Equally troubling is Mr. Meese's somewhat skimpy legal background. Although he once served as an assistant district attorney in California and was director of the Center for Criminal Justice Policy and Management at the School of Law at the University of California in San Diego before coming to Washington, he has spent much of his career doing political work for Mr. Reagan. He is a lightweight in the lagal arena, and we think this country has had enough of attorneys general who gained their appointment through political cronyism. The nation's top law enforcement official should have an extensive legal background, and he or she should be above reproach from a moral and ethical standpoint. Mr. Meese falls short on both counts.

Ed Meese may be a valued friend and political adviser to Mr. Reagan. But there are many other people in this country who are better qualified to be attorney general. The Senate should reject his nomination and the President should come up with a better one.

[From the Davenport (IA) Quad-City Times, Jan. 29, 1985]

HE'S ASKING TOO MUCH

If it wasn't bad enough that Edwin Meese seemingly lacks the right ethics stuff to become the U.S. attorney general, now he wants taxpayers to pick up the full $720,923 he spent on expensive lawyers to prove to investigators that he is not a crook and is qualified for the presidential appointment.

Meese hired some top legal guns to defend himself against accusations of financial improprieties. While these investigations let Meese off the criminal hook, they scarred his nomination to such an important position in the Justice Department. Ethics considerations remain in light of Meese helping to get government jobs for a half dozen people who did him financial favors. Meese's wheel-and-deal with federal jobs and other questionable actions make him unfit to serve at Justice.

As for the fees that Meese is trying to recover from his investigation by independent counsel Jacob Stein, that is an extravagant request that Justice properly is contesting. Meese is entitled to some reasonable reimbursement for legal fees as established by law, but not in a $250-an-hour category. The outrageousness of the Meese request can be seen by comparing it to the $320,000 cost of the government investigation.

Meese, the White House counselor who helped battle against federal legal services for the poor, apparently is a more liberal government spender when he is affected personally. Meese should submit a much smaller legal bill. He also should save President Reagan further embarrassment by withdrawing his name from attorney general consideration. He just doesn't morally measure to such a sensitive post.

[From the Des Moines Register, Jan. 31, 1985]

MEESE IS NOT QUALIFIED

Let it be said clearly: Edwin Meese III is not a criminal, but neither is he qualified, professionally or ethically, to become attorney general of the United States.

James J. Kilpatrick, writing on the opposite page, devotes quite some space to ridiculing Archibald Cox as just too, too virtuous, and declares Meese to be a fine fellow guilty of no more than "the ordinary manifestations of politics and friendship."

Colman McCarthy's column gets closer to the heart of the matter, saying it isn't right vs. left, as some would make it, but right vs. wrong: that Meese's dubious money deals with people who got government jobs and his buddyism would disgrace the Justice Department.

Not to the extent that Richard Nixon's attorneys general, John Mitchell and Richard Kleindienst, disgraced it before they went to jail, McCarthy concedes. Much is made by Meese's backers of the fact that an independent counsel examining allegations against him found nothing that would sustain an indictment.

As we have said before, the mere fact that a person is not a criminal does not qualify him for the nation's highest law-enforcement office. Neither do "the ordinary manifestations of politics and friendship."

[From the Duluth (MN) News Tribune, Jan. 29, 1985]

MEESE REMAINS A POOR CHOICE

The worst of the storm may have passed, but Ed Meese is still not a proper choice to be attorney general of the United States.

The Senate Judiciary Committee begins hearings today on President Reagan's nomination of his old friend Meese to be our nation's chief legal authority. Meese's nomination has long been a subject of controversy in our nation's capital because of his many questionable practices during his first-term stint as Reagan's White House counsel.

But now Washington pols predict Meese will win Senate confirmation. The Reagan administration argues the controversy surrounding him was ended by a report of a special prosecutor who last fall found no cause to charge Meese with violating federal laws. Furthermore, Reagan's recent electoral landside seems to have helped grease the skids for Meese.

On the latter point, we would point out that Reagan's personal popularity is in no way transferrable to his friend and would-be attorney general. As to the claims concerning the special prosecutor's finding of "no basis" to indict Meese, we concur with former special prosecutor Archibald Cox: "The effort to sweep Mr. Meese into office on the strength of the independent counsel's report misrepresents the character of that report." That report, Cox contended a month ago, showed Meese to be "blind to the ethical standards and obligations required of a public official."

Lack of criminality does not justify making a person our government's most important and most powerful crime fighter and legal protector. If Meese's nomination reaches the Senate floor, we hope there are enough Republican senators with the nerve and the decency to defy their president and vote to reject this imprudent choice. And we hope to be able to count Minnesota's two Independent-Republican senators, David Durenberger and Rudy Boschwitz, among the "no" votes.

[From the Easton (PA) Express, Jan. 31, 1985]

MEESE LIKELY TO WIN, BUT QUESTIONS REMAIN

If tenacity were the main requirement for the office of attorney general, Edwin Meese III would qualify easily. President Reagan nominated his "trusted counselor" and longtime California friend to head the Justice Department more than a year ago.

The Cabinet position, of course, requires much more. It calls for a person with a firm grasp of the law, a dedication to its highest principles and a professional background that is as clean as the proverbial hound's tooth. Some past attorneys general have fallen short of these ideals, but his administration has often sounded the trumpet of ethical purity.

Meese's political history and the rather narrow views he has voiced about justice in America—including his famous remark that some stand in soup lines "because the food is free and it's easier than paying for it"—lead us to question whether he could bring even-handed leadership and set an ideal example in the administration of justice.

Against that must be measured the traditional right of a president to choose his Cabinet members. Reagan and Meese have stood their ground through more than a year of controversy. Meese may well win confirmation primarily because the Republicans control the Senate.

A court-appointed independent counsel last year investigated allegations that Meese had helped obtain federal jobs for people who had helped him with his own financial problems. The counsel, Jacob A. Stein, found that Meese had not committed any criminal actions and that there was "no basis" to prosecute him. But Stein did not take up the ethics question. Two lawyers on the government ethics office staff found that Meese had "violated the standards of conduct or other applicable statutes."

The director of the ethics office, Reagan appointee David H. Marin, not only rejected his staff's findings but sought to keep the report from the public. Martin at first wrote to the Judiciary Committee that Meese had committed one violation of standards involving an appearance of impropriety, but a day later Martin wrote that "there was no substance to the appearance problem." Martin said he reached his conclusion after a "robust, open and free exchange" with his staff.

A sore point to many people is Meese's effort to win reimbursement for $720,000 in legal fees he incurred defending himself. These fees were at the rate of a mere $250 an hour.

Two points are especially irritating: Much of the legal work was done by associates and assistants to Meese's star-priced lawyers; only under questioning by Sen. Charles McC. Mathias, R-Md., did Meese later admit that his lawyers would accept whatever the court rules they are entitled to be paid. The rate will probably be much lower than $250. Ironically, it is the Justice Department that is responsible for preventing excessive drains on the U.S. Treasury.

If Meese is confirmed, he will enter the office with inappropriate baggage of ethical conduct questions that have not been resolved to the complete satisfaction of many. And that will be a burden to his effective conduct of that office.

[From the Elmira (NY) Star-Gazette, Jan. 27, 1985]

UNFIT FOR ATTORNEY GENERAL

The case against Edwin Meese III is growing more interesting each day with no further evidence being produced to justify his appointment at attorney general. His latest caper is a request for a court award of $700,000 in legal fees that it cost to clear him of criminal charges.

Meese, who has been blind to the ethical standards of public office, is not qualified to become the nation's highest law enforcement officer. Although Washington lawyer Jacob A. Stein, an independent counsel who investigated 11 charges of misconduct failed to find basis to indict him on criminal charges, the report doesn't bleach out the stained record of the presidential adviser.

The indisputed evidence in the report shows Meese repeatedly participated in appointments of high government officials who gave financial favors.

There are too many failures in Meese's past to warrant confirmation of his appointment. The sooner President Reagan realizes his close political associate is unfit to serve the better off the nation.

[From the Eugene (OR) Register-Guard, Jan. 23, 1985]

SENATE SHOULD DUMP MEESE

We suspect that even the Republicans in the U.S. Senate would be happy to see President Reagan withdraw the nomination of Edwin Meese for attorney general. But Reagan won't.

The Senate should reject the nomination out of hand. But, sadly, it probably won't.

So, the frustrating prospect is that the Senate will confirm this sleazy appointment and the wheeling-and-dealing Mr. Meese will sometime next month become the chief legal officer of the United States. How utterly outrageous that prospect is.

It's true that special prosecutor Jacob Stein investigated various allegations against Meese and last September cleared the nominee of any indictable offense. But Stein pointedly left unanswered the questions of Meese's ethical behavior or his fitness for office. In fact, Stein clearly urged the Senate to explore those areas on its own.

The ethical questions involve cases of people who had helped Meese and his family financially suddenly receiving lucrative federal jobs, an unreported $15,000 interest-free loan to Meese's wife, his highly irregular promotion in the Army reserve and his still-fuzzy role in the purloined Carter campaign documents.

We presume Stein is legally correct in concluding that none of these instances violated federal law. But that is a far cry from saying that they meet even the minimum standards the nation should expect of a person in high office, especially the office of attorney general. If Meese's activities aren't indictable, they are ethically indefensible. As for his legal credentials, we view them as, at best, limited.

In short, Meese's only real qualification for the job is personal loyalty to Ronald Reagan. By any measure that's simply not enough. As the Los Angeles Times noted recently, an ethical blind spot is a major—and disqualifying—infirmity in an attorney general. We wish that the President and, especially, the Senate agreed.

[From the Gary (IN) Post-Tribune Feb. 1, 1985]

MEESE IS NOT BEST CHOICE

The only compelling argument for confirming Ed Meese as attorney general of the United States is that he's President Reagan's choice. That is a powerful political argument. The real test is whether Meese is qualified for the job, and of course he is not.

Being an old, loyal friend of a president is not good enough. What has happened to high standards in public service? The Senate may not want to open that door because it is a broad question that its members have to answer.

There are enough questions about Meese's definition of ethics to raise doubts, but there is no evidence that he has violated any laws. Impropriety is not the same as illegality, but it is unbecoming in a man who aspires to be the country's chief law enforcer, its role model in the fields of justice and fairness.

The perception of impropriety is deadly, too. Meese has been cleared of any criminal acts. That's good, but the fact that an investigation was necessary is significant. Saying that he is not a crook is no great accolade.

But aside from these questions, there is very little to recommend Meese for this position. He has not distinguished himself in the law, and his concern for the rights of poor people in seeking justice is revealing. He has vigorously opposed creating a federal program that would provide lawyers for the poor, and he called the American Civil Liberties Union a "criminals' lobby."

The president apparently does not expect the new attorney general to inspire the nation to lofty levels of justice. If he does not see this office as the very heartbeat of the American system, he is endorsing mediocrity, not urging the country to stand tall. He can find distinguished lawyers to do the job. There is no indication that he has looked for such persons, and that is discouraging.

He has turned to a buddy, and Meese is a distinguished buddy.

Meese's confirmation will tell the country that there is little room for high expectations.

[From the Huntington (WV) Herald-Dispatch, Feb. 2, 1985]

MEESE UNFIT FOR JOB

We've said it before and we'll say it again: Ed Meese isn't fit to be attorney general of these United States.

After lengthy scrutiny, Meese has been officially cleared of any criminal wrongdoing in connection with his financial dealings. But just because he's not a crook, doesn't mean he's qualified to be attorney general.

It was, after all, Ed Meese who convinced President Reagan to try for a while to block extension of the Voting Rights Act.

It was Ed Meese who, as White House counselor and the president's long-time friend, dragged Reagan into the indefensible position of trying to award tax-exempt status to schools which practiced unabashed racial discrimination.

It was Ed Meese who made Scrooge look like a saint when he suggested that thousands of hungry Americans lining up at soup kitchens were really bums and chislers just looking for a free meal.

And it was Ed Meese who, despite that clean bill of health given his financial dealings has revealed a total failure to understand this basic rule of public life: You must not only avoid conflicts of interest but also the appearance of such conflicts.

Is this the kind of man who should be the top "lawman" in America?

No.

Barring some further revelations, it appears likely that Reagan's nomination of Meese will be confirmed by the Senate.

The issue seems to be hardening along party lines, and the Republicans are in the saddle. Even in the Democratic ranks, the argument is being offered that, no matter how distasteful an appointee and his views might be, the president is entitled to have the people he wants to have serving in his Cabinet.

We urge West Virginia's senators—Robert C. Byrd and Jay Rockefeller—to reject this easy rationalization.

For the attorney general is not just another secretary of Commerce or Labor. As the chief legal officer for the nation, he is expected to be, in the words of Sen. Joe Biden, D-Del., "the beacon, the citadel of what young lawyers should aspire to."

To confirm Ed Meese as attorney general would tarnish the luster of one of the most important public offices in this land.

[From the Jackson (MI) Citizen Patriot, Jan. 31, 1985]

MEESE IS UNFIT FOR THE JOB

Once again Edwin Meese III is seeking confirmation as President Reagan's nominee for U.S. attorney general. This week a new round of confirmation hearings began before the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Last year, the Senate delayed confirmation when questions were raised concerning Meese's fitness to serve as the nation's highest law enforcement official. An independent counsel, Jacob A. Stein, was appointed to conduct an inquiry into the allegations, some of which were criminal in nature.

After five months, Stein reported on Sept. 20 that he had found no basis "for bringing of a prosecution against Mr. Meese for violation of a criminal statute." Stein studiously avoided characterizing the ethical propriety of Meese's business dealings.

Meese, who is White House counsel, declared that he had been vindicated, and Mr. Reagan vowed to resubmit his name to the new Congress as the attorney general nominee.

This week, however, there was more damaging material submitted. Two attorneys in the Office of Government Ethics concluded that Meese had violated federal ethics laws, but they were overruled by the head of the office, who is a Reagan appointee. Their dissenting report asserts that there are grounds for prosecuting Meese.

Well, one need not be an attorney to see why Meese is unfit for the job. This is not a position for someone who merely squeaks by in a technical reading of the law. The person holding that high office must be above reproach. Meese's recent career poses too many annoying and unresolved questions.

President Reagan, in persisting to nominate his friend, has turned loyalty from a virtue into a vice. The Senate owes nothing to the president or to Meese on this nomination, but it owes much to the American public. An honest judgment should be rendered on the Meese nomination, and we think honesty would dictate that confirmation be denied.

[From the Janesville (WI) Gazette, Feb. 1, 1985]

MEESE CONFIRMATION WOULD BE A MISTAKE

An extraordinary examination has been going on this week into the questionable ethical conduct of President Reagan's choice for attorney general, Edwin Meese III. Nothing criminal has been disclosed, but some pretty unseemly conduct is readily apparent.

The office Meese seeks is the most sensitive in the Justice Department, a position requiring infinite integrity. The attorney general's post, as Delaware Sen. Joseph Biden said the other day, should be "a beacon, the citadel of what young lawyers should adhere to."

Questions of ethical judgment center on these issues:

Charges that Meese received financial help from individuals who later were given federal jobs in the Reagan administation.

The promotion of Meese in the Army Reserves. He was found to have been improperly transferred from retired to active-reserve, then promoted to colonel. He later was retired.

Meese's request for $720,000 from the government to pay legal expenses in his own defense regarding his finances—at rates up to $250 an hour charged by his lawyers.

An item reported by the Wall Street Journal stating that Meese had violated the government's ethical standards in two instances and that a report regarding those incidents was not released.

Common Cause, an independent watchdog of government operations, has been fighting an aggressive drive against confirmation. Its chairman, Archibald Cox, former Watergate special prosecutor, said the report contained evidence of "Meese's own low regard for ethics in government."

"To declare that the president's nominee for attorney general should be approved whenever there is no basis for his criminal prosecution would have disastrous consequences," Cox wrote. "The attorney general has more opportunity to set the ethical tone of an administration than any official other than the president . . ."

Newspapers across the country have voiced opposition to Meese's nomination, including the Chicago Tribune, Los Angeles Times, Des Moines Register, Boston Globe and others.

In March 1984, the Senate Judiciary Committee began hearings on Meese but postponed action in response to numerous charges revealed in committee hearings and in the press. Attorney Jacob Stein was appointed as independent counsel to head a criminal investigation of Meese.

Eleven charges against Meese resulted, but in September it concluded there was "no basis" for prosecuting Meese under federal criminal law. Reagan hailed the report as a "vindication" of Meese, leading to the impression that he had been exonerated.

But Meese was not exonerated of ethical improprieties.

We believe it would be a grave mistake for the Senate to confirm the appointment of Meese and that President Reagan should withdraw Meese's name.

[From the Lansing (MI) State Journal, Feb. 2, 1985]

MEESE NOT BEST CHOICE

Members of the Senate Judiciary Committee are expected to vote next week on sending the nomination of attorney general designate Edwin Meese III to the full Senate for confirmation.

If that happens, Meese likely will be confirmed on a mostly party line vote—and that's regreattable. We editorialized nearly a year ago that Meese was a poor choice for this most crucial job, and we still think so.

Arguments raged on this past week over allegations of unethical conduct by Meese, despite the fact that a special prosecutor investigated the charges last year and cleared Meese of any criminal wrong doing. The charges centered primarily on claims that a couple of friends who performed financial favors for Meese about four years ago ended up with top federal appointments.

Jacobs Stein, the special prosecutor, did not pass judgment on the ethics questions, but held that Meese was not in conflict of interest and had committed no violations of law. Meese continued to insist that he had done nothing wrong, but did suggest last week that if he had to do it over he might do things differently.

In pursuing their attack, his critics suggest that the ethics questions leave a cloud over the nomination. They do, but that will not likely change anything in the Senate, where the Republican majority will argue that President Reagan is entitled to have the person he wants for the job.

A concern seldom mentioned is that Meese does not have the best credentials for this job, which is the top law enforcement posision in the nation.

It is a post that calls for a leader with considerable experience in legal practice, one who is far above average in knowledge of the law and the Constitution, and one who is not heavily burdened by prior political activism. We believe Meese falls short on all these counts.

Meese's major claim to the office seems to be the fact that he was the president's chief of staff when he was governor of California; that he was a key official in Reagan's 1980 election campaign, and that he since has served as a White House legal counselor—who has remained politically active.

In other words, he is the president's buddy.

Well, we question again that this is the best standard for choosing the person who will head the U.S. Justice Department. We have seen in the past the not-so-happy results of President Nixon's appointment of political buddy John Mitchell to the post years ago. And it was to the dismay of legal experts across the land that President John F. Kennedy named his brother Robert to the job in the early 1960s, even though the younger Kennedy fell far short of the legal experience appropriate to the post.

Cronyism was not and is not a desirable credential from the standpoint of creating public confidence in the Justice Department.

It's regrettable that President Reagan did not ask his friend to withdraw long ago, since he surely could present other candidates who are far more qualified and find other ways to reward Meese for his loyal and effective personal service.

Had he done so, it might have saved the taxpayers about $720,000 in legal expense reimbursement Meese claims is due him for defending himself against the ethics and conflict of interest issues last year. Meese reportedly is entitled to ask for the reimbursement under provisions of the Ethics in Government Act.

Reagan, being Reagan, is not going to back off. The only hope now is that the Senate committee will reject the nomination, but that seems highly unlikely, too.

[From the Lexington (KY) Herald-Leader, Jan. 31, 1985]

MEESE JUST ISN'T CUT OUT TO BE ATTORNEY GENERAL

President Reagan has put the nation's senators in a bind. They can either deny a recently re-elected president the right to appoint whomever he wants to one of the nation's most important positions, or they can allow him to name an unqualified man to be the nation's top legal officer.

That is the choice posed by the president's nomination of Edwin Meese to be attorney general. The Senate Judiciary Committee is now considering the nomination; it will eventually go to the full Senate for consideration.

In making the decision on Meese's appointment, the senators face a difficult decision. First off, he is a close adviser to President Reagan. There is much to be said for the notion that a president should be given broad latitude to appoint those he wants to important posts.

The question is, how broad should that latitude be? A thorough investigation into Meese's background failed to turn up any evidence that he broke the law in some questionable dealings while on the White House staff. There is nothing in his background that would immediately disqualify him from being attorney general.

That's good enough for many senators, perhaps enough to ensure Meese's confirmation. Meese's critics, led by Democrat Howard Metzenbaum of Ohio, contend that even though Meese broke no laws, his financial arrangements with people later appointed to high government positions show an ethical insensitivity that should disqualify him from office. There is weight to that argument, though it would be easier to accept if it were being put forward by someone other than Metzenbaum, whose own record is not exactly a shining example of ethical sensitivity.

The concern over Meese's sense of propriety does not by itself disqualify him. But Meese's insensitivity to ethical conflicts is really just a symptom of a larger problem with his nomination. Meese simply does not have the legal background the nation has a right to expect of an attorney general.

Meese's legal career has never carried him into the upper reaches of the legal world. He can point to no major cases, no experience as a judge. His major qualification is that he is the president's friend. Were that not the case, no one would ever think of him as material for such an appointment.

In some offices, the question of qualifications does not matter. The attorney general, though, is not just the president's lawyer. He is also the nation's lawyer, its top prosecutor, its top law-enforcement official.

In deciding to stick with Meese and to push for his confirmation, the president has displayed considerable loyalty. That is one of the admirable personal qualities that led American voters to re-elect him overwhelmingly last November. The Republican-controlled Senate, mindful of the size of that victory, are likely to be of a mind to go along with what the president wants to do.

That would be a serious mistake in this case. The Senate should reject the nomination. The president and the nation can—and should—do better than Ed Meese for this important job.

[From the Lexington (NC) Dispatch, Jan. 30, 1985]

MEESE IS UNFIT

The office of Attorney General of the United States is the nation's top legal position. The person filling that high post is the country's chief law enforcement official and the president's most trusted legal adviser. Quite simply, he or she should be above reproach—a person of high ethical standards, of proven legal ability, of sound judgment and with a sense of fairness.

Over the years, the men who have served as Attorney General generally have fulfilled those broadly expected but unwritten requirements; naturally, some have been stronger than others.

The man President Reagan wants to serve in his Cabinet as Attorney General, Edwin Meese 3d, is totally unfit to hold that high position.

For almost a year, attention has focused on whether Mr. Meese is a crook or not. A special, independent counsel determined last year that there was no reason to prosecute Mr. Meese for criminal wrongdoings, but now, this week, it has become known that two Office of Government Ethics officials have concluded that he violated ethics rules. That conclusion was kept secret by the investigators' boss, David H. Martin, a political appointee of President Reagan; Mr. Martin simply suppressed the evidence and overruled it, reporting that Edwin Meese had not violated any ethics rules.

As Archibald Cox, who served as first Watergate Special Prosecutor under President Nixon until the "Saturday Night Massacres," noted recently, "It's not enough for someone to be Attorney General to have a sign saying, 'I've been found not to be a crook.'"

Now Mr. Meese may have to add an appendage to that sign, this one explaining, "But I do break government ethics rules."

Is this the kind of man Americans want to be Attorney General? We think not.

There are those people in Washington who think that Mr. Reagan, in light of his landslide victory in November, can do almost anything. He can, of course, choose whom he wants for his Cabinet members, and, to a point, he should; those Cabinet members are his most trusted circle of advisors, men and women who help establish and implement policy. The Attorney General is no different from the other Cabinet members.

But even if Mr. Meese did not break the law, and even if the federal ethics investigators are wrong, he should not be confirmed.

The reason simply is that he is not qualified. His legal scholarship is far from distinguished and so is his career in the law. In his most recent job, as counselor to the President, Mr. Meese sought to wipe out years of gains in civil rights and undermine a law creating a federal program of lawyers for poor people. He speaks out crassly, making absurd and unsupportable comments such as calling the American Civil Liberties Union a "criminals' lobby." His memory is poor, which is how he has explained many of his questionable dealings that led to the criminal investigation.

Why should Mr. Reagan go out on such a weak limb with his nomination of, and continued support for, Mr. Meese? He shouldn't.

It would be better for him and his administration, and certainly for the country, if he would withdraw the nomination and choose "someone with impeccable professional and ethical qualifications," as the Beaumont (Texas) Enterprise said last December.

[From the Lincoln (NE) Evening Journal, Jan. 31, 1985

WHAT ONE MIGHT EXPECT?

Question. Was Edwin Meese III telling the truth when he declared to a Senate Committee he has met all "ethical as well as legal" standards and therefore should be confirmed as attorney general of the United States?

Answer. Yes, given Meese's ill-formed understanding of ethical behavior.

Who other than one with such a narrowness of conprehension would do what Meese did in 1981? When told that he could not legally use about $10,000 from the Presidential Transition Fund in 1980 to move his family to Washington, Meese ordered public records doctored to reflect the payment as a "consulting fee".

It is just such incidents that get seized and exploited by to many people as monkey-see, monkey-do justifications for scams they try to pull on government. (Welfare Queen, anyone?) Never discount the power of example at the top, both positive and negative, to influence behavior at other points on the human bean pole.

How many Nebraskans would want as their attorney general a man who displayed such ethical flexibility as Meese? Not us, here in Lincoln, or in Washington. The fitness of men and women for such great public trusts can be measured by their previous conduct in situations requiring ethical decisions.

[From the Arkansas Gazette, Jan. 31, 1985]

MR. MEESE FAILS THE TEST

The attorney general of the United States should be able to recognize and therefore avoid situations that may have the appearance of unethical behavior. Despite his disclaimers before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Edwin Meese III does not seem to have these necessary qualities. Based on President Reagan's continuing support for the White House counselor, Meese's nomination as attorney general may well win committee approval, but Meese would be doing Mr. Reagan a favor by withdrawing at some early juncture in the Senate confirmation process.

It is true that Mr. Meese has been cleared of any criminal violations in alleged fiscal improprieties that were the subject of an investigation last year by independent counsel Jacob A. Stein, who was appointed by a panel of federal judges to make the investigation under the Ethics in Government Act. There is disagreement before the committee over whether ethical questions have been settled, but this disagreement suggests another question: Should there be such a close question about ethical judgment when the job at issue is attorney general, who is the nation's top law enforcement official?

We must agree, at least in part, with Senator Howard Metzenbaum of Ohio that "Mr. Meese lacks the integrity of character, the even-handedness of purpose and the sensivity to ethical values required of the attorney general of the United States." Mr. Meese has pledged to the committee that in the future he will be more alert to "appearances of impropriety" if he is confirmed, and on this he should be given the benefit of the doubt. But he shouldn't be given the job.

[From the Longview (TX) Morning Journal & News, Jan. 31, 1985]

EDITORIALS—MEESE'S IMAGE DAMAGED

After months of haggling over the "appearance of improprieties" in the activities of Edwin Meese, it's fair to ask whether the nation would be better off if the attorney general-designate withdrew his name from consideration.

There is no question that opposition to Meese's nomination is largely political, but it is also apparent he runs a loose ship. Meese admitted to the Senate Judiciary Committee that he had been less sensitive to potential ethical or conflict-of-interest problems than he should have been.

Meese has steadfastly denied any wrong doing and no evidence presented to the inquiring committee so far proves otherwise. But Meese's business transactions have made him vulnerable to accusations no attorney general-designate should face.

One report by the Office of Government Ethics staff concludes that "an appearance of using an official position to private advantage" was created by Meese's support of a San Francisco accountant's appointment to the U.S. Postal Board of Governors. A month before the accountant's name first came up at the White House, he arranged a $40,000 loan for Meese, who at that time was on the White House staff.

Perhaps Meese had no intention of seeking a favor, but it was also noted in the report that after the accountant received the appointment, he allowed Meese to defer payment of some interest on the loan.

In another instance, a man who helped finance the purchase of Meese's California home was given a job with the Interior Department. It may have been a coincidence, as the director of the ethics office says it was.

Nevertheless, these and other incidents raised serious questions. Meese may be one of the most honest men in Washington, but his ability to serve effectively as attorney general has been hurt.

He is a victim of "appearance of improprieties," which can be as damaging as an actual violation.

[From the Los Angeles (CA) Herald Examiner, Jan. 30, 1985]

JUSTICE FOR MEESE? YES, BUT NOT THE JUSTICE DEPARTMENT

Everyone makes mistakes, but Edwin Meese has used up the quota for a prospective Attorney General, particularly when he stubbornly insists he did nothing wrong. To be sure, a special prosecutor found Meese innocent of any criminal violations last fall. But an Office of Government Ethics staff report made public yesterday looks at the case differently.

The report's authors, both attorneys, assert that Meese may indeed have violated both federal statutes and ethical requirements. Yet David H. Martin, the ethics office chief, whom President Reagan appointed, shelved the report and gave Meese a clean bill of health.

The report says Meese may have violated statutes "prohibiting a federal employee from accepting a gift from any other federal employee receiving less pay than himself." For one thing, in 1981, Meese received a $60,000 loan from John R. McKean, part of which was paid after McKean had been nominated to a seat on the U.S. Postal Board of Governmors. (Meese participated in McKean's personnel review, by the way.) The report also stated there was "an appearance problem" in the $70,000 that Thomas J. Barrack Jr. contributed to help finance the purchase of Meese's San Diego home. Afterwards, Barrack received two high federal appointments, again with Meese playing a role in the personnel-review process.

Even if Meese is innocent of violating any other federal statutes, he appears to have violated at least the spirit of the Ethics in Government Act, prohibiting actions that "might result in, or create the appearance of . . . using public office for private gain . . . giving preferential treatment to any organization or person . . . or affecting adversely the confidence of the public in the integrity of the government."

The $15,000 interest-free loan Meese received from Edwin Thomas, a family friend who, along with his wife and son, were later appointed to federal jobs, follows the pattern. And Meese's highly unusual promotion to colonel in the Army Reserve while serving in the White House makes the case even more damning. An attorney general is far more than a politician; he is the highest law-enforcement officer in the land. Meese's actions make him unsuitable for the job.

[From the Louisville (KY) Courier-Journal, Jan. 30, 1985]

SENATE HAS REASONABLE GROUNDS FOR REJECTING MEESE NOMINATION

What the White House hoped would be a quick and fairly quiet Senate hearing on Edwin Meese's fitness to be U.S. attorney general has again erupted in controversy. That's tough on Mr. Meese and his friend and mentor, President Reagan. But this nomination, which was put on hold last year after earlier controversy, is much too questionable to be confirmed in haste.

In fact, at this point the Senate—based on the public record—has solid grounds for rejecting the Meese nomination. Even the nominee doesn't deny that individuals who helped him financially, by lending him money or arranging loans on unusually favorable terms, were the later recipients of federal appointments. To make matters worse, Mr. Meese was a member of the senior White House staff that approved these appointments. Yet Mr. Meese righteously insists only that there was no connection whatsoever between those federal jobs and the personal help he had received.

Maybe not. But according to The Wall Street Journal, two staff members of the Office of Government Ethics who studied the record concluded that Mr. Meese violated federal rules that forbid actions that "might result in, or create the appearance of . . . giving preferential treatment to any organization or person." The staff report was later overruled by the director of the ethics office, a Reagan appointee. But the conclusions of the two staffers are pretty much what any reasonable and unbiased observer would reach when confronted by the facts in the case. At the very least, there was the appearance of serious conflicts of interest.

Mr. Meese and his defenders note that a thorough investigation last year by an independent counsel, Jacob Stein, uncovered no evidence of criminal conduct. But the Stein report hardly amounted to an endorsement of Mr. Meese's nomination to be the nation's top legal officer. An attorney general should have an impeccable record that enables him to proclaim more than just "I am not a crook."

Mr. Meese has billed the government for more than $700,000 in fees for lawyers representing him during the Stein investigation. The bill seems high—reportedly about $225 an hour—but that's said to be the going rate for first-rate legal help in Washington these days. The government should try to bargain the figure down, if only to get an example in other cases in which it pays private attorneys. But the government's expressions of shock subsided quickly when news got out that it has been paying private lawyers as much as $285 an hour.

In any event, there is no question that Mr. Meese has a right, under 1983 amendments to the Ethics in Government Act, to demand that the government pick up his legal tab. Beyond that, though, he's not in a position to do much demanding. Nor is Mr. Reagan. The Senate is under no obligation to confirm this nomination merely because Mr. Meese has for so long been a pal, adviser and ideological soul-mate of the President.

The only legitimate question at the moment is whether Mr. Meese is qualified to be attorney general. The evidence so far—which shows an appalling insensitivity by Mr. Meese in situations fraught with ethical dangers—suggests that he isn't fit for the job.

[From the Louisville Times (Louisville), KY Jan. 30, 1985]

WRONG-HEADED AND WRONG-HEARTED, MEESE'S ETHICAL SHORTCOMINGS MAKE HIM UNFIT FOR ATTORNEY GENERAL

Edwin Meese III contends he has conducted himself "in accordance to the ethical as well as the legal standards of behavior for public officials." If that is the case, then Mr. Meese needs to consult a dictionary.

Since a special counsel, after a five-month investigation, concluded that Mr. Meese was not indictable for some of his actions, he can claim to have acted legally. But there should be a higher standard for the attorney general, the nation's top law-enforcement officer, than the fact that he is not a crook.

For if words means what they said, Mr. Meese is at best dissembling when he claims to have obeyed the ethical standards laid down for public officials. Those standards, among other things, forbid officials from taking actions that "might result in, or create the appearance of . . . giving preferential treatment to any organization or person."

Two lawyers on the staff of the Office of Government Ethics concluded that Mr. Meese's actions on two occasions violated that code. One involved Mr. Meese's assistance in getting a government appointment for John R. McKean, a San Francisco Accountant, who arranged a $40,000 loan for Mr. Meese. The other involved the appointment of another California, Thomas Barrack, to an Interior Department job after he helped sell Mr. Meese's California house.

David Martin, director of the ethics office, overturned the staff recommendation, ruling that Mr. Meese only had "minor participation in the appointment of Mr. McKean. He did concede that there was an appearance of a violation of the standards. In other words, he and Mr. Meese say the ethical standards don't say what they say about creating "the appearance" of a conflict.

But Mr. Meese's weaknesses go beyond his ethical overights. He lacks broad legal experience. His understanding of the law is brought into question by his efforts to restore tax exemptions to schools that discriminate against blacks and to sabotage the program of legal services to the poor.

Mr. Meese is wrong-headed and wrong-hearted. Nothing says the attorney general can't be both. But he doesn't have to be. Mr. Meese is not the only lawyer who can give the President advice that he want to hear. The Senate should give one of them the opportunity by rejecting the Meese nomination.

[From the Capital Times (Madison, WI), Jan. 31, 1985]

CONTAIN THE MESS AROUND MEESE

The continuing saga of Ed Meese, the man who wants to set the tone for the nation's Justice Department, gets messier and messier.

Meese, of course, ran into trouble with the Senate in his bid to become attorney general because he seemed to have difficulty paying attention to ethical niceties like not using his powerful position as counselor to the president to help out those who had done him personal favors.

The Reagan administration thought Meese was "vindicated" last fall when a special prosecutor said Meese had broken no laws. That was good to hear, because Meese thus will not need furloughs from prison to run the Justice Department.

But the special prosecutor's report was not quite the vindication it seemed to be at first blush. Common Cause used the material gathered by the prosecutor to demonstrate Meese's insensitivity to the ethics that should go with someone holding a high government position.

Now we learn that the staff attorneys in the Office of Government Ethics had their own concerns about whether Meese followed government rules in dealing with his friends who later got government jobs.

But we didn't learn that because the Office of Government Ethics let us know about it. The head of that office, David H. Martin, neatly skipped over the attorneys' concerns when he told the Senate Judiciary Committee last week that Meese had complied with federal conflict-of-interest laws and regulations.

Meanwhile, Meese himself told the committee he has developed "a much higher level of sensitivity" to ethical questions since he first came to Washington. We would hope so, given what he's been through. His plea for the government to pay his legal fees—outlined by columnist Colman McCarthy at right—suggests that some more "sensitivity training" might be in order here, however.

The fundamental problem with making Meese the nation's attorney general is that it sends the wrong signal to all in public service. If anyone in government should set a high ethical tone, it should be the attorney general. From the initial conflicts through the coverup of the attorneys' reservations about him through the dispute over the legal fees, the Meese nomination has been stuck in an ethical swamp.

There's no need to bring that swamp into the halls of the Justice Department.

[From the Wisconsin State Journal (Madison, WI) Jan. 30, 1985]

MEESE FALLS SHORT

An independent investigation last year cleared Edwin Meese III, President Reagan's nominee for attorney general, of criminal wrongdoing in connection with his personal finances.

Hearings on Meese's nomination were delayed, pending outcome of that investigation.

Now, on the eve of confirmation hearings, Meese's lawyer has acknowledged that a preliminary report by the office of government ethics found Meese had violated federal ethics rules, but the findings were overruled by David Martin, director of the ethics office.

The ethics office found violations involving two individuals—Thomas Barrack, who helped Meese sell his California home, and John R. McKean, who arranged two loans for Meese totaling $60,000.

Barrack, a California real-estate developer, was hired by the Interior Department. McKean became chairman of the Postal Service Board of Governors.

The incidents were part of the earlier independent investigation, which cleared Meese of criminal offenses. No ethical judgments were made as a result of that inquiry.

Sen. Strom Thurmond, chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee that is holding confirmation hearings and a Meese supporter, promptly arranged for Martin and the two staff members who prepared the preliminary ethics report to testify before the committee.

The U.S. attorney general is the nation's chief law-enforcement officer. As such, his integrity and personal virtue should not be suspect.

But even the most charitable reading of Meese's convoluted financial dealings must conclude they have been ethically questionable.

Meese has been a valuable personal adviser to the president; that doesn't mean he has the right stuff to be attorney general. President Reagan should replace Meese with someone more qualified.

[From the Miami (FL) Herald, Jan. 29, 1985]

OF CAESAR'S WIFE

As this nation's chief law-enforcement officer, the U.S. Attorney General should have an unblemished reputation for probity and rectitude. The name of the Department that he heads—Justice—encapsulates in itself the reason why: If the Attorney General is not without taint, how can his Department's policies be perceived as blind to all interest save that of justice?

That is the question that confronts the Senate Judiciary Committee today as it opens hearings anew into President Reagan's nomination of his White House counselor, Edwin Meese III, to be Attorney General. The nomination itself is not considered imperiled, because a court-appointed independent counsel last September cleared Mr. Meese of any criminal wrongdoing. That done, the Senate committee's Republican majority is not likely to deny the President his choice as Attorney General.

Criminality is not the issue here, however; ethics is. It is one thing to absolve a nominee for Attorney General of criminal misdeeds. It is quite another thing to say that Mr. Meese has lived up to the ethical standards that an Attorney General, especially, should observe.

Independent Counsel Jacob A. Stein's court-specified duty was to investigate and report on whether Mr. Meese broke any criminal laws. Mr. Stein was not asked to evaluate Mr. Meese's ethics, on which his report therefore is silent.

Clearly Mr. Meese's actions were not ethical. It was not ethical for him to accept loans totaling $60,000 from John R. McKean, later named to the U.S. Postal Service's governing board. It was not ethical for Mr. Meese to "forget" a $15,000, interest-free loan to his wife from a man who later got a Government job. It was not ethical for Mr. Meese to accept $10,000 for "moving expenses" from Mr. Reagan's 1980 election campaign and, when told that paying moving expenses was illegal, to have the payment's alleged purpose changed to read "consulting fees." Nor was it ethical for Mr. Meese to accept financial assistance in the sale of his California home from a man who later was named an assistant Secretary of Commerce by a committee on which Mr. Meese served.

So Edwin Meese, the Attorney General-designate, stands exonerated of criminal conduct. Yet time and again, Mr. Stein's report found that persons who assisted Mr. Meese in his personal finances then got Federal jobs.

Perhaps these coincidences are just that, without cause-and-effect ties. Or perhaps they indicate an indifference to the Caesar's wife principle—an indifference that Mr. Meese, as Attorney General, cannot afford to display.

The Attorney General directly sets the priorities, and through them the ethical and moral tone, of the Justice Department. His standards, whether articulated directly or perceived through his example, become the marching orders for U.S. attorneys throughout the nation. Indeed, the Attorney General is the exemplar for state prosecutors as well because his is the mantle of ethical leadership.

Because his ethics are in question, Mr. Meese as Attorney General will have no greater task than ensuring that no such questions ever are raised about his performance at the Justice Department. Let him, upon his confirmation, set no imperative higher than fealty to the Caesar's wife principle.

[From the Miami (FL) News Jan. 31, 1985]

MEESE FALLS SHORT OF ETHICS STANDARD

Edwin Meese's mistake, which he has repeated often, was to play with the high-rollers on a public servant's income. His problems follow from that, and they will become the nation's problems if the Senate votes to confirm him as attorney general.

Meese, 53, has spent nearly all of his working years at what his friends might call the public trough. Chief of staff when President Reagan was governor of California, he has seen wealthy people help his boss throw a lavish inaugural and furnish a White House. He never had money to throw around, but he has seen how it is thrown.

In all the controversy over the loans he has accepted and the jobs he has helped hand out to his creditors, no one has accused Meese of trying to get rich. If he had been trying, he would be rich. No, his problem is that he has acquired champagne tastes on a beer budget.

So it was that a man who thinks lawyers for the poor shouldn't be paid more than $75 an hour turned to Washington's pricier lawyers for counsel when the special investigator began looking into his loans and appointments. Meese's lawyers charged $250 an hour.

It is a typical Meese problem that he will have trouble paying for such expensive counsel. Under a recent law, the government gets the bill, but it only pays what a panel of three federal judges determines is reasonable. Meese's bill is $720,000. The cost of the government investigation of Meese was only $320,000. Investigator Jacob A. Stein had to pursue dead ends; Meese's lawyers only had to respond to live leads.

The judges must decide if Meese's lawyers were worth it. If the judges decide to limit reimbursement to what Stein's investigation cost the Justice Department, Meese could have to make up the $400,000 difference. The alternatives—Reagan's wealthy backers paying the remainder of the bill, or the lawyers writing most of it off—easily could raise the kinds of conflicts that Stein investigated.

What Meese needs is a fat job in the private sector to pay off his debts, which are around $320,000 even without the new legal costs.

What President Reagan is trying to give him is the attorney generalship, which pays $80,000 a year.

Meese's flaw is more than the arrogance of someone who would deny to the poor the kind of expensive legal services which he would make the government buy for himself. His flaw is an inability to untangle his personal finances and friendships from his public offices and duties.

Investigator Stein found "no basis" in criminal law for prosecuting Meese. But the pattern of forgetfulness and lack of concern on Meese's part, which Stein detailed and which is directly related to Meese's bills, leaves serious ethical questions.

Those questions can't be answered by saying that since Meese wasn't indicted he is fit to be attorney general.

Two members of the Office of Government Ethics and the first Watergate prosecutor, Archibald Cox, read the record and found Meese has violated minimum ethical standards for a job of such trust.

To confirm him now would be to apply the lowest standard—indictability—to the highest law officer in the land.

[From the Middletown, (NY) Times Herald-Record, Jan. 29, 1985]

HERE WE GO AGAIN

The Senate Judiciary Committee begins hearings today on the nomination of Edwin Meese III to be attorney general of the United States. One year and $720,923 in legal expenses later, Meese stands cleared of criminal wrong-doing in a series of unorthodox financial arrangements between him and persons who later received federal jobs.

Many senators feel the new hearings will be much easier on Meese, but, even as they begin, there is a smell of funny money business about them. This time it involves the fees submitted by two lawyers who represented Meese in the government investigation. The law provides for reimbursement of legal fees in such cases, but the Justice Department—which may soon be working for Meese—and the independent counsel who investigated him have doubts about fees of $250(!) an hour.

This when the Justice Department is in the midst of a campaign—at the president's bidding—to limit fees reimbursable to lawyers at taxpayers' expense to $75 an hour. Meese surely knows this. He's the president's alter ego. Does he mean to say, by routinely passing through such bills, that they seemed to be appropriate to him? If he becomes attorney general will he follow such a generous policy? Is he truly so ignorant about money? Or is this just the same old Meese arrogance?

Let's hope some senators ask the same questions.

[From the Milwaukee (WI) Journal, Jan. 30, 1985]

MEESE MESS GETTING MURKIER

Almost a year after being nominated for U.S. attorney general, Edwin Meese is finally nearing a confirmation vote in the Senate. Should he be approved?

Within broad limits, we favor letting presidents have their own choice of cabinet members. Even an appointee of somewhat marginal ability should be confirmed if his or her integrity is above reproach. Thus, Meese lack of distinction in the law enforcement field does not rule him out, but we think the Senate should very carefully weigh ethical shortcomings that might render him unfit. The attorney general, after all, is the country's highest law enforcement officer and should set an example of probity.

Embarrassing disclosures keep cropping up, making Meese's nomination look less and less defensible.

At the outset, questions were raised about (among other things) his personal financial dealings with Californians who subsequently received federal job appointments. Meese, as White House counselor, participated in the appointment process. After investigating, a special counsel said there was no basis for criminal prosecution of Meese but declined to say whether he had breached ethical standards.

After a review of the evidence by the Office of Government Ethics, that agency's director concluded that Meese had not violated rules governing conflicts of interest. But now it has been revealed that the director's legal staff has come to the opposite conclusion, and even suspected that Meese may have violated a law against accepting gifts.

The ethics office director reversed the staff's finding of conflict of interest—and suppressed it—after consulting Meese's principal lawyer and the White House legal counsel. Such goings-on, sad to say, fall short of the independent, arm's length proceedings that are needed to make an investigation credible.

Meanwhile, Meese is asking the government to pay a whopping $720,000 in lawyer charges that he incurred (at the princely rate of $250 an hour) during the investigations. This is the same Meese who has advised the Reagan administration that $75 an hour is enough for the government to pay when it reimburses people who have successfully sued it. The amount of the legal fees is being challenged—as it should be—by the court that ordered the special investigation and by the very same Justice Department that the president wants Meese to head.

In short, the Meese affair becomes messier by the day. His problems may not have risen to a level that would call for his rejection by the Senate, but they are getting close.

[From the Minneapolis (MN) Star-Tribune, Feb. 4, 1985]

A QUESTION OF HONOR

Edwin Meese III should not be the next attorney general of the United States. He has traded too many favors and shrugged off too many mistakes to serve as the country's top guardian of the law. That should be the conclusion of the Senate Judiciary Committee, which is scheduled to vote tomorrow on the nomination.

Last week's Senate hearings on Meese's nomination to replace William French Smith as head of the Justice Department raised as many questions as they answered: about Meese's tangled finances, his peculiar lapses of memory, his notions of right and wrong. As emphasized during the hearings, Meese has steered clear of criminality and ethics violations. But he several times has swerved close to such misconduct, provoking credible challenges to his vision of the law and of ethics.

As Sen. Charles Mathias, R-Md., argued during the first round of Meese hearings last year, "The attorney general must be perceived to be absolutely above any suspicion." On that criterion, Meese falls short. Since coming to Washington, Meese has accepted thousands of dollars in loans, favors and foregone interest from wealthy friends. He helped arrange federal appointments of people who had helped him financially, accepted an Army reserve promotion to which he was not entitled and received a questionable payment from the Presidential Transition Trust.

Last year, an independent counsel appointed to investigate Meese's affairs found that his conduct was legal. And the Reagan-appointed head of the Office of Government Ethics found Meese's conduct technically proper—despite an initial staff finding to the contrary. But legal, technically proper conduct may fall short of honorable conduct.

Honor should be an indispensable qualification for an attorney general. Meese lacks it. He has been imprudent and unscrupulous in his personal dealings. He has refused to acknowledge his mistakes, invoking narrow technical defenses when his errors were obvious. As presidential counselor, he has played a special role as a saboteur of civil-rights laws and critic of civil liberties. Americans expect more of the attorney general, who must pledge to preserve the law, not circumvent it. The Judiciary Committee should reject Meese's nomination.

[From the Moline (IL) Daily Dispatch, Jan. 30, 1985]

REPUBLICAN FOLLIES

The Republicans' enjoyment of the Democrats' discomfiture is hindered by GOP-dominated proceedings elsewhere in Washington.

The Senate Judiciary Committee, controlled, as is the Senate, by Republicans, is pondering whether to approve President Reagan's nominee, Edwin Meese, as attorney general of the United States. Republicans on the committee, and in the Senate, probably are going to—as the saying goes—hold their noses and vote the party line.

Confirmation of Meese would give us a new attorney general about as undistinguished as any who's ever taken the office. He's been an assistant county prosecutor in California, and a water-carrier for Ronald Reagan. As White House counselor, he's been embroiled in one controversy after another, many of them centered around the fact that so many people who did him financial favors ended up in government jobs.

A special counsel took a long look at the money-jobs ties and concluded there was no basis for criminal prosecutions. But the Office of Government Ethics, in a report that was initially suppressed, said Meese's dealings violated ethical standards.

Complicating the situation is the fact that the Justice Department, which he would head as attorney general, is currently challenging a $700,000 bill Meese submitted to cover the legal expenses he incurred during the special counsel's probe.

Given that Reagan is sticking with his buddy Meese through all this, the Republicans in the Senate probably will go along.

So the nation will have, as it has all too often in the past, a political hack for its attorney general.

[From the Monroe (MI) Evening News, Jan. 31, 1985]

REJECT EDWIN MEESE

Although some members of the Senate Judiciary Committee are giving former presidential counselor Edwin Meese a tough time, it appears the panel will recommend his appointment as attorney general. But that would be a mistake.

The nomination was stalled last year while a special investigator, Jacob Stein, looked into allegations of impropriety against Mr. Meese. On Sept. 20 Mr. Stein cleared the former counselor of any criminal wrong-doing. But he had "no comment on Mr. Meese's ethics and the propriety of his conduct or an evaluation of his fitness for office."

Such concerns are vitally important. Mr. Meese's nomination is for the highest law-enforcement office in the land. As Archibald Cox, chairman of Common Cause and former Watergate prosecutor, observes, "It's not enough for someone to be attorney general to have a sign saying, 'I've been found not to be a crook.' "

These are some of the actions raising ethical questions:

In meetings to consider the appointment of John R. McKean to the U.S. Postal Board of Governors, Mr. Meese did not mention that he was the beneficiary of $60,000 in loans arranged by Mr. McKean, or that Mr. McKean had forgiven the interest due on $40,000 of this. Nor did Mr. Meese exclude himself from the meetings.

Mr. Meese participated in decisions to name officials of the Great American First Savings Bank to high government positions after he had received forbearance of monthly payments on $120,000 of loans from the bank.

Mr. Meese recommended Thomas Barrack as assistant secretary of commerce after Mr. Barrack arranged the sale of Mr. Meese's California home, with Mr. Barrack himself contributing $83,000 in the transaction. (Mr. Meese says he did not know of Mr. Barrack's involvement in the sale.)

Mr. Meese called the secretary of defense to urge reappointment for the chief of army reserves, who had awarded Mr. Meese a promotion to colonel in the reserve under unusual circumstances.

To be sure, some of Mr. Meese's critics are relying on the ethics issue to block the appointment of an attorney general whose law-and-order views they abhor. And these favors did not actually enrich Mr. Meese; they largely helped him with the financial pickle he found himself in when he moved from California to Washington and from private practice to the public sector, with a huge cut in pay.

Nevertheless, questions of criminality aside, the impression conveyed is this: He is adept at landing cozy government jobs for people who have done him financial favors. This is not the sort of high moral ground that Americans expect their attorney general to occupy.

The Senate panel, should reject the Meese nomination; failing that, the full Senate should do the job.

[From the New London (CT) Day, Jan. 30, 1985]

ED MEESE, HE LACKS THE SUBSTANCE FOR ATTORNEY GENERAL

The political mood in the Senate now beckons confirmation of Edwin Meese III as attorney general. President Reagan has won a landslide election and Meese has been cleared of any violation of the law by a special counsel who investigated questions raised in connection with his finances and his handling of patronage appointments.

Edwin Meese's experience in the law does not qualify him to be attorney general. But the issue that seals his incompatibility for the post is his faulty memory and casual attitude about handling personal money matters and then being involved in dispensing patronage jobs to people who did him financial favors. This is a record of personal ethics insensitive to the standards Americans expect from the nation's highest law enforcement officer.

Just as the Senate is about to consider Meese's nomination, Leonard Garment, the nominee's lawyer, admits that the Office of Government Ethics found that Meese violated federal ethics rules. Lawyer Garment, a former law partner of Richard M. Nixon, says he convinced the director of the office to reverse the staff's evaluation.

So Mr. Meese is batting two for two. He was cleared in two investigations, or was he?

Independent Counsel Jacob A. Stein, an attorney in private practice in Washington, concluded that Meese did not violate any federal laws. Stein did not rule on whether the attorney general nominee transgressed in ethical situations. "There is sufficient interest in those other issues to support an expectation that they will not remain unexplored. . ." said Stein.

The attorney general's office embodies a respect for the law. It must set high ethics and expect that agencies throughout the government respond to that tone. Other appointments within the government may allow for the naming of old friends on the buddy system, but the attorney general's job is not one of them.

The Senate should not blithely approve Meese. There are any number of other people President Reagan could nominate who are more qualified in the law and more attuned to a higher standard of personal ethics. The Meese nomination is good 'ole boy politics, and the public be damned.

[From the Norfolk (VA) Virginian-Pilot, Jan. 30, 1985]

THE MEESE STANDARD

The most striking aspect of the Senate Judiciary Committee's hearings yesterday on Edwin Meese's nomination to become attorney general was the acrimony of the debate, particularly in the viciousness of the attacks made by Mr. Meese's supporters upon those who oppose his nomination.

Why is this? Why would senators such as Alan Simpson of Wyoming, Jeremiah Denton of Alabama and Orrin Hatch of Utah—all well-regarded by their peers—lash out so bitterly at their Democratic colleagues, at the media, at Common Cause, at anyone who opposed Mr. Meese?

It's not simpy that they are fulfilling the role of partisan Republicans. Partisan debates on most issues in the Senate have an air of civility that was missing yesterday.

Could it be that the senators see of lot of themselves—a lot of many politicans, Democrat, Republican or independent—in Mr. Meese? Are they putting themselves in Mr. Meese's place and saying:

"Gee, I may be as culpable as he is, and I don't do anything that I consider unethical. All he did was get some financial help from friends who later obtained nice government jobs. That doesn't prove anything. Sure, if you know the right people, have the right connections, you've got a foot in the door in government. Isn't that the way the world works?"

One Meese supporter, outraged at the "unfairness" of the treatment, said there is no way members of the Senate could live under the same standards that Mr. Meese's detractors are applying to the attorney general-designate.

After all, the senator said, members of Congress get honorariums and large campaign contributions from interest groups and then later have to vote on measures that affect those same groups. We shouldn't be expected to refuse the contributions just because accepting them creates an appearance of impropriety, he said. Don't people trust us? he asked.

The short answer is: no. The public has a right to be suspicious when public officials appear to be getting something for nothing. This is particularly true when the public official in question happens to be in line for a sensitive and important job such as attorney general. Mr. Meese may be a fine fellow and may have a good legal mind. But it is clear that his primary attribute is his close personal and political association with the president. It is also clear that he has a huge ethical blindspot. Based on his record, he shouldn't be trusted as the nation's top law-enforcement officer.

[From the Oakland (CA) Tribune, Jan. 24, 1985]

A QUESTION OF ETHICS

If Richard Nixon himself were nominated attorney general, some admirer would no doubt say in his defense, "after all, he's never been indicted."

That seems to be the most one can say for attorney general designate Edwin Meese III, a man who has set off one explosion after another in a blind stumble through the ethical minefields of Washington, D.C.

Last September, court-appointed counsel Jacob Stein reported that he could find "no basis" for a criminal prosecution of Meese on any of 11 different charges. Armed with that ringing endorsement, President Reagan vowed to fight for Meese's confirmation.

But surely the nation should hold the chief law enforcement officer in the land to a higher ethical standard.

As former Watergate prosecutor Archibald Cox observed last month, "The office of Attorney General requires a person who can symbolize the highest standards of honor, integrity, and freedom from favoritism or other self-interest in the performance of public office. Only such a person can build the confidence in the integrity and even-handedness of law and law enforcement that is essential to democracy."

Special counsel Stein pointedly refused to pass judgment either on Meese's character or suitability for office. That task lies with the Senate. But the evidence detailed in his report argues powerfully against seating Meese in that powerful job.

Though Meese may have committed no crimes, he most certainly violated the spirit of Executive Order 11222 which prescribes "Standards of Ethical Conduct for Government Officers and Employees."

That order prohibits actions that might "create the appearance of . . . using public office for private gain . . . giving preferential treatment to any organization or person . . . (or) losing complete independence or impartiality of action . . ."

By that test, consider just a few of the lowlights of his career as counselor to the president:

After receiving an unsecured $40,000 loan from one John McKean, Meese helped obtain his nomination to the U.S. Postal Board of Governors. Later, after McKean extended a further loan and deferred overdue interest, Meese helped his benefactor get a longer term on the postal board.

Only after The Washington Post exposed the conflict did Meese pay back the interest he owed, totaling more than $20,000.

Meese let Thomas Barrack, a friend of a friend, help arrange the sale of his California home, which had been on the market for a year and a half. Barrack put up a total of $83,000 of his own money to sweeten the deal. Later, Meese approved his appointment as assistant secretary of commerce apparently without mentioning the conflict.

On Jan. 7, 1981, Meese's wife Ursula, with his approval, borrowed $15,000 from a friend who Meese appointed his assistant in the White House, Meese didn't disclose the loan though the Ethics in Government Act clearly required it.

Meese went more than $400,000 into debt to the Great Amercian First Savings Bank, defaulted on one loan and had payments on others deferred. Yet still he participated in decisions to name four of the bank's officials to high government posts, without disclosing his conflict of interest.

Friends in the Pentagon arranged Meese's promotion in the Army Reserve first to active status and then to the rank of colonel—with higher pension benefits. The Army inspector general concluded that "Meese, despite his disclaimer, was accorded special treatment and consideration that far transcended that which might be considered reasonable.

Meese was informed of the irregularities yet did nothing to correct them. Indeed, while his own promotion was still under consideration, Meese influenced the reappointment of his main backer, the chief of Army Reserve.

Told by an attorney in December 1980 that his acceptance of $10,000 in moving expenses from the Presidential Transition Trust would probably violate the law, Meese didn't return the money. He simply told the trust's office manager (later White House personnel director) to change her records so the payment would reflect "consulting fees." Apparently he did not submit any statement of hours worked.

REJECT MEESE NOMINATION; HE IS UNFIT FOR THE JOB

Members of the U.S. Senate should show conscience and reject emphatically nomination of Ed Meese to be attorney general. Meese's behavior has disqualified him from serving as the nation's top law enforcement official.

We are sorry most senators are keeping silent on this travesty proposed by President Reagan.

This is what came out about Meese after investigation by an independent counsel appointed under the Ethics in Government Act and a report to a special grand jury:

A San Francisco tax accountant, John McKean, helped rescue Meese from personal bankruptcy in 1981 by arranging two unsecured loans totaling $60,000. Meese recommended McKean shortly afterward for a seat on the Postal Board of Governors with no disclosure of his link to McKean.

Also without disclosure of his personal interest, Meese helped recommend federal appointments of Gordon Luce, Edwin Gray, Marc Sandstrom and Clarence Pendleton. All were officers and directors of a San Diego bank that made a $400,000 home loan to Meese and then let him get 15 months behind.

When Meese was unable to sell his California home, real estate developer Thomas Barrack put together a deal in which Meese escaped financial damage. Barrack was then nominated to be deputy undersecretary of the interior.

After Meese moved to Washington when Ronald Reagan was elected, he received a $10,000 check with a notation "moving expenses." Meese said later he ordered the notation changed to "consulting fees" after he learned of a legal problem in accepting moving expenses.

Meese received a promotion in the Army Reserve from lieutenant colonel to colonel even though he had failed to meet the normal educational requirement. The secretary of the Army told an investigator he had recommended to Meese that he refuse the promotion.

In his government financial disclosure forms for 1981 through 1984, Meese failed to include required information on loans, fees received, trips and stock transactions. And Meese on 52 occasions said he could not recall documents or events about loans or discussions about jobs with those who had helped him financially.

To nominate Ed Meese to be attorney general would be a good plot for a political satire or a night club routine, but this man has no business in that job. We hope senators will rise up and say no.

ATTORNEY GENERAL MUST HAVE ETHICS

We find it incredible that President Reagan has resubmitted the nomination of his old buddy Edwin Meese III to serve as attorney general of the United States, even though an in-depth investigation by independent counsel Jacob Stein has found "no basis" for a criminal indictment against Meese.

In our opinion, the nation's top law enforcement officer needs better credentials than the fact that he is not going to stand trial or go to prison.

Although Meese is technically in the clear insofar as criminal violations are concerned, the Stein investigation did not delve into the ethical ramifications of croynism, favoritism and the good-old-boy system of political patronage that Meese appears to have used to his advantage during his years as a presidential adviser.

Yet Meese's name is back in the hopper for attorney general and the Senate Judiciary Committee is scheduled to begin hearings on the confirmation today. The administration appears confident that Meese will be confirmed without a great deal of fanfare, in light of the Stein report. Reagan himself sees it as a "vindication" of his old friend.

However, Archibald Cox, chairman of Common Cause and a former U.S. solicitor general, says Stein's report demonstrates that Meese is "blind to the ethical standards and obligations required of a public official," and should not be confirmed as attorney general.

"It's not enough for someone to be attorney general to have a sign saying, 'I've been found not to be a crook,' " Cox said recently.

Echoed the New York Times: "To be cleared of criminal suspicion is a relief, but not a qualification for high office."

What did Meese do—or fail to do—that he should be denied confirmation as attorney general? Here are a few examples:

After receiving a $40,000 unsecured loan—with no interest due for a year—from his accountant John McKean, Meese, as one of four members of the Senior Staff Personnel Committee, supported the nomination of McKean to fill a vacancy on the Postal Board of Governors. No one present recalls Meese informing the others of the loan, or of asking to be excused from making the decision.

Participated in decisions to name officials of the Great American First Savings Bank to high government positions at a time when he was deeply indebted to the bank and in arrears on some of his loans.

Recommended appointment of Thomas Barrack as assistant secretary of commerce after Barrack arranged the rapid sale of Meese's California home, a deal to which Barrack reportedly contributed $83,000 of his own money. Meese did not reveal his connection to Barrack to other members of the Senior Staff Personnel Committee in recommending Barrack for the commerce post.

The Stein report notes that Meese suffered lapses of memory when questioned about potentially embarrassing situations.

Although Meese's activities as a presidential adviser may not have placed him in legal jeopardy, we are confident that somewhere in this broad land Reagan can find someone eminently better qualified to serve as attorney general, someone who will set a high moral tone for the entire nation.

We are sure Michigan Sens. Carl Levin and Donald Riegle would like to know how you feel about the appointment of Edwin Meese as attorney general before the confirmation hearings begin. They may be reached at the Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C. 20515.

AGAIN, ED MEESE TRIPS HIMSELF UP

Edwin Meese III, who raised eyebrows with his financial dealings as a counselor to the president, won vindication late last summer when a special federal prosecutor found nothing actionable in what he'd done. But now there's fresh evidence that Meese—appointed to be the next attorney general—lacks judgment and a sense of proportion. That's what a lot people have been saying was his problem all along.

Remember, Meese ran into financial trouble as a result of his move from California to Washington in order to serve Ronald Reagan. Not unusual for people who shift temporarily from the business world to lower-paying jobs in government. The unusual angle was that several individuals helped out Meese and his wife with loans and then got cushy positions in the federal realm.

Suspicous-minded people might have seen a classic case of influence-peddling. Not so. Meese is not a corrupt individual. However, he failed to perceive that this pattern of actions could be interpreted as corruption. Even when their acts and intentions are innocuous, public servants ought to avoid the very appearance of wrongdoing.

Meese's actions didn't get serious scrutiny until the president nominated him last year to succeed William French Smith as attorney general. On petition from some of Meese's critics, a special three-judge panel of the U.S. circuit courts of appeal named an independent prosecutor under the Watergate-era Ehtics in Government Act. After a six-month investigation, Meese was cleared.

Now it comes out that Meese is seeking about $700,000 from Uncle Sam to pay legal bills incurred in his defense during that investigation. His attempt is legitimate; federal law allows such reimbusement.

But just as with Meese's financial gyrations, it's the circumstances that are questionable. His lawyers want as much as $225 an hour for their services. Reagan administration policy has been that lawyers who win cases against the government should get no more than $75 an hour. No matter what happens it's a potential embarrassment for the Justice Department that Meese is nominated to head.

None of this seems to bother Meese. He is a babe in the woods, his view of the forest blinded by all those trees. Here is a man slated to be the nation's chief law-enforcer, supposed to descry others' evildoing, but unable to comprehend that his own behavior can look suspicious or insensitive to others. Keep him in an office close to the president, who trusts him as friend and adviser. But don't make him attorney general.

[From the Salinas (CA) Californian, Jan. 30, 1985]

THE EDWIN MEESE CASE

Edwin Meese has returned to the Senate Judiciary Committee.

He comes bearing a report from an independent counsel who found no basis for prosecuting him under federal law but made no judgment on Meese's ethics.

Meese's supporters saw the report as a vindication. Meese's foes pointed to new issues that had been raised.

The voluminous record on the Meese case contains no "smoking gun", just accounts of a series of poor judgments and questionable decisions that raise legitimate questions about Meese's ethical standards.

For example, when Meese was in financial trouble and having problems selling his home, he contacted Pendleton James, who had recently left his job as White House Director of Personnel. James contacted Thomas Barrack, who helped arrange the sale of Meese's home and contributed $83,000 himself toward the purchase. At the same time, James was sponsoring Barrack for a federal appointment. Meese was one of a four-member group that recommended Barrack be appointed to an Interior Department post.

After receiving an unsecured loan for $40,000 from his accountant John McKean, Meese supported McKean's nomination to fill a vacancy on the Postal Board of Governors. Later, after receiving an additional $20,000 and an agreement that McKean would defer some interest payments that were already in arrears, Meese joined in approving McKean to a longer term on the board.

In neither of these cases did Meese exempt himself from the decision-making process, or even point out his possible conflict of interest.

When questioned by the independent counsel, Meese said on 52 different occasions that he did not recall key information or events surrounding these job decisions affecting those who had helped him financially.

These two incidents were cited by Office of Government Ethics investigators as being in violation of ethics guidelines. That report was overruled by the head of the department, a presidential appointee, after he discussed it with Meese's attorney and the White House counsel.

Another questionable judgment by Meese involved the $10,000 he received from the Presidential Transition Trust in November 1980. In earlier testimony, Meese said it was a consulting fee. But the independent counsel report said the check was marked "moving expenses" when Meese cashed it. He was later told it was illegal to use the money for moving expenses. He then apparently changed the notation on the check stub to "consulting fee."

Standing alone, none of these acts would have an impact on his confirmation. But the picture that emerges is of a man living beyond his means, a man who appears to be using his public office for private gain.

Meese told committee members Tuesday that his confirmation ordeal will make him far more sensitive to such conflicts in the future. That would be welcome. The message must be delivered that government by cronyism and patronage is simply not acceptable.

Despite his troubles, it appears Meese eventually will win confirmation. The president is strongly backing his longtime adviser. That should be enough to win him confirmation in the Republican-controlled Senate, especially in the absense of unified Democratic opposition.

But the question is not a partisan one. The question should simply be whether Edwin Meese, based on this record, is the best person available to become the nation's top law-enforcement officer.

We think not.

[From the Santa Barbara (CA) News-Press, Jan. 31, 1985]

QUESTIONS DANGLE

Questions regarding Edwin Meese III's ethical conduct that were raised a year ago did not go away when the Senate suspended confirmation proceedings as the presidential election period approached. Neither have the questions clouding the name of President Reagan's friend and appointee to the office of Attorney General become less relevant over time.

As the Senate Judiciary Committee again considers whether to confirm Meese's appointment as Attorney General, however, there are disturbing signs that time and political realities—not the least of which is Meese's friend's overwhelming re-election to the highest office in the land—have softened the committee's view of conduct more harshly treated before the election.

A court-appointed independent counsel absolved Meese of any criminal wrongdoing in September. In a report summarizing the findings of an investigation of allegations that Meese had traded financial favors for federal job appointments, accepted improper gifts of money and benefited undeservedly from an Army Reserve promotion arranged by a longtime friend, the special investigator concluded, in effect, that Meese had done nothing worthy of criminal indictment, but that questions regarding the morality of his conduct remained unanswered.

They dangle still, even as Meese swears to the senate panel that he is now more sensitive to ethical issues.

No doubt he is more sensitive to the troubles that can derive from a disregard of such issues, but we question whether adversity has actually increased Meese's ability to appreciate the moral distinctions that he was so recently unable to perceive. Attorneys in the Office of Government Ethics put their doubts about Meese's ethical judgment in writing, but the internal report was suppressed by another Reagan appointee, the director of the government ethics office.

Such a lack of consensus among Meese's examiners surely weakens the public's confidence that the Attorney General-designate possesses sufficient strength of judgment, if not of character, for the job of top U.S. legal counsel.

It is a position that requires absolute rectitude, in fact and in appearance. We doubt the Senate can credibly find that Meese satisfies that requirement on both counts.

[From the St. Petersburg (FL) Times, Jan. 29, 1985]

A QUESTION OF JUDGMENT

The U.S. Senate's Judiciary Committee today will begin hearings on President Reagan's nomination of his friend and adviser, Edwin Meese III, to become the next attorney general of the United States. We have previously stated our opinion that the Senate should decline to confirm Meese for the reason that he is not suitably qualified to become the nation's chief law enforcement officer, even though an independent prosecutor found no cause to indict him for his pattern of arranging federal jobs for persons who performed personal favors for him.

Meese's handling of the extraordinary legel fees associated with his defense is a further reason to question his judgment in carrying out the public's legal work.

Meese clearly deserves fair and adequate compensation for the attorneys who defended him. It is provided by law and is not an issue in our minds.

The issues are what is fair compensation, how Meese has handled the matter and the irony of Meese's strong opposition to the government's paying lawyers' fees for the less powerful and less wealthy.

A 1983 amendment to the Ethics in Government Act provides that Meese, and anyone else cleared in an inquiry by a special prosecutor, is entitled to apply to a three-judge federal court for the legal fees. The surprise was that Meese and his attorneys asked for $720,923 for Washington lawyers Leonard Garment and E. Robert Wallach for fees ranging up to $250 an hour, including time spent as Meese's press agent.

That is high legal cotton, which seems even higher in the light of two other facts. Meese's legal bill is more than double the cost to the government of the entire investigation into his conduct. Special Prosecutor Jacob Stein and his five assistants billed the government $320,000 for the Meese investigation. Also, the Reagan Justice Department has argued repeatedly to the court and to Congress that the government should pay no more than $75 an hour for private lawyers. The department apparently applied that rule to Stein, who wrote in objecting to the large fee: "In the civil context, it is our impression, based in part on recent personal experience, that existing Justice Department policy is to negotiate contracts for outside counsel at a rate of no more that $75 an hour."

The natural question is whether Meese agreed to such large fees in advance. If so, it shows a high degree of fiscal irresponsibility. If not, it bears the administration's mark of generous and thoughtless spending on behalf of the rich and powerful while squeezing the weak and the poor.

Finally, there is an ironic political issue here. As the presidential adviser in charge of liaison with the legal services program, Meese for four years has waged a kind of guerrilla warfare against legal aid for the poor. On Meese's advice, the President has gone to extraordinary lengths, including the abuse of his powers to make recess appointments, to frustrate the will of Congress to continue legal aid to the poor. He has named people to run the program who are dedicated to destroy it.

For the official who has tried so hard to keep the poor from obtaining government-paid legal services now to ask the government to pay his lawyers' inflated fees of almost three-quarters of a million dollars is a kind of legal socialism for the powerful that violates the American sense of fairness.

[From the St. Paul (MN) Pioneer Press Dispatch, Jan. 29, 1985]

MEESE DOES NOT MERIT ATTORNEY GENERAL POST

The Senate Judiciary Committee is scheduled to begin hearings today on the nomination of Edwin Meese III to serve as attorney general of the United States. That panel, and ultimately the full Senate, would serve justice best by denying confirmation.

President Reagan warrants no less discretion in making senior appointments than that enjoyed by his predecessors. (The Senate has rejected by 11 Cabinet nominees in the history of the republic; only three this century and none since the Eisenhower administration.) But Mr. Meese's dull appreciation for propriety in high public life requires that he not serve as the nation's preeminent law enforcement officer.

We first urged that Mr. Meese's name be withdrawn last March, after it was learned that at least six people who had lent him money, or who otherwise had helped him financially, had wound up with federal jobs. A subsequent investigation by an independent counsel, Jacob Stein, found "no basis" for the "bringing of a prosecution against Mr. Meese for violation of a criminal statute." This, though, was inadequate vindication, because Mr. Stein's 385-page report, released in September, did not address the nominee's ethics or his fitness for office. And there's rub: Mr. Reagan's longtime aide and former high-ranking campaign official may not have committed an indictable offense, but that is slight recommendation to lead the Justice Department. By his utter casualness in observing the public's trust, he had proved himself unfit to be attorney general.

Mr. Meese's naming shows itself even weaker once his civil rights proclivities and his disregard for civil liberties are considered. He was party to unsuccessful maneuverings during Mr. Reagan's first term aimed at granting tax exemptions to segregated private schools. He also tried to stem leaks by requiring federal employees to take lie detector tests while in government service and by broadly restricting what they could write afterward. This foray failed too. Added can be the admonition in the 1975 final report of the Watergate prosecutor: "The president should not nominate and the Senate should not confirm as attorney general . . . a person who has served as the president's campaign manager or in a similar high-level campaign role." The risk of conflicts of interest, real or simply perceived, is too high.

Nonetheless, it is not this last paragraph of problems that persuades us that Mr. Meese should not be attorney general. Each drawback was known last January when he first was nominated, and while we said then that his selection was disappointing, we did not oppose confirmation. We did, however, reach that conclusion two months later when it become clear that, at best, he is weakly animated by legitimate concerns about the proper uses of great authority.

Mr. Meese's standards are not those of an attorney general. The Senate should tell him so.

[From the Centre Daily (PA) Times, Jan. 28, 1985]

EDWIN MEESE IS TOO TAINTED TO BE ATTORNEY GENERAL

Tomorrow, in Washington, D.C., the Senate Judiciary Committee will resume deliberating whether Edwin Meese III should be confirmed as the nation's next attorney general.

The odds would appear to be in Mr. Meese's favor: Only two presidential nominees to cabinet posts have been rejected by the Senate in this century.

The nation would be better served if Mr. Meese became the third such rejection.

Better yet, President Reagan himself should end this episode, which has gone on for a year now since he nominated Mr. Meese on Jan. 23, 1984. The president should withdraw Mr. Meese's name from consideration. But that appears unlikely: The president is confident that the Senate—which first took up the Meese nomination last March—will approve the nomination swiftly.

Mr. Meese isn't a crook. But he is, without a doubt, a man who has on more than one occasion displayed incredibly poor judgment and questionable ethics. Some examples:

In 1960, Mr. Meese accepted a check for $10,000 from a Presidential Transition Trust to cover "moving expenses" to Washington. Later, after a White House lawyer told him the acceptance probably violated a federal statute, one of Mr. Meese's assistants changed the wording on the canceled check from "moving expenses" to "consulting fee."

In 1982, Mr. Meese seems to have knowingly benefited from preferential treatment by the Army. Records show that high Army officials violated military rules by transferring Mr. Meese to the active reserve and promoting him to colonel—increasing his annual pay by $2,000 and his pension by 18 percent.

Mr. Meese paid back the financial help he received from some friends with federal jobs. In one instance, Mr. Meese took part in a mid-1981 White House decision to obtain a position on the Postal Board of Governors for Jack McKean, a San Francisco tax accountant. A month earlier, Mr. McKean had helped Mr. Meese out of a bad financial situation by arranging a $40,000 loan on which no payments were due for a year.

The following year, after obtaining another $20,000 loan from Mr. McKean, Mr. Meese said nothing about his dealings with the tax accountant when he participated in White House talks that resulted in Mr. McKean being recommended for a longer term on the postal board.

An independent counsel appointed to investigate the allegations against Mr. Meese last year found no "criminal violations" by the attorney general-designate, but Jacob Stein's findings were hardly a vote of confidence.

As the Los Angeles Times observed in an editorial last month: "There may indeed be nothing illegal about a government official conferring public rewards on those who have done him private favors, but, unproscribed or not, such actions are ethically indefensible. . . . An ethical blind spot is a major infirmity in an attorney general."

It certainly is. If Mr. Meese were being considered for a less critical or non-legal post, it might be possible to overlook his many errors and reluctantly endorse his confirmation. But Edwin Meese isn't being nominated for the Postal Board of Governors. He is being nominated for attorney general—the nation's top law enforcement officer.

The person who holds that job must be beyond reproach. He must be a person whose past is reasonably free of acts that give even the appearance of impropriety. He must be a person who, by word and deed, sets a good example for all Americans.

Edwin Meese III is not that man.

[From the Stuart (FL) News, Jan. 28, 1985]

WRONG MAN FOR THE JOB

The Reagan administration apparently is determined to have Edwin Meese as the nation's next Attorney General, and the U.S. Senate will likely resound with heated debate over his confirmation.

Meese, a presidential counselor, was accused last year of using his influence to get federal jobs for persons to whom he owed money. A special prosecutor, however, found insufficient evidence to indict Meese.

Still, the episode is bound to weigh on the minds of senators as they ponder whether to approve the appointment. Just because Meese was not indicted doesn't mean he is above reproach.

Senators would do well to consider what former Watergate Special Prosecutor Archibald Cox said the other day at a government ethics seminar at Florida State University in Tallahassee. Cox believes senators are "beginning to realize it isn't true that the special prosecutor cleared Meese of the charges."

Cox, now a Harvard law professor and chairman of Common Cause, is the man who pursued the Watergate investigation so aggressively that President Nixon fired him. He knows a thing or two about the importance of ethics among public officials.

"The attorney general should be symbolic of the fairness, integrity and even-handedness of the government," Cox said.

In this regard, Meese fails to measure up. His reputation is tainted. He could not possibly enjoy the full confidence of the American people.

Even if Meese's ethics were unquestioned, we don't believe he is qualified to be attorney general. That vital post needs someone who ranks among the nation's finest in the study and practice of law. Meese has not reached that level.

The Senate ought to turn down the Meese appointment. Then the president can do what he should have done initially—find someone more suitable for the job.

[From the Sun City (AZ) Daily News-Sun, Jan. 30, 1985]

TOO MANY GRAY AREAS

Edwin Meese is President Reagan's close friend and trusted adviser—one of the Californians who have stood by the president through the traditional "thick and thin."

Meese's own "thin" time came Tuesday as charges of unethical behavior were revealed in a Government Ethics Office internal report.

Independent Counsel Jacob Stein, chosen by the president earlier to investigate criminal charges against Meese, found "no basis" for indictment.

But the independent counsel refused to give an opinion on Meese's ethical behavior, something he said he hadn't been asked to do.

Now, in hearings before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Meese's ethical behavior is under close scrutiny.

Government Ethics Office attorneys submitted a report Jan. 14 which said that in at least two instances Meese "violated the standards of conduct or other applicable statutes" and that his actions created "the appearance of preferential treatment" in federal appointments.

The internal report was overruled by David H. Martin, ethics office director, who concluded that Meese "was in compliance with applicable laws and regulations regarding conflicts of interest."

But Judiciary Committee Chairman Strom Thurmond requested the internal report for the committee's consideration.

Now, with the report before them, along with Martin's letter explaining why he rejected it, the Senate committee has a ticklish task. It must decide whether President Reagan's longtime friend is suited for a job where ethical performance is a high-priority requisite or whether his participation in approving federal appointments for persons who had done him favors represents conflict-of-interest and makes him unfit for the office of attorney general of the United States.

Although Mr. Reagan steadfastly supports his friend's nomination for U.S. attorney general, it appears that Meese's appointment could prove to be an embarrassment to him.

Meese should not be approved.

[From the Thousand Oaks (CA) News Chronicle, Jan. 30, 1985]

THE MEESE MESS

Your brother-in-law has a bookkeeper whom you are thinking of hiring as office manager.

You find out that the bookkeeper has been borrowing money from one of the company's suppliers and that the lender got a large contract from the company after making the loan to the bookkeeper.

You wonder whether that was the right thing to do, so you hire a private investigator to find out more about it.

The private investigator reports back to you that everything is fine. He asked your brother-in-law.

That is about what happened in the Edwin Meese affair, except that it isn't a bookkeeper we're talking about, nor is it an office manager.

It is the No. 1 presidential counselor and the U.S. attorney general. And it isn't your brother-in-law, it is the president of the United States.

Meese will likely win confirmation to the highest law enforcement post in the nation, and he will likely win it on Thursday as scheduled.

That despite his admission that he borrowed money and favors from individuals who not much later won high offices in the federal government by appointment.

Damning as that is ehtically, even worse in Meese's statement to the Senate Judiciary Committee on Tuesday that "I have conducted myself in accordance to the ethical as well as the legal standards of behavior for public officials."

It is conceivable that he is not prosecutable for what he did; it is inconceivable that he was innocent in doing it.

If he regarded the non-prosecution of the conflict of interest charges against him as evidence of exoneration, he will likely regard the Senate's expected confirmation of him as vindication.

That would be a double disservice.

[From the Torrington (CT) Register Citizen, Jan. 30, 1985]

THE MEESE NOMINATION

President Reagan has nominated for attorney general his White House counsel, Edwin Meese, who has a bad habit of getting financial favors from people who end up with cushy government jobs. The coincidences were striking enough to prompt the appointment last year of an independent counsel, who came to the conclusion that there wasn't enough hard evidence to justify a criminal indictment.

That's reassuring, but it doesn't answer the question at hand: whether Mr. Meese has the ethical sensitivity that the Senate should expect of a person asking to be confirmed as head of the Department of Justice. Therefore it is gratifying to know that Mr. Meese's ethics—and not just his criminal liability—has been addressed by the Office of Government Ethics.

The staff of that agency studied the report of the independent counsel and came to the conclusion that, in two matters, Mr. Meese's financial dealings had, in fact, appeared to conflict with his official duties. This is a violation of federal regulations which forbid actions by officials that might even "create the appearance of" preferential treatment for someone.

This clear statement of some of the issues involved in the Meese appointment was almost not available to the Senate Judiciary Committee as it began Tuesday what its Republican chairman, Strom Thurmond, has said will be just a one-day, hurry-up confirmation hearing of Mr. Meese. The contents of the report were kept under wraps by the Office of Government Ethics' director, David H. Martin, after he was persuaded by Mr. Meese's attorneys and White House officials not to take action on the staff's findings. The report saw the light of day only after it was leaked to The Wall Street Journal.

There are no damning new revelations in the document. All that the staff's attorneys did was to study the independent counsel's record, examine the pertinent federal regulations and come to a conclusion that should have been obvious to the Senate: Mr. Meese has not met the minimum standard for conduct by government officials or employees. The advantage of having this report on the table is that it forces senators to recognize just what they will be condoning if they give their blessings to this unworthy nomination.

[From the Trenton (NJ) Trentonian, Jan. 31, 1985]

REJECT MEESE

President Reagan's persistence in attempting to make his old buddy Edwin Meese the Attorney General of the United States raises some serious questions as to why Mr. Reagan feels it is so important to have Mr. Meese in this important, demanding and sensitive office.

It is just stubbornness? Does he really believe Mr. Meese is the best qualified person for the post? Does he owe him? Or is it more than that?

True, a special prosecutor found no grounds for prosecuting Mr. Meese after an investigation of some of his rather intriguing activities—including finding federal posts for people who loaned him money, interest free. Now, Mr. Reagan has renewed the nomination and wants the Senate to confirm him.

The special prosecutor found no cause for prosecution, but specifically declined to certify that Mr. Meese was fit to be the nation's Attorney General. What was unsaid thereafore says a lot more than what was said.

Common Cause, the citizens lobby group, opposes confirmation of Mr. Meese by the Senate because of his numerous eyebrow-raising but technically legal dealings.

Common Cause is right. The fact that Mr. Meese may not have broken any laws doesn't mean that his activities that were investigated (numbering 11 in all) aren't sufficient reason for the Senate to reject him.

The conservatives find this rather hypocritical. They argue that since Mr. Meese isn't guilty of breaking any laws he is innocent of wrongdoing and shouldn't be barred from holding the office.

That just won't wash. The public has a right to demand higher ethical and moral standards of high officials than the law may stipulate.

Mr. Meese can say, as former President Nixon did, that he is "not a crook." His personal professional conduct is, however, less than the public has a right to expect from a man who will preside over the administration of justice in this nation for the next four years.

[From the Tucson (AZ) Citizen, Jan. 29, 1985]

CONFIRMATION WON'T BE END OF MEESE CASE

Once again the matter of confirming Edwin Meese III is up for consideration in the U.S. Senate, and this time—just over a year after he was nominated to succeed William French Smith as U.S. attorney general—it appears he will be approved.

For many Americans, including members of the Tucson Citizen editorial board, this is not a happy thought. We believe President Reagan could have done better than choose his long-time acquaintance. We see a danger that Meese will be an embarrassment to the administration, along the lines of a James Watt or a David Stockman or an Anne Burford.

This is not to say the president has bombed out on all his appointments; some have been excellent choices. But it seems most unlikely that the naming of Meese will rank up there with the appointments of Sandra O'Connor and George Shultz.

Meese, renominated on Jan. 3, first was appointed attorney general in January of 1983. But questions about his financial dealings arose, questions that centered on whether he had helped to get federal jobs for persons who provided financial assistance to Meese and his wife. Confirmation proceedings were suspended in April pending an inquiry by an independent counsel, Jacob A. Stein, into allegations of criminal conduct.

After a five-month investigation, Stein reported in September that "no basis" had been found "for the bringing of a prosecution against Mr. Meese for violation of a criminal statute." He said he had "no comment on Mr. Meese's ethics and the propriety of his conduct or an evaluation of his fitness for office," because the inquiry did not extend to those questions.

Does this finding "clear" Meese of all suspicion and serve as a mandate for his speedy confirmation? We don't think so, but the word from Capitol Hill is that Meese will indeed be confirmed, despite some remaining opposition. Among those speaking against confirmation is Archibald Cox, the first Watergate special prosecutor and now chairman of Common Cause. In a commentary for the Los Angeles Times, Cox said:

"In the past, receiving personal financial benefits, as Meese did, and then exercising governmental power in favor of the benefactor has been condemned as grossly unethical—even when there was no proof of a causal connection. . . . The attorney general has more opportunity to set the ethical tone of an administration than any official other than the president. He must symbolize the fair-minded, impartial, sensitive but impersonal administration of justice. But he cannot do so if he himself has repeatedly accepted material favors and then used his official position in a way that helps his benefactors."

We believe that Meese, if confirmed, will take office under a suspicion that he will not be able to shake. As a tough "law and order" prosecutor in California, he made lots of enemies (and some friends) in supervising arrests of protesters and helping put down demonstrations at Berkeley. He has attacked the American Civil Liberties Union as part of a nationwide "criminals' lobby."

Given Meese's problems even before confirmation, one must wonder if he will be able to serve as an effective, credible attorney.

Surely President Reagan could have made a better choice.

DIFFERENT SET OF VALUES

See, if every taxpayer sent a penny to Poor Ed he would collect about a million dollars so he could pay off his lawyers—and have some spare change to maintain his lifestyle, the lifestyle that put Meese in a bind and heavily in debt when his pal Ronald Reagan first went to the White House.

What prompts this commentary is, of course, the news from the nation's capital that Meese has asked U.S. taxpayers to pay a $720,900 legal bill he ran up while proving he did nothing illegal when a friend obtained loans for him and another friend "found" a buyer for Meese's California house and also loaned the buyer some money for the purchase. Both these helpers later got appointments to federal jobs.

A federal regulation allows Meese to ask the U.S. Treasury to reimburse him for his team of $250-an-hour lawyers. (For a 40-hour work week, that comes to a weekly check of $10,000.)

If he becomes attorney general, Meese's salary will be only $80,000 a year so he couldn't cover the bill himself. Also, for him to ask other "friends" to chip in with some cash would not look too good for the nation's chief administrator of law. Alas, nothing to do but ask all of us to come up with $720,900.

(By the way, the investigative costs incurred by the U.S. special prosecutor amounted to a mere $320,000.)

Just to be even-handed, we must mention that Republicans in D.C. aren't the only politicians who seem to work in a different world than ordinary people. Wisconsin Democrats managed to pull a spiffy stunt when they hired an ex-legislator named William Rogers to an $1,886-a-month job as aide to a committee of the Legislature.

Rogers, 54, had served his Kaukauna constituency for 22 years before losing the November election. Assembly Speaker Thomas Loftus, D-Sun Prairie, recommended that a committee hire Rogers because he needed a job.

"Democrats don't shoot their wounded," Loftus said.

Democrats should try triage next time.

Rogers didn't show for work during the first week. Now, he's been fired. Good.

The examples being set in Madison and Washington are poor. Cronyism, favoritism and insensitivity to public opinion serve only to support the viewpoint of many Americans that most politicians are a lower order of life.

The way to end the Meese mess is for Meese to withdraw his name from consideration and for President Reagan to find another attorney general candidate. OK, taxpayers will pick up the tab for him—because it's cheaper and better for the nation to be rid of Meese as a public official.

But we don't need him in the attorney general's chair. Meese's judgment has been shown to be flawed. Seriously flawed.

We hope that Wisconsin's senators, Republican Robert Kasten and Democrat William Proxmire, refuse to confirm Meese as U.S. attorney general.

[From the Wichita (KS) Eagle-Beacon, Jan. 28, 1985]

MR. MEESE HARDLY "VINDICATED"

Last fall, the independent counsel who'd investigated Edwin Meese was asked to say if "the evidence does not substantiate the loose charges of moral turpitude against Mr. Meese." The counsel, Jacob Stein, who'd just absolved Mr. Meese of criminal wrongdoing, refused to answer. Nor would he offer his opinion on Mr. Meese's fitness to be attorney general.

President Reagan subsequently used Mr. Stein's conclusion on criminality to pronounce Mr. Meese "vindicated" and said he would renominate him to be attorney general. It's important that the Senate, when it takes up the Meese renomination later this month, consider what Mr. Stein said—and wouldn't say.

Mr. Stein's charge was narrow: "to investigate any allegation or evidence of violation of any criminal law by Mr. Meese." His findings were offered in that narrow context.

But evidence uncovered during the Stein investigation reveals that Mr. Meese, a counsellor to Mr. Reagan since 1981, consistently used his power and influence in ways that appeared wrong, or left him open to compromise. He apparently doesn't understand that persons in high public office must have a sense of ethics and sufficient judgment to know when to exercise it. And he either was ignorant of—or didn't care about—a presidential executive order on ethics, in effect since 1965, that says government officers shouldn't act in ways that "might result in or create the appearance of . . . using public office for private gain."

It all boils down to this: Should the same strict standard of proof that keeps those who aren't indictable from the dock be used to judge the ethical qualifications of a man who would be chief legal officer of the nation? The answer is no, and that's the conclusion the Senate should reach.

[From the Willingboro (NJ) Burlington County Times, Jan. 30, 1985]

ETHICS: MEESE'S RECORD STILL TROUBLING

Edwin Meese III, President Reagan's nominee to succeed William French Smith as attorney general, is not qualified to be the nation's chief law enforcement officer.

It's not that Meese has broken the law. An independent investigation into Meese's financial affairs last year cleared him of criminal wrongdoing.

However, a new report raises serious questions about Meese's ethical judgment.

According to the Wall Street Journal, investigators for the Office of Government Ethics found Meese in violation of federal ethical standards. Curiously, their report was quashed by David H. Martin, head of the ethics office.

The issue is not so much whether Meese was involved in an outright conflict of interest—although that's a legitimate issue for debate—but whether Meese, as a public servant, took care to avoid the appearance of conflict.

Meese is alleged to have benefited from financial transactions with two men who subsequently obtained jobs in the government.

Sen. Strom Thurmond, R—S.C., chairman of the judiciary committee, said on Tuesday that he would seek to avoid "unreasonable inquiries" into Meese's conduct in office.

To hear Thurmond talk about it, one would think Meese had only been accused of stealing pencils or paper clips. There have been more serious allegations against Meese and—perhaps—an attempt to conceal the truth about two of the many incredible and profitable coincidences in the life of Edwin Meese III.

It is hardly high praise to say of Ed Meese that he is not, to anyone's knowledge, a criminal—that, at best, he walks a thin line between ethical and unethical behavior.

[From the Worcester (MA) Evening Gazette, Jan. 30, 1985]

ETHICS AND ED MEESE

Edwin Meese continues to meet obstacles on his way to being confirmed as attorney general.

Two weeks ago, he said that the government should pay legal costs of $700,000 that he incurred defending himself against allegations of improper conduct last year. Meese was cleared of breaking the law, but his high-priced attorneys are charging $225 an hour, more that the government wants to pay.

Yesterday the Senate Judiciary Committee discussed a secret staff report from the Office of Government Ethics that Meese, although cleared of any indictable offense, had nevertheless violated the federal government's ethical standards in two instances. The document was leaked to the press this week, apparently by someone in the White House with no great love for Meese.

The new development is vexing to the Republican leaders in the Senate. They had planned to whisk his confirmation through the Judiciary Committee and the Senate within a week or two.

Meese has been cleared of any crime, but is that enough? Should he have taken the $40,000 loan in 1981 from a man who was later appointed to a government job with his support? Should he be "as clean as a hound's tooth," or is that an unreasonable standard to set for the top law officer of the nation in 1985?

Maybe it's only a matter of "appearance," but appearances do count, especially when they involve the attorney general of the United States.

Meese's ordeal is not yet over. He still may have to face some tough grilling before he settles the disturbing questions that have been raised.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I previously indicated that I did not intend to delay this matter. I do not intend to delay it now. It is my understanding that Senator LEVIN is in the library and is prepared to come to the floor to speak.

I again suggest that those who are concerned about the farm issue, as I am, but not as a direct participant in this endeavor, see fit to be on the floor in order to protect their position.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a number of newspaper articles and editorials concerning Mr. Meese for Attorney General be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the National Review, Feb. 8, 1985]

MEESE AND THE LAW

Edwin Meese, who is as honorable and selfless as any man in public life today, will apparently have to undergo one last bout of character assassination before his confirmation as Attorney General of the United States.

The report of the independent counsel charged with investigating allegations against Meese showed that he was gulity of violating no rule other than the one that might be called Metzenbaum's Law: That public office is the preserve of the very rich. Faced with a financial crisis when he was unable to sell his house in California after moving to Washington, Meese persuaded his bank to grant an extension of time for mortgage payments instead of foreclosing, borrowed money from his accountant and from a close friend, and eventually was able to sell his house. Some of the people involved in these transactions (like virtually everyone Meese knew well or did business with) were also friends of other Administration officials or of President Reagan himself. Several later received low-level government appointments through their other contacts in the Administration—not through Meese. In no instance was it found either that the business transactions were improper in themselves or that they had anything to do with the appointments.

A memorandum now being circulated by Common Cause, however, suggests that the independent counsel's report exonerates Meese only of criminal wrongdoing. The memorandum argues against Meese's confirmation on the ground that his perfectly legal business transactions gave rise to an "appearance of impropriety." But the appearance is in the eye of the beholder. Common Cause overlooks the fact that the very things that make it improper for government officials to engage in certain business transactions also make these transactions illegal. If, as the independent counsel found, none of these factors was present in any of Meese's dealings it can only have been because they were conducted at arm's length and were therefore entirely proper.

The Common Cause memorandum also makes much of the fact that Meese—who has participated in meetings at which thousands of names were discussed for various positions in government, and whose office has received many thousands of letters—was in some instances unable to remember whether he had heard names discussed or read letters people said they had mailed to him.

Under the standard implicitly suggested by Common Cause, Meese was bound either to declare bankruptcy rather than borrow money to save his home, or to keep a list of the people with whom he did business in order to veto them in the event other people chose them for jobs for which they were well qualified. Official misconduct used to be made sterner stuff.

THINKING OUT LOUD

(By Nathan Cohn)

Our government was organized to guarantee its permanence.

The men who desired to live in a democracy designed a government of checks and balances.

We have three branches of government: the executive, the judicial and the legislative.

The three branches were set up to guarantee that our form of government would protect itself within its own framework.

The judicial branch determines the legality of these laws.

The executive branch executes these laws if they are recognized as constitutionally legal by our judicial branch.

The president of the United States, who is elected by the people, heads the executive branch.

Our forefathers who designed this fantastic government either were geniuses or were the luckiest group of people in the world.

It really works.

Our freedoms are completely protected by this simple, but brilliant theory of self-government.

We have a president who has been elected by a majority of our citizens.

Under our government, even those who did not vote to elect the president are duty-bound to support the selection by the majority.

The president heads the executive branch and has been allocated the power to select men and women to assist him in his executive position.

I did not vote for our present president, but as the majority of our people elected him into office, I support him. I do not agree with many of his ideas or actions, but as he is our duly elected leader, his actions and ideas are the law of the land.

President Reagan has made many appointments to his cabinet which leave me cold, and in some instances, quite a little worried. But, the public elected Reagan and Ronnie has the right to surround himself with the people he desires to assist him in running our country.

Years ago, I tried a case with two other attorneys representing co-clients. One of the other two was an outstanding trial attorney named James Martin MacInnes. I became a little upset with our third co-counsel and remarked to Jim that our associate was an "idiot." Jim looked at me solemnly and stated, "Yes, Nate, but he's our idiot."

Reagan has recently nominated Edwin Meese III to be attorney general of the United States.

The president should have the right to select the attorney general to serve as a member of his executive team.

Some senators have objected to Meese's nomination on the grounds that Meese failed to disclose loans from close friends. The loans were for a few thousand dollars. This is understandable. Many people would consider loans of such amounts from close friends as personal obligations and might not even think of such a friendly loan as something which should be included in one's profit-and-loss statement. A loan such as this might not even be remembered as an outstanding obligation which need be reported.

Meese was questioned about the fact that a couple of close friends of his were appointed to government positions.

This is a ridiculous issue to raise in evaluating Meese's qualities for his appointment. Our political leaders appoint people they know and trust to positions in their administrations.

Jacob Stein, a special prosecutor, was appointed by a special three-judge panel to investigate the allegations regarding Meese. After a five-month investigation special counsel Stein reported that there was no basis to bring any prosecution against Meese.

If Meese had performed illegal acts or had an intent to violate the law, Meese would have never been cleared by special counsel Stein.

Politicians usually appoint people to positions in government who might assist the politician in his reelection or in election to some higher political office.

President John Kennedy appointed his brother Robert attorney general. Bobby Kennedy had no legal experience which guaranteed his being named attorney general. Bobby performed ably, but neither his knowledge of the essential legal procedures nor his personal experience in law would have qualified him for appointment to this position by another president.

For many years, the postmaster general of the United States was nominated not for his abilities but only because he had served as campaign manager for the successful president.

Ed Meese is a well-qualified attorney. He was a former prosecutor, professor of law and a legal adviser to Reagan before the president acquired his present position.

Meese is from this area. He has always been reputed to be an honest, decent, hard-working lawyer.

Who does a person borrow from? Friends, of course. This is the normal procedure. A person would have a difficult time attempting to borrow money from strangers.

If a person is a close enough friend to loan one money, that person would, without doubt, be a close enough friend to trust in a government position when one wishes to name people who can be trusted to such position.

Loyalty should be rewarded, not used as a device to defame the loyal one.

Since 1966, Meese has been a person Ronald Reagan trusted. Meese served Reagan for two terms as chief of staff when Reagan was governor of California.

During President Reagan's first term. Meese served Ronald Reagan as counselor to the president.

No one can fault Reagan for naming a trusted, loyal supporter to be his attorney general.

Perhaps if you or I were president, we would select someone other than Meese to be attorney general. But neither of us is president, and the selection is not ours.

The Senate Judiciary Committee should recommend the confirmation of Edwin Meese's nomination as attorney general and the Senate should follow that recommendation.

Edwin Meese III should make a competent attorney general.

As Jim Macinnes would say, "Ronnie is our president."

[From the San Diego (CA) Union, Jan. 8, 1985]

CONFIRMATION DUE

There is every indication that the Senate Judiciary Committee will recommend that the Senate confirm Edwin Meese III, presidential counselor, to be attorney general when the issue is taken up again later this month. This will end nearly a year's delay in carrying out a key shift within Mr. Reagan's official family.

An independent special prosecutor, the respected Washington lawyer Jacob A. Stein, reported last September that there are no grounds for criminal charges against Mr. Meese in connection with any of the matters that came to light during his earlier confirmation hearings. This was no surprise to those who know Mr. Meese as a man of honesty and integrity. His sins of omission or commission involving loans, gifts and federal jobs were not those of someone intent on breaking the law. Mr. Meese did not always appreciate that innocent actions could be misunderstood when they are carried out by someone in his powerful position in the government.

Common Cause, the organization that brought some of the original accusations against Mr. Meese, won't let go of the issue. No matter what the special prosecutor says, Common Cause would like to see the Senate refuse to confirm the nomination on grounds that Mr. Meese is "blind" to ethical standards. That's reading far too much into Mr. Meese's lapses in judgment.

It's not unusual for presidents to name as Attorney General a close political associate or adviser who happens also to have appropriate credentials as a lawyer. Mr. Meese's long association with Mr. Reagan as governor, as candidate and President qualify him on the first score; his experience as a prosecutor and law professor qualify him on the second.

At the Justice Department, Mr. Meese will have the backing of strong staff—experienced professionals who are prepared to provide expertise and continuity in their respective fields. The man in the front office, we suspect, will spend a lot of time on the phone to the White House.

[From the Wall Street Journal, Jan. 3, 1985]

COMMON CAUSE VS. COMMON LAW

Just in time for today's return of Congress to Washington, the angels at Common Cause are enjoying one last dance on the pinpricked hide of Edwin Meese. Chairman and head ethicist Archibald Cox recently issued a 37-page report urging that everyone ignore last September's 385-page investigator's report exonerating Mr. Meese.

Not to worry that independent counsel Jacob Stein and five deputy counsels interviewed 200 witnesses, and a grand jury questioned 45 witnesses, and both read libraries full of documents. They cleared Mr. Meese of all allegations of criminal improprieties.

Mr. Stein was careful to note that he could only consider the criminal charges, and wasn't empowered to report the "propriety or the ethics" of Mr. Meese's conduct. But obviously ethical judgments depend, or should depend, on the facts, which Mr. Stein found weren't there. Yet Common Cause harps on some of the same charges, which include failure to report a pair of cuff links given by South Korea, a loan to Mrs. Meese by someone who later got a government job, and an extension on the Meese house mortgage.

The Stein report said there was nothing up Mr. Meese's sleeve on the cuff-link case, or when it came to the friend who made loans to Mrs. Meese and then got a government job "without the knowledge of or any intervention by Mr. Meese," or when the Meese mortgage was extended instead of foreclosed, which was "sound from a business point of view." It's not as if he was accused of breaking campaign finance laws or using a widow's trust fund for Meese family purposes.

What's really going on here is what's been going on ever since William French Smith resigned. Some people simply don't want an attorney general with the conservative views of Mr. Meese. Many of these apparently pay dues to Common Cause. Mr. Cox didn't let the Stein report facts get in his way. Even before the report was assigned, Mr. Cox was convinced that Mr. Meese violated "ethical mandates," and last spring sent a letter to all the senators saying so. So far, the anti-Meese lobby has managed to keep the attorney general's office vacant for almost a year, leaving in limbo some important programs of the Reagan mandate. Finally, Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole now says, "We've held Ed Meese hostage long enough."

One overdue reform for Attorney General Meese would be to end the Legal Services Corp., the American lawyers' version of UNESCO. The program was supposed to help the poor enforce their rights, but has been hijacked by social-engineering lawyers whose fascination is with redistributionist politics, not with the interests of individual poor people. Mr. Meese may also have some ideas for reducing the amount of litigation this country suffers, which accounts for a whopping 2% of GNP, more than steel.

The Senate Judiciary Committee hearings to confirm Mr. Meese are rescheduled for later this month. He is perfectly qualified for the job, as he was before the independent counsel's report, much personal torment, and a year ago.

Indeed, judging by the damage groups such as Common Cause would wreak on cherished legal principles, it strikes us that it may be import to have a chief law-enforcement officer with a victim's firsthand knowledge of the fragile nature of the rule of law. Consider this Common Cause argument. Despite the factual findings of the Stein report, the group only required its collective judgment to conclude that Mr. Meese lacks "ethical sensitivity," and so must never be attorney general. Each page from Mr. Cox must have the strength of 10 pages from the independent report because Common Cause hearts are so pure.

Consider what Common Cause would have us adopt as a new standard of proof. For example, the Cox report acknowledges the Stein finding that there was no link between the loan and the job, but concludes, "whatever his subjective motive, Mr. Meese did link by his actions" the loan and the job. "Subjective motive?" Common Cause is apparently relying on an "objective motive," an idea only a studied Marxist could understand. Since no evidence is offered to suggest any action by Mr. Meese to support a link between the loan and the job, this pathbreaking legal standard requires no proof.

The gist of the Common Cause argument makes a hash of the very concepts of guilt and innocence: Even though Mr. Meese did nothing criminal, there were allegations of criminal behavior, and the existence of allegations is fatal to Mr. Meese. In Mr. Cox's estimation, the controversy surrounding Mr. Meese means he can no longer "symbolize the highest standards of honor, integrity and freedom from self-interest." Mr. Cox and Common Cause of course were sources of many of these allegations in the first place. So political enemies can be quashed in three easy steps: Raise accusations, damage reputations, ignore vindications.

Neat.

But this procedure turns the major principle of common law inside out. The accepted idea has been that people are considerd innocent until proved guilty. The suggested reform from Common Cause, as applied to Mr. Meese, is that he's guilty after being proved innocent. A more proper verdict would be a speedy confirmation as attorney general.

[From the Sacramento Union, Jan. 2, 1985]

SECOND ROUND FOR MEESE

With a landslide reelection behind him, President Reagan is expected to have little difficulty in belatedly obtaining Senate acquiescence to his choice of Edwin Meese III as attorney general.

It should also help Mr. Meese and Mr. Reagan that Congress is—or should be—embarassed by its clumsy whitewash of Democratic vice presidential candidate Geraldine A. Ferraro's financial disclosure problems.

Post-Ferraro partisan attacks on Mr. Meese's integrity—now that he has been cleared of criminal suspicion by special prosecutor Jacob A. Stein—would not play well with the voting public that so overwhelmingly expressed its confidence in Mr. Reagan.

Mr. Stein thoroughly investigated Mr. Meese's personal finances, his controversial promotion in the Army Reserve, and insinuations that he helped to get federal jobs for people who helped him financially.

Some members of the Senate Judiciary Committee—which must confirm Mr. Meese as attorney general—and others in Congress had a field day grilling Mr. Meese during his initial round of confirmation hearings last year.

Some Democratic senators obviously found the presidential counselor a tempting surrogate target for his Republican boss in a crucial election year.

Now that the presidential election is over, the Senate Democrats presumably won't have much incentive to keep up the attacks on Mr. Meese.

Those who have followed Mr. Meese's governmental career in California and Washington are convinced that he is honest.

This, of course, doesn't excuse Mr. Meese from the charge that he was careless in keeping his financial affairs—including an interest-free loan of $15,000 to his wife that he failed to disclose as the law requires—straight and above suspicion.

We are confident that Mr. Meese will lay to rest any lingering doubts about his suitability to serve as attorney general.

When Round 2 of his confirmation hearings begin, Mr. Meese should be on his way toward restoring his reputation, that was tainted by nothing worse than occasionally poor judgment and excessively partisan attacks.

RECORD CLEARED: AN APOLOGY TO ED MEESE

(By James J. Kilpatrick)

WASHINGTON.—Back in March I wrote a column about Ed Meese. It hurt to write it. The President had nominated Meese to become attorney general, and the nomination had been caught in a fog of suspicion and innuendo. Meese was being perceived as a wheeler-dealer who peddled federal jobs in return for personal favors.

"Because perception counts so heavily," I said then, "my unhappy thought is that Meese ought to withdraw his name. . . . Reagan has enough heavy baggage to carry into the coming campaign without the burden of a long and distasteful battle for (Meese's) confirmation."

I write today's column with a lighter heart. Meese now has won vindication—vindication in every way that a court-appointed independent counsel could provide it. An exhaustive review of 11 allegations of wrongdoing failed to turn up the slightest evidence against him.

With only a few days remaining before Congress adjourns on Friday, it is too late to resume confirmation hearings now; but if Reagan is reelected in November, the Senate's first order of business in January should be the speedy rectification of the injury that has been done to an honorable man.

Jacob A. Stein was appointed independent counsel on April 2. My expectation—an expectation nurtured in Washington journalism—was that we were in for a summer of leaks. I could see The Washington Post's bloodhounds sniffing on the trail of Stein's investigators. It didn't work out that way. As it now transpires, there was nothing scandalous to leak. Moreover, Stein ran a tight ship. He gave no press conferences, and he kept his crew buttoned up: "We were successful in affording confidentiality concerning the appearance of witnesses."

By the time his investigation ended, Stein and his staff had interviewed more than 200 witnesses and had pored over thousands of pages of relevant material. No witness sought immunity. No witness took the Fifth. Under the ethics statute, Stein had no authority to consider matters of propriety, appearance or judgment on Meese's part. The question was whether Meese had violated federal law. And the upshot?

"We find no basis with respect to any of the 11 allegations for the bringing of a prosecution against Mr. Meese."

One of the more serious allegations last spring had to do with a $15,000 loan from Edwin W. Thomas to Meese's wife Ursula. Meese had failed to report the indebtedness on his Form 278; the loan carried no interest; Thomas had been named to head the San Francisco office of the General Services Administration; Mrs. Thomas had become an attorney-examiner with the Merit Systems Protection Board; their son Tad Thomas held a job for 10 months with the Labor Department. It looked bad.

Stein's metriculous investigation dissipates the cloud. The two families were quite close; the loan was a friendly accommodation intended to help Mrs. Meese in the timely purchase of a promising stock. (The stock, as it turned out, was a bummer.) Thomas got his GSA job on his own. There was no-evidence "that Mr. Meese was involved in or was even aware of Mr. Thomas' appointment." As for Mrs. Thomas: "No evidence of Mr. Meese's participation in her hiring was found." As for Tad: "No evidence regarding Mr. Meese was discovered."

The same negative findings were made in the matter of Meese's real estate loans. After Reagan's victory in November 1980, it was imperative that Meese make a move to Washington in order to serve as the incoming President's chief counselor. The Meeses put their San Diego home on the market and simultaneously arranged to purchase a house in McLean, Va., a Washington suburb. The San Diego property remained unsold until September 1982. Much of the financing was through Great American First Savings Bank. Subsequently Gordon Luce, chairman of Great American's board, was appointed to a part-time position as alternate delegate to the U.N. General Assembly.

Stein's conclusion, after an exhaustive tracking of documents and testimony, is that there simply was no nexus between the bank's easygoing treatment of Meese and Luce's appointment to a largely honorary post. Luce was close to the President. If he had wanted a high-ranking job in Washington, he would not have needed Ed Meese to intercede for him. All other allegations faded away in the same fashion.

In the newspaper business, all this would add up to "no story." The media, regrettably, have treated the Stein report as such. The abbreviated coverage of Meese's vindication this month is in marked contrast to the voluminous reported of the allegations against him last spring. This is how the system works: No story is no story. But it is pure pleasure for me to rejoice that Meese spurned my bad advice in March. He and the President stood fast, and they have come through with colors flying.

Ed Meese Cleared and Ready

President Reagan's announced intention to have Edwin Meese, his White House counselor, serve as the next U.S. attorney general got a big boost recently.

Meese was officially cleared of possible criminal charges having to do with his financial affairs and possible violations of bribery statutes. Specifically, he was found innocent of allegations that he helped to get federal jobs for individuals who had lent his family money or helped him sell his La Mesa, Calif., home.

This vindication came in the form of a 385-page report. The findings summarize an exhaustive five-month investigation by Jacob A. Stein, who was appointed last April by a three-judge federal court as a counsel independent of the Justice Department to determine Meese's culpability.

Stein, one of the country's most respected attorneys, was assisted by five deputy counsels, including three former government prosecutors, and four FBI agents.

There were 11 separate inquiries of possible wrongdoing, some of which were niggling. One, for example, had to do with Meese's retention of cuff links given to him by the government of South Korea.

The most serious inquiry and the center of the investigation concerned Meese's failure to list a $15,000 loan to his wife on federal disclosure forms. The exonerating verdict on this is clear enough: ". . . we find no indication of any underlying improper or illegal conduct on the part of the Meeses and no evidence that they had knowledge of any such conduct by anyone else." Stein did cite Meese's "general lack of attention to the forms . . ."

As for the charge that Meese helped his friends obtain federal jobs in return for personal favors. Stein found in every instance that the individuals were so well acquainted either with the president himself or with other top officials in the administration that ". . . none of them needed Mr. Meese's support and influence to obtain federal jobs . . ."

So much for the criminal aspect. But what about ethics and judgment? Appropriately, Stein resisted pressure from both friends and foes of Meese to express an opinion on the moral aspects and confined his report to the strictly legal. Thus, these subjective considerations remain as a factor in the confirmation proceedings after the November election, assuming Mr. Reagan's victory. Senators from both parties predict, however, that the president will be given the attorney general he has pledged anew to nominate.

Indeed, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, apparently reflecting the views of other Judiciary Committee Democrats, has said, "the questions examined and resolved by the special counsel should no longer be part of the confirmation process." Instead, he promised to question Meese about his "sensitivity to issues of civil rights and civil liberties." Such partisan and philosophical dickering will not likely amount to much.

The real question now is this: What can be expect from Meese as the nation's top law-enforcement official? Putting aside his advocacy of law and order since his days as deputy district attorney in California's Alameda County during the early 1960s, we find a thoughtful answer from a prominent and qualified Democrat: Lloyd N. Cutler, a lawyer and counsel to President Jimmy Carter, wrote not long ago that Meese's academic and professional records ". . . may not be up to the standards of distinction set by Nicholas Katzenbach and Edward H. Levi, but he compares favorably with most of our attorneys general * * *

Philosophy Behind Meese Mess an AP News Analysis By Mike Feinsilber

Washington.—From one viewpoint, the fight over the fitness of Edwin Meese III to serve as attorney general was over his ethics. But that was only part of the story. Much of the opposition facing Meese was based on his political philosophy rather than his ethics.

The long, painful, expensive fight over Meese's nomination illustrates a point about the way Washington works.

These occasional confirmation battles—always distasteful because a person's reputation is at stake—are almost always over a hidden question.

Usually the battle grounds are the nominee's ethics while what's really at issue is his philosophy.

In Meese's case, special prosecutor Jacob A. Stein absolved Meese of criminal wrongdoing last week in the culmination of a five-month grand jury investigation.

The fight wasn't over a $15,000 interest-free loan from a long-time California friend who ended up on the federal payroll. Nor was it over Meese's forgetfulness in neglecting to list some stock transactions on his financial disclosure forms, or his hasty promotion in the Army Reserve, or his failure to turn over to the government a $375 pair of jade and gold cuff links given him by the South Korean government.

Meese's ideological foes in the Senate raised those issues in an attempt to keep him from becoming head of the Justice Department because they don't like his ideas, not because they cared what he did with a pair of cuff links.

Meese's critics don't like his conservative political philosophy, his feelings toward the poor, his attempts to weaken or abolish the Legal Services Corporation, his attempt to restore tax-exempt status to Bob Jones University despite its record of discrimination on the basis of race, his opposition to the Equal Rights Amendment and what one witness at Senate hearings called "the Administration's insensitivity, unfairness and indifference to women, minorities, the disabled and many other victims of discrimination."

The witness, Ralph Neas, testifying on behalf of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, told the Senate Judiciary Committee last Feb. 2, "Bluntly put, we oppose the nomination because, on the basis of our observations over the past three years, we do not believe Ed Meese, as the nation's chief law enforcement officer, would enforce, vigorously and objectively, our nation's civil rights laws."

That sort of argument doesn't get very far, and the Meese nomination was headed for the Senate floor, and probable confirmation, when the personal financial questions that caused the appointment of a special prosecutor arose.

VINDICATION FOR EDWIN MEESE III

When there were stories day after day on the charges made against White House Counselor Edwin Meese III during Senate hearings on his suitability to serve as U.S. Attorney General, the constant repetition had the effect of virtually convicting Meese without a trial.

The inquisitors of Meese, led by Sen. Howard M. Metzenbaum, D-Ohio, hounded him with a succession of allegations that seemed to indicate Meese had accepted financial favors in exchange for helping a number of his friends get cushy government jobs.

Democratic foes of Meese even went so far as to invent a term, "the Sleaze Factor," which they claimed applied to the Reagan administration as well as to Meese.

Meese's detractors were so convinced of his guilt they called on him to ask President Reagan to withdraw his nomination because they were sure he had committed serious, possibly criminal offenses.

Meese finally had all he could take of this guilt-by-accusation strategy and asked for an independent investigation of the charges that Metzenbaum and Company arrayed against him.

Now, after an exhaustive investigation by an independent counsel, Jacob A. Stein, the latter says the five-month probe found "no basis" for bringing criminal charges against Meese on 11 allegations made against him.

This 378-page report should silence a lot the irresponsible charges and innuendos that political opponents of Meese and President Reagan have coantinued to make against Meese. The Sleaze is on the other foot. Those who jumped so quickly to conclude that Edwin Meese had broken the law in a number of financial dealings must now be feeling pretty sleazy, and deservedly so.

It is not surprising that Senator Metzenbaum is still talking about "inconsistencies" between what Stein reported and testimony heard before the committee, or that Metzenbaum has called anew for Meese to ask Reagan to withdraw the nomination. There probably is nothing on earth that could persuade Metzenbaum to drop his vendetta against Meese. Fortunately, if the present trend in the presidential race holds up, the influence of the noted real estate broker from Ohio will be further diminished after Nov. 6.

The lesson here is that it is always wrong to attempt to convict someone before he has had a fair hearing on the charges made against him. The overzealous pursuers of Mr. Meese weren't just out to defeat his nomination, they intended to destroy his effectiveness in the White House, and to then use the demise of Meese to batter the administration as well. The exoneration of Meese of any illegal behavior has foiled this plan. It should serve as a caution flag for some in Congress and in the media who have been inclined to conclude that any behavior that appears suspicious is, ipso facto, criminal behavior.

BURNING THE SCANDAL AT BOTH ENDS—MEESE MESS

(By Michael Ledeen)

Scandals make good copy and sometimes make journalistic careers, but do they make for good government? The case of Ed Meese shows the press in a less than flattering light, diligently hunting down all the leads that might show malfeasance in high places but often exaggerating the significance of what has been discovered, and leaving one in the end with the disturbing thought that the whole "affair" will prove to be one more blow to reasonableness

My favorite contemporary author, the Swiss Friedrich Durrenmatt, provided the best perspective on scandal in his novel Traps, later a Broadway play entitled The Deadly Game. The theme as in all his works, was justice. What is guilt, and who can judge it? In Traps, a nondescript person wanders through a winter blizzard into a chalet to find three old men having their monthly dinner together, a retired judge, a retired prosecutor, and a retired defense attorney. The three try the greatest case of history, but as one of them explains to Traps, it's more fun with a real person, and they ask if he will stand trial in exchange for food and drink. He agrees, but when his attorney suggests he plead guilty to a minor charge ("everyone has done something wrong after all"), Traps insists that he has lived an exemplary life and claims innocence. In the end, the prosecutor finds that Traps, having discovered his wife involved in an affair with his boss, arranges for the man—who has a heart condition—to undergo a shock, which kills him. "You knew he would die," the prosecutor proclaims enthusiastically. "Yes," says Traps, who is promptly sentenced to death by the judge. Taking matters into his own hands, Traps hangs himself and when the three old men—now happily drunk—find his body, they lament, Traps, Traps, why did you do that? You have ruined the most wonderful evening we ever had."

As Durrenmatt realized, no one's life can withstand intense scrutiny. We have all done something we regret, or failed to do something we should have done, and a canny prosecutor in a courtroom or in the media can eventually ask enough damaging questions to make us look bad. In practice, once the life of a public figure comes under the microscope, he is in trouble. One hopes that the issue is one of degree, and that we are entitled to be judged by standards of reasonableness. Are our sins grave or only the usual ones?

In the Meese affair, the protagonist's major malfeasance seems to have been that he borrowed money. His other alleged sins, for the most part, are those that define the political process and the spoils system: he got people he knew appointed to jobs; he rewarded party loyalists and Reagan supporters; he did his best to rally public and Congressional backing for his President's programs.

Yet even though there is virtually unanimous testimony from those who know him best that Meese is an honest and scrupulous man, the media have investigated his activities without the kind of fairness we so badly need to keep society civil. THE NEW REPUBLIC for one, used a nasty cover headline—SLEAZY ED MEESE—to highlight a TRB column about the case (TNR, April 2). Consider two other examples. The first came on April 4, when Ronald J. Ostrow of the Los Angeles Times wrote a story (picked up by The Washington Post) with this lead paragraph:

Clarence M. Pendleton Jr., chairman of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, won appointment to his federal job while serving on the board of Great American Federal Savings & Loan Association, the San Diego institution that allowed Attorney General-designate Edwin Meese III to fall fifteen months behind on his mortgage payments."

After noting that Pendleton was the third former official of the S&L to get a job in the Reagan Administration. Ostrow leveled his charge against Meese in the form of a question: "In an interview, Pendleton said he had no knowledge of Meese's mortgage debt . . . or of Great American's apparently unusually tolerant attitude. . . ." The insinuation here is that the bank let Meese off easy because the bank's officials wanted (and got) jobs in Washington, or alternatively, that bank officials helped Meese and he rewarded them later on by getting them Washington jobs.

Meese and Pendleton were old friends, Pendleton having served on the board of San Diego Coalition for Economic and Environmental Balance—co-founded by Meese—in the late 1970s. Thus Pendleton was already in the basic pool of people from whom the Reagan Administration chose many of its officials. Furthermore, as Ostrow's own information demonstrates, the dates of Pendleton's association with the bank don't support the suggestion that he was instrumental in the Meese loans. Pendleton came to the bank in January 1981 (by which time the Meeses were trying to sell their house) and left in November. Ostrow himself observes that Meese's mortgage debt" . . . climbed to $423,000 in April 1982," by which time Pendleton had been gone for five months and was hardly in a position to influence anything. In any event, the bank's willingness to let Meese delay payments until the house was sold is hardly surprising; California real estate is not a bad risk. Meese was gainfully employed, and his future earning prospects were excellent. Meese says that he didn't even know Pendleton was on the board, and nothing in prunt suggests the contrary.

Had the media been of a fairer turn of mind, they might have reported that the stones of Meese and his California home reflected the man's real condition: Meese had to borrow money, tried to sell his house during a tough time for the real estate market, and got some help during that period from—imagine—his friends.

The other main sin of which Meese has been accused is more interesting, because it is related to the post-Watergate effort to eliminate venality from government. As usual, the procedures were designed by the lawyers, who created complicated forms for government officials to fill out. It was Meese's failure to completely fill out one of these forms that led to one of the most outrageous headlines in the whole affair, in the Washington Post on April 6: Meese Failed to List Paid Trips. The clear suggestion of the headline—and much of the story—was that Meese was cheating in fact he had run afoul of same tough paperwork. The new ethics laws require you to report almost everything you do and have done, including everthing you own, all jobs you have ever held any company with which you have had a relationship, any board on which you have sat, and so on. I know of one older government official who has done a lot in his life who had to pay a lawyer and an accountant for thirty days' work in order to fill out the forms in full.

The ordeal by form does not end there, however, for if you travel while a government official, you have to report that, too, and it is very difficult to deduce from the laws how to report it all. If a group asks you to speak and offers to pay for the cost of your travel and lodging, there are two possibilities: you can pay the expenses and ask for reimbursement, or you can ask for the tickets, the hotel bills, and the meals to be paid directly for you. If I understood the requirements properly, the first case is termed "reimbursement" and goes on one form, while the second is a "gift" and goes on a different form. Moreover, the government's lawyers were in a quandary for the first couple of years about how to report all these things, and even about whether they all had to be reported.

This aspect of the Meese story offered the media the chance to look into the Ethics in Government Act and ask some intelligent questions about it, but to my knowledge no publication or network did so. Yet as John H. Gross, who investigated the Carter family business for the Justice Department in 1979, wrote in the New York Law Journal back in January 1982:

". . . the Act does not effectively deal with the problem it was intended to address. In fact, its chief effect has been to deflect public inquiry from genuine improprieties of those in high office and focus public interest instead on errors which those officials comment in preparing their disclosure reports.

"This is essentially a misplaced focus because most such errors are nothing more than honest mistakes. Not only do the Act and its regulations call for elaborate detail, but they do so in a terribly confusing manner. . . . A government official without specialized training in the requirements of the Act is likely to be mystified by the task before him. Mistakes are almost unavoidable.

"Such mistakes seem to hold an interest for "public interest" groups and the media well beyond their intrinsic importance . . ."

Meese didn't want to spend the money on a lawyer, and filled out the forms himself. On one occasion he omitted a $15,000 loan to his wife from a California friend who later got a government job (he had declared the loan on other forms), and this got him into hot water. Just as John Gross had predicted, an innocent error became characterized as malfeasance.

In Traps, the old men's game becomes deadly because Traps makes a claim of absolute innocence that cannot possibly stand close investigation, and he forgets that he is involved in a game and acts as if his mock trial and sentencing were real. The judge and the attorneys were shocked to see the effect of their amusement, for they had believed it was all a game. I sometimes think the media behave in the same way, and one of the tip-offs is the fact that almost without exception the major media have termed Jacob Stein the "special prosecutor" in the case. His actual title is "independent counsel" and the title was changed from "special prosecutor" in 1982 precisely because Congress decided that the latter was too prejudicial. Yet among leading publications only The Wall Street Journal has used the correct label with any frequency.

The Meese affair has produced hundreds of pages of articles and hours of broadcast time. This is disproportional to the significance of Meese's actions. It hurts Meese, an honest and capable official, and it makes it more difficult to recruit other good people for similar positions. In fact, for a day at the Democratic convention, some journalists noted that Geraldine Ferraro had not listed her husband's business activities on her disclosure form, and there was a brief flurry of investigative activity. Happily, it quieted down, but we shall soon witness her second ordeal by form. If we continue to subject our public officials to such unfair examinations, we shall end up with either inexperienced novitiates or experienced crooks in high office.

The government and the media must reach a reasonable compromise, whereby the media continue to scrutinize the activities of government officials but a sense of balance about improprieties is observed. The alternative is for political life to grow less and less civil.

CANNIBALISM CAPITAL-STYLE

(By Aram Bakshian)

Attention, readers: Can you name this tune?

"This is a hell of a job I have no trouble with my enemies. I can take care of them all right. But my damm friends . . . they're the ones that keep me walking the floor nights!"

Wrong again. It's not a quote from Ronald Reagan's diary. This conversational fragment was uttered by President Warren Gamaliel Harding to journalist William Allen White, some 60 years ago.

One wonders though, whether some similar thought—neatly shorn of the expletives, of course—doesn't occasionally echo in the sound chambers of the current First Executive Cranium. Especially just now, while Edwin Meese, one of the president's closest confidants and his nominee for attorney general, has become an inadvertent means of raising doubts about the ethical practices of the Reagan administration.

Fritz Mondale, the candidate of compassion and the open mind, has already tried Mr. Meese and found him guilty of being part of, in Mr. Mondale's own delicate words, the Reagan "sleaze factor." My question, and perhaps I should use a Mondalian frame of reference, is, "Where's the sleaze?"'

Until and unless the investigation of the newly appointed special prosecutor uncovers any real illegalities or improprieties on the part of Mr. Meese, it will become Mr. Mondale and the rest of the pack yapping at his heels to pass judgment on one of the more decent, dedicated people to come to Washington and the executive branch in recent years.

Let me confess that I am not a neutral spectator in this tawdry political melodrama. I knew, worked with—and occasionally disagreed with—Ed Meese in the Reagan White House for several years. When you gain insight into and respect for a person's character on the basis of close contact, you may be better qualified to pass judgment on their conduct and character than someone who is trying to use them as a political punching bag—but you are not an unbiased juror.

So, having admitted that extensive exposure to Ed Meese left me with the highest opinion of him as a man of honor and a public servant of integrity, let me confine myself to some of the factual details of the "case" that is being mounted against him by Sen. Howard Metzenbaum. D-Ohio, and other partisan politicians trying to inflict damage on Ronald Reagan in what just happens to be an election year.

By the way, a close look at Mr. Metzenbaum's own colorful rise to riches as a Midwest parking lot millionaire, and his exceedingly cordial relations with trade union bosses might prove most informative as an example of how to get rich quick and then be elected to the Senate. One hopes that somewhere, even now, a dedicated sociologist—or an employee of Jack Anderson—is compiling the full story so that it will not be lost to future generations wishing to emulate it.

As for the Ed Meese case, herewith a few facts that have been lost in the blizzard of innuendo. On the basis of all the evidence and accusations made to date.

1. Mr. Meese never proposed any full- or part-time federal job for any person (or their relatives) to whom he or his wife were ever indebted.

2. He never proposed any federal full- or part-time job to anyone who assisted, financially or otherwise, in the sale of his San Diego home.

3. His debts never exceeded his assets.

4. All of his debts have been paid, along with all interest due.

5. He made no effort to receive special treatment for promotion in the Army Reserve.

6. Out of four annual financial filings, each requiring scores of complex entries, he forgot to list only three items, one of which may not have been required in any event. All omissions have been corrected.

7. There is not inconsistency in any of his statements, sworn or unsworn, about Carter materials, or statements he made about other routine unclassified Carter campaign materials having nothing to do with the debates.

It may well be that, thanks to a media blitz and the cheap shots of Messrs. Metzenbaum, Mondale, and crew, Mr. Meese may never become attorney general. Ted Stevens, the Republican Senate Whip, has said that, if he were Ed Meese, he'd wait to be exonerated by the special prosecutor and then tell them what to do with the job. I suspect that's what many of us would do in a similar case.

Mr. Meese may also conclude that he has, fairly or unfairly, become a political liability to his old friend, the President. But if he has—and if he goes—it will be much more of a tribute to cynical political cannibalism Washington-style than to anything remotely resembling justice.

Where's the decency?

OUR ANEMIC SCANDALS

Apparently the first obligation of every White House appointee and nominee is to serve as raw material for the American soap opera industry, particularly that annex of the industry, that has arrogated the term journalism.

In the Carter administration Tim Kraft, Ham Jordan, and Bert Lance dutifully served this high purpose. Even the President is expected to serve, as Jimmy Carter learned when the reporters called him onto the carpet to explain the dark intricacies of the sale of his fabulous peanut warehouse.

Now it is the Reagan administration's appointees who are learning their roles in our national morality pageants, and for three years various ill-starred eminentoes have been duly responding to the lurid charges lodged by suspicious journalists and congressional investigating committees.

Only one Reagan appointee has been convicted of any crime whatever. Yet the Democrats now speak portentously of the Republican's "moral character," and recently in Iowa Gary Hart adjudged the administration's ethics as unparalleled throughout the long, sordid history of the republic.

This creation of melodrama where theretofore only dull government toil was spied is a fascinating process. Ominous stories appear in the press. A barrage of inquiries from the journalists falls upon the fated appointee. Overnight the head of the National Security Council, the head of the Central Intelligence Agency, the secretary of the Navy and all manner of smaller fish are turned from their governmental tasks and obliged to provide us with thrills on the evening news and opportunities for Pulitzer Prizes.

"Since Ronald Reagan took office," an inflamed New York Times reporter revealed last week, "more than a dozen high-level officials have resigned, been investigated or been forced to explain their actions after charges of impropriety.

"Forced to explain their actions." What pale representation of scandal is this? Moreover what kind of ethical issue is it?

Well, for the credulous it is a scandal to curl the hair, and for the Democrats, whose policies and presidential contenders are so thunderously unfetching, it is an issue on the order of "Fifty-four Forty or Fight."

Currently in our nation's capital we have two more appointees jumping through the journalists' hoops and otherwise being sweated by the news industry at taxpayers' expense. They are the sinister Edwin Meese, President Reagan's nominee for attorney general, and Leslie Lenkowsky, a Democrat whose appointment as deputy director of the United States Information Agency was a shoo-in until it was discovered that someone somewhere at the USIA had compiled a list of speakers to be barred from USIA trips.

Did Lenkowsky know about this Procrustean tool of Reaganite totalitarianism? If he cannot prove his ignorance, back to New York he, his wife and two children will be sent, and under a very dark cloud.

Of these two scoundrels, Meese is providing the greater melodrama. His imbroglio involves money, cuff links, and the mysterious Carter briefing papers. Lenkowsky's is merely a question of whether he knew about the infamous list (now reported to be a bureaucratic record of the 96 or so speakers rejected by political appointees out of the 5,600 accepted over 2½ years).

Lenkowsky says he abolished the list when he heard of it, which is perfectly plausible. He is a lifelong Democrat and Democrats are politically savvy enough to know intuitively whom to invite to represent them. Republicans are comparatively quite ignorant. They need lists.

There are two lessons to be learned here. The first is for the White House. If it wishes to avoid future imbroglios such as the Meese grilling, do not appoint middle-class salary-earners. Appoint the really rich who can afford to lose money in their moves to Washington, and fire those in the White House who allow such puny scandals to grow vast and blood-curdling.

I suggest that former Treasury Secretary William Simon be brought in. He is as rich as Croesus, and he makes it all himself. Not only that, he is Reaganite to the core.

The second lesson is for those who create these melodramas. In time, these scandals are an embarrassment to America. We should have scandals as great as America is great. Each administration should have to appoint a few certifiable gratters to positions of public trust. Anyone familiar with urban politics knows where to find likely candidates.

HANG TOUGH, ED

(By Kenneth Adelman)

Dear Ed: It's a tough thing you're going through. Confirmation battles have become like an annual springtime rite of passage. You are no doubt pondering exactly how you got into this situation and planning how to get it resolved. Then you may be able to appreciate what Virgil wrote in 23 B.C.: "Perhaps someday it will be pleasant to remember even this."

I learned some lessons at the same time last year:

1. The controversy transcends the nominee. Advocates of a political cause think they have to personalize their issue to be effective. The issue precedes the confirmation battle and will persist afterward. In your case, they are trying to dramatize what they see as a "liberal" versus "conservative" issue. They are trying to use you to advance the idea that the Reagan administration cares more about its own advantage than about the disadvantaged. While the words and investigations concentrate on the nominee, the controversy is fueled by emotion on the issue, quite apart from your fate. Precise answers to charges made are necessary but not sufficient; they deal with the facts rather than the passion. I was extensively queried on South Africa, traits of a successful president, African art acquisitions, and sundry other topics which do not, shall I say, now cross my desk. You try not to take it personally, but that's impossible.

2. Senators on the march seem spirited, relentless, pointed; those on the defense seem hesitant, sporadic and diffused. What seems is often what is. Those on the attack seek to mobilize troops by transforming the issue into a highly symbolic skirmish over the confirmation. They use overstatement, high drama and vigorous reconnaissance missions—not all that much different from what was once called a witch hunt.

In such circumstances, even the most meager tidbit is often heralded as an exceptional scoop. Only a rare senator or commentator breaks from the chase to suggest that justice for the nation—the Senate's constitutional obligation to pass a sound judgment on a nomination—has to be somehow balanced by justice for that individual. Public servants have a right to avoid having their reputations besmirched by "revelations" of silly mistakes, which become of consequence only because they appear at a particular intense moment. Clement Haynsworth, Walter Hickel, Theodore Sorensen, William Clark and other decent and capable men—from different administrations—were treated roughly and seriously bruised in and by the confirmation process.

At risk is a nominee's reputation. That is most valuable. At risk, just as vital, is the willingness of persons out of government ever to serve and thereby unavoidably enter the fray.

3. Each new revelation, no matter how dinky, arouses more and more committee members and, in confirmation battles, the senators have the power. Most of the time most senators feel themselves less powerful than people in the executive branch—the opposite of what most in the executive feel—but not in this case. Here, everyone agrees that the nominee is almost wholly in the committee's, then the Senate's hands. In fact, in what constitutes the quintessence of John C. Calhoun's concept of government by concurrent majority, a willful handful of senators can halt a critical action—the appointment of the president's person to implement his policies.

It's not surprising that the United States is the only country with such a confirmation process, or that the provision was put together in a compromise during the final weeks of the Constitutional Convention. Still, the process is there to be used, not abused.

4. Time is a big problem and a big frustration. A nominee naturally yearns to move into the new job to tackle the challenges. The delays seem unending. They increase the opportunities for hyping otherwise insignificant material; the opposition needs that to keep the tale alive. Delays are oftentimes tailored to drive the nominee or the president to yield. Hang tough, Ed.

5. Some members of the press quickly become participants rather than observers. The opposition on the Hill feeds material to reporters friendly to them; supporters do likewise to try to achieve a semblance of news balance. As is too frequently the case with the rush of deadlines and lack of in-depth knowledge, some reporters are propelled to print material furnished by sources without independent substantiation.

Above all media, television news reigns supreme. As a form of theater, it thrives on passion and controversy. Do not expect a fair exposition of the facts. But what television news brings forward, from among a multitude of factors, will be what makes the Senate cloakroom and other "talk of the town." That's terribly important.

6. Despite all this, final votes are cast largely by what the senators think of the nominee as a person—how decent, how truthful, how qualified, how interested in the public good rather than in private gain. This in your favor, Ed. Senators are, by and large, keen at gaining a sense of the person. After all, they are at the top, which demands agility at sizing up people. Integrity becomes the supreme consideration, as is proper for the process, for the nominee, and for the country. As long as the nominee conducts himself then, as before, with decency and integrity, it shines through.

Until that final resolution, an abundance of frustration, creeping doubt and emotional tearing are the lot of the nominee and the nominee's family. All want to cry out:

"This just isn't fair." That's only human, and it's also true.

The unfairness grinds away at the collective enthusiasm for the new position. "Is it worth it?" During a confirmation ordeal, that question can be difficult. But the enthusiasm springs back the instant you are sworn in and begin tackling the new challenges.

Strangely enough, it is somehow consoling to grasp that after all this furor, in short order Washington will move along to a new Major Issue, which, in turn, will soon be overshadowed, continuing the endless march of Major Issues and Big Controversies in Washington—many furnishing little meaning beyond the Potomac, much less any historical legacy.

Not fleeting, but enduring is the maxim of Abba Eben: "Politics is not for the faint-hearted."

ED MEESE: RIGHT MAN FOR THE JOB

The Senate Judiciary Committee's confirmation hearings on the nomination of Edwin Meese 3d to become the new U.S. Attorney General did not lay a glove on him.

For sheer election-year hypocrisy, however, they will take some beating.

For the millionaire Sen. Howard M. Metzenbaum (D-Ohio) to pursue Meese about the financing of his two homes on a White House salary was the worst kind of limousine liberal demagoguery.

For Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), with Sen. Edward Kennedy sitting next to him, to fret about Meese's closeness to Reagan would be laughable if it were not so undiscerning.

What, pray was the late Robert Kennedy if not his brother Jack's most active political campaign manager and closest confidant?

Every President has a right to a trusted friend as attorney general. Eisenhower had his top political strategist Herbert Brownell, JFK had Bobby, Nixon had his law partner and campaign director John Mitchell, Carter had his boyhood friend Griffin Bell.

Yet a more persuasive message is coming from the hearings. This is that Ed Meese is a decent guy—reserved, of modest means, a quiet family man who has lived through a great personal tragedy, a man with close ties to his church and a highly regarded expertise in law and order.

In short, an ordinary American who has done the nation some service. The Senate, this week should allow him to do still more.

BE FAIR TO MEESE

(By Lloyd N. Cutler)

WASHINGTON.—Although the independent counsel appointed to investigate Edwin Meese 3d, the President's counselor, has just begun his work, many are saying that Mr. Meese is not fit to be confirmed as Attorney General and ought to withdraw his name now—no matter what the independent counsel concludes.

As one who supported the original special-prosecutor law and its extension in 1982, I believe this position offends the basic principle of this important post-Watergate reform. The decision to appoint an independent counsel is not a judicial judgment of guilt. It is not even a judicial accusation of guilt, as a grand jury indictment would be. It is merely a recognition that there is a reasonable basis for investigating whether a crime may have been committed by a top-ranking member of the incumbent Administration.

Since the Attorney General would appear to have a political conflict of interest in conducting such an investigation, the job of investigating further and deciding whether to present charges to a grand jury is turned over to an independent counsel. (The title of the investigator was changed in 1982 from "special prosecutor" to "independent counsel" to avoid an implication either of guilt or an accusation of guilt against the subject of the inquiry.)

Mr. Meese has not yet been officially accused of any criminal act. The independent counsel may conclude that no such accusation is justified. That would not automatically mean that Mr. Meese was fit to be confirmed as Attorney General. That judgment depends on two factors: his credentials and record apart from the events under investigation by the independent counsel, and on the bearing of these events, even if they do not justify criminal charges, on Mr. Meese's fitness for the office.

On the first point, his academic and professional records, he may not be up to the standards of distinction set by Nicholas deB. Katzenbach and Edward H. Levi, but he compares favorably with most of our Attorney General. The President plainly trusts Mr. Meese and is prepared to rely on his advice. While many of us have publicly disagreed with his views on particular issues of civil rights and criminal justice, his record places him well within the range of discretion that Presidents have been and should be granted in selecting their Attorneys General.

The second point is more subtle. Even if Mr. Meese's actions are not found to warrant criminal prosecution, they may amount to a civil violation of the Ethics in Government Act. And even if they do not amount to a civil violation, they may still justify an inference that Mr. Meese has been too inattentive and irresponsible about his personal legal duties as a public official to make a credible Attorney General. But until the independent counsel finishes his work and reports his findings, we cannot fairly pass judgment on any of these issues.

Even then, the independent counsel's full report to the court cannot legally be published unless the court finds it in the public interest to do so. In the three cases to date where a report declining to prosecute was filed, the court made the full report public only in the case of Hamilton Jordan, President Jimmy Carter's chief of staff. It published an excised version in the investigation of Raymond J. Donovan, Mr. Reagan's Secretary of Labor, and nothing at all in the case involving Timothy Kraft, President Carter's appointments secretary. In the event that a report declining prosecution is filed, Mr. Meese ought to request that the court promptly publish it in full. This would best serve the public interest as well as his own. Only then would the Senate and the public have an informed opportunity to advise on and consent to his accession to the highest lawyer's office in the land.

Until then, fairness to Mr. Meese, as well as a decent respect for the principles of the law creating the independent counsel, oblige us all to reserve our judgment.

(Lloyd N. Cutler, a lawyer, was counsel to President Jimmy Carter.)

MEESE IN THE TIGER'S DEN

Ed Meese went before the Senate Judiciary Committee yesterday for his confirmation hearings. One member, Sen. Alan Simpson of Wyoming, put the whole thing in proper perspective with the following remarks. We reprint below an excerpted version: It says it all better than anyone else could.

I would like to welcome Ed Meese in the tiger's den. Let me say first that I am pleased we could start these hearings on such a light, bipartisan note.

I note that you and I are the same age—and that we served in the Army at the same time, 1954 to 1958. I relate that because we both obviously trained and qualified for long hours on the rifle range with the M1 rifle.

Do you remember that Ed? Now you are about to be hauled up out of the range pit and will soon become the target. I think you are well prepared for that. But I know that you also know what happened when they would splatter away all day—and on a complete miss they would haul out a red flag called "Maggie's Drawers."

After some of these pesky rascals on the Judiciary Committee have peppered away at you during their allotted—or unalloted—time, that is what they will come up with—a big goose egg. But the ritual must be played out and that is as it should be.

We do have some members here today who would flunk a saliva test waiting for your appearance in order that they might do a tattoo on your freckled dome. No experience is required to be a critic—and anyone can qualify. We will trot out everything you have done—or uttered—and yet if somebody gathered up the collected mumblings of Al Simpson, I'd be in the clink.

As they vent their spleen on you as the alleged alter ego of this fine president, you will again be acquainted with the remarkable ambivalence of this place—a city where we have organizations that gather together and raise millions of dollars to care for every known species of tree, bird, beast or brook—and yet trot up another human being and they will exhaust the group's treasury to trash the guy.

All this under the guise of protecting the rest of us from the wretched ogre. People see through that, they see through those efforts, knowing that the real goal is to keep the old membership up—or keep the executive directors eating—and for heaven's sake, making the building payments after they have sandbagged their poor members into erecting an edifice in Washington.

Our sole purpose here today is to determine the capacity of this lawyer to be attorney general of the United States. Nothing more. When the shot and shell have stilled, it will become obvious that your education, training, experience, intellect and temperament eminently qualify you for the task our president has chosen for you.

Good luck. Grab a tight rein on the backer and come out of Chute No. 4!

MEESE DESERVES A CHANCE

It would be foolish to believe Edwin Meese, as attorney general, would not be partial to the philosophy of the man in the White House, where Meese has worked for three years. But it would be equally foolish to think a president would choose a philosophical adversary for a Cabinet position.

President Reagan has nominated Meese, a longtime confidant and White House counselor, to replace William French Smith at the Justice Department. Meese's philosophy, troubled home mortgages, and reputation among Democrats as oppressor of the poor and hungry were very much in the limelight at the Senate confirmation hearings.

Meese has pledged to pursue "even-handed justice and equal protection of the law for all citizens regardless of race, color, sex, creed, background or economic circumstances." His law background includes a stint as assistant district attorney in Alameda County (Oakland), Calif., and the directorship of the Center for Criminal Policy and Management at the University of San Diego.

As a former insider at the White House, Meese might have enhanced access to the president. But should the need for a Justice Department probe of the White House arise, of course it would be inappropriate for Meese to head it—just as it would have been had Bobby Kennedy been called upon to investigate his brother, President John Kennedy.

The Justice Department under Meese probably would not differ much in style or substance from the Smith-led department. Those criticizing him the most probably are just blowing election-year smoke. Meese is the president's man. Reagan is in charge. Meese should get his chance.

[From the Houston Chronicle, Mar. 4, 1984]

MEESE RIGHT MAN FOR THE JOB

Edwin Meese should be confirmed by the U.S. Senate as attorney general.

Meese has the qualifications and the experience required. He is a first-rate lawyer and a former prosecutor who earned the reputation of being a law and order man. He has served for three years as White House counselor to President Reagan, and therefore is familiar with the president's domestic policies.

President Reagan said in nominating Meese for this post that Meese "is a person whose life and experience reflect a profound commitment to the law and a consistent dedication to the improvement of our justice system."

Because Meese is controversial, the Senate hearings on his confirmation have lasted for several days. Meese has not equivocated in his statement to the senators. He said he can and will act in an "impartial, independent manner" as the nation's top law enforcement officer. He said there must be "in the Department of Justice and in our government a commitment to evenhanded justice and equal protection of the law for all citizens regardless of race, color, sex, creed, background or economic circumstances.

Meese is the right man for the job, and deserves Senate approval.

[From the Oakland Post]

EDWIN MEESE

President Ronald Reagan once again showed his loyalty to his long-time staff members when he touched Ed Meese, one of Oakland's fair-haired boys, to serve as United States Attorney General.

This is another star in the crown of Oakland, as it has put one of our most loyal citizens as Head of the Justice Department of the United States and makes him even more closely identified (and with more responsibilities) to the President of the United States. Not only does he have more responsibility, but Meese loses none of his close association with Ronald Reagan as he moves to attempt to be the President of the United States for another four years.

It was in 1969, when Ed first came to the attention of Ronald Reagan, who was then Governor of the State of California and Meese was appointed State Legal Affairs Secretary. From there, he became Reagan's Chief of Staff for the remaining eight years that the President was Governor of the state. In the interim years between his governorship and ultimately becoming the Chief Executive of the United States, Ed has been a constant associate of the President and has carried on his shoulders many of the major responsibilities that the governorship and the White House placed upon the shoulders of Ronald Reagan.

POLITICAL PHILOSOPHY

It goes without saying that in his tenure with the President, he has been loyal to him in carrying out the President's political philosophy, both as a Governor and as a President, and has earned high marks in this assignment.

Earl Warren, who was the District Attorney of Alameda County and subsequently became the Governor of the state of California, spawned a political philosophy very much like the one that Ed Meese is putting together. Those long-time residents of Oakland remember how Earl Warren ran for President and ultimately became the Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court. All this is possible for Ed and more. Those of us who have known him since he was a young man plying his trade as Deputy District Attorney of Alameda County, where I and many other lawyers had an occasion to observe him in his fairness and compassion, obviously wish him well.

It would be difficult to speculate to the amount of good that he has done for the City and the County and its citizens. His elevation and career is one that all of us can be proud of.

His father before him served the County well, too, in the capacity of Tax Assessor for over 15 years. It was his father's influence and the good fortune that he had to be born in Oakland that helped lay the foundation for the kind of character and dedication to hard work and loyalty that went into molding Ed Meese into the kind of person that he really is.

He has never failed to support those things that are important to the County. For example, the East Bay Regional Park District, where he worked in 1947 for $2.50/day; his support for citizens who called upon him to aid them as they attempted to work with the bureaucracy whether or not it was state or federal; his loyalty to his many friends in Oakland is legendary and his friends are legion that he has taken the time in his busy career to help when they needed him.

I suppose he could be referred to as a "Renaissance Man." It goes without saying that he will make a substantial contribution to President Ronald Reagan's cabinet. His loyalty is unquestioned and his trust by the President is monumental. In short, the transfer of Edwin Meese from Counsel to the President to United States Attorney General bodes well for this community and solicits from men of good will an enthusiastic congratulations.

I too, am one who has been touched by his generosity. I speak from this point of personal involvement. A few months ago, I was invited to the White House to be briefed by the Executive Staff and had a chance to request him to speak in favor of a project in which I was interested. His response to me was positive, his action was immediate and the results were as I wished. It gives me a great personal satisfaction to speak of his worth and to his value to the City, County, the State, and the Nation.

[From the Cincinnati Enquirer Jan. 26, 1984]

MEESE, AS SMITH'S SUCCESSOR, MAY BE ONE OF REAGAN'S BEST APPOINTMENTS

Edwin Meese III will be a tough, no-nonsense attorney general. Importantly, he wants the job, which is more than could be said for the retiring William French Smith. He will be a highly active Justice Department head who won't flinch from controversy.

Yet if his nomination pleases Mr. Reagan's most conservative supporters, the vacuum he leaves in the White House won't. The President, curiously has decided not to replace him as counselor. That may save on payroll—though obviously this wasn't his main intent—but it won't please those who worry about Mr. Reagan's vulnerability to advisers more pragmatic but less ideological than Mr. Meese.

While Mr. Smith's action as the sixth member of Mr. Reagan's Cabinet to resign was a jolt, it wasn't wholly unexpected. He was never enamored of the job. He apparently accepted it mainly as a favor to the President for whom he had worked as a tax lawyer and financial adviser. Neither Mr. Smith, who did a credible job, nor his wife loved Washington. Both, presumably, will be happier back home in California.

By contrast, Mr. Meese thrives in the political arena, having served as chief of Mr. Reagan's staff when the President was governor of California. Moreover, a good record as attorney general, assuming Mr. Reagan's reelection, could point him toward a Supreme Court vacancy.

One of Mr. Meese's longest suits is that he is a crime fighter who fervently believes and will vigorously acknowledge that a victim's rights are at least as important as those of the accused. While Mr. Smith put the Justice Department on a commendably activist course in pursuing organized crime and drug racketeers, Mr. Meese will almost certainly be more aggressive. He may be just what Justice—and the nation—need, and turn out to be one of Mr. Reagan's top Cabinet choices.

MEESE'S NOMINATION SETTING OFF FIREWORKS

The only surprise about Attorney General William French Smith's resignation was its timing. The quiet, patrician Smith never regarded himself as a fixture in the capital and, accordingly, he and his wife chose to reside in a downtown Washington hotel rather than to lease or buy a suburban home.

His departure at the end of President Reagan's first term was a given in Washington circles. That he should resign at this particular time is another vivid indication that Mr. Reagan will soon announce for a second term: Smith has been an active participant in all of the Reagan campaigns and indeed, he said he was motivated more by politics than by a yearning for California sunshine.

That Mr. Reagan should immediately name Edwin Meese III, his White House counselor, to be the next attorney general, confirms a solid tradition in recent years of president appointing alter egos or very close associates to head the Department of Justice. Smith, closer to Ronald Reagan than any other Cabinet member, often described himself as "the president's lawyer." That is precisely what Meese will continue to be, assuming he is confirmed.

Without Washington experience or much knowledge of the Justice Department, the low-keyed Smith was served up as a lightweight in the earlier days of the administration. But the Justice Department under Smith reshaped the face of American justice and stirred storms of controversy.

Reversing the direction of recent presidents of both parties, the department aggressively opposed busing and reverse discrimination as civil rights mechanisms, loosened antitrust restrictions, stepped up efforts against drug smuggling and organized crime and waged an intense campaign to curb activist judges. Attorney General Smith crusaded against creation by the courts of new "fundamental rights" that benefit criminals at the expense of society.

The Meese nomination is already setting off fireworks, left and right. The liberals are exercised because they rightly fear that Ed Meese will be more visible, vigorous and even more effective than was William French Smith: they plan what one Democratic senator predicts will be "a hell of a grilling" during forthcoming Senate confirmation hearings.

The conservatives are dismayed that, with Meese departing the White House on the heels of his fellow-conservative, Judge William P. Clark, who succeeded James Watt as secretary of the Interior Department, there will be no offsetting balance to the relatively liberal pragmatism of White House Chief of Staff James Baker and his deputy, Michael Deaver.

Meese has been a law-and-order enthusiast since his days as deputy district attorney in Alameda County, Calif. during the early 1960's. It would appear that, in contrast with Judge Clark, who has taken a subdued approach that calms the troubled Interior Department. Ed Meese will have a much sharper image at the Justice Department than his quiet predecessor. This is apparently what President Reagan wants in both instances.

MEESE IS LAW ENFORCEMENT'S KIND OF A GUY

(By Aaron Epstein)

WASHINGTON.—If police officers and prosecutors could select the nation's top law enforcement officer, their choice might be the very man that President Reagan named Monday to become attorney general—White House counselor Edwin Meese.

Meese is an unqualified admirer of the police, an unyielding conservative on law and order issues who, as a county prosecutor in California, used to love riding in patrol cars, talking to cops about their day-to-day problems.

A federal drug enforcement official told a reporter:

"Ed Meese is our kind of guy."

Meese is Rep. William Hughes' kind of guy, too.

Hughes, D-N.J., a former prosecutor and chairman of the House Crime Subcommittee, predicted that Meese would fight for a high Justice Department budget and "become a catalyst" for legislation to increase penalties for drug offenders and other criminals, to make it easier to extradite criminals from one jurisdiction to another and to weaken protections for defendants.

The only surprise about Attorney General William French Smith's resignation announced on Sunday was its timing. The quiet, patrician Mr. Smith never regarded himself as a fixture in the capital and, accordingly, he and his wife chose to reside in a downtown Washington hotel rather than to lease or buy a suburban home.

His departure at the end of President Reagan's first term was a given in Washington circles. That he should resign at this particular time is another vivid indication that Mr. Reagan will soon announce for a second term. Mr. Smith has been an active participant in all of the Reagan campaigns and, indeed, he said he was motivated more by politics than by a yearning for California sunshine.

That Mr. Reagan should immediately name Edwin Meese III, his White House counselor, to be the next attorney general, confirms a solid tradition in recent years of presidents appointing alter egos or very close associates to head the Department of Justice. Mr. Smith, closer to Ronald Reagan than any other Cabinet member, often described himself as "the President's lawyer." That is precisely what Mr. Meese will continue to be, assuming he is confirmed.

Without Washington experience or much knowledge of the Justice Department the low-keyed Mr. Smith was sized up as a lightweight in the earlier days of the administration. "A society lawyer with a short attention span," miffed New York Times columnist Anthony Lewis. Such contempt proved to be a bitter mistake for the liberals. The Justice Department under Attorney General Smith reshaped the face of American justice and stirred storms of controversy.

Reversing the direction of recent presidents of both parties, the department aggressively opposed busing and reverse discrimination as civil rights mechanisms, lessened antitrust restrictions, stepped up efforts against drug smuggling and organized crime, and waged an intense campaign to curb activist judges. Attorney General Smith crusaded against creation by the courts of new "fundamental rights" that benefit criminals at the expense of society.

To be sure, Mr. Smith also suffered some stunning setbacks, including defeat of his challenge to the landmark 1973 decision legalizing abortion and his attempt to restore tax exemptions to private schools judged guilty of racial discrimination.

The Meese nomination is already setting off fireworks, left and right. The liberals are excused because they rightly fear that Ed Meese will be more visible, vigorous and even more effective than was William French Smith, they plan what one Democratic senator predicts will be "a hell of a grilling" during forthcoming Senate confirmation hearings.

The conservatives are dismayed that with Mr. Meese departing the White House on the basis of his fellow-conservative, Judge William P. Clark, who succeeded James Watt as secretary of the Interior Department, there will be no offsetting balance to the relatively liberal pragmatism of White House Chief of Staff James Baker and his deputy, Michael Deaver.

But the special relationship between Mr. Meese and Mr. Reagan that has endured every test for almost two decades will abide and perhaps be enhanced, in any event, Mr. Meese is known to vent this challenge and to be excited about the new opportunity for services. He has been a law-and-order enthusiast since his days as deputy district attorney in Alameda County during the early 1980s. In fact, he has been a police buff ever since he graduated from the University of California's Law School in Berkeley. And, before rejoining Mr. Reagan in Washington, he was director of the Center for Criminal Justice at the University of San Diego School of Law.

It would appear that, in contrast with Judge Clark who has taken a subdued approach that claims the troubled Interior Department, Ed Meese will have a much sharper image at the Justice Department than his quiet predecessor. This is apparently what President Reagan wants in both instances.

San Diegans, who remember their fellow townsman with affection and appreciation, welcome Mr. Meese's nomination to this high office with pride and high expectations.

[From the Chattanooga News-Free Press, Jan. 24, 1984]

MEESE NAMED, ATTACK BEGINS

The nomination of Edwin Meese III to be attorney general of the United States, succeeding retiring William French Smith, has set off an immediate attack by the Democratic political leaders who are looking for partisan advantage more than they are looking for tough legal leadership for our nation's Justice Department.

House Speaker Tip O'Neill said he thinks the nomination of Mr. Meese "is bad, to be perfectly truthful."

And Democratic presidential frontrunner Walter Mondale asserted, "Mr. Meese is unfit to be the highest law enforcement official in our land. Based on his record, Mr. Meese's guiding principle appears to be 'with liberty and justice for a few.'"

With criticism from such sources, the nomination of Mr. Meese should be heartbreaking to many Americans. And that his predecessor did a good job may be indicated by an interesting attack upon him. Tass, the Soviet news agency, assailed outgoing Attorney General Smith as a "racist with a stained reputation." If Mr. Meese and Mr. Smith were popular with Mr. O'Neill, Mr. Mondale and the Soviets, there would be cause to wonder, indeed. Perhaps "by their opponents we shall know them."

Mr. Smith is a brilliant attorney who long had handled President Ronald Reagan's personal affairs, and had been his business counselor and political helper before being named to the Cabinet office. Under him, the Justice Department did many notable things. It cracked down in a big way on the illegal drug traffic, gaining military cooperation with enforcement efforts aimed at the large-scale importation of illegal drugs into this country. His efforts have had great success. He also has changed the Justice Department emphasis on civil rights away from the foolishness of forced boxing and the injustice of quota systems, substituting an effort for real equal application of the law without regard for race, opposing both discrimination and reverse discrimination. In anti-trust matters, he has been inclined to reduce federal interference, increasing market freedom.

Mr. Meese has been an ardent, vociferous leader is the Reagan administration. Quick of mind, firm in conservative principle, he has displayed a talent for expressing directly and clearly the conservative principles and policies of the president. In doing so, he has occasionally gotten into hot water, as in the case of recent remarks on the "hunger" problem. But usually such difficulties have resulted from accidental or purposeful lack of full, honest reporting of what Mr. Meese has really said rather than from error on his part.

It is the right of the president under our Constitution to appoint to his Cabinet posts the people he thinks will best carry out his aims. Such appointments are confirmed with the "advice and consent of the Senate." That gives the political opponents a chance they will enjoy to try to tear down the president's appointments.

In the case of Mr. Meese, we may expect loud political fireworks from Democrats in this election year, followed by his confirmation and then effective service as a soundly conservative and able attorney general of the United States.

[From the Contra Costa Times]

MEESE RATES APPROVAL AS ATTORNEY GENERAL

Departures of officials from President Reagan's team in Washington will give Congress a host of new appointments to approve. But the first order of business should be to approve White House counselor Edwin Meese as U.S. attorney general. As Senate Majority Leader Robert Dole says, "we've held Ed Meese hostage long enough."

The president's choice of Meese to replace William French Smith as head of the U.S. Department of Justice met considerable opposition last year. Questions were raised about the nominee's financial dealings and acceptance of loans from persons who received federal jobs. However, politics figured heavily in the tough going-over he received.

Democratic senators found Meese a tempting target in a year in which they were trying to unseat President Reagan. The upshot of the initial confirmation hearings was that a court (with Meese's support) appointed an independent special prosecutor to investigate him—prominent Washington attorney Jacob Stein.

Stein thoroughly investigated Meese's personal finances and in the end, cleared him of criminal suspicion. The special prosecutor said in a report issued in September that there was "no basis" for prosecuting Meese in connection with any of the matters that came to light during the Senate Judiciary Committee hearings.

Meese has had a close association with governor, candidate and President Reagan during a long and distinguished governmental career in California and Washington. A lawyer, he has worked as assistant Alameda County district attorney, as a University of California law professor and as Reagan's legal affairs secretary in Sacramento.

He can be faulted for carelessness in keeping his financial affairs above suspicion. But Meese is a man of honesty and integrity who is well-qualified to take over a department that plays a key role in constitutional interpretation, the general thrust of law enforcement and the selection of judges.

Earlier this month, President Reagan renewed his request to the Senate to confirm him. After a year of delay and mudslinging, Meese deserves support from the Senate Judiciary Committee and confirmation by the full Senate so he can promptly assume his new responsibilities.

Attorney General Smith, who waged war on violent crime and drug traffickers, has done much to return the Justice Department to a sound, law-and-order course. Meese is a sound choice to continue policies which have given many Americans confidence that they finally had a defender in nation's top justice slot.

[From the Wall Street Journal, May 30, 1984]

THE POLITICS OF ETHICS

By now we have all had a good snicker over Sen. Howard Metzenbaum.

Sen. Metzenbaum, a Democratic member of the Judiciary Committee, since March has been holding up Ed Meese's nomination for attorney general. Sen. Metzenbaum has cited a torrent of alleged violations by Mr. Meese of the Ethics in Government Act. These accusations have to do mainly with home mortgages, federal job recommendations, a $15,000 loan and a stock investment by Ursula Meese that lost $3,000. The whole matter is in the hands of the by-now familiar special prosecutor.

So it came to light last week that Sen. Metzenbaum himself creamed a $250,000 finder's fee out of a $30 million hotel deal last year by putting the seller and buyer in touch with each other. The senator says he didn't break the rules of the Senate because he made the phone calls in the evening and that he didn't break the D.C. real estate licensing laws because he made them from his home in Virginia. A fastidiously ethical mind would be careful about that sort of thing. Besides, says the senator, he has given the money back. Before turning to a broader consideration of the moral spider's web Washington has woven around itself, let it be recorded that in returning the money Sen. Metzenbaum added accrued interest of about $25,000, a grimly amusing irony to the Meeses of the world who find themselves twisting over a $15,000 principal.

At one exceedingly low level this makes for an amusing spectacle. But isn't there a point at which those of us in the political community have to do some hard thinking about the amount of productive time we're wasting on this kind of political garbage? Ethics? Come off it. There can't be five people in all the churches of Washington who go down on their knees at night in the belief that the greater good is being served by the unending prosecution of the two main legislative artifacts of post-Watergate morality—the Ethics in Government Act and the Federal Election Campaign Act.

These laws have lost any connection they might have had with ethics or clean politics. They're gravy for the lawyers. And for the politicians they're two pieces of heavy artillery, which any party or candidate can roll out to bomb the opposition.

Gary Hart's current assault on Walter Mondale's delegate committees—for violating "the spirit" of the campaign laws—is a perfect example. What precisely is this holy spirit that now animates our campaign laws? In point of fact, the campaign spending act is now such a huge, convoluted tangle that the thing has become a laughingstock among political professionals. A lawyer reviewing a two-volume explication of the act referred to the lawyers now hired by politicians like Messrs. Hart and Mondale as "election law rabbis."

The details of the Ethics in Government Act go on and on with a mind-boggling list of disclosure requirements and specifically forbidden acts. You must report the "source and brief description or estimated value of any gift or reimbursement which is not received totally independent of the spouse's relationship to the reporting individual and certain assets, liabilities and transactions of the spouse, unless the reporting individual certified that he or she had no control over them. . ." These are the laws of a great nation?

The problem is this: We have formalized into explicit law areas of public and political life that are more effectively controlled by informal politics or less construction legislation. It's now obvious that the informal procedures produced a healthier political climate. Back then, the press could be expected to learn of and report alleged breaches of political ethics by elected breaches of political ethics by elected or appointed officials. Such stories rose or fell on their own weight. Watergate stayed afloat, and its principals are largely out of public life.

The "jury" in this informal system is the electorate, which balances the accusation against an official's usefulness and passes judgment in the voting booth. Why did the sponsors of the ethics act think our politics would be better served or improved if mostly trivial affairs were dragged out through the public minutiae of the legal system? Under these laws the issue often becomes, as it has in the $15,000 Meese loan, not whether the behavior was improper but whether the bureaucratic forms were filled out properly.

These laws also put the press in an odd bind. They have turned us into law clerks. Politicians and their staffs may be inwardly laughing like madmen as they use the ethics and campaign laws to pontificate about the alleged improprieties of Messrs. Meese, Lankowsky or Mondale. And the press, with no easy way to report motive, must restrict itself to detailed citations of the laws. We may not be serving our readers the whole story. Worse, we're probably boring them.

We're all for ethics. Who isn't. But the campaign reform law and the Ethics in Government Act aren't about ethics. They're about politics at best and political hypocrisy most of the time.

Mr. HECHT. Mr. President, the consequences of juvenile crime have been known to criminologists and sociologists alike for decades now, but I do not recall a nominee for the post of Attorney General whose experience in work with juveniles exceeds that of Edwin Meese III.

Mr. Meese's qualifications as a former assistant district attorney who prosecuted many courtroom cases are well known. So are his convictions concerning the rights of victims and the need for judicial reform. His experience and views will be welcome in the Department of Justice, where they will bring long-awaited advocacy of the rights of law-abiding citizens to justice and public safety.

But those who must weigh his qualifications for the position of Attorney General are, in all likelihood, far less aware of another aspect of his legal career. I am referring to Mr. Meese's work in preventing juvenile crime and assisting disadvantaged youth in finding opportunities for employment and improvement in their lives.

In the same county where he served as a prosecutor, Mr. Meese also participated in the Alameda County Delinquency Prevention and Family Assistance Program. This program helped young people break out of the economic and social problems which too often led to involvement with the criminal justice system.

Mr. Meese also volunteered his services as a legal officer to the Alameda County Young Opportunity Board, an organization which assisted young people in finding jobs, and arguably helped many to avoid the temptations of unlawful behavior.

For some young people these affirmative efforts came too late. But here Mr. Meese also was of assistance, working with the Crittenden Center—a halfway house for parolees and drug offenders in Alameda County. Crittenden Center provided counseling and rehabilitation for drug offenders seeking to overcome their dependency to reenter society.

Nor has his work been limited to youth in immediate peril. He has also understood the importance of teaching promising youngsters respect for the institutions and of our government of the law. He has served as president and a board member of the trustees of Junior Statesmen, a California foundation which promotes leadership and government interests in high school-aged young people.

These are not the usual qualifications we seek in an Attorney General. They are not prerequisites for the post. Nor are they among the matters that have been most hotly debated with regard to Mr. Meese's nomination. But they are testimony to his character and his civic involvement. They reveal more about the man than any number of legal briefs or presentations to bar associations. They show that his commitment to law and to our young people is deep and personal.

I believe they also show a facet of his character that has been overlooked. Edwin Meese is a man who cares about people, and who cares about respect for the rights of others and the law. He is a man willing to devote his time to the improvement of his community and the lives of those he has come into contact with.

Together with what has been demonstrated with regard to his ethical conduct and professional qualifications, this personal commitment argues highly that Mr. Meese is eminently qualified for the post of Attorney General and should be confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, we have reached a point now where there appears to be no one who wants to speak.

If there is anyone who wants to speak, I suggest he do so now. We have been asking for those who care to express themselves to do so.

Does the distinguished Senator from Michigan who just came to the Chamber wish to speak?

Mr. LEVIN. I would be happy to speak.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan is recognized.

Mr. LEVIN. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, I think our colleague from Colorado may wish to speak at this time, and I will yield to him if he does, if he is within earshot.

I do have a fairly lengthy statement. I am not going to be able to complete it tonight because we have been expecting a report from the Office of Government Ethics, which was supposed to have been in by now, which has not arrived, which is now promised for tomorrow morning.

I happen to be on the Governmental Affairs Subcommittee with oversight jurisdiction over the Office of Government Ethics, and so I have been engaging in some correspondence with them relative to their testimony and their answers in the Meese matter.

They sent me one letter which raised more questions than it answered. So I sent them another letter a little over 1 week ago and asked for an answer by now, and they have not answered by now, but I have been promised within the last few hours that we would be receiving an answer from them by 11 a.m. tomorrow morning.

So, I am going to have to divide my statement in about two parts at least for the opening statement.

But I do wish to thank my friend from South Carolina at least for yielding at this time, and I am happy to begin this statement unless the Senator from Colorado wishes to proceed.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, if the Senator wishes to speak tonight, of course it is a good opportunity to do so. If he prefers to wait until tomorrow, though, that will be all right with us.

Mr. LEVIN. That would be fine. At that point I could have the Government Ethics report at 11 a.m., and I could include this in my opening statement.

Mr. THURMOND. Incidentally, on the ethics section of the Department of Justice the Senator is speaking about, the ones who testified in the Meese hearing——

Mr. LEVIN. The Office of Government Ethics.

Mr. THURMOND. The Office of Government Ethics—I might say that we had extensive examination and cross-examination of them, and if the Senator has time he might care to read that testimony. It would be helpful to him.

Mr. LEVIN. I already have. I thank my friend. It is that testimony which raises many questions in my mind, and because I am the ranking minority member of the Subcommittee on Governmental Affairs that has oversight over the Office of Government Ethics, I asked that office to answer some questions which that testimony raised, and they are supposed to have answers to me by tomorrow morning at 11 a.m.

So that would be fine with me if I complete my opening statement in one fell swoop tomorrow morning.

Mr. THURMOND. We are glad to accommodate the Senator in any way we can.

Mr. LEVIN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I be able to proceed briefly as in morning business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DURENBERGER). Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. EXON. I thank the Chair.

(The remarks of Mr. EXON relating to the introduction of legislation are printed in the RECORD under Statements on Introduced Bills and Joint Resolutions.)

Mr. BYRD addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The minority leader is recognized.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I make a parliamentary inquiry. I am sure there is no intention on the part of anyone to put the Senate back into legislative session. As I recall the precedents, any action while in executive session "as in legislative session" has the effect of putting the Senate back into legislative business. We do not want that to happen. I am sure that was not the intention of Mr. EXON. Am I correct?

Mr. EXON. The Senator is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator had permission to proceed as in morning business.

Mr. BYRD. Yes; but under the precedents that has the effect really of putting the Senate back into legislative business. That is correct, I believe.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is not the understanding.

Mr. BYRD. Let us take a look.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, just to put the precedent to which I referred, or the language of the "precedent" in the RECORD, I read as follows from page 670: "During an executive session the request to transact business as 'in legislative session' is construed as action upon the part of the Senate to return to legislative business."

The book refers us to the Journal, and the RECORD, under date of April 1 and 2, 1914.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I understand that there will be a response by the Chair on the part of the Parliamentarian to the inquiry of the distinguished minority leader.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

The precedent cited by the Democratic leader is a precedent from 1914 when the words "executive session" referred to a session behind closed doors. Using that definition, the precedent is a valid precedent. But the Senate now uses the words "executive session" to refer to its consideration of treaties and nominations, which does not ordinarily take place behind closed doors.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the Chair.

ORDERS FOR WEDNESDAY

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL 9 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, as in legislative session, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today, it stand in recess until 9 a.m. on Wednesday, February 20.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR RECOGNITION OF CERTAIN SENATORS TOMORROW

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that following the leaders' time of 5 minutes each, the following Senators be recognized for not to exceed 10 minutes each for special orders: the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPECTER], the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. QUAYLE], the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE], the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. BOREN], the distinguished Senator from Montana [Mr. MELCHER], the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. PRYOR], the distinguished Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SASSER], the distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. LEVIN], and the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. EXON].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR RECESS AT 10:40 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, for the information of all Senators, we are asked to assemble in the Senate Chamber not later than 10:40 a.m. tomorrow to proceed as a body to the Hall of the House of Representatives to hear an address by the Prime Minister of Great Britian, the Right Honorable Margaret Thatcher. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent that at 10:40 a.m., the Senate stand in recess until 12 noon tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR PERIOD FOR TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. DOLE. When the Senate reconvenes at 12 noon, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent there be a period for the transaction of routine morning business not to extend beyond 1 p.m., with statements therein limited to 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

REMOVAL OF INJUNCTION OF SECRECY

Mr. DOLE. As in executive session, I ask unanimous consent that the injunction of secrecy be removed from a treaty with Canada concerning Pacific salmon (Treaty Doc. No. 99-2), which was transmitted to the Senate by the President of the United States on February 12, 1985; and ask that the treaty be considered as having been read the first time; that it be referred, with accompanying papers, to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed; and that the President's message be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The message of the President is as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit herewith, for the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification, the Treaty between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of Canada Concerning Pacific Salmon, with annexes and a related Memorandum of Understanding, signed at Ottawa January 28, 1985. I also transmit for the information of the Senate the report of the Department of State. This treaty would establish a basis for bilateral cooperation in salmon management, research, and enhancement on the west coast of North America. It will enter into force upon exchange of instruments of ratification.

The treaty would establish a bilateral commission with coastwide responsibilities for management of "intercepting" salmon fisheries, fisheries of one Party that harvest fish which spawn in the waters of the other Party. These responsibilities would include management of the fisheries on Fraser River sockeye and pink salmon, now governed by the Convention for the Protection, Preservation, and Extension of the Salmon Fishery of the Fraser River System, signed at Washington May 26, 1930, entered into force July 28, 1937, as amended. That convention would be superseded by this treaty. An annex to this treaty would prescribe specific fishery regimes, establishing allocations, annual catch levels, and broad regulations by time, area, or gear for (1) transboundary rivers, (2) the northern boundary area, (3) chinook, (4) Fraser River pink and sockeye, (5) southern coho, and (6) southern chum.

This treaty represents the culmination of fourteen years of negotiations on this issue. It establishes a basis for bilateral cooperation on management, research, and enhancement of salmon stocks throughout the west coast of North America. This treaty provides a framework that will enable us to conserve this precious resource. The increases in salmon production made possible by this treaty will inure to the benefit of fishermen of both the United States and Canada.

I recommend that the Senate give early consideration to the treaty and give its advice and consent to ratification of the treaty, including its annexes and related Memorandum of Understanding.

RONALD REAGAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 12, 1985.

AUTHORIZATION FOR PRODUCTION OF DOCUMENTS

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, as in legislative session, I send a resolution to the desk on behalf of the majority leader and the distinguished minority leader and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 71) to authorize production of documents by the Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, during 1971, the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations conducted an investigation and held hearings on the activities of organized crime in stolen securities. The Department of Justice has asked the subcommittee for a document received by the subcommittee during its investigation for use in a current criminal proceeding. Senators

ROTH and NUNN, the chairman and the ranking minority member of the subcommittee, would like to be in a position to respond to authorized requests for pertinent subcommittee records.

The enclosed resolution would authorize the chairman and the ranking minority member, acting jointly, to provide the requested document. It reserves for the subcommittee discretion to withhold confidential matters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 71) was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

The resolution, with its preamble, reads as follows:

S. RES. 71

Whereas, in 1971 the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations investigated and held hearings on organized crime and stolen securities;

Whereas, the Department of Justice has requested access to certain papers in the subcommittee's files from that investigation which may be useful in connection with a criminal proceeding;

Whereas, by the privileges of the Senate of the United States and Rule XI of the Standing Rules of the Senate, no evidence under the control or in the possession of the Senate can, by administrative or judicial process, be taken from such control or possession but by permission of the Senate;

Whereas, when it appears that documents, papers, and records under the control of or in the possession of the Senate are needful for use in any court for the promotion of justice, the Senate will take such action as will promote the ends of justice consistently with the privileges and rights of the Senate: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the chairman and ranking minority member of the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, acting jointly, are authorized to provide to the Department of Justice records of the subcommittee relating to its investigation of organized crime and stolen securities.

VOTE ON MEESE NOMINATION

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, before moving in accordance with the previous order, I hope that we can have a vote on the Meese nomination sometime in the early afternoon tomorrow. I also hope that a number of my colleagues who are concerned about the farm credit crisis will decouple the Meese nomination from their concerns. The Senator from Kansas would indicate that many of us have the same concerns. There has been a meeting at the White House as recent as 5 o'clock this afternoon on this issue. So it is my hope, since there is being a good faith effort made and the administration has already announced considerable relief to farmers across the Nation in this area, we would permit a vote on the Meese nomination sometime tomorrow.

The distinguished chairman of the Agriculture Committee, Senator HELMS, has instructed his staff to work with all Senators and their staffs to go over ideas they might have. I will be meeting at 10 a.m. in the morning with a number of Republican Senators who have ideas, as does the Senator from Oklahoma and others, so we hope that sometime tomorrow we will have the input, or at least the ideas from a broad cross-section of Senators and that we can then meet with the Secretary of Agriculture, Secretary Block, and with the OMB Director or someone in the OMB office who deals in agriculture matters.

I make that plea to my colleagues; that we move on and confirm the nomination of Mr. Meese to be Attorney General. We hope to have something worked out on the farm credit matter soon. I hope that we will not couple those two matters.

RECESS UNTIL 9 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I then move, in accordance with the previous order, that the Senate stand in recess until 9 a.m. on Wednesday, February 20.

The motion was agreed to, and at 6:22 p.m. the Senate, in executive session, recessed until Wednesday, February 20, 1985, at 9 a.m.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

SOCIAL SECURITY BENEFITS

HON. MEL LEVINE
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. LEVINE of California. Mr. Speaker, during the November campaigns, candidates from both parties promised not to cut benefits to Social Security recipients. Yet, now that the votes have been cast, and the election season has ended, the President and legislative leaders are discussing the possibility of a freeze on cost of living increases for Social Security recipients.

It seems that many of those who had so earnestly assured our senior citizens that they would never support any reductions in benefits have changed their minds. I have not.

I have always opposed efforts to reduce Social Security benefits and will continue to do so. It is a tragedy that whenever the need arises to cut government spending policy makers first turn to programs like Social Security which benefit the elderly and the poor.

I have thousands of senior citizens in my district whose sole source of income are their Social Security benefits. Without these benefits, they will be unable to pay their rent, clothe themselves, and buy food.

We are a wealthy society. The least we can do is provide a decent standard of living to those people who have worked throughout their lives and have contributed so much to our society.

An insightful article recently appeared in the Washington Post by Robert M. Ball, a former U.S. Commissioner of Social Security and a member of the National Commission on Social Security Reform on this subject. In his article he argues eloquently in favor of providing a cost of living increase for Social Security recipients.

I would like to share it with my colleagues. I hope it will help convince every member of this body to oppose any budget which does not contain cost of living increases for Social Security recipients.

SOCIAL SECURITY: LEAVE THE COLA ALONE
(By Robert M. Ball)

Skipping or cutting the cost-of-living adjustment (COLA) for Social Security is both unwise and unfair. Although many seem to have forgotten, the Social Security COLA was permanently cut in the 1983 legislation. The date of payment was moved from July to January, and as a result, Social Security benefits were cut approximately $5 billion in 1984 and again in 1985, and will be cut by $6 billion in each of the next three years. These cuts continue. The cuts in the 1983 legislation amounted, on average, to a reduction of 2½ percent in benefits over the lifetime of both present and future beneficiaries.

The 1983 cuts were part of an agreement struck among many diverse interests in order to bring the separately financed old-age, survivors and disability insurance systems (OASDI) into balance. Employers, employees, the self-employed and the general taxpayer all made some sacrifices. To now impose additional sacrifice on one group, beneficiaries, breaks that agreement. It would seem particularly unfair since OASDI is both adequately and separately financed and is not contributing one cent to the deficit.

Let me review the recent history:

All during 1981 and 1982, Social Security beneficiaries—36 million elderly retired persons, totally disabled people, widows and motherless and fatherless children—were terrorized by the fear that their benefits would stop or be reduced. There were almost daily reports of Social Security "bankruptcy." Under this daily pounding, not only beneficiaries, but a high proportion of the 120 million contributors to the program became convinced that they would never receive their benefits.

As a consequence of the great public concern, a National Commission on Social Security Reform was appointed jointly by the president and the Republican and Democratic leadership of Congress. After a year of study, the commission presented a set of recommendations, which were endorsed by 12 of its 15 members. These recommendations were in turn endorsed by the president, the Republican leadership in the Senate and the Democratic leadership in the House and became the basis for the 1983 Amendments. These amendments have restored financial integrity to OASDI as far as the eye can see. (Medicare is another story and probably faces financial problems within about 10 years.)

Because of the 1983 Amendments, Social Security is already helping to reduce the deficit in the consolidated budget and will do so for a long time. In order to build up reserves, Social Security, under present law, will be taking in more than it pays out for several decades. This, of course, helps overall government financing. Social Security funds that are not needed for the payment of benefits are lent to the government at interest. Thus other activities can be partially financed by borrowing from Social Security, without the government's going into the financial markets and competing with private industry. Social Security is doing more than its share now, and benefits should not be reduced because of an apparent unwillingness to raise the taxes necessary to pay for other spending.

The COLA is not something extra but an integral part of Social Security. The law provides that Social Security should be inflation proof, and Social Security financing is designed to pay for it. People are counting on it. The president has reinforced the promise in the law by an unequivocal pledge not to cut Social Security protection, including the COLA. He was very clear on this, even after the campaign.

The American people agree with this policy. For example, in a Washington Post/ABC poll conducted Jan. 11 to 16, only 5 percent said Social Security should be cut to reduce the budget deficit, as compared with 46 percent who said military spending should be cut.

Nevertheless, many in Congress have shown support for a COLA cut or freeze. Some of them seem to have the mistaken notion that Social Security, because it has no needs test, is somehow a "middle-class program." Social Security is a universal program and, of course, does cover the middle class, but it is also our most effective anti-poverty program.

If there were no Social Security, there would be about 3.5 elderly poor persons for everyone now below the poverty level. The overwhelming majority of beneficiaries have low incomes. Social Security supplies more than half the income of two-thirds of its over-65 beneficiaries. About one-third get more than 90 percent of their income from Social Security. Yet, the average benefit payment is less than $450 a month. If the increase in the Consumer Price Index for next year is 4 percent, a freeze would cost the average beneficiary $18 a month; if 5 percent, $22.50. These amounts may sound small to most of us, but to people largely dependent on Social Security, these cuts can mean choosing between food and medicine. An additional 500,000 people would be pushed below the government's rock-bottom measure of dire poverty if their purchasing power were cut by a COLA freeze.

Most fundamentally, the main reason for not tampering with the COLA is that keeping benefits up to date with the full cost-of-living makes sense, and not just for the poor. It makes sense to decide on the proper level of benefits that people should get at the time of first receipt, then to maintain the purchasing power of that benefit. It doesn't make sense to provide a given level of benefits at the time of retirement or total disability, or to survivors on the death of a wage earner, and then let inflation cut the value of those benefits so that people in their seventies or eighties, for example, have less to live on than when they first started to get benefits.

The 1983 amendments to the Social Security Act restored fiscal solvency to Social Security and, as the amendments are understood, will reassure people that their benefits are safe. That is, if we don't start tampering with the system for purposes that have nothing to do with Social Security. After the turmoil of 1981 and 1982, Social Security is now doing just fine. Let's keep it that way.●

THE IWO JIMA MEMORIAL

HON. BRUCE A. MORRISON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. MORRISON of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, today marks a critical time in our Nation's history. Forty years ago today, on February 19, 1945, American Marine forces, with Army and Navy attached units, invaded the small island of Iwo Jima. This battle was the first time that U.S. forces captured a piece of Japanese territory. As a result, some 6,800 Americans died and 18,000 suffered wounds, and almost 20,000 Japanese soldiers died in battle.

Today, some 225 American veterans, widows, and other relatives and about 100 Japanese, including some of the few remaining survivors, have reunited in Iwo Jima to dedicate a memorial to the battle of Iwo Jima. The memorial proclaims in English and Japanese a "reunion of honor" and expresses the hope that "our sacrifices will always be remembered and never repeated." It has been funded by the Veterans Associations of the 3rd, 4th, and 5th Marine Divisions and the family of the late John Wayne, who starred in the 1949 film, "Sands of Iwo Jima."

One of the veterans attending this important event, and the only one from the State of Connecticut, is Ed Moraniec, of Milford, CT, in my Third Congressional District. In 1945, he served as a corporal in the K Company, 3d Battalion, 25th Regiment, 4th Division of the U.S. Marine Corps. Corporal Moraniec was wounded while manning a 16mm mortor gun on the 20th day of the battle of Iwo Jima, and for his brave and herioc efforts, was awarded the Purple Heart and the Bronze Star for Valor. He now serves as Commander of the Disabled American Veteran's Post 15 in Milford.

I know that my colleagues join with me in remembering this important annivesary and in honoring Cpl. Ed Moraniec, and the many other American soldiers whose brave and selfless actions won this critical campaign in the cause of freedom.●

A CONGRESSIONAL SALUTE TO WILLARD T. McGUIRE

HON. ROBERT T. MATSUI

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to commend a Sacramento resident who served in the U.S. Army valiantly during World War II, and who has waited 40 years with a great deal of patience before being recognized for his bravery.

Cpl. Willard T. McGuire served with the 822d Tank Destroyer Battalion in the European campaign. On April, 16, 1945, enemy fire struck Corporal McGuire's tank near Munich, Germany. Corporal McGuire and three others were able to get out of the tank which was nonfunctional, and ran through enemy fire, taking cover in a nearby ditch. One soldier remained in the tank, which had begun to burn. Corporal McGuire gallantly returned to the tank and pulled his comrade out of the flames. While he was extinguishing the other soldier's burning clothing, the tank's fuel tank exploded, causing shrapnel injuries to Corporal McGuire's legs. In spite of his injuries, Corporal McGuire was able to drag the other soldier to the safety of the ditch, some 75 feet away.

Later McGuire was evacuated to an aid station and was informed by a major that he was to be recommended for the Silver Star. Due to an extended hospital stay after the war, Corporal McGuire was unable to follow up on the paperwork involved with receiving the Silver Star. He corresponded with the Army for many years regarding his award, but finally gave up.

Recently, Corporal McGuire reinitiated correspondence with the Army and provided statements from several of his comrades who had witnessed his actions during the battle. On January 16, 1985, I received notification from the Army that Corporal McGuire had indeed been awarded the Silver Star. I am pleased that the Army has afforded Corporal McGuire this most deserved honor after his many patient years of waiting. Corporal McGuire's valor and patriotism provide a fine example for all Americans, and his actions were certainly worthy of this fine recognition.●

CIGARETTE SMOKING AND HEALTH RISKS

HON. BRUCE F. VENTO

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. VENTO. Mr. Speaker, cigarette smoking is the single most important cause of preventable premature death and illness in the United States, according to the American Lung Association. Smoking is a major factor in contributing to coronary heart disease and respiratory illnesses. In terms of its financial costs, smoking accounts for $13 billion in medical costs each year, $25 billion in lost productivity per year, and $3.8 billion for Medicare and Medicaid expenditures each year. The extensive efforts which have been made by the American Lung Association and various other organizations in educating the American public about the health risks associated with cigarette smoking are well known. However, it is also important that we acknowledge the important efforts which have been made by individuals who have become involved in helping smokers to quit smoking.

Katherine J. McMonagle has consistently demonstrated her concern for the health and well-being of others. She is a health sciences instructor at North High School in North St. Paul, MN. Last November, she coordinated a "D-Day Program" at North High School where she solicited the pledges of students and faculty who committed themselves to giving up smoking. Twenty-two students signed up on "D-Day" along with three school staff members. A month later they were all honored at a school assembly for giving up the smoking habit. The "D-Day Program" has been a tremendous success thanks to Kathie's hardwork and dedication. It was certainly appropriate that on November 15, 1984, Kathie McMonagle was honored by the Minnesota Lung Association for her outstanding work in developing the "D-Day Program." I commend Kathie for her fine work and also those students and faculty who have committed themselves to a healthier life by quitting smoking.

[From the Ramsey County (MN) Review, Dec. 26, 1984]

TWENTY-FIVE STUDENTS, STAFF QUIT SMOKING FOR 1 MONTH ON D-DAY PROGRAM

(By Carol Pettitt)

Twenty-five people at North High School say they are feeling healthier these days.

They stopped smoking one month ago. The 25 (three staff members and 22 students) were among three times that many who signed up Nov. 15 on D-Day, to quit smoking. They succeeded for one month, and were honored at an assembly at the school Dec. 7.

Coordinator of the D-Day program, health sciences instructor Kathie McMonagle, said the results were "unbelievable." She said she had hoped to get about 13 people to succeed. "I thought 20 was out of reach," she added, "and I think 25 is just unbelievable."

About 175 people attended the assembly, including State Sen. Jerry Hughes (DFL-Maplewood), and State Rep. Dick Kostohyrz, (DFL-North St. Paul), both of whom congratulated the students and staff for their victories. Letters were also received from Minnesota Sen. Rudy Boshwitz, Sen. Dave Durenburger, Surgeon General C. Everett Koop, Secretary of State Joan Growe, and Sister Mary Ashton, director of the Minnesota Health Department.

McMonagle said that U.S. Congressman Bruce Vento (DFL-St. Paul), also intends to read into the Congressional Record, the accomplishment of these D-Day victors.

McMonagle was honored by the Minnesota Lung Association Nov. 15 for her work in developing the D-Day program. In addition to encouraging people to sign up for the North High quit smoking program, she arranges for local businesses to donate prizes to those who succeed, she signs up volunteers who serve in the Adopt-A-Smoker aspect of the program, and this year she coordinated districtwide student contests for posters, jingles, essays, and diary and letter writing.

McMonagle said she was pleased with the growth of the D-Day program, which she initiated last year. There were about 30 businesses involved in donating prizes a year ago (there were 46 this year), and 11 people successfully remained smoke-free for one month.

Staff members who quit are: Ellen Dellaney, Jean Davis, and Marilyn Pearson.

Adopt-A-Smoker volunteers whose smokers quit are: Andrea Bohn, Karen Kane, Scott Lyons, Janice Rademacher, Betty Sarner, Michelle Sauvageau, and Rhea Springer.

North High homerooms which had remained tobacco free for the entire month from Nov. 13 to Dec. 17 were those of: Ms. Buskin, Mrs. Beck, Ms. Miller, Mr. Miska, Mrs. Shager, and Mrs. Warren.

The winners of "The Good Things About Being Tobacco Free" contest, at North High, are: art, Kii Arens; essay, Karen Lien; and jingle, Tom Bohmbach.

Contest winners at John Glenn Middle School are: poster, David Lien and Ken Hunt: jingle, Brian Peterson; essay, Pat Oster.

District-wide contest winners are: poster, David Lien; jingle, Tom Bohmbach; essay, Karen Lien; letter, Tara Reinhardt; and diary, Tammy Marx.●

KENTFIELD, CA, DOCTOR VOLUNTEERS FOR SUDAN RELIEF WORK

HON. BARBARA BOXER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to call attention to a constituent of mine who is the epitome of a caring doctor. Most of the time, Dr. Royce Truex of Kentfield, CA, is a noteworthy pediatrician at the Ross Valley Medical Clinic in Greenbrae, CA.

But recently, Dr. Truex has volunteered his services to aid the famine-plagued victims along the Sudanese-Ethiopian border. He is part of a small group organized by San Francisco-based Medical Volunteers International. Currently, there are 10 new volunteers, 8 of whom are from the bay area. The volunteers will assist in dispensing food and will train Sudanese in routine medical procedures. Dr. Truex will be separated from his wife and high school age daughter for 2 months while caring for the patients in Sudan's Tokar Valley.

I am sure you will agree that this mission Dr. Truex is undertaking is truly admirable. It takes a special type of person to volunteer his valuable time and talent to give assistance to those less fortunate in a very difficult environment. Dr. Truex is an individual who values human life, as is evidenced by his commitment to those in desperate need.

I am proud of him.●

THIS IS AN ALTERNATIVE IN NICARAGUA

HON. MICHAEL D. BARNES

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, in the corridors of the Capitol one can already hear the talk that there are no alternatives for U.S. policy in Nicaragua. The administration is arguing that we must resume funding of the groups fighting to overthrow the Government of Nicaragua because the only other approach is to abandon our interests. Nothing could be further from the truth. As a close observer of the situation in Nicaragua, I share much of the administration's discomfort over the policies of the Sandinistas. I do, however, part company over the administration's solution. The funding of the "secret war" against Nicaragua does not have the support of the American people. Attempting to overthrow governments with whom we are at peace is not consistent with American traditions, our laws, or our treaty commitments. The administration has not made its case, and more importantly, its policy does not make sense.

There is still time to develop an alternative policy in Nicaragua. But the Congress cannot do it all alone. We need the executive branch as much as they need us. That is the wisdom of our Constitution's checks and balances.

The New York Times last week published a very thoughtful editorial on this subject. It argues that there is a middle way in Nicaragua that can protect our security interests and avoid involvement in a deepening morass. The Times correctly sees that "judicious pressures for negotiable ends promise a better result than aimless combat." I highly recommend this editorial to my colleagues.

[From the New York Times, Feb. 13, 1985]

A MIDDLE WAY IN NICARAGUA

President Reagan has given interviewers from The Times a clear, concise statement of his attitude toward the Sandinista rulers of Nicaragua. They betrayed the revolution that Americans cheered for its promise of democracy, he said. They have become pro-Soviet, chased democrats into exile and refused to subject their power to the consent of the Nicaraguan people. The exile army of "contras," therefore, has every reason to fight for democracy. The United States has ample reason to help them.

The President's premises are admirable and accurate. But his attitude is not a policy. Americans are also displeased by betrayals of democracy in South Korea and Haiti, Cuba and Poland, but do not make war for such displeasure. Why not?

First, because the costs of exporting democracy by war are usually too high. Even direct invasion of nearby countries would plunge them into endless civil war. We could capture Managua or Havana but we could not clear the hills of the guerrillas thus created.

A second reason is that we're rotten at making intrusive war, overtly or covertly. The Sandinistas and Fidel Castro are good examples of how rotten. Their regimes result directly from dictatorships sponsored by America's Marines or meddling diplomats. The CIA's overthrow of pro-Communists in Guatemala 30 years ago delivered that country to right-wing totalitarians.

A third reason is more abstract but no less compelling. Americans don't want to live in a world where nations feel free to impose their political doctrines on others by force. War should be a last resort, to defend vital national interests. To act otherwise is to stimulate aggression the world over.

When a President declares war on a country, he needs a better reason than distaste for its regime. Even when he has one, he needs to be sure that his goals are attainable with the force he is prepared to expend. Only with such calculation does an attitude become a policy.

The American-sponsored contra army is simply too weak to overthrow the Sandinistas. Its hit-and-run assaults can damage their economy and punish their hostility. But such warfare also invites either unthinkable escalation or the ultimate humiliation of failing to achieve our stated purpose. Meanwhile, the combat cruelly exploits Nicaraguan patriots whose goal we know to be unattainable. In the end, they will be twice betrayed.

Still, couldn't the contra army hurt the Sandinistas enough to make them willing to deal? Perhaps, if the price were clear to them, and tolerable. As the President recognizes, the Sandinistas can't be forced out of power. What they might do under pressure is agree to bar Soviet and Cuban military bases and to let an inter-American force guard against arms shipments to El Salvador.

What then of the political, religious and labor freedoms that the President and all Americans want to see in Nicaragua? As in dealing with other countries, these could be made the price of real friendship, of aid and trade concessions.

The policy choices in Nicaragua are not between blind force and abject acquiescence. Geography and circumstance create an American interest in Nicaragua's future, and opportunities to influence it. Surely judicious pressures for negotiable ends promise a better result than aimless combat. At worst, the Nicaraguan people would be left in a grim peace. At best, they would have America to thank for a gradual improvement in their condition.●

A CONGRESSIONAL SALUTE TO THE SACRAMENTO UNION ACADEMY BAND

HON. ROBERT T. MATSUI

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor a group of fine young Americans, the Sacramento Union Academy Band. I take great pleasure in commending this talented group of musicians for their selection to participate in the 50th Presidential Inauguration.

The Sacramento Union Academy Band has distinguished itself as talented, innovative, and exciting group of young performers receiving numerous awards and commendations. Throughout the years of this outstanding band's existence, it has consistently performed at a level of excellence matched by few and surpassed by none.

Mr. Speaker, it is not surprising that the Sacramento Union Academy Band has been selected to honor the President of the United States on the occasion of his inauguration. This group of young musicians touched the hearts of the President and First Lady through their energetic performance at the steps of California's State Capitol in Sacramento last November. Indeed, the Sacramento Union Academy Band exemplified the spirit of California, and I take great pride in the fact that the Third Congressional District has been duly represented by this elite organization. I ask my colleagues to join me in saluting this fine example of American youth.●

A COSTLY MOVE

HON. BARNEY FRANK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, on May 7, 1984, the Government Operations Subcommittee on Manpower and Housing which I chair and the Post Office and Civil Service Subcommittee on Civil Service chaired by Ms. SCHROEDER held a joint hearing on the Office of Personnel Management's proposal to move the Western Executive Seminar Center from Denver to Grand Junction, CO.

At this hearing representatives from the General Accounting Office testified that such a relocation would result in a net additional cost to the Government of more than $300,000 in fiscal year 1985, more than $100,000 in fiscal year 1986, and more than $80,000 in subsequent years. This does not include the cost related to extra travel time by participants in the Federal Executive Training Program who must first fly to Denver to board a second flight to Grand Junction.

Notwithstanding the additional costs to the taxpayers, the Office of Personnel Management appears determined to continue its efforts to effectuate this unnecessary, costly and impractical relocation.

I wish to share with my colleagues a recent editorial from the Denver Post of January 26, 1985, concerning this proposed move which tells it like it is:

EXPENSIVE REVENGE

Pursuing a partisan political feud at taxpayer expense, the Reagan administration's Office of Personnel Management has renewed its effort to punish Denver Congresswoman Pat Schroeder by moving a federal executive training program out of Denver.

Schroeder chairs the House civil service subcommittee and has often clashed with OPM chief Donald Devine over issues involving federal employee policies. Last year, Devine retaliated by ordering that the training program—which Denver Mayor Federico Peña estimates generates about $1 million a year in business in the city—be moved out of Schroeder's district to Grand Junction.

Congress, however, blocked the move after a study showed what every Coloradan knows: that to get to Grand Junction from most places in this country you first have to fly to Denver, then catch a second flight to Grand Junction. The increased air fare alone, added to moving expenses, would increase operating costs $301,508 in the first year and $104,203 the second. Extra travel time for participants would add about $329,200 to the annual cost. Thus, Devine's little "message" to Schroeder would cost taxpayers about $640,000 the first year and more than $400,000 a year thereafter.

But, as unconvinced by economics as he is by legalities, Devine recently renewed his campaign. The General Services Administration, which is in charge of renting space for the program, took a more respectful view of the law. In a letter Dec. 20 to Peter Chen, chief of the OPM's Management Support Services Division, the GSA pointed out that Congress had banned such a move without congressional approval of a cost-benefit analysis. Chen replied on Jan. 2, demanding the move be given "expeditious handling" in spite of the congressional ban.

Cost aside, such a move is a lousy idea. In Denver, the training program is linked effectively with the Graduate School of Public Affairs of the University of Colorado and draws support from many nearby business and governmental agencies. In Grand Junction, where no similar support is available, it would be little more than a vacation billed to the taxpayers.

But Devine and Chen seem only concerned with getting even with a critic. If these two clowns are so determined to send Schroeder a "message," they should buy a can of spray paint and write it on some overpass. That seems about their style—and it's a lot cheaper than their present scheme to embarrass her by ripping off the taxpayers.●

FOUR CHAPLAINS DAY

HON. BRUCE A. MORRISON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. MORRISON of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to join with American Legion Post 76 of North Haven and the town of North Haven, CT, in my Third Congressional District, in honoring four brave chaplains who, 41 years ago, gave their lives so that 200 men could live. Walter J. Gawrych, first selectman of the town of North Haven, has proclaimed February 21, 1985 the 41st anniversary of the four chaplains death, as "Four Chaplains Day." Post 76 members, along with the citizens of North Haven, will be commemorating this in a memorial service in North Haven's Post 76 American Legion Hall.

On February 3, 1943, off the coast of Greenland, the troopship U.S.S. Dorchester was torpedoed by an enemy submarine. Four chaplains aboard the ship offered reassurance and encouragement to the panic stricken soldiers trying to flee the sinking ship. As the ship began to founder, the chaplains helped men into life boats and others to get life jackets from the lockers. When the supply of life jackets was exhausted, the chaplains gave their own life jackets to others who had none and then remained with the ship as it went down in a blaze of fire.

These four chaplains were credited with saving the lives of over 200 men who managed to survive the icy waters off the coast of Greenland. Their names were George L. Fox, Alexander D. Goode, Johnny P. Washington and Clark V. Poling. Each one received the Purple Heart and the Distinguished Service Cross posthumously for their extraordinary heroism in connection with military operations against an enemy of the United States. In addition, on July 14, 1960, the U.S. Congress awarded each of the four chaplains with our Nation's highest distinction, the Congressional Medal of Honor.

I am proud that North Haven's American Legion Post 76, which has worked hard to maintain the memory of the four chaplains, and the town of North Haven have chosen to honor them in this day of reflection and prayer. I hope that my colleagues will join with me in remembering these heroic men. Their compassion and love for their fellow man, above their own life, serves as an inspiration to us all.

I would like to share with my colleagues, the town of North Haven, CT's proclamation on behalf of the four chaplains. It reads as follows:

FOUR CHAPLAINS DAY

Whereas: Murray-Reynolds Post 76, American Legion, has had both the patriotic and spiritual foresight to help perpetuate a historic event which took place more than forty years ago, and

Whereas: The Murray-Reynolds leadership in its infinite wisdom has for many years performed both a local and regional human service in keeping alive the memory of the now-immortal four chaplains who served aboard the USS Dorchester during World War II and gave of themselves so that others might live, and

Whereas: We as loyal Americans should use this memory of ultimate sacrifice as a foundation for building and maintaining our own lives and as a measure of respect and compassion for people throughout the world.

Now, therefore, I: Walter J. Gawrych, Chief Executive of the Town of North Haven, by virtue of the power and authority vested in me by the Town Charter, do hereby proclaim February 21, 1985, as Four Chaplains Day and urge all residents to recognize this day in reflection and prayer.

In witness thereof: I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the Town of North Haven to be affixed on this first day of February in the year of Our Lord Nineteen Hundred and Eighty Five.

First Selectman.●

A FLAW IN RADICAL TAX REFORM

HON. ROBERT T. MATSUI

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, Norman Ornstein, a respected and brilliant scholar at the American Enterprise Institute, recently wrote a column for the New York Times on whether this Nation will be better off if Congress radically reforms our tax system.

Mr. Ornstein's arguments are both perceptive and persuasive, and I would like to share his thoughts with my colleagues:

A FLAW IN RADICAL TAX REFORM

(By Norman J. Ornstein)

WASHINGTON.—It would appear that the climate for a flat or modified flat tax is as favorable as could be. But there is one factor, overlooked so far, that may give pause to many people who are so enthusiastic about tax simplification. That is the probability that radical tax reform could, over time, lead to a more-intrusive Government.

Any system of taxation plays three main roles: raising revenue; shaping the nature of economic investment and growth; and influencing social policy. We already have had an extensive debate about the first; while all the major flatter-tax proposals are "revenue-neutral," each has been designed with the understanding that the need to raise money to shrink the budget deficit may require adjustments. On the second role, the consensus among economists is that a more neutral tax code, one that does not distort investments into unproductive tax shelters or unnecessary office buildings or dying industries, would be a real step forward.

So far, so good. But what about the third role—influencing social policy? Over the decades, we have added provisions, exceptions, "loopholes," and incentives to the tax code, usually for one overriding reason: to foster better social ends in the least obtrusive, most efficient way possible. Our social ends have included enhancing charitable organizations (by providing incentives for private-sector contributions), encouraging and protecting the goal of home ownership (through mortgage interest deductions), encouraging provision of basic benefits to workers, like health benefits (through various tax incentives to employers and employees) and countless others.

Why did we do all these things through the tax code? Because the alternative was so unpalatable and inefficient: more Government programs, intervention and regulation.

Take charities. As a nation, we plainly wanted to encourage and protect philanthropic organizations. But what if we had decided not to do so through tax incentives that encouraged individuals to give. We would very likely have done it through a Government program that appropriates money and allocates it to designated charitable organizations—in other words, by Government bureaucrats deciding which charities are deserving or not.

We have had a fair approximation of that process in the past few years in the way that the Federal Government, through its Office of Personnel Management, has handled the combined Federal employee campaign for the United Way, bringing in some newly favored conservative action organizations while trying to exclude, for example, Planned Parenthood.

The same thing is true of nearly every other program protected or enhanced through the tax system. The lesson is that if we eliminate the tax preference, the outcome will be a new program, bureaucracy or set of regulations that relies that much less on free market forces and individual incentives.

Does anybody believe, for example, that if we scrap the various tax breaks that favor "smokestack" basic industries that our society will let them die—even if, in pure economic terms, they should? Of course not. We'll simply turn to a combination of bailouts and direct Government subsidies, and beef up protectionist barriers.

All of this should give conservatives hellbent for flat-tax reform some considerable pause. It should do the same for forward-looking liberals, with an added twist: with tax reform, at least a few important Government goals and roles cherished by liberals are likely to be reduced or eliminated and not resurrected.

This is not to deny the tangible benefits of tax reform. There is also merit to the notion of periodically scraping the barnacles off the ship of state, even if they would eventually be replaced by new ones. But pure economic goals are not the whole story here. There were important, rational and legitimate reasons that drew us over the years to work much social policy through tax provisions and incentives instead of through Government programs.

If we eradicate our current tax system, there will be costs to pay, and one of them, ironically, may well be more-instrusive Government. As this reality descends on the tax debate, the flat tax may just fizzle.●

IN HONOR OF MARION MURPHY

HON. HAMILTON FISH, JR.

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I rise today, to honor a dedicated, selfless woman who has dedicated her life to the betterment of her community.

Marion Murphy, county clerk of Orange County, NY, was honored recently at an annual Lincoln Day dinner for her outstanding service in the Republican Party and county government. She is in her second term as the county clerk of Orange County and prior to that, served five terms as the town clerk in the town of Newburgh. She is the first woman to be county clerk in Orange County as she was the first woman town clerk in the town of Newburgh.

Marion Murphy is a member of the New York State Association of County Clerks, and is serving as the chairperson of its resolution committee, vice chairperson of the environmental conservation committee, and in June 1984, was elected to the executive committee. She has asserted herself as a leader in these State and national organizations with the energy and vitality that mark all of her endeavors.

I am honored to work with Marion Murphy in her capacity as county clerk and leader of the Republican Party. She is devoted to her family, her community, and all of the people of Orange County whom she serves.●

LIBYAN INVOLVEMENT IN THE MINING OF THE RED SEA

HON. WM. S. BROOMFIELD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, the name Qadhafi has become synonymous with international terrorism. Intelligence reveals that the Libyans were definitely responsible for the recent mining of the Red Sea and the subsequent damage done to shipping in that strategic waterway.

According to the recently revealed information, the Libyans used one of their ships to plant fairly sophisticated mines in the Red Sea. While Libyan complicity in the mining operation has always been suspected, a Soviet mine was recovered by a British team last August. All indications point to Qadhafi as the perpetrator of this terrorist act.

Involvement in terrorist operations and other schemes is nothing new to Qadhafi and company. He has armed the Polisario guerrillas in their battle against Morocco over control of the western Sahara and has used Libyan agents to buy the votes of delegates to the Organization of African Unity in order to gain support for Libyan efforts in Africa. Qadhafi has claimed the mineral-rich northern part of Chad and has sent Libyan troops to support the military efforts of a Chadian political group trying to gain power in that impoverished country. He has also threatened to assassinate President Reagan and has sent terror teams throughout Europe to eliminate opponents of his unfortunate regime. He recently sent 2,000 Libyans disguised as religious pilgrims going to Saudi Arabia and planned to use them to seize the holy city of Mecca and embarrass the Saudi Government. In addition to mining the Red Sea, Qadhafi planned to sink a ship in the Suez Canal and bomb the Aswan high dam.

The Egyptian intelligence service cleverly foiled a recent Qadhafi plot to assassinate a former Libyan minister in Egypt for anti-Qadhafi sentiments.

Our Government is also concerned about recent Libyan political and military penetrations in Malta. Last year, the two governments signed the Malta-Libya treaty which calls for the two countries to hold consultations aimed at harmonizing their viewpoints on political, security, and international issues. In addition, Libya will train Maltese personnel in Libya and in Malta and will supply any military equipment and armaments which the Maltese side may require. Because of its location, Malta is an ideal place for the transshipment of goods and arms and Maltese passports are easily acquired. Equally disconcerting is the shift to the left which the Government of Malta has made in recent years. Former Prime Minister "Dom" Mintoff closed the NATO base in Malta in 1979 and signed a neutrality agreement with Moscow in 1981. He also had North Koreans train Malta's riot police. His successor, Carmelo Mifsud Bonnico has pledged to continue the policy of nonalignment. He may soon declare a state of emergency and seems reluctant to carry out parliamentary elections next year. Western countries are concerned that the island of Malta could become a staging area for Libya's various shady activities in Europe and the surrounding region.

While Libyan involvement in the mining of the Red Sea should not come as a surprise to anyone who follows the maneuverings of the sly desert fox, this recent story highlights the deep commitment that Qadhafi has to the use of terrorism as an instrument of state. He hopes to gain Libya's foreign policy objectives, in part, by the coldblooded use of mindless terrorism. Fortunately, our Government is ready, willing, and able to put a stop to his meddling.

With these thoughts in mind, I commend the following USA Today article to my colleagues in the Congress:

RED SEA MINING DONE BY LIBYANS

(By William Ringle)

WASHINGTON.—A never before-seen, "fairly sophisticated" Soviet mine was recovered during the five nation sweep of the Red Sea last August, the chief of naval operations revealed Wednesday.

And it definitely was planted by Libyans, Adm. James Watkins disclosed to the Senate Armed Services Committee.

"There is no doubt about where it came from," added Navy Secretary John Lehman, also a committee witness.

Previously, only "persuasive circumstantial evidence" that a Libyan ship was involved had been reported by official agencies, and the mine had only been characterized as a 1981 Soviet model.

At the request of Egypt, the United States, Italy, France and Britain sent minesweepers, divers and other mineclearing gear to the Red Sea after 20 ships had been damaged by mines. British divers, however, were the only ones who recovered a mine. Egypt charged at the time that Libya had planted the mines, but Libya denied it.

Watkins said the mine had been laid by the Libyan container ship Ghat and its crew. The ship was "clearly geared up to go in there and lay mines," he said.

The Soviet mine was "a modern mine, in fact a fairly sophisticated one—one we hadn't seen before," Watkins added.

The Ghat had been seen zig-zagging in the Red Sea for 17 days in mid-July, after which about 20 vessels reported they were damaged by underwater explosions, none seriously.●

JUSTICE DELAYED 43 YEARS

HON. NORMAN Y. MINETA

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. MINETA. Mr. Speaker, today is the anniversary of Executive Order 9066; the document signed 43 years ago which authorized the evacuation, relocation, and internment of 120,000 loyal Americans of Japanese ancestry purely because of their race.

This internment constitutes a shocking and still unresolved abuse of the constitutional rights of those who were interned. I am proud to be a supporter, along with more than 100 of my colleagues, of H.R. 442, the Civil Liberties Act of 1985 which seeks, once and for all, to put this sad episode in our history to rest. Just as importantly, H.R. 442 ensures that such a fundamental loss of constitutional rights is never imposed upon any other group of Americans in the future.

One of the U.S. court decisions of the 1940's which upheld the internment was a case known as Korematsu against United States. Recently, in a U.S. district court in San Francisco, Judge Marilyn Patel overturned that conviction, and gave to Fred Korematsu the only thing he has sought: a clear record and an honorable name.

I would like to insert into the RECORD at this point a summary of the Korematsu case, and the decision overturning it. This Nation owes Mr. Korematsu, his attorneys, and Judge Patel a debt of gratitude for their efforts to bring justice after so many years.

The summary follows:

BACKGROUND ON WRIT OF ERROR CORAM NOBIS AND SUMMARY OF KOREMATSU VS. THE UNITED STATES

Fred T. Korematsu, an American citizen, was convicted on September 8, 1942 [1] for refusing to obey militay orders leading up to the mass racial internment of 110,000 Japanese Americans, 70,000 of whom were American citizens.[2] Specifically, Korematsu was convicted of being in a place from which all persons of Japanese ancestry were excluded pursuant to Civilian Exclusion Order No. 34 issued by Commanding General J. L. DeWitt.[3] His conviction was upheld by the U.S. Supreme Court in 1944, when the high court accepted the government representations that the internment camps were justified by "military necessity."[4]

The Court's finding of "military necessity" was based on the representation of government lawyers that Japanese Americans were committing espionage and sabotage by signaling enemy ships from shore. The government also charged that it was impossible to separate the loyal from the disloyal due to the racial characteristics of Japanese Americans.[5]

However, documents recently discovered under the Freedom of Information Act revealed that government attorneys suppressed key evidence and authoritative reports from the Office of Naval Intelligence, the F.B.I., the Federal Communications Commission, and Army Intelligence which flatly contradicted the government claim that Japanese Americans were a threat to security.

The Office of Naval Intelligence report issued in February of 1942, before the internment began, was the culmination of a two-year study of the West Coast Japanese American population. Authored by the ONI authority on Japanese Americans, Lieutenant Commander K. D. Ringle, the report concluded that only a small and readily identifiable portion of the Japanese American people were even potentially disloyal. "The entire Japanese problem has been magnified out of its true proportion largely due to the physical characteristics of the people."[6]

Edward Ennis, Director of the Alien Enemy Control Division of the Justice Department and the attorney responsible for supervising the drafting of the Justice Department brief in Korematsu versus the United States, advised Solicitor General Charles Fahy in April of 1943 that, "we must consider most carefully what our obligation to the Court is in view of the fact that the responsible Intelligence Agency regarded selective evacuation as not only sufficient by preferable [to mass evacuation]. I think we should consider very carefully whether we do not have a duty to advise the Court of the existence of the Ringle memorandum and of the fact that it represents a view of the Office of Naval Intelligence . . . Any other course of conduct might approximate the suppression of evidence."[7]

In response to a request by Attorney General Francis Biddle to verify the accuracy of military claims of shore-to-ship signaling, J. Edgar Hoover wrote in February of 1944

before the Korematsu case was argued, "Every complaint [of shore-to-ship signaling and radio transmissions] has been investigated, but in no case has any information been obtained which would substantiate the allegation that there has been illicit signaling from shore to ship . . ." [8]

In response to a similar request, James Fly, the Chairman of the Federal Communications Commission, wrote in February of 1944: "There were no radio signals . . . which could not be identified, or which were unlawful." [9]

In a February 1944 memo to Attorney General Francis Biddle, Ennis criticized the Final Report of General J.L. DeWitt as being highly inaccurate in stating that Japanese Americans were committing acts of espionage and sabotage and were prone to disloyalty. He wrote, "[The Final Report] stands as practically the only record of causes for the evacuation and unless corrected will continue to do so. Its practical importance is indicated by the fact that it is being cited in the briefs in the Korematsu case in the Supreme Court . . ." [10]

Justice Department Attorney, John Burling, also responsible for drafting portions of the Korematsu brief, wrote in a memo to Assistant Attorney General Herbert Wechsler in September of 1944, "You will recall that General DeWitt's report makes statements concerning radio transmissions and ship-to-shore signaling which were categorically denied by the F.B.I. and the Federal Communications Commission. There is no doubt that these statements are intentional falsehoods . . ." [11]

Burling attempted to alert the Supreme Court of the falsity of the military claims, particularly with respect to allegations of shore-to-ship radio transmissions, by inserting a footnote in the Korematsu brief stating that such allegations were in conflict with information in the possession of the Department of Justice. War Department officials objected to Burling's footnote and the printing of the brief was stopped in midstream.[12] Despite the protestations by Edward Ennis that the footnote should remain, the Justice Department ultimately omitted the footnote from the government's Korematsu brief.[13]

Armed with this new evidence, Fred Korematsu filed a petition for writ of error coram nobis, a petition to correct "fundamental errors" or more "manifest injustice," alleging that a fraud had been committed upon the Court, and that high government officials and Justice Department lawyers knew that there was no factual basis for the claim of "military necessity." On November 10, 1983, in Federal District Court, Judge Marilyn Hall Patel ruled that the government's failure to substantively respond to Korematsu's petition was "tantamount to a confession of error." [14] Referring to the congressional report of the Commission on Wartime Relocation and Internment of Civilians and the documents attached to the Korematsu petition as exhibits, Judge Patel stated that the claim of military necessity justifying Executive Order 9066 was based upon "unsubstantiated facts, distortions and representations of at least one military commander, whose views were seriously infected by racism." [15]

On April 19, 1984, Judge Patel issued her written opinion formally vacating Korematsu's conviction.[16] Referring to the newly discovered government documents attached as exhibits to the petition, Judge Patel wrote, "The substance of the statements contained in the documents and the fact the statements were made demonstrate that the government knowingly withheld information from the courts when they were considering the critical question of military necessity in this case." [17] Citing the instance of the original Burling footnote which revealed that the Justice Department attorneys possessed reports contradictory to the allegations of espionage and sabotage, Judge Patel noted, "The record is replete with protestations of various Justice Department officials that the government had the obligation to advise the courts of the contrary facts and opinions. In fact, several Department of Justice officials pointed out to their superiors and others the "willful historical inaccuracies and intentional falsehoods" contained in the DeWitt Report. "These omissions are critical." [18] Judge Patel continued, "Omitted from the reports presented to the courts was information possessed by the Federal Communications Commission, the Department of the Navy, and the Justice Department which directly contradicted General DeWitt's statements. Thus, the Court had before it a selective record." [19]

In concluding that coram nobis relief exists for a claim of prosecutorial impropriety,[20] Judge Patel wrote, "There is substantial support in the record that the government deliberately omitted relevant information and provided misleading information and papers before the Court." [21] "The judicial process is seriously impaired when the government's law enforcement officers violate their ethical obligations to the Court." [22]

In closing, Judge Patel wrote of the original Supreme Court decision in Korematsu, "Justices of that Court and legal scholars have commented that the decision is an anachronism in upholding overt racial discrimination as 'compellingly justified.' The government acknowledged its concurrence with the Commission's [Congressional Commission on Wartime Relocation and Internment of Civilians] observation that, "Today the decision in Korematsu lies overruled in the court of history."

"Korematsu remains on the pages of our legal and political history. As a legal precedent it is now recognized as having very limited application. As historical precedent it stands as a constant caution that in times of war or declared military necessity our institutions must be vigilant in protecting constitutional guarantees. It stands as a caution that in times of distress the shield of military necessity and national security must not be used to protect governmental actions from close scrutiny and accountability. It stands as a caution that in times of international hostility and antagonisms our institutions, legislative, executive and judicial, must be prepared to exercise their authority to protect all citizens from the petty fears and prejudices that are so easily aroused." Signaling was often observed at premises which could not be entered without a warrant because of mixed occupancy. The problem required immediate solution. It called for the applications of measures not then in being." Quote, at p. 8. It was impossible to establish the identity of the loyal and the disloyal with any degree of safety. We cannot say that the war-making branches of the government did not have ground for believing that in a critical hour such persons could not readily be isolated and separately dealt with, and constituted and menace to the national defense and safety . . ."

THE CUYAHOGA COUNTY BAR ASSOCIATION 39TH ANNUAL PUBLIC SERVANTS MERIT AWARD RECIPIENTS

HON. LOUIS STOKES

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, each year, the Cuyahoga County Bar Association hosts an awards luncheon to salute the exceptional work and contributions of selected county court system employees. This year, the association will sponsor the 39th Annual Public Servants Merit Awards Luncheon on Wednesday, February 27, 1985, in Cleveland.

I take this opportunity to salute the Cuyahoga County Bar Association and the five public service award recipients.

Mr. Speaker, each of the honorees has a 30-year record of public service in the court system. The honorees are: Mr. John Bokoch, support unit supervisor, juvenile court; Ms. Lucille J. Corea, notary and license registrar, county clerk's office; Mr. James P. Madden, jury commissioner, common pleas court; Ms. Ann McClory, deputy, estate tax, probate court; and Mr. Walter J. Sutkowy, Sr., probation office, Cleveland Municipal Court.

At this time, I would like to share the accomplishments of the honorees with my colleagues.

Mr. John Bokoch began his affiliation with the court system in 1952 in the auto title bureau of the county clerk's office. In April 1954, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Bokoch was appointed an assistant assignment commissioner of the common pleas court. On August 15, 1960, Mr. Bokoch joined the juvenile court where today he is counselor supervisor in the child support department.

A native of Masontown, PA, Mr. Bokoch is a graduate of the San Antonio Business College in San Antonio, TX.

Mr. Speaker, the second honoree, Ms. Lucille J. Corea, is a 30-year employee with the county clerk's office. She currently supervises the registration and recording of notary and real estate licenses, new attorneys and the payment of juror and venire panel fees.

Ms. Corea is a member of the Cuyahoga County Democratic Party Executive Committee and has served in Richmond Heights as a Democratic ward leader since 1958.

Mr. James P. Madden, the third honoree, has enjoyed 34 years of public service beginning as a deputy county clerk from 1951 to 1969. Since 1969, Mr. Madden has served in a variety of positions with the common pleas court including a 3-year stint as a court constable. Currently, he serves as a jury commissioner with the court.

An activist within the Democratic Party, Mr. Madden serves as a member of the Lakewood County Democratic Party Executive Committee.

Mr. Speaker, Ms. Ann C. McClory is the association's fourth honoree. She currently is employed with the probate court as the deputy of the estate tax division.

Ms. McClory is a graduate of the Lourdes Academy.

Mr. Walter J. Sutkowy, Sr., is the fifth honoree, this year. A graduate of Baldwin Wallace College, Mr. Sutkowy worked for many years as a teacher and administrator in various area school systems.

For the past 28 years, Mr. Sutkowy has worked as a Cleveland probation department officer preparing presentence reports and supervising the cases of those clients placed on probation.

Mr. Speaker, it is a special honor for me to join in the salute to these exemplary public servants. Employees such as Mr. Bokoch, Ms. Corea, Mr. Madden, Ms. McClory and Mr. Sutkowy make the system work for all of the citizens of the Cleveland metropolitan area. I join with the Cuyahoga County Bar Association, its president, Mr. Alan M. Wolk and the Merit Awards Committee chairman, Mr. Franklin A. Polk, in paying tribute to the 1985 Public Servants Merit Award recipients.●

THE PROVISIONS OF THE CONTE CONTRIBUTION CREDIT

HON. SILVIO O. CONTE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, the legislation which I introduced today to allow a tax credit for contributions to reduce the public debt is very simple—very straightforward. It simply provides a 25-percent nonrefundable tax credit for qualified contributions to reduce the public debt.

Under present law, a taxpayer may deduct donations to reduce the debt in the same manner as deductions for donations to charity. The rules for charitable donations (generally, in section 170 of the Internal Revenue Code) are, however, extremely complex. My legislation must necessarily be combined with the rules of section 170 and the Internal Revenue Code generally with respect to limits on donations, valuation of noncash contributions and application with other credits. In addition, creditable contributions under my bill would reduce the deduction limits under section 170. Due to the complexity that could result, I have prepared a detailed summary of my legislation, with five specific examples of how it would work.

The legislation generally provides a 25 percent nonrefundable tax credit for contributions to reduce the public debt. The credit would be available to both corporations and individual taxpayers regardless of filing status. No deductions would be allowed under section 170, of course, with respect to contributions for which the credit is claimed.

A tax credit is generally of greater benefit to taxpayers whose effective tax rate is lower than the percentage of expenses for which the credit is allowed. Most taxpayers have an effective tax rate of less than 25 percent.

Second, with respect to noncash contributions, there is no change from present law. The Treasury Secretary and the Administrator of GSA may accept donations of property and provide for its sale. The proceeds of the sale must be used to reduce the public debt. Contributions of property will be valued under the valuation rules of present law for purposes of determining applicability of the credit. For example, donations of ordinary income property (which generally means property which, if sold, would result in the recognition of ordinary income) are generally valued at the donor's basis. Capital gains property donated to public charity may be valued at fair market value.

The third provision of my bill deals with the percentage limitations on charitable contributions. Under present law, a taxpayer's donation to a charitable organization is limited to 50 percent of adjusted gross income. A taxpayer may, however, carry forward unused deductions indefinitely. Deductions for donations of capital gains property are limited to 30 percent of adjusted gross income.

The legislation provides that the amount of contributions will be determined without regard to the 50- and 30-percent caps. Thus, a taxpayer could elect to donate any amount of income to reduce the public debt. Any additional donations to other charities, however, would remain subject to the cap, and if a taxpayer's other contributions, when combined with donations to reduce the debt, exceeded 50 percent of adjusted gross income, the excess would have to be carried forward to succeeding taxable years.

As a practical matter, a taxpayer who could afford to donate all or a substantial portion of his income to reduce the public debt would probably be in a tax bracket higher than the amount of the credit. Thus, it is anticipated that such an individual would take the deduction allowed under section 170. Additionally, since the credit is nonrefundable, taxpayers who made donations respresenting a large percentage of income may not be able to take full advantage of the credit and the section 170 deduction would be more desirable.

It is also important to explain how my credit would interact with other credits in the code. Since present law allows a deduction for donations to reduce the deficit, deductions which may be carried forward when the donations made exceed the caps described above—the legislation makes the credit for contributions to reduce the public debt nonrefundable, and provides no carryback or carryforward. Since the credit is available to both individuals and corporations, it is placed outside of the general business credit and is listed with the foreign tax credit, et cetera. Because the credit is nonrefundable and no carryback or carryforward is provided, it is anticipated that many taxpayers would take the contribution credit before other credits.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I think it is important to explain how my credit would apply with deductions under section 170. In general, the legislation denies the section 170 deduction for contributions to reduce the debt when the credit is taken. A taxpayer may, of course, deduct other donations under section 170, and may elect not to take the credit for contributions to reduce the public debt and instead take the deduction.

In addition, the legislation provides that creditable contributions will reduce other charitable contributions when all contributions combined exceed the 50-percent cap. In other words, the credit for donations to reduce the debt would be taken first. If additional donations to other charities, combined with donations to reduce the debt, exceeded 50 percent of adjusted gross income, the excess of total contributions to other charities over 50 percent of adjusted gross income reduced by contributions to reduce the debt would be carried forward to a succeeding taxable year. For example, if a taxpayer with $20,000 of adjusted gross income contributed $8,000 to reduce the deficit and $5,000 to other charities, the $3,000 excess over 50 percent of adjusted gross income would be carried forward to the next year—$2,000 of the donations made in the current year could be deducted under section 170.

The preceding explanation is best demonstrated by the following examples.

Example one: T, a single taxpayer, has taxable income of $10,000. T donates $400 to reduce the public debt. Assuming no other deductions and no other contributions, T's tax liability would be $1,079 (tax liability on $10,000) minus $100 (25% of contribution to reduce the debt) for a total of $979.

Example two: Taxpayers C&D, a married couple filing a joint return, have adjusted gross income of $45,000. Although C&D did not itemize their deductions, they donated $500 to C's old college and took advantage of the above-the-line deduction of present law. In addition, C&D donated $2,000 to reduce the public debt. Their tax liability would be calculated as follows:

	Dollars
Adjusted gross income	45,000
Personal exemptions	−2,000
Total	42,925
Tax liability on $42,925	8,823
Credit for donations to reduce the debt	−500
Total	8,323

Example three: X, a single taxpayer, had $30,000 in adjusted gross income. In addition, he claimed $200 in medical expenses, paid $7,500 in interest, donated $500 to his church, and paid $500 in union dues. X was also a member of a limited partnership which invested in rehabilitating old buildings eligible for the rehabilitation tax credit. X invested $15,000 in qualified rehabilitation expenses with the partnership. Finally, X donated $4,000 to reduce the debt. X's tax liability would be calculated as follows:

	Dollars
Adjusted gross income	30,000
Excess itemized deductions	−6,400
Personal exemption	−1,000
Total	22,600
Tax liability on $22,600	3,888
Tax credit to reduce debt	−1,000
Rehab tax credit	−3,750

Since this would result in negative tax liability for X, he can reduce his tax liability to $0 in the current taxable year, and carry back $862 in unused rehabilitation credits to prior years.

Example four: F, an unmarried, retired banker, has taxable income of $20,000 in 1984. F decides to donate $18,000 to reduce the public debt. Assuming no other donations, F's tax liability would be calculated as follows:

	Dollars
Tax liability on $20,000)	3,212
Tax credit to reduce the debt	4,500

Since this would result in negative tax liability, X could elect to deduct $10,000 in 1984 and carry forward $8,000 in deductions to 1985. Alternatively, X could take a credit of $3,212 (and reduce his tax liability to $0) and carry forward a deduction of $5,152 to the succeeding taxable year.

Example five: G&H, married taxpayers with three children, have adjusted gross income of $50,000. G&H itemize their deductions. They do not meet the 5% of AGI test so cannot deduct medical expenses. They paid $8,000 in interest, donated $22,000 to the American Red Cross and paid $1,000 in state taxes. G&H contribute $6,000 to reduce the public debt.

Since combined charitable contributions and contributions to reduce the debt exceed 50% of income, itemized deductions for charitable contributions are limited to $19,000, calculated as follows:

	Dollars
50 percent of adjusted gross income	$25,000
Contribution to reduce the debt	−6,000
Total	19,000

Their tax liability would be calculated as follows:

	Dollars
Adjusted gross income	50,000
Excess itemized deductions	24,600
Personal and dependency exemptions	5,000
Total	20,400

$2,547 (tax liability on $20,400) − $1,500 (credit) =$1,047. In addition, G&H can carry forward $3,000 of the unused donations to the next taxable year.●

THE SOVIETS AND ARMS CONTROL

HON. WM. S. BROOMFIELD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, while I fervently hope that the upcoming arms control talks in Geneva will be fruitful and will ultimately bring about reductions in the weapons of mass destruction, I am concerned about Soviet violations of the 1972 Anti-Ballistic Missile [ABM] Treaty.

It appears that the Soviets have built an extensive radar system in a remote region of the Soviet Union. According to experts in our Government, this system constitutes a violation of legal obligations under the 1972 ABM Treaty. In a recently released report, our Government charges that the Soviets have violated or "possibly violated" various agreements by using chemical and toxic weapons, deploying the mobile SS-16 missile, testing a second land-based intercontinental missile, using new equipment associated with ABM's, and not giving the West prior notification of large-scale maneuvers to be held by Warsaw Pact forces in Eastern Europe.

It is difficult to deny that the Soviet Union set out shortly after the accord was signed on a course specifically prohibited by the treaty. They have yet to admit that the radar site even exists.

Soviet violations of the letter, and certainly the spirit of these solemn accords, should give all of us concern. For me, these violations clearly highlight the need for verifiable agreements. While we should continue to talk and meet with the Soviets about arms control, we should proceed ahead with these agreements cautiously and prudently, and not try to get an agreement for agreement's sake.

With these concerns in mind, I recommend the following Washington Post editorial to my colleagues in the Congress.

THE KRASNOYARSK RADAR

A year's further discussion of whether the Soviet Union is respecting its arms control obligations has produced more of a consensus than most people had thought possible. The release of President Reagan's latest congressionally mandated report on "Soviet noncompliance with arms control agreements" makes this clear.

The main thing that has happened since the last report is that public attention has focused on one alleged violation—the Krasnoyarsk radar. Most of those who previously hesitated to call it a violation of the 1972 Antiballistic Missile Treaty (ABM) have stopped hesitating. It has become very hard to deny that the Soviets set out shortly after the treaty was signed on a course specifically blockd by the treaty, that they stonewalled through years of American efforts to induce them to admit it or correct it and persist on that course to this day. Fewer people remain to say that it really doesn't matter all that much and that in any event it's wrong to talk about it in public.

Some Americans feared—others hoped—that official efforts to nail the Kremlin on this violation would unravel the whole arms control process. This has not happened: President Reagan and the Russians are headed back to full-scale negotiations at Geneva. But there have been other major consequences. The American standards for verification of new agreements have been toughened. And major impetus has been given to the idea of an American defense against ballistic missiles—this is the idea embodied in the president's Strategic Defense Initiative. Unlike the Soviet radar at Krasnoyarsk, this program, in its current, research phase, is entirely consistent with the ABM Treaty.

A few Soviets have hinted that, if Moscow felt it could avoid public embarrassment, it might find a way to halt construction on the radar or other wisesignal that it understood American sensitivities. But of course Moscow had years to do just that, and so far has chosen not to, even though it was being discreetlly pressed on the matter by Americans of very different political persuasions.

Is there not someone in the Kremlin with the wit to recognize the immense Soviet interest in quietly unfolding a few tarpaulins at the Siberian construction site? What a pity that its political radar is so inferior to that huge electronic radar being built at Krasnoyarsk.●

AMERICAN LEGION POST 76

HON. BRUCE A. MORRISON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. MORRISON of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, today I would like to extend my warmest congratulations to American Legion's Post 76 of North Haven, CT, in my Third Congressional District. This month, Post 76 was recognized by the American Legion as "Post of the Month" for its invaluable service to the community.

Post 76 sustains an active membership of over 290 veterans including many local community leaders, as well as members of North Haven's police and fire departments. It provides numerous invaluable services to the citizens of North Haven, such as food and emergency funds to the needy, sponsorship of a local Boy Scout troop and baseball team, color guard at inaugurations of town selectmen, and organization of the town's annual Memorial Day parade. Members of the women's auxiliary are active in sponsoring local students in the girls' State program and supporting a battered women's shelter.

Post 76 instills in the citizens of North Haven a sense of community and civic pride. I congratulate them in their hard-earned and well-deserved honor of "Post of the Month." I know that all of us are extremely proud of their accomplishments.

Following is a copy of an article that appeared in this month's American Legion magazine describing in detail Post 76's activities:

FEEDING THE POOR OF THE COMMUNITY

"As a kid growing up in the '30s I recall how much I looked up to those men who belonged to the local American Legion post. I remember thinking that some day I wanted to be part of that, to be one of those guys who did so much for our town and meant so much to me."

That's how Walter Gawrych felt about the men of Murray-Reynolds Post 76, North Haven, Conn., and that's why he joined the post when he was discharged after WWII.

As first selectman (mayor) of North Haven, Gawrych has a particularly good vantage point from which to judge the post's impact on North Haven and to recommend it for Post of the Month. "This post is extremely supportive of the people in this community," he said. "Post members don't sound their own horn very much, but everyone knows about them because of their work."

Founded in 1920, the post's 287 members have sustained their founders' desires that the post become a positive force for North Haven, a town of about 25,000 near New Haven in southern Connecticut.

Years ago, town leaders felt area poor children needed help to enjoy a merrier Christmas, so they asked the post for help. Post 76 began a gift program that is now an annual project of the entire community. The post also gives 80 to 90 food baskets, each weighing about 60 pounds, to needy families at Thanksgiving and Christmas. Emergency funds for needy families are available from the post, thanks mostly to the efforts of Jim DeMarzo, post service officer and liaison to the town board.

Post members' service to the community is known beyond the Legion and North Haven. Charlie Slavin, an aide to the leader of Connecticut's Knights of Columbus and a nearby Hamden resident, said, "Whenever they're called upon for help, the men of that post never refuse."

The post's impact on the community is symbolically evident, too. "The post faces our 'green' or public square and is right next door to our town hall," explained Fred Foster, administrative assistant to Selectman Gawrych. The post's closeness to town hall comes in handy when large crowds show up for town meetings. When that happens, the meetings are moved to the post.

Post members provide a color guard for swearing-in ceremonies of town selectmen, volunteer their services at VA hospitals in both New Haven and Fairfield, sponsor a Boy Scout troop, send delegates to Boys' State, sponsor Legion Oratorical Contests, sponsor a Sons of The American Legion Squadron, volunteer at Special Olympics programs in two cities, conduct an annual Veterans Day dance, help out at a town playground and give aid to handicapped children. Members also sponsored the baseball team that finished fifth in the Legion's 1972 World Series.

Post 76 Legionnaires have organized the town's Memorial Day parade for 25 years and for 16 years have presented a nationally recognized series of Four Chaplains services in February.

Organizing those annual services has been the job of Wallace Bassett, a tireless Legionnaire and past post commander. Bassett and other volunteers present their program to keep alive the sacrifices of two ministers, a priest and a rabbi who gave away their life jackets so that soldiers on a torpedoed WWII troop ship, the USS Dorchester, could live.

The services have been attended by past national officers, including a national chaplain, and for years were attended by the late Mrs. Bruce Cunningham, the widow of the Rev. Clark V. Poling, one of the chaplains who died on the Dorchester. The post, partly because of the services, has won its department's "Back To God" award four times in the last 10 years. In 1983, thanks in part to Post 76's work, Connecticut Gov. William A. O'Neill proclaimed February "Four Chaplains Month."

Besides its own leaders, including Post Cdr. George Breuler and Post Adj. Michael Pelligrino, Post 76 provides leaders for the larger community, too. In addition to Gawrych, three state representatives as members of Post 76, and a half dozen others are on the town's police and fire departments. Pelligrino has also been a second district commander. George Nye, a WWII veteran, was a department historian and Rev. Earl T. Williams is the chaplain at the West Haven VA Medical Center.

Working with Post 76 Legionnaires are members of their Auxiliary, who sponsor students to Girls' State and support a battered women's program. Auxiliary President Eloise Swingler Kennedy also plays the bugle for the Four Chaplains services.

Rev. Vincent E. Lyddy, pastor of St. Francis Cabrini Church, and one of several persons who recommended Post 76 for Post of the Month, may have summed it up best when he wrote: "Post 76 is a credit to veterans, to our country, to our town especially, and to the (Legion's) national organization. We are very proud of it."●

A CONGRESSIONAL SALUTE TO C.R. "CAL" FLORENCE, SR.

HON. ROBERT T. MATSUI

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor one of my outstanding constituents, Mr. C.R. "Cal" Florence, Sr., recently selected 1984 Sacramento Citizen of the Year by the Sacramento Board of Realtors.

Mr. Speaker, Cal Florence has faithfully served the city of Sacramento for more than three decades. He is currently serving his 7th consecutive year as chairman of the Cerebral Palsy Telethon and is also serving as the 1985 president of the Easter Seal Society and Goodwill Industries.

In 1984 alone, Mr. Florence founded and implemented the Sacramento Sheriff Department's Thumbs Up Program, raised funds for many local agancies which benefit the handicapped and underprivileged, served as a Lions Club district 4 officer, participated in the Society of the Blind White Cane Days, and was secretary of the northern California Peace Officers Association. With his record of service to the community, it is clear why Mr. Florence was selected by a panel of community representatives from over 20 highly qualified nominees to receive the honor of 1984 Sacramento Citizen of the Year.

Mr. Florence's career as a Sacramento deputy sheriff and staff assistant was characterized by a very caring and compassionate attitude. Even in his retirement, Mr. Florence still exhibits these qualities in his daily community efforts. I know that his wife, Edyth, and his three children, Bobbie, Sandy, and Cal, Jr., are proud of his many achievements.

Despite battling several health problems, Cal Florence has remained involved and active as a volunteer in more than 70 community programs.

Mr. Speaker, I ask that my colleagues join me in saluting this outstanding individual, Mr. C.R. "Cal" Florence, Sr., a truly fine gentleman and an outstanding member of the Sacramento community.●

GROWTH ALONE WON'T DO IT

HON. DENNY SMITH

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. DENNY SMITH. Mr. Speaker, it is a rare occasion that I come across an opinion/editorial piece so instructive and so professionally crafted that I feel the article merits a printing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the benefit of my colleagues.

The following article, authored by Mr. Frank Gregorsky, editor of the Republican Study Committee Bulletin, is such a piece. The article appeared in the Wednesday, February 13, 1985, edition of the Wall Street Journal.

As a member of the Committee on the Budget trying to separate fact from fiction during the fiscal year 1986 budget debate, I think that Members from both sides of the aisle will find Mr. Gregorsky's thoughts most instructive.

GROWTH ALONE WON'T DO IT

(By Frank Gregorsky)

Too many people make federal budget policy without having any idea of what's in the budget and how it relates to the economy. The partisans of economic growth as cure-all took heart from the fact that the fiscal 1984 budget deficit was $20 billion narrower than the fiscal 1983 budget deficit. This was hailed as evidence that economic growth could eventually balance the budget. But a look at the budget, item by item, suggests that new rules are at war with old formulas. It is time to reexamine the links between deficit spending and economic growth.

During fiscal 1983 growth averaged 5%. During fiscal 1984 it was a roaring 6.2%. We had, by any definition, a strong economy. (And it is still strong: This is the 10th straight quarter of economic growth.) Unemployment, from a December 1982 peak of 10.6%, had fallen to 9.1% by the close of fiscal 1983. Still, that year's deficit was much bigger than fiscal 1982's—$195 billion vs. $110 billion. The link—economic recovery, rising red ink—was partly because average unemployment was higher during fiscal 1983 than during fiscal 1982.

But what about the perverse figures for fiscal 1984? Unemployment fell from 8.7% in October 1983 to 7.1% by June 1984 (with no trend since). The average rate dropped from near-10% during fiscal 1983 to 7.7% for fiscal 1984. In the 1970s, liberals and conservatives agreed that a 1% annualized drop in unemployment would cut the deficit $25 billion to $30 billion. By that standard, the 1984 deficit should have plunged about $60 billion. It declined only $20 billion.

We can't blame the shortfall on revenues. The federal tax take expanded smartly in fiscal year 1984. Total revenues rose $66 billion from 1983, nearly 11%. If we could count on that every year for the next three, with the new money not spent, the deficit would be gone by fiscal 1988. Economic growth would indeed "end deficits." But, while revenues were rising $66 billion, aggregate 1984 spending was increasing $46 billion—even with a sharp downward trend in joblessness, economic growth the highest in decades, and a low inflation rate taking pressure off cost-of-living adjustments.

Not 'Countercyclical' Now

[Percent growth during fiscal 1984]

"Human development" (human services block grants, work incentives, family social services)	10.3
Federal housing programs	7.9
Child nutrition programs	7.8
Community planning and development	6.9
"Assistance payments" (formerly AFDC)	6.0
State grants for Medicaid	5.7
Low-income energy assistance	1.7

What sort of "automatic budget reductions" should a booming gross national product trigger? For starters, unemployment compensation and food stamps should cost less. That part of conventional wisdom remains wise. The Employment and Training Administration, which administers unemployment payments, cost a whopping 31.3% less during fiscal 1984. Food stamp outlays fell a bit (2.3%) from their fiscal 1983 levels. Prosperity-induced reductions in these two areas saved almost $16 billion in fiscal 1984.

Where the Budget Ballooned

[Percent during fiscal 1984]

Rural Electrification Administration	579.4

But other items should have held level or dropped in cost as prosperity returned. These functions are at least partly influenced by the economy's strength. But they rose with the GNP, as the first table shows.

Why these rises during 12 months of more than 6% GNP growth? Perhaps bureaucratic overhead gobbled up the money even as aggregate benefit payments fell. That's a favorite suggestion of those who hope to cut budgets without taking away checks from voters. But most of the items in the table are transfer-payment operations, without much Washington overhead.

A more compelling conclusion is that the "safety net" is so broad and deep that people stay in it even when economic growth surges. The GNP is no longer very good at bidding Americans away from the services of the welfare state.

Liberals will suggest the defense budget is really driving the spending side. In fact, Pentagon outlays accounted for only $17 billion of the $46 billion rise during fiscal 1984. Interest on the debt accounted for an additional $21 billion. That means all other spending rose $8 billion. That may not sound like much, but non-debt, non-defense costs are not supposed to rise during the second year of an economic recovery.

The Council of Economic Advisers' monthly economic indicators show how total domestic spending and unemployment have been moving in opposite directions. The "transfer payments" index in the indicators covers social insurance benefits, direct relief, and payments to veterans. In 1982's fourth quarter, with unemployment at 10.5%, transfer payments were at an annual rate of $399 billion. In 1983's third quarter, with unemployment at 9.2%, they had risen to $403 billion. In June 1984, with unemployment down to 7.1%, they were at a $416 billion annual rate. By last November, with joblessness at 7%, transfer payments were costing over $424 billion.

Some budget functions took cuts in fiscal 1984. Revenue-sharing outlays dropped 1%. The Environmental Protection Agency got 5.6% less, and the Department of Education 6.4% less. Agriculture Department spending fell $19 billion from its fiscal 1983 level of $46.3 billion (an all-time high). Appalachian development programs lost a fifth of their allocation, as did the Civil Aeronautics Board. The Small Business Administration parted with 46.7% of its 1983 money. Domestic spending wasn't entirely out of control.

Yet those savings only make more alarming the overall rise in spending. Not only did the economic expansion fail to dent key social-welfare programs, but it was deliberate policy to lavish new funds on other items. The second table shows some of last year's big winners.

Five years ago, tax-cutting conservatives honestly assumed that low inflation and high economic growth would generate new tax revenues and control spending; economic health would thus end deficits. The 1981–82 recession prevented an early test of that theory, and many Republicans asserted that the deficit was mostly cyclical (and hardly structural). When the recovery blossomed early in 1983, they said the U.S. would now "grow its way out of the deficit."

The theory of the fiscal optimists has now been tested, during eight quarters of low inflation and economic boom. During that period, the red ink totaled $370 billion; during fiscal 1984, unemployment's plunge did not reduce aggregate spending levels, even with defense and debt interest factored out. The first quarter of fiscal 1985 also showed good growth—along with poor progress on the deficit.

The U.S. economy can't grow fast enough to catch up with deliberate high spending that has followed the Reagan team's 1981-82 budget cuts. Neither can the economy grow fast enough to overtake spending on an aging population interacting with too-generous transfer-payment laws. Sen. Alan Simpson was right: "No slot machine in America pays off like that." Economic growth remains an insurance policy against bigger deficits. But it will take politicians investing political capital to achieve balanced budgets.

At the very least, the numbers are telling us to change the terms of debate. Liberal Democrats need to forget charges of mass victimization via budget cuts; Reagan partisans should put away the rose-colored glasses. With the election over, people in various political camps can afford to take a magnifying glass to everything the government does, or thinks it does. We need fewer soft options from the interest groups and more hard data from the GAO. We need to put aside ideological budgeting and to perfect investigative budgeting.●

AMERICANS SUPPORT A STRONG NATIONAL DEFENSE

HON. BILL HENDON

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. HENDON. Mr. Speaker, the House of Representatives will obviously be faced with many difficult and important national security decisions this year. The votes we cast will significantly impact the President's strategic modernization program, and in many ways they will determine the future of America's leadership position in the free world.

A clear mandate for a strong national defense does not presently exist in this body, and it did not exist in the last Congress. Last year, the House placed a moratorium on the deployment of the MX Peacekeeper missile system until April 1, 1985. The vote in favor of this moratorium was by a slim majority of 199 to 197, and we now face as many as six votes on MX before it can be deployed. The President's request for military aid to El Salvador passed the House last year by the slim margin of 212 to 208, and in 1984 the Senate had tie votes on both the defense appropriations bill and on funds for the production of binary chemical weapons.

The simple point I am trying to make is that the many major national security issues confronting us will be decided by just a handful of votes, and because of this I think all of my colleagues should be well aware of the sentiments of the American people.

According to recent indepth scientific survey research, the American people clearly support President Reagan and his national security policies. Cambridge Reports, one of our Nation's leading pollsters, reports that American opinion strongly supports the President's strategic modernization program, and our people definitely are in favor of programs such as the MX Peacekeeper missile, the antisatellite [ASAT] weapon, and the Strategic Defense Initiative. Recent, findings by the Opinion Research Corp. of Princton, NJ, show that only 19 percent of the American people would favor the Kennedy-Hatfield nuclear freeze resolution if it left the United States inferior to the Soviet Union. The same survey shows that 80 percent of Americans want a national strategy of peace through strength; 78 percent of our people believe that the United States should pursue positive, nonmilitary means to roll back the growth of communism, and 62 percent say they want "overall military and technological superiority over the Soviet Union." I was particularly pleased to note that the Cambridge Reports poll shows Americans supporting the MX missile by a 60- to 36-percent margin.

A bipartisan organization that mirrors American public opinion is the American Security Council. I was encouraged when I recently reviewed the results of over 15,000 national security legislative action surveys that were completed by ASC members just last month. The views of ASC supporters are particularly important to me because this group includes our Nation's most vigorous and effective prodefense advocates. This group has worked vigorously in support of both the President's strategic modernization program and the Strategic Defense Initiative. These 15,000 legislative action surveys were completed by a membership that includes many national security experts, and they provide vital grassroots assistance to ASC's role as program secretariat for the bipartisan Coalition for Peace Through Strength.

There are now 235 members of the U.S. House and Senate who belong to the coalition, and it is the largest congressional caucus on Capitol Hill. Despite this, the prodefense community is obviously faced with many uphill battles on vital defense issues, and the grassroots support of the American people and ASC members in particular is urgently needed. I hope these legislative action surveys will be translated into concrete results by this Congress, and I know the Coalition for Peace Through Strength will be supporting the President's mandate to rebuild our defenses. By an overwhelming majority, the ASC membership feels our top priority must be full funding for the Strategic Defense Initiative, and this position is definitely supported by the American people themselves.

Mr. Speaker, I insert the results of the national security legislative action survey of the American Security Council in the RECORD.

The material follows:

THE NATIONAL SECURITY LEGISLATIVE ACTION SURVEY OF THE AMERICAN SECURITY COUNCIL

[In percent]

	Yes	No	Undecided
1. Should the President establish a National Strategy Advisory Board within the National Security Council to prepare and keep updated a peace through strength strategy for the United States?	69	7	18
2. Should the United States use its advanced technology to rebuild its conventional military capability by producing inexpensive unmanned planes or cruise missiles which could search out and destroy enemy tanks, guns and emplacements, and planes?	84	3	8
3. Should the United States build space and ground based defenses which could destroy Soviet missiles and bombers before they reach the United States?	91	1	5

COOPERATION IN THE FIGHT AGAINST TERRORISM

HON. WM. S. BROOMFIELD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, this is the time to work together to combat international terrorism. Now, more than ever, our Government is facing the threat of terrorism. We are not retreating from this menace. I commend the Secretary of State for his recent remarks to the American Society for Industrial Security on the subject of cooperation. In addition to calling for expanded cooperation with our allies around the world in the struggle against terrorism, the Secretary also called for greater cooperation between the U.S. Government and the private sector.

Not unlike our Foreign Service and military personnel, American businessmen and their families are assigned to a variety of countries around the world. They face the same threats which most official Americans face. As American citizens, they are not exempt from terrorism, crime, and petty thievery. As the real economic backbone of the United States, American businessmen around the world are also obliged to protect their homes and investments. Although there has always been cooperation between the Office of Security at the Department of State, and the U.S. private sector, both here in the United States and overseas, the new program will expand and formalize the relationship. This new joint venture between the private sector and the Department is called the Overseas Security Advisory Council.

Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Security, David Fields, is to be commended for his abiding commitment to helping the business community overseas. Thanks to the foresight of professional corporate security officers such as Steven Van Cleave, Fred Bornhofen, Robert Disney, Myron Weinstein, Ed Meserve, Eugene McCarthy, Warren Metzner, and George Murphy, all members of the Society's Standing Committee on Terrorism, progress was made in expanding cooperation between the government and business community.

In addition, Mr. John Thomas brings to the standing committee unique experience in that he served as Assistant Secretary of Administration at the Department of State, and later worked as the vice president of International Assets at Norton-Simon Inc. Other members of the committee also had similar backgrounds in Government and the private sector.

Since U.S. businesses and our diplomatic missions face similar security problems, they will be able to share their solutions to these common problems, or pool resources to develop new approaches in the fight against terrorism. Through this joint effort, and this new spirit of cooperation, let us hope that the lives of innocent citizens serving their country overseas can be saved.

With these thoughts in mind, I recommend the Secretary of State's comments to my colleagues in the Congress.

U.S. GOVERNMENT AND BUSINESS: OUR COMMON DEFENSE AGAINST TERRORISM

(Following is an address by Secretary Shultz before the American Society for Industrial Security, Arlington, Virginia, February 4, 1985.)

International terrorism has rapidly become one of the gravest challenges to American interests around the world. In the Middle East, in Latin America, and in Western Europe, we have suffered heavy casualties, and the threat has not diminished.

Terrorism poses a foreign policy problem of immense proportions, and as a foreign policymaker I consider the reduction and eventual eradication of terrorism one of our most important goals. But I also see the terrorist threat on a much more personal level. A Secretary of State is obviously responsible for helping the President set the direction of American foreign policy. But he is also responsible for the health, safety and well-being of the thousands of men and women who work for the State Department both here and overseas—and not only the State Department but those assigned overseas from other agencies of the government; and not only employees of government but private citizens working or visiting overseas. I feel that responsibility deeply.

When a terrorist attack kills or injures our people abroad, it is a loss for our foreign policy, but it is even more a deeply personal loss. Some may think that deaths and injuries at the hands of terrorists are the cost of doing business in some regions. But if anyone stood in the bombed-out ruins of the courtyard at our Beirut Embassy Annex, as I did, and saw firsthand the terrible destruction wreaked by terrorism, they would agree that the price is unacceptable and intolerable. Clearly, we cannot retreat in the face of the terrorist threat, but, just as clearly, we have to do more to protect our people.

Part of the answer comes from understanding the nature of the terrorist phenomenon. We have learned a great deal about the scope and nature of international terrorism in recent years, though our education has been painful and costly. We have learned about the terrorists themselves, their supporters, their international links, their diverse methods, their underlying motives, and their eventual goals. We have learned that terrorism is, above all, political violence. What once may have seemed the random, senseless, violent acts of a few crazed individuals has come into clearer focus.

Today, we are confronted with a wide assortment of terrorist groups which, alone or in concert, orchestrate acts of violence to achieve distinctly political ends. Their stated objectives may range from separatist causes to revenge for ethnic grievances to social and political revolution. Their techniques may be just as diverse: from planting homemade explosives in public places to suicide car bombings to kidnapings and political assassinations.

But the essential method of all terrorists is the same: they are trying to impose their will by force—a special kind of force designed to create an atmosphere of fear. The terrorists want people to feel helpless and defenseless; they want to undermine people's faith in their government's capacity to protect them and thereby to undermine the legitmacy of the government itself, or its policies, or both. The terrorists profit from the anarchy caused by their violence. They succeed when governments change their policies out of intimidation.

DEVISING AN EFFECTIVE STRATEGY TO DEAL WITH TERRORISM

Over the years, the pattern of terrorist violence has become increasingly clear. It is an alarming pattern, but it is something that we can identify and, therefore, a threat that we can devise concrete measures to combat. The knowledge we have accumulated about terrorism can provide the basis for a coherent strategy to deal with it, if we have the will to turn our understanding into action.

An effective strategy must incorporate many elements. I have spoken on other occasions about the need to go beyond a purely passive defense to consider means of active prevention, preemption, and retaliation. Our goal must be to prevent and deter future terrorist acts, and experience has taught us over the years that one of the best deterrents to terrorism is the certainty that swift and sure measures will be taken against those who engage in it.

We have also recognized the need for a broader international effort. Terrorism poses a direct threat not only to Western strategic interests but to the very moral principles that undergird Western democratic society. The enemies of the West are united. So, too, must the democratic countries be united in a common defense against terrorism. The leaders of the industrial democracies, meeting at the London summit last June, agreed in a joint declaration that they must redouble their cooperation against terrorism. There has been followup to that initial meeting, and the United States is committed to advancing the process in every way possible. Since we, the democracies, are the most vulnerable, and our strategic interests are the most at stake, we must act together in the face of common dangers.

Sanctions, when exercised in concert with other nations, can help to isolate, weaken, or punish states that sponsor terrorism against us. Too often, countries are inhibited by fear of losing commercial opportunities or fear of provoking the bully. Economic sanctions and other forms of countervailing pressure impose costs and risks on the nations that apply them, but some sacrifices will be necessary if we are not to suffer even greater costs down the road. Some countries are clearly more vulnerable to extortion than others, but surely this is an argument for banding together in mutual support, not an argument for appeasement.

Even these steps, however, will not be enough. For until the day comes when we have banished the scourge of terrorism from the modern world, we will continue to face threats. We must, therefore, summon all our resources, all our knowledge, and all our will to find ways to protect ourselves, our installations, and the people, both in government and in the private sector, who represent America abroad. We must take every precaution to provide the safest possible environment for our citizens who live and work overseas. And I believe there is much that the American Government and American businesses can do together to meet this challenge.

Most of you here today have the great responsibility of providing security to American businesses around the world. As a former business executive myself, I know how important it is that your people abroad have some degree of confidence in their safety. Without that confidence, doing business effectively is practically impossible. And when America's businesses have a hard time doing business abroad, all of America suffers. Our nation loses jobs and income. Our balance of payments is adversely affected. And, not least important, the constructive ties that American business creates with our friends and allies around the world are eroded.

U.S. MEASURES TO ENHANCE SECURITY

The problems that you face are not very different from those I have faced as Secretary of State. In fact, I often feel like a security executive myself. At the State Department, we have made enhancing the security of our personnel and installations abroad a top priority. I'd like to take a few moments to outline for you some of the measures we are taking to enhance the security of our posts and personnel overseas.

One thing we have learned over the years is that defense against terrorists depends to a great extent on timely and accurate information and intelligence. We have, therefore, begun to augment and improve our capabilities in this vital area. We have strengthened our ability to analyze and report on terrorist threats. We have expanded our data facilities to keep on record biographical information on individual terrorists and terrorist groups, the kinds of weapons they use, and their modus operandi. And we have developed better and faster procedures for our posts in the field to gather and report information on terrorist activities.

We have taken great strides toward bringing our installations in threatened areas up to the standards we believe necessary to protect our people. All our posts have done intensive reviews of their security needs, and these reviews have been the basis for speedy action. We have made immediate improvements at 23 high-threat posts. We are planning to construct 13 new office buildings that will measure up to the latest security standards. In addition, we have contracted out to private firms longer term improvements at 35 of our posts. Construction at these posts will begin this spring. As we move ahead on all these projects, we will continue to test and evaluate new technologies for enhancing physical security. Finally, we will be adding over 400 new security personnel, including Marine security guards, to our posts around the world.

Obviously, we have been forced to spend more money to protect our people abroad, and the Congress, on a bipartisan basis, has been enormously helpful to these efforts. From 1979 to 1983 the Congress tripled the State Department's authorization for security. Last year the Congress authorized a $361 million security supplemental, which is paying for the bulk of the measures we are now taking. In 1985 we expect to spend more for security than we did in all of the preceding 5 years combined. We are grateful for this congressional support.

Protecting ourselves against terrorism, however, will require more than these tangible security improvements. We must also take steps to educate ourselves and our personnel abroad, to raise our awareness of the terrorist threat and what needs to be done to counter it. I myself meet every morning with Ambassador Oakley [Director of the Office for Counter-terrorism and Emergency Planning] and our security and intelligence officials to stay abreast of the very latest information on terrorist activities and to discuss ways of improving security. But all our personnel must learn to adapt to the new and dangerous circumstances that the terrorist violence has created. The State Department is now developing a comprehensive multidisciplinary program using our security, medical, training, and public affairs officials as educational resources. As long as the terrorist threat persists, all our people must be vigilant and ready to respond to any crisis quickly and effectively.

State Department officers around the world in many ways represent the front line of the U.S. Government. But the men and women who work for American businesses abroad are also on the front line, and their safety and well-being are also at the forefront of our concern, as I know they are of yours.

POOLING THE RESOURCES OF THE PUBLIC AND PRIVATE SECTORS

I'd like to turn now to the ways American Government and American business can pool their energies and resources to enhance the security of all Americans overseas, whether they represent the public or the private sector.

Obviously, terrorism poses the same kind of difficulties and dangers to businessmen abroad as to government officials. And the security measures needed to protect businesses are also substantially the same. There is much room, therefore, for collaboration. We can share information on terrorist activities and on the new technologies for enhancing security. We can coordinate our security efforts overseas. In short, we can meet the threat together.

In July I convened a blue-ribbon panel on overseas security chaired by retired Admiral Bobby Inman. I asked this panel to look into the security of our Embassies abroad and to tell us, in essence, how much security is enough. One of the specific questions posed to this panel was: "What responsibility does the U.S. Government have for the protection of American business people abroad?"

For a number of years now, we have worked informally with many American firms on local security issues. The main players have been the regional security officers at overseas posts and our Threat Analysis Group here in Washington. This has been a good and growing relationship. But we would like to put it on a more formal footing and make it available to more American firms and organizations.

In this regard, I am pleased to announce today the formation of a new joint venture between the State Department and the private sector: the Overseas Security Advisory Council. The members of this council will come from a wide range of American businesses that operate abroad, as well as from the State Department, American law enforcement agencies, and other foreign policy agencies. Its goal is to establish a continuing liaison between officials in both the public and private sector in charge of security matters; to provide for regular exchanges of information on developments in the security fields; and to recommend plans for greater operational coordination between the government and the private sector overseas. The creation of this council marks an important step forward. There are many ways our security officers overseas can assist businesses abroad with emergency communications, information about specific threat conditions, and even advice on the best locales for residences overseas. I am sure that, by working together to enhance security, we can be more effective in saving lives and reducing the dangers of doing business abroad.

Obviously, all our efforts will not eliminate the threat. That will require time and a broad, consistent strategy combining elements of defense, response, and international cooperation. But we must stand firm. So long as terrorism continues to be a grave problem, we must not waver or bow to terrorist intimidation. The United States cannot allow the actions of terrorists to affect our policies or deflect us from our goals. When terrorist intimidation succeeds in changing our policies, when it forces businesses to close down overseas, we hand them a victory; this only opens the door to more terrorism. It shows that terrorism works; it emboldens those who resort to it; and it encourages others to join their ranks.

If we remain firm, we can look ahead to a time when terrorism will cease to be a major factor in world affairs. But we must face the challenge with realism, determination, and strength of will. Not so long ago we faced a rash of political kidnapings and Embassy takeovers. These problems seemed insurmountable. Yet, through increased security and the willingness of governments to resist terrorist demands and to use force when appropriate, such incidents have become rare. In recent years, we have also seen a decline in the number of airline hijackings—once a problem that seemed to fill our newspapers daily. Tougher security measures and closer international cooperation have clearly had their effect.

I have great faith that we do have the will, and the capability, to act decisively against this threat. It is really up to us. We must work together and apply ourselves to the task of ensuring a safer future.●

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Wednesday, February 20, 1985

The House met at 10 a.m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James David Ford, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, for the beauty of this day we give You thanks; for the friends of this day may we show appreciation; for the opportunities of this day may we have strength; for any dangers of this day may we have courage; and for all the good gifts of this day, let us rejoice. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to make an announcement.

After consultation with the majority and minority leaders, and with their consent and approval, the Chair announces that today when the Houses meet in joint meeting to hear an address by the Prime Minister of Great Britain only the doors immediately opposite the Speaker and those on his left and right will be open.

No one will be allowed on the floor of the House who does not have the privilege of the floor of the House.

Children of Members will not be permitted on the floor and the cooperation of all the Members is requested.

RECESS

The SPEAKER. Pursuant to the order of the House of January 31, 1985, the House will stand in recess subject to the call of the Chair.

Accordingly (at 10 o'clock and 2 minutes a.m.), the House stood in recess subject to the call of the Chair.

JOINT MEETING OF THE 99TH CONGRESS HELD PURSUANT TO THE ORDER OF THE HOUSE OF JANUARY 31, 1985, TO HEAR AN ADDRESS BY THE RIGHT HONORABLE MARGARET THATCHER, PRIME MINISTER OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND NORTHERN IRELAND

The SPEAKER of the House presided.

The Doorkeeper, the Honorable James T. Malloy, announced the Vice President and Members of the U.S. Senate who entered the Hall of the House of Representatives, the Vice President taking the chair at the right of the Speaker and the Members of the Senate the seats reserved for them.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints as members of the committee on the part of the House to conduct the Prime Minister of Great Britain into the Chamber:

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. WRIGHT];

The gentleman from Washington [Mr. FOLEY];

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GEPHARDT];

The gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. OAKAR];

The gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL];

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL];

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT];

The gentleman from New York [Mr. KEMP]; and

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The President of the Senate, at the direction of that body, appoints the following Senators as members of the committee on the part of the Senate to escort the Prime Minister of Great Britain into the House Chamber:

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. DOLE];

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND];

The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. SIMPSON];

The Senator from Maryland [Mr. MATHIAS];

The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WALLOP];

The Senator from Kansas [Mrs. KASSEBAUM];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. BYRD];

The Senator from California [Mr. CRANSTON];

The Senator from New York [Mr. MOYNIHAN];

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. PELL];

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. SIMON]; and

The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE].

The Doorkeeper announced the ambassadors, ministers, and chargés d'affaires of foreign governments.

The ambassadors, ministers, and chargés d'affaires of foreign governments entered the Hall of the House of Representatives and took the seats reserved for them.

The Doorkeeper announced the Cabinet of the President of the United States.

The members of the Cabinet of the President of the United States entered the Hall of the House of Representatives and took the seats reserved for them in front of the Speaker's rostrum.

At 11 o'clock and 4 minutes a.m., the Doorkeeper announced the Prime Minister of Great Britain.

The Prime Minister of Great Britain, escorted by the committee of Senators and Representatives, entered the Hall of the House of Representatives, and stood at the Clerk's desk.

[Applause, the Members rising.]

The SPEAKER. Members of the Congress, it is my great privilege, and I deem it a high honor and personal pleasure, to present to you the Right Honorable Margaret Thatcher, the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom of Great Britain.

ADDRESS BY THE PRIME MINISTER OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND NORTHERN IRELAND

Prime Minister MARGARET THATCHER. Mr. Speaker, Mr. President, distinguished Members of Congress, on this, one of the most moving occasions of my life, my first words must be to say thank you for granting me this rare privilege of addressing a joint meeting of the United States Congress.

My thoughts turn to three earlier occasions when a British Prime Minister—Winston Churchill—has been honored by a call to address both Houses.

Among his many remarkable gifts, Winston held a special advantage here. Through his American mother he had ties of blood with you. Alas for me, these are not matters we can readily arrange for ourselves. Those three occasions deserve to be recalled because they serve as lamps along a dark road which our people trod together, and they remind us what an extraordinary period of history the world has passed through between that time and ours. And they tell us what later generations in both our countries sometimes find hard to grasp—why past associations bind us so closely.

Winston Churchill's vision of a union of mind and purpose between the English speaking peoples was to form the mainspring of the West.

No one of my generation can forget that America has been the principal architect of a peace in Europe which has lasted 40 years. Given this shield of the United States, we have been granted the opportunities to build a concept of Europe beyond the dreams of our fathers: A Europe which seemed unattainable amid the mud and slaughter of the First World War and the suffering and sacrifice of the second.

When, in the spring of 1945, the guns fell silent, General Eisenhower called our soldiers to a service of thanksgiving. In the order of service was the famous prayer of Sir Francis Drake: "O Lord God, when Thou givest to Thy servants to endeavor in great matter, grant us to know that it is not the beginning but the continuing of the same, until it be thoroughly finished, which yieldeth the true glory."

On this day, close to the 40th anniversary of that service, and of peace in Europe, one of the longest periods without war in all our history, I should like to recall those words and acknowledge how faithfully America has fulfilled them.

For our deliverance from what might have befallen us, I would not have us leave our gratitude to the tributes of history. The debt the free peoples of Europe owe to this Nation generous with its bounty, willing to share its strength, seeking to protect the weak, is uncalculable. We thank and salute you.

Of course, in the years which separate us from the time when Winston Churchill last spoke to Congress, there have been disappointments, as well as hopes fulfilled, the continued troubles in the Middle East, famine and oppression in Africa, genocide in South East Asia, the brutal occupation of Afghanistan, the undiminished agony of tortured Poland, and above all the continued and continuing division of the European Continent.

From these shores it may seem to some of you that by comparison with the risks and sacrifices which America has borne through four decades, and the courage with which you have shouldered unwanted burdens, Europe has not fully matched your expectations.

Bear with me if I dwell for a moment on the Europe to which we now belong. It is not the Europe of ancient Rome, of Charlemagne, of Bismarck. We who are alive today have passed through perhaps the greatest transformation of human affairs on the continent of Europe since the fall of Rome.

In but a short chapter of its long history, Europe lost the position which it had occupied for 2,000 years. And it is your history as much as ours.

For five centuries, that small continent had extended its authority over islands and continents the world over, for the first 40 years of this century there were seven great powers—the United States, Great Britain, Germany, France, Russia, Japan, and Italy.

Of those seven, two now tower over the rest—the United States and the Soviet Union.

To that swift and historic change Europe—a Europe of many different histories, of many different nations—has had to find a response.

It has not been an easy passage to blend this conflux of nationalism, patriotism, sovereignty into a European community.

Yet I think that our children and grandchildren may see this period, these birth pangs of a new Europe, more clearly than we do now. They will see it as a visionary chapter in the creation of a Europe able to share the load alongside you.

Do not doubt the firmness of our resolve in this march toward this goal.

But don't underestimate what we already do.

Today, out of the forces of the alliance in Europe, 95 percent of the divisions, 85 percent of the tanks, 80 percent of the combat aircraft and 70 percent of the fighting ships are provided, manned, and paid for by the European allies, and Europe has more than 3 million men under arms and more still in reserve. We have to.

We are right in the front line. The frontier of freedom cuts across our continent. Members of Congress, the defense of that frontier is as vital to you as it is to us.

It is fashionable for some commentators to speak of the two superpowers, the United States and the Soviet Union, as though they were somehow of equal worth and equal significance.

Mr. Speaker, that is a travesty of the truth.

The Soviet Union has never concealed its real aim. In the words of Mr. Brezhnev: "The total triumph of socialism all over the world is inevitable, for this triumph * * *. We shall struggle with no lack of effort."

Indeed, there has been no lack of effort.

Contrast this with the record of the West. We do not aim at domination, at hegemony in any part of the world. Even against those who oppose and who would destroy our ideas. We plot no aggression.

Of course, we are ready to fight the battle of ideas with all the vigor at our command. But we do not try to impose our system on others. We do not believe that force should be the final arbiter in human affairs. We threaten no one. Indeed, the alliance has given a solemn assurance to the world: "None of our weapons will be used except in response to attack."

In talking to the Soviet Union, we find great difficulty in getting this message across. They judge us by their ambitions. They cannot conceive of a powerful nation not using its power for expansion or subversion.

And yet they should remember that when, after the last war, the United States had a monopoly of nuclear weapons, she never once exploited her superiority. No country ever used such great power more responsibly or with such restraint.

I wonder what would have befallen us in Western Europe and Great Britain if that monopoly had been in Soviet hands.

Mr. Speaker, wars are not caused by the buildup of weapons.

They are caused when an aggressor believes he can achieve his objectives at an acceptable price.

The war of 1939 was not caused by an arms race. It sprang from a tyrant's belief that other countries lacked the means and the will to resist him.

Remember Bismarck's phrase: "Do I want war? Of course not, I want victory."

Our task is to see that potential aggressors from whatever quarter understand plainly that the capacity and the resolve of the West would deny them victory in war: and that the price they would pay would be intolerable.

That is the basis of deterrence and it is the same whatever the nature of the weapons. For let us never forget the horrors of conventional wars and the hideous sacrifice of those who have suffered in them. Our task is not only to prevent nuclear war, but to prevent conventional war as well.

No one understood the importance of deterrence more clearly than Winston Churchill when in his last speech to you he said: "Be careful above all things not to let go of the atomic weapon until you are sure, and more than sure, that other means of preserving peace are in your hands." Thirty-three years on, those weapons are still keeping the peace.

But since then, technology has moved on, and if we are to maintain deterrence, as we must, it is essential that our research and capacity do not fall behind the work being done by the Soviet Union.

That is why I firmly support President Reagan's decision to pursue research into defense against ballistic nuclear missiles—the strategic defense initiative.

Indeed, I hope that our own scientists will share in this research.

The United States and the Soviet Union are both signatories to the 1972 Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty, a treaty without any terminal date. Nothing in that treaty precludes research, but should that research on either side lead to the possible deployment of new defense systems, that would be a matter for negotiation under the treaty.

But, Mr. Speaker, despite our differences with the Soviet Union, we have to talk with them. For we have one overriding interest in common: That never again should there be a conflict between our peoples. We hope, too, that we can achieve security with far fewer weapons than we have today and at lower cost. And thanks to the skillful diplomacy of Secretary Shultz, negotiations on arms control open in Geneva on the 12th of March. They will be of immense importance to millions. They will be intricate, complex and demanding. And we should not expect too much too soon.

We must recognize that we shall face a Soviet political offensive designed to sow differences among us, calculated to create infirmity of purpose, to impair resolve—and even to arouse fear in the hearts of our people.

Hope is such a precious commodity in the world today that some are tempted to buy it at too high a price. We shall have to resist the muddled arguments of those who have been induced to believe that Russia's intentions are benign and that ours are suspect, or who would have us simply give up our defenses in the hope that where we led others would follow.

As we learned cruelly in the 1930's, from good intentions can come tragic results.

Let us be under no illusions: It is our strength and not their goodwill that has brought the Soviet Union to the negotiating table in Geneva.

Mr. Speaker, we know that our alliance, if it holds firm, cannot be defeated. But it could be outflanked. It is among the unfree and the underfed that subversion takes root.

As Ethiopia demonstrated, those people get precious little help from the Soviet Union and its allies. The weapons which they pour in bring neither help nor hope to the hungry.

It is the West which heard their cries. It is the West which responded massively to the heart-rending starvation in Africa. It is the West which has made a unique contribution to the uplifting of hundreds of millions of people from poverty, illiteracy and disease.

But the problems of the Third World are not only those of famine. They face also a mounting burden of debt, falling prices for primary products, protectionism by the industrialized countries.

Some of the remedies are in the hands of the developing countries themselves. They can open their markets to productive investment. They can pursue responsible policies of economic adjustment. We should respect the courage and resolve with which so many of them have tackled their special problems. But we also have a duty to help.

How can we help? First, and most important, by keeping our markets open to them. Protectionism is a danger to all our trading partnerships. And for many countries trade is even more important than aid. And so we in Britain support President Reagan's call for a new GATT round.

The current strength of the dollar, which is causing so much difficulty for some of your industries, creates obvious pressures for "special cases," for new trade barriers to a free market. I am certain that your administration is right to resist such pressures.

To give in to them would betray the millions in the developing world, to say nothing of the strains on your other trading partners. The developing countries need our markets, as we need theirs.

And we cannot preach economic adjustment to them, and refuse to practice it at home.

And, second, we must remember that the way in which we in the developed countries manage our economies determines whether the world's financial framework is stable; it determines the level of interest rates; it determines the amount of capital available for sound investment the world over; and it determines whether or not the poor countries can service their past loans, let alone compete for new ones.

Those are the reasons why we support so strongly your efforts to reduce the budget deficit. No other country in the world can be immune from its effects. Such is the influence of the American economy on us all.

We in Europe have watched with admiration the burgeoning of this mighty American economy. There is a new mood in the United States. A visitor feels it at once. The resurgence of your self-confidence and your national pride is almost tangible. Now the Sun is rising in the West.

For many years our vitality in Britain was blunted by excessive reliance on the State. Our industries were nationalized, controlled and subsidized in a way that yours never were. We're having to recover the spirit of enterprise which you never lost.

Many of the policies you are following are the policies we are following.

You have brought inflation down. So have we.

You have declared war on regulations and controls. So have we. Our civil service is now smaller than at any time since the war. And controls on pay, prices, dividends, foreign exchange all are gone.

You have encouraged small business, so often the source of tomorrow's jobs. So have we.

But above all, we are carrying out the largest program of denationalization in our history. Just a few years ago in Britain, privatization was thought to be a pipe dream. Now it is a reality, and a popular one.

Our latest success was the sale of British Telecommunications. It was the largest share issue ever to be brought to the market on either side of the Atlantic. Some 2 million people bought shares.

Members of Congress, that is what capitalism is: A system which brings wealth to the many, and not just to the few.

The United Kingdom economy is in its fourth year of recovery, slower than yours but positive recovery.

We have not yet shared your success in bringing down unemployment, although we are creating many new jobs.

But output, investment and standard of living are all at record levels and profits are well up.

And the pound, it is too low. But whatever the proper international level of sterling, it is a marvelous time for Americans not only to visit Britain, but to invest with us.

And many are. America is by far the largest direct investor in Britain and I am delighted to say that Britain is the largest direct investor in the United States.

The British economy has an underlying strength. Any, like you, we use our strength and resolve to carry out our duties to our allies and to the wider world.

We were the first country to station cruise missiles on our territory. Britain led the rest.

In proportion to our population we station the same number of troops as you in Germany.

In Central America we keep troops stationed in Belize at the Government's request. That is our contribution to sustaining democracy in a part of the world so vital to the United States.

We have troops in Cyprus and in the south Atlantic and, at your request, a small force in the Sinai, and British servicemen are now on loan to some 30 foreign countries. We were alongside you in Beirut. We work with you in the Atlantic and in the Indian Ocean. Our navy is on duty across the world.

Mr. Speaker, Britain meets her responsibilities in the defense of freedom throughout the world and she will go on doing so.

But, Members of Congress, closer to home there is a threat to freedom both savage and insidious. Both our countries have suffered at the hands of terrorists. We have both lost some of our best young lives. And I have lost some close and dear friends.

Free, strong, democratic societies will not be driven by gunmen to abandon freedom or democracy.

The problems of the Middle East will not be solved by the coldblooded murder of American servicemen in Lebanon, nor by the murder of American civilians on a hijacked aircraft. Nor will the problems of Northern Ireland be solved by the assassin's gun or bomb.

Garret Fitzgerald and I and our respective governments are united in condemning terrorism.

We recognize the differing traditions and identities of the two parts of the community of Northern Ireland, the nationalist and the unionist. We seek a political way forward acceptable to them both which respects them both.

So long as a majority of the people of Northern Ireland wish to remain part of the United Kingdom, their wishes will be respected. If ever there were to be a majority in favor of change, then I believe that our Parliament would respond accordingly.

For that is the principle of consent, enshrined in your Constitution and an essential part of ours.

There is no disagreement on this principle between the United Kingdom Government and the Government of the Republic of Ireland.

Indeed the four constitutional nationalist parties of Ireland, north and south, who came together to issue the new Ireland forum report, made clear that any new arrangements could only come about by consent, and I welcome, too, their outright condemnation and total rejection of terrorism and all its works.

Be under no illusions about the Provisional IRA. They terrorize their own communities. They are the enemies of democracy, and of freedom, too.

Do not just take my word for it. Ask the Government of the Irish Republic, where it is an offense even to belong to that organization, as indeed it also is in Northern Ireland.

I recognize and appreciate the efforts which have been made by the administration and Congress alike to bring home this message to American citizens who may be misled into making contributions to seemingly innocuous groups. The fact is that money is used to buy the deaths of Irishmen, north and south of the border; and 70 percent of those killed by the IRA are Irishmen. And that money buys the killing and wounding even of American citizens visiting our country.

Garret Fitzgerald—and I salute him for the very brave thing he did yesterday in passing a special law to see that money did not get to the IRA—Garret Fitzgerald and I will continue to consult together in the quest for stability and peace in Northern Ireland. And we hope we will have your continued support for our joint efforts to find a way forward.

Distinguished Members of Congress, our two countries have a common heritage as well as a common language. It is no mere figure of speech to say that many of your most enduring traditions, representative government, habeas corpus, trial by jury, a system of constitutional checks and balances, stem from our own small islands.

But they are as much your lawful inheritance as ours. You did not borrow these traditions. You took them with you, because they were already your own.

Human progress is not automatic. Civilization has its ebbs and flows. But if we look at the history of the last 500 years, whether in the field of art, science, technology, religious tolerance or in the practice of politics, the conscious inspiration of it all has been the belief and practice of freedom under law, a freedom disciplined by morality, under a law perceived to be just.

I cannot conclude this address without recalling words made immortal by your great President Abraham Lincoln in his second inaugural address, when he looked beyond an age when men fought and strove toward a more peaceful future. "With malice toward none, with charity for all: With firmness in the right as God gives us to see the right, let us strive on to finish the work that we are in * * * to do all which may achieve and cherish a just and lasting peace, among ourselves and with all nations."

Members of Congress, may our two kindred Nations go forward together, sharing Lincoln's vision, firm of purpose, strong in faith, warm of heart, as we approach the third millenium of the Christian era.

Mr. Speaker, thank you.

[Applause, the Members rising.]

At 11 o'clock and 37 minutes a.m., the Prime Minister of Great Britain, accompanied by the committee of escort, retired from the Hall of the House of Representatives.

The Doorkeeper escorted the invited guests from the Chamber in the following order:

The members of the President's Cabinet.

The ambassadors, ministers, and charges d'affaires of foreign governments.

JOINT MEETING DISSOLVED

The SPEAKER. The Chair declares the joint meeting of the two Houses now dissolved.

Accordingly, at 11 o'clock and 41 minutes a.m., the joint meeting of the two Houses was dissolved.

The Members of the Senate retired to their Chamber.

AFTER RECESS

The recess having expired, at 12 o'clock and 30 minutes p.m., the House was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. FOLEY].

PRINTING OF PROCEEDINGS HAD DURING THE RECESS

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the proceedings had during the recess be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

PRIME MINISTER THATCHER'S ADDRESS

(Mr. BIAGGI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, we had the privilege of listening to the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom this morning, and there is no question she is a woman of great substance and held in high regard, and properly so.

It was comforting to note that she felt as strongly about the alliance between the United Kingdom and the United States, but then when she shifted into the question of the Irish problem in Northern Ireland, what was important is that she did raise the issue here, in the Congress of the United States in joint session.

That, we would like to believe, was in response to a letter signed by 40 Members of the House, urging her to do that.

We do, however, take some exceptions to the manner in which she addressed it. She addressed it from her perspective; she talked about terrorism, and we all condemn terrorism universally.

Terrorism comes in many forms. Institutional terrorism which is inflicted by a representative of the United Kingdom that enforced the law in that area.

There is a question of basic rights, civil rights, the discrimination and denial of political opportunity, denial of employment opportunity, denial of proper housing that exists in the six counties of Ulster that the Prime Minister did not address herself to. Hers was a single-dimension approach, serving her own best interests.

What heartened me is the fact that she will continue to speak to the Prime Minister of the Republic. And hopefully that will be productive. We agree that in the end, it will not be terrorism or force of violence that will bring about the solution; it will be a political solution, but there will not be a political solution until all parties to the conflict sit down in good faith, with a determination to resolve an age-old problem.

RESOLUTION ON JAPANESE AUTO IMPORTS

(Mr. MICHEL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing a sense-of-the-Congress resolution calling for the retention of the Japanese auto import agreement.

I do so because I think we need to send a message to the Japanese Government that they need to be much more forthcoming in opening up their markets and turning around the dollar/yen imbalance.

The fact is that despite the talk, all the meetings, and all the promises, we have seen very little in the way of concrete action on the part of the Japanese.

They supposedly agreed to steps last year to stabilize the dollar/yen alignment, but the value of the yen has now reached an all time high.

They continue to drag their feet in a whole host of areas with respect to allowing our products into their markets.

Our trade imbalance with the Japanese has now reached an unbelievable high of $37 billion.

Twenty billion of that is due to auto imports, even with the import cap. The total imbalance is costing us nearly 1 million jobs according to Commerce Department figures.

The U.S. Trade Commission estimates that removal of the import cap on autos will result in 4 to 5 billion dollars worth of additional Japanese cars flooding our markets.

I don't care what the health of our auto industry is at this time, we as a nation simply cannot afford such an addition to our trade imbalance.

And we cannot afford the job loss that will result.

The resolution I am introducing, identical to one being introduced today in the Senate by Senator DANFORTH, calls for retention of the voluntary restraint agreement until our exports to Japan are substantially increased and our trade deficit with the Japanese is substantially reduced.

I urge that it be given early committee consideration and be taken up on the House floor as soon as possible.

Mr. Speaker, under my unanimous-consent request, I include the text of the resolution at this point in the RECORD.

H. CON. RES. 63

Whereas, the United States merchandise trade deficit with Japan reached the unprecedented level of $37 billion in 1984—accounting for almost one-third of the entire United States deficit with the world;

Whereas, this unprecedented bilateral deficit was accumulated in spite of significant growth in the Japanese economy;

Whereas, the principles of free trade provide for trade flows between nations on the basis of each nation's comparative advantage;

Whereas, Japan has extensive access to the United States market for products where Japan has comparative advantage;

Whereas, United States exporters lack access to the Japanese market for manufactured goods, forest products, key agricultural commodities and certain services where the United States has comparative advantage;

Whereas, the bilateral trade imbalance is costing the United States hundreds of thousands of jobs every year;

Whereas, the high value of the dollar relative to the yen effectively subsidizes Japanese exports to the United States and taxes United States exports to Japan;

Whereas, despite the voluntary restraint Japanese autos continue to account for approximately 2 million cars imported into the United States market—contributing over $20 billion to the bilateral trade deficit;

Whereas, years of negotiating with Japan to secure meaningful improvements in market access for competitive United States exports have been largely unsuccessful;

Whereas, many other countries experience comparable difficulty in obtaining access to the Japanese market;

Whereas, an end to the voluntary restraint on autos without a comparable improvement in access for competitive United States exports to the Japanese market will severely exacerbate the bilateral trade deficit;

Whereas, this deficit has the potential of undermining the entire range of bilateral relations between the United States and Japan: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the voluntary restraint on Japanese autos not be ended until United States exports to Japan are substantially increased and the United States trade deficit with Japan is substantially reduced.

APPOINTMENT AS MEMBERS OF HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES PAGE BOARD

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair wishes to announce that pursuant to section 127 of Public Law 97-377, the Chair appoints, on behalf of the Speaker, as members of the House of Representatives Page Board the following Members of the House:

Mr. FAZIO of California; and
Mr. KILDEE of Michigan.

APPOINTMENT AS MEMBER OF HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES PAGE BOARD

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to section 127 of Public Law 97-377, I appoint the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MYERS] as a member of the House of Representatives Page Board.

ADMINISTRATION'S PROPOSED CUTS IN STUDENT FINANCIAL AID SEVERE, UNFAIR, AND SHORTSIGHTED

(Mr. PERKINS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, the administration's proposed cuts in student financial aid are severe, unfair, and shortsighted. The cuts are too broad. At least 1 million students would be adversely affected by no longer being eligible for assistance.

The proposals are unfair. They strike at the middle class and the poor student, jeopardizing equal opportunity in education by limiting access to private and prestigious universities to only the very rich.

Beyond being unfair, the proposals are shortsighted. Where will tomorrow's scientists, doctors, and lawyers come from? An educated population is a nation's strength. We cannot sacrifice our most valuable asset for tomorrow—our youth.

DON'T INTERFERE WITH THE VOLUNTARY RESTRAINT AGREEMENT WITH THE JAPANESE

(Mr. GAYDOS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Speaker, I wish at this time to commend the minority leader for his foresight in introducing the resolution directed to the Japanese, and as to the trade problems as we have grown to know it.

The voluntary restraint agreement should not be interfered with at this time. We have experience with the Japanese. Not only the $27 billion trade deficit, but there is a serious question as to whether you can depend upon their word.

Some 6 months ago, Ambassador Brock, our special trade negotiator, was sent to Japan, commitments were made, there are going to be some changes; some of our electronics industry was going to be given better consideration and more fair international trade concessions; that did not materialize.

We end up buying everything, all specialty, all highly labor intensive products from the Japanese, and they buy from us oranges and other minor things.

I wish to commend again the minority leader. I am going to be one of the very early cosponsors of his resolution, and I hope and I urge that my colleagues would join in this, what I think is a very proper exercise of the intent of Congress via the resolution area.

DON'T PULL THE PLUG ON FAMILY FARMERS

(Mr. ALEXANDER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, recently the New York Times published editorial support for the Reagan administration's elimination of farm programs. The Times, like too many other eastern media, does not understand the severity of the farm problem nor its ultimate impact on urban America.

Today, our colleague LINDSAY THOMAS of Georgia, responded eloquently to the New York Times editorial, explaining the fallacy of the administration's proposal, warning that it would be "an economic time bomb in rural America * * * the beginning of the self-immolation of the agricultural system that is our national treasure and our best hope for a hungry world."

Mr. Speaker, the American family farm is in a state of economic depression. The farmer needs the understanding of his Government and of the press. I commend Mr. THOMAS of Georgia for his excellent article in today's New York Times and recommend his insights into the farm problem for the consideration of our colleagues.

[From the New York Times, Feb. 20, 1985]

DON'T PULL THE PLUG ON FAMILY FARMERS

To the Editor:

Your Feb. 7 editorial in support of the Administration's proposed dismemberment of Federal farm programs reflects the same tragic misunderstanding of American agriculture that we see today in the White House.

The killing blow that the Administration is preparing for the family farm will not destroy a "19th-century vision of pastoral life" or a handful of marginal farm operators. It will bankrupt many of our most productive farmers and brutalize the economy of our urbanized nation.

The Administration proposes to eliminate $26 billion from credit and farm subsidies over three years. Many of these programs are sorely in need of reform. But in their place, the Administration proposes nothing.

U.S. agriculture could prosper without such programs if world agriculture operated in a free market. But it does not. Canada is decimating our timber industry with harvests from its government-owned forests. Brazil and Argentina produce the bulk of their commodities on government-owned land with government financing. Australia floods our markets with meat processed under health standards not accepted here. Throughout the world, our farmer competitors are generously cultivated by their national treasuries.

But in America, farm programs are designed primarily to provide stability of supply and price. The support programs we have are truly support programs for the grocery shopper, who enjoys the cheapest food in any developed nation. When Government-induced surpluses and trade policies threw the farmer against the rocks, he continued to subsidize the consumer by using up the equity in his land.

This Administration's best agricultural minds gave us PIK (payment in kind), the most expensive failure of a farm program in recent history. Now, having waited until the credit and price crisis is full blown, it would step adroitly aside, and presto, we will have more efficient agriculture.

The result of that play will not be the loss of a misty-eyed vision of Americana: it will be the detonation of an economic time bomb in rural America, the collapse of agricultural banks and the eventual soaring of food prices. It will be the beginning of the self-immolation of the agricultural system that is our national treasure and our best hope for a hungry world.

Our best and cheapest course of action is not to pull the plug on the family farmer. Our course must be to modernize our trade and farm policy tools to sustain our agricultural resource through these troubled times.

LINDSAY THOMAS,
Member of Congress, 1st Dist., Ga.,
Washington, February 8, 1985.

STRATEGY MUST BE DEVELOPED TO DEAL WITH PROBLEMS ON MEXICAN BORDER

(Mr. HUGHES asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, in the last few days the United States has launched an intensive search along the Mexican border for U.S. Drug Enforcement Agent Enrique Camarena Salazar, who was abducted on February 7.

This border crackdown has generated a lot of controversy both in Mexico and the United States. In so doing, it has focused new attention on just how open our border is, and why we have so many problems with illegal aliens, terrorists, drugs, and other contraband entering our country through the border with Mexico.

The fact is, it's easy to cross the border between Mexico and the United States. While our Border Patrol and Immigration Service are doing the best they can to police the border, they just don't have the manpower and resources necessary to do the job. How can they be expected to control the influx of illegal aliens and drugs into our country when we have something like one border patrolman for every 200 miles of border with Mexico?

The chaos which is occurring now as a result of the search for Agent Salazar is unacceptable to both America and Mexico. I regret that it has taken this kidnaping incident to show that we are capable of tightening the security along our borders, but that we don't even have a coordinated strategy for doing so.

I hope and pray that Agent Salazar will be rescued safely, and that the rumors of other plots to kidnap U.S. drug enforcement officials prove to be groundless. But we cannot depend on that.

I hope that we have finally learned from this incident that we must develop a strategy and commit the resources now to deal with the terrorism, drug smuggling, illegal aliens and other problems along our border with Mexico.

THE SOCIOECONOMIC WAR IN NORTHERN IRELAND

(Mr. GILMAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, today the House heard Margaret Thatcher proclaim her concern for resolving the problems of violence in Ireland. I hope those concerns would focus on the undeclared socioeconomic war in Northern Ireland, that has made life in Northern Ireland a living hell for the Catholic minority which is constantly reminded of the fact that there are no laws to protect them, no job opportunities, and no hope for the future.

The continued use of the lethal plastic bullet by British Forces occupying that region, and the suspension of basic and individual rights under the Prevention of Terrorism Act, the Emergency Powers Act, and the Diplock court system, continue to frustrate and anger those who work for peace in Northern Ireland. Of all of the human rights violations suffered by the Catholics in Northern Ireland at the hands of this system, however, perhaps none is as pervasive and as detrimental as the discriminatory employment practices exercised toward Catholics in this region.

The right to work is a fundamental right that is not only an economic, but a spiritual necessity. On this note I commend New York City Comptroller, Harrison Goldin for his recent efforts to convince the 13 companies in which the New York City pension funds have investments, to adopt the MacBride principles. If successfully adopted by these American corporations, these equal opportunity-affirmative action principles could have a profound effect on the quality of life for Catholics in Northern Ireland.

THE HATCH ACT

(Mr. TORRICELLI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. TORRICELLI. Mr. Speaker, the Hatch Act was originally intended to protect the average Federal employee from political intimidation by their supervisors. It has, however, recently been perverted under this administration and has become the chief instrument for silencing the private, voluntary, political expression of Federal workers.

Recent examples include the banning of Federal employee participation in nonpartisan voter registration, visible and highly publicized attempts to prosecute Federal employee union leaders who spoke out on behalf of their workers.

We should not, of course, allow Government workers to politic or become involved in politics to the detriment of the public good. The original intent is sound: Stop harassment, allow the performance of duties without political interference and prevent work in campaigns.

But the Hatch Act is not an excuse to silence dissent. It is not an excuse to prevent the exercise of constitutional liberties. The recent announcement of the prosecution of the leaders of Federal unions is not an act of law enforcement, it is an act of revenge and it has no place in our country.

ON AMERICAN INTERESTS IN IRELAND

(Mr. DIOGUARDI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and to include extraneous material.)

Mr. DIOGUARDI. Mr. Speaker, we have witnessed today a great occurrence in the House with the Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher addressing the joint session today.

I wish to make a statement that I think is very timely and very important today.

Mr. Speaker, today, February 20, 1985, Ash Wednesday, Congress was addressed by the Prime Minister of England, Margaret Thatcher. Mrs. Thatcher was the first successor of Lord North so honored since Winston Churchill was so honored in 1952.

That such an honor be bestowed upon the head of a government in whose name numerous human rights and civil rights violations are perpetrated upon the Irish people, in those six of the divided Irish province of Ulster's nine counties, known as Northern Ireland, has been protested by numerous Irish-Americans, and Irish-American organizations, and private citizens.

Irish America came to Washington today by the thousands from all over this great country in order that they might bring to the attention of this Congress and of the executive branch their moral outrage over the continuing injustice which is the partition of Ireland and the occupation of part of the Irish national territory by a foreign government and army, contrary to the expressed wishes of the overwhelming majority of the Irish people.

They also came to express their belief today that in all the world only the Government of the United States has the power to focus the attention of the British Government upon the necessity to seek a just and lasting peace for all of Ireland through the recognition of the sovereignity of the Irish nation over the entire island of Ireland, her islands and territorial seas.

In consideration of the concerns of Irish America and of my own concern for peace, justice, and stability in the North Atlantic community, I welcome this opportunity to begin a dialog with the Westminister Parliament and so shall offer a proposal that this Congress begin by responding to Mrs. Thatcher's remarks with the serious consideration of American interests in Ireland.

I have drafted my position in this grave matter in a paper entitled "On American Interests in Ireland," which I shall offer in this RECORD.

I am thankful for the opportunity to address the House on this most timely and important matter to all Americans.

ON AMERICAN INTERESTS IN IRELAND

To many Americans, the tragedy that is in "Northern Ireland" today is little more than an internal British squabble, or at most, a bilateral concern between Dublin and London. In any case, most Americans feel that the "Irish Question" is of no practical concern to the United States. Nothing could be farther from the truth.

The United States has a definite interest in the establishment of a just and lasting peace in Ireland and in the corrolary reconciliation of the "British" and Irish peoples. American interests go beyond the fact that we have deep and abiding ties of blood and affection with all parties to the tragic conflict that is in Ireland today. Our interest also lies in the establishment of political, economic and military/naval stability in a part of the world which lies immediately beside the jugular vein of commerce and communication between North America and most of the rest of the North Atlantic community.

The continuing conflict in those six of the divided Irish province of Ulster's nine counties known as "Northern Ireland" costs the United Kingdom in blood, treasure, and reputation. It costs the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) in terms of the absence of Ireland (with her proven military manpower and her strategically-located naval and air bases) and its costs in downgraded British participation in the face of the Soviet threat. Ultimately, though indirectly, it is the American soldier, sailor, airman, Marine and taxpayer who must take up the slack in the maintenance of the defense of the West. (This last point was reenforced by the recent South Atlantic conflict with Argentina).

Since the 1981 Hunger Strikes, interest in the "troubles" in Ireland has increased around the world, especially in the United States; New York City, for example, witnesses months and months of the largest sustained Irish demonstrations and general press and media interest since the early 1920's. It is a matter of public scandal for the entire Western World that Ireland today is witness to political concentration camps. Whether viewed as a question of human rights or of political/military insurgency, and current conflict in the "North" of Ireland is a blot upon the reputation of the United Kingdom and a chink in both the moral and the physical armor of the West.

The American dimension to the centuries-old Anglo-Irish conflict has existed since long before the independence of the United States. There is a significant body of American opinion which believes not only in the moral rectitude of a truly independent Irish Ireland, "not Free merely, but Gaelic as well, not Gaelic merely, but Free as well," but which feels a moral imperative to work through the American political system to seek to hasten the English withdrawal and the reunification of Ireland which are the sine qua non of a just and lasting peace for all of Ireland. It is most significant that the Primate of All Ireland and the previous Taoiseach (Irish Prime Minister) alike have recognized both the legitimacy and the utility of the American dimension.

Sharing the bright dream of the men and women of Easter Week 1916, many Americans have pledged themselves "To aid and advance by all legitimate means the aspirations and endeavors of the Irish people for complete and absolute independence."

Ireland is chronically destabilized by the "British" presence. The on-going conflict in north-east Ireland is not only a growing concern to Irish America, but also a potential threat to the security and stability of the North Atlantic community. Ireland lies astride the sealanes through which Europe and, yes, Great Britain must be reinforced and resupplied in the event of a crisis. We have no less an authority for this strategic judgement than the former Chairman of the NATO Military Committee, Admiral of the Fleet Sir Peter Hill-Norton(No soft Options: The Politico-Military Realities of NATO, 1978).

Nothing that has been tried since 1920 has alleviated the sufferings of the Irish people nor the political instability of Ireland. Partition was the principal cause of Irish "official" neutrality during the Second World War, and Partition has the same effect today. Ireland must reachieve national unity with sufficient alacrity to preclude meddling by agents of the other great destablizer. The reunited Irish people, themselves, are the most secure custodians of their own liberties.

I agree that a change in British policy must be encouraged and I further contend that the ultimate reunification of Ireland is an important element of a just and lasting peace for all Ireland; in the words of Padraic Pearse: "Ireland unfree shall never be at peace."

The United States is currently on friendly terms with all of the principals of this unhappy conflict, most especially with the United Kingdom. A true friend does not encourage error, but rather appeals to the other's better nature.

I shall encourage the Reagan Administration to pursue on behalf of the United States, policies which will persuade the British government that the orderly, phased reunification of a truly independent sovereign Ireland is not only historically and morally just, but is also a matter of enlightened self-interest for the United Kingdom and beneficial to the entire North Atlantic community.

Looking not only to the principle of Liberty, but also to the pragmatic, peaceful means of United States assistance in the achievement of Irish re-unification, I shall join my efforts with those of my friend, Chairman Mario Biaggi, and the Ad Hoc Congressional Committee for Irish Affairs as with any other sincere friends of Ireland in a variety of measures including the amendment of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 to authorize economic relief and rehabilitation assistance for Ireland. I shall also continue to consult with County Executive Andrew P. O'Rourke, with Senator John E. Flynn, and with my constitutents concerning issues of interest of Irish America.

With the Bicentennial of the American War for Independence still green in our memory, let us not forget that the American debt to the Irish is not less than the debt we redeemed in France in 1917/18 and again in 1944.

REPORTS ON THE 24TH MEETING WITH THE EUROPEAN PARLIAMENT DELEGATION AND FACTFINDING MISSION TO PORTUGAL, ISRAEL, THE SOVIET UNION, AND AUSTRIA

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, the 24th meeting between Members of Congress and of the European Parliament was held in Brussels, Belgium, on January 7 through 9 of this year—at an important time in the history of United States-European Community relations.

The U.S. delegation to the conference was cochaired by the gentleman from California [Mr. LANTOS] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. GILMAN], the ranking majority and minority members respectively of the Subcommittee on Europe and the Middle East. Other members of the U.S. delegation were: J.J. PICKLE, of Texas; GUS YATRON, of Pennsylvania; LES AUCOIN, of Oregon; HARRY REID, of Nevada; E. THOMAS COLEMAN, of Missouri; ROBERT E. BADHAM, of California; WILLIAM M. CLINGER, of Pennsylvania; DOUG BEREUTER, of Nebraska; MARK D. SILJANDER, of Michigan; and ALFRED M. MCCANDLESS, of California.

In addition to the conference in Brussels, members of the delegation visited Portugal, Israel, the Soviet Union, and Austria and met with key government leaders and officials at each stop. The focus of these meetings were: First, Portuguese accession into the European Economic Community; second, U.S. bilateral relations and the internal political situation with all countries visited; third, arms control issues; and fourth, human rights.

Mr. Speaker, I include in the RECORD at this time a detailed report I have received from the cochairmen of the U.S. delegation on the factfinding mission. This is followed by a separate report covering the agenda of the Brussels conference, including the U.S. presentations on these topics, and opinions and observations expressed by both delegations.

The Congress will face many of these issues this session, and I believe that the business in which this bipartisan delegation engaged is of serious importance and directly related to the participants' legislative responsibilities.

I strongly commend this material to the attention of my colleagues.

The reports follow:

COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, DC, February 8, 1985.

Hon. DANTE B. FASCELL,
Chairman, Committee on Foreign Affairs, House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: We respectfully submit our report on the 24th meeting between a delegation from the United States Congress and a delegation of the European Parliament held in Brussels, Belgium on January 7-9, 1985. Congressman Tom Lantos (D-Calif) chaired the U.S. Delegation; Congressman Benjamin A. Gilman (R-NY) served as co-chairman. Other members of the delegation included J.J. Pickle (D-Tex), Gus Yatron (D-Pa), Les AuCoin (D-Ore), Harry Reid (D-Nev), E. Thomas Coleman (R-Mo), Robert E. Badham (R-Calif), William M. Clinger (R-Pa), Doug Bereuter (R-Neb), Mark D. Siljander (R-Mich), and Alfred McCandless (R-Calif). The European delegation was chaired by Mr. Pieter Dankert of the Netherlands, a former President of the European Parliament. Messrs. Vincenzo Giummarra of Italy and Rene-Emil Piquet of France served as the co-chairman.

This parliamentary exchange occurred at an important time in the European Community and in the history of European-American relations. The new European Commission, headed by Jacques Delors of France, had entered office on January 7th. Europeans and Americans alike looked forward to what new measures the Commission would implement to resolve many of the issues confronting the United States and the European Community. The new Commission was taking office at a time when economic questions were affecting U.S.-European relations more than at any time in the past twenty-five years. For the U.S. delegation, this meeting presented an opportunity to discuss these matters for the first time with members of the new European Parliament elected in June 1984.

The agenda of the two-day meeting focussed on trade, economic and political questions affecting our relationship. Although some members of the European delegation suggested that U.S.-EC relations were generally good, it soon became apparent that significant differences existed on several fronts, foremost of which was trade and agriculture.

ECONOMIC AND TRADE ISSUES

None of the agricultural disputes appear near solution. The European Community's reliance on subsidies through its Common Agriculture Policy (CAP) has enabled it to take markets from the U.S. farmers. The U.S. delegation expressed clearly its belief that the attempt to reform CAP in 1984 had not corrected the conditions which cause European surpluses. Briefly, the difference is that the United States tries to store a sizeable share of its agricultural surplus while the EC exports much of its surplus.

Representatives Tom Coleman and Doug Bereuter led much of the discussion on agricultural trade. Other agricultural issues discussed included the possibility of the EC's removal of duty-free status for imports of corn-gluten and soybeans. The U.S. delegation also stated its concern that the EC might alter the terms set for certain agricultural imports, especially soybeans, in order to adjust its economic system to the forthcoming admission of Spain and Portugal, scheduled for January 1986. The Europeans expressed much interest in the Reagan Administration's future farm policy and future Congressional action. With the Administration still determining its own position it was not possible for the U.S. delegation to make any definite prediction on farm legislation desired by the President. Several of the Europeans were very concerned about recent policy statements on U.S.-EC farm trade by Secretary of Agriculture John Block and stated their concern about a future trade war.

However, not all issues in trade were disputed as much as agriculture. The announcement on January 4, 1985 of an agreement between the U.S. and EC to limit imports of pipe and tube steel from the EC to 5.9 percent of the U.S. market made the issue moot. There was general agreement, too, about the importance of a new round in the General Agreement on Trade and Tariffs (GATT), although the European delegation tied on conditions or observations. Most less-developed countries were not interested in a new GATT round if it discussed services—a topic of much importance to the U.S. and EC; the Europeans insist that the terms of the previous round—the Tokyo Round—should be implemented, which is an argument sometimes used to imply that the U.S. is not currently adhering to the GATT; and, lastly, that the U.S. should work toward an adjustment of exchange rates as part of a GATT settlement. The last condition was also part of a European argument that high budget deficits have affected the value of the dollar by making it high and thereby have caused a $120-$130 billion U.S. trade deficit in 1985—a point with which many in the U.S. delegation agreed.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT AND FOOD AID

A second general topic on the agenda was international development and food aid. Representative Gilman presented both an overview of U.S. and EC policies and an analysis of needed policy. Representative Gilman pointed out that more people had come to realize that the food problem goes beyond the need for more food production, that, in fact, it is interwoven with the need for economic development. He explained, too, the impact of international indebtedness on the food and development programs. The coordination of policy among developed nations was an especially important goal, and to that end Representative Gilman recommended the convening of a summit conference of developed nations to address the problem of world hunger and development.

The European delegates agreed with most of Representative Gilman's observations and added some interesting ideas of their own. Some of the Europeans thought the Community had been slow to organize its own efforts to assist famine-stricken Ethiopia. There was no criticism of U.S. policy toward Ethiopia, but the European delegation did suggest that the U.S. and EC should contribute a certain amount of cereals each year to the World Food Program. Some encouraged consideration of a moratorium on debt payments by the lesser developed countries (LDCs) in order to assist their development. When asked about their reaction to the Caribbean Basin Initiative of the United States, they commended the initiative's intent but decried its inadequate funding.

POLITICAL ISSUES

The remainder of the meeting concentrated on political issues and human rights. In a discussion of East-West relations, Representative Mark Siljander observed that the United States and the EC were stronger than the Soviet Union, which, he argued, was faced with increasingly complex problems at home and abroad. The strength of the West put it in the position to negotiate a comprehensive arms control agreement concerning strategic, intermediate, and offensive space-based weapons, as well as chemical weapons. Furthermore, the West's strength would enable it through exploitation of opportunities to influence Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union toward democracy—an observation with which some Europeans disagreed.

The response of the European delegation was affected greatly by the meeting, occurring simultaneously in Geneva, of Secretary of State George P. Shultz and Soviet Foreign Minister Andrei Gromyko. Like their American colleagues, the Europeans were greatly interested in the formula to emerge from Geneva, and they hoped any future negotiations would include the INF systems. The other major concern was the Strategic Defense Initiative proposed by President Reagan. In this system of sophisticated technology which could destroy incoming missiles, the Europeans saw a possible decoupling of the U.S. nuclear link and security commitment to the European allies. The U.S. delegation assured the Europeans that this was not the purpose of the SDI.

Closely related to the question of nuclear arms control was the issue of the western nations' conventional strength. Several Europeans endorsed the upgrading of NATO's conventional strength. Representative William Clinger argued strongly in favor of the new emphasis on conventional strength in NATO, which he discussed in the context of the debate surrounding the Nunn-Roth amendment that addressed NATO's capability and the possibility of removing up to 90,000 U.S. troops from Western Europe. Representative Clinger urged the Allies to try to meet the 3 per cent guideline on defense spending set in 1978 but emphasized his disagreement with the method used in the Nunn-Roth amendment to obtain Europe's adherence to the latter or agreement to take certain steps in increasing NATO's conventional capabilities. To the European Parliament, these issues have become of such importance that the Parliament, after the 1984 elections, established a subcommittee to deal with such questions.

Representative Gus Yatron opened a discussion on human rights with a presentation on human rights in the Soviet Union. It focused on the abuse of psychiatry, the continued existence of forced labor camps, and the harassment and persecution of Soviet Jews. Representative Yatron suggested that the Helsinki Accords and other documents had been an effective way of confronting the Soviet Union with its record on human rights in international fora. The European delegation shared Representative Yatron's concerns and noted the importance of the forthcoming conference in Ottawa in May 1985 in which the Soviets have agreed to discuss human rights. However, the European delegation noted areas where the West could face some embarrassment because of its human rights record—Central America, South Africa and Turkey. Turkey posed an especially awkward problem because of its status as a NATO ally; yet, in the opinion of some in the European delegation, it had not reached the state of democracy where it could join its allies in proposals to the Soviet Union.

The discussion on Central America examined differences between Democrats and Republicans in the Congress over this issue as well as the perspectives of the EC and its members. Representative Tom Coleman reviewed present U.S. policy toward both El Salvador and Nicaragua. There is, Representative Coleman noted, a consensus in the Congress over assistance to El Salvador and support for the government of President Jose Napoleon Duarte. Republicans, as well as Democrats, desired the continuation of land reform and an end to the violent terrorism of the death squads on the right and left. On Nicaragua, there was far less agreement in the Congress because of the controversy surrounding covert assistance to the Contras. Representative Coleman suggested opponents of covert assistance used a double standard when they criticized human rights violations in El Salvador and overlooked them in Nicaragua. Many Republicans want a symmetry on U.S. policy, meaning an end to covert assistance if the Sandinistas likewise end their support for revolutions elsewhere in Central America and allow genuine elections and pluralistic democracy to develop.

Representative Harry Reid reviewed U.S. policy in Central America from the perspective of many Democrats. Representative Reid explained the reasons for opposition to the covert funding of the Contras in Nicaragua: The eventual public knowledge of the policy, its cost to U.S. credibility with its allies, and the strain on relations between the Executive and Legislative branches. Also, U.S. policy has risked violation of the charters of the United Nations and Organization of American States and the Inter-American Treaty of Reciprocal Assistance. Representative Reid said the covert aid had been ineffective, although he recommended assistance to countries so they could interdict the flow of military equipment from Cuba and the Soviet Union.

The opinions of the European delegation were varied. There was strong support for the Contadora process and the formula discussed at the San Jose Conference in September 1984. The European perspective on El Salvador and President Duarte was very sympathetic, and the Europeans stated their support of the negotiations between the guerrillas and El Salvador's government. On Nicaragua there was less unanimity. Some Europeans argued that the outcome of the elections in Nicaragua had to be judged in the context of that country's history and not in comparison with the record of El Salvador or other Central American nations.

The meeting with the European Parliament delegation ended with a review by Representative Gilman of the problems of drug abuse and narcotics trafficking. Time constraints did not permit discussion of Representative Gilman's paper, and it was agreed the two delegations would look at this issue more closely in their next meeting in the summer of 1985. There was agreement as well to discuss Western security issues and NATO more extensively in the next meeting.

As part of the program with the European Parliament, the two delegations joined in a dinner hosted by the President of the European Parliament, Pierre Pflimlin. A prominent French statesman who participated in the creation of the European Community, President Pflimlin spoke on the importance of harmonious U.S.-European relations. The U.S. delegation also had a chance to meet with one of the new EC Commissioners. Willy De Clercq, and with the President-in-Office of the Council of the European Community, Mario, Fioret. Both meetings touched briefly on trade issues which had been discussed in more depth in the working sessions.

The new Congress will face major legislative decisions which will affect U.S. relations with Europe. These will come in matters of security, trade and general economic relations. We believe this exchange with the European Parliament has given the United States delegation a very clear indication of European opinion on many of these issues. This knowledge will prove very helpful as the Congress attempts to solve many of the problems before it.

Sincerely

COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, DC, February 8, 1985.

Hon. DANTE B. FASCELL,
Chairman, Committee on Foreign Affairs, House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: We are writing to you to report on a fact-finding mission to Portugal, Belgium, Israel, Denmark, the Soviet Union and Austria from January 4 through January 19, 1985. This trip included a meeting in Brussels, Belgium between our Congressional delegation and a delegation from the European Parliament. We are submitting a separate letter to you on this meeting, which was held on January 7-9. The delegation was co-chaired by Congressmen Tom Lantos (D-Calif) and Benjamin A. Gilman (R-NY). Other members of the delegation included J.J. Pickle (D-Tex), Gus Yatron (D-Pa), Les AuCoin (D-Ore), Harry Reid (D-Nev), E. Thomas Coleman (R-Mo), Robert E. Badham (R-Calif), William M. Clinger (R-Pa), Mark D. Siljander (D-Mich), and Alfred McCandless (R-Calif). In each country, it was the delegation's purpose to obtain an understanding not only of the nation's relationship with the United States but also an appreciation of the internal political and economic issues affecting its policies.

PORTUGAL

The delegation's visit to Portugal was part of the preparation for its meeting with the European Parliament. Portugal, along with Spain, which the delegation visited last year, is negotiating its admission into the European Community. For the United States, there are important implications from Portugal's membership in the EC. Not only will its economy be affected, but Portugal's young democracy will receive a strong endorsement from the ten members of the Community. Portugal will also have to make decisions affecting trade with the United States, and particularly trade in agricultural imports.

After receiving a briefing from U.S. Ambassador W. Allen Holmes, the delegation had meetings with Foreign Minister Jaime Gama, Minister of Agriculture Alvaro Barreto and Minister of Finance Ernani Lopes. The delegation also met with Prime Minister Mario Soares and Deputy Prime Minister Carlos da Mota Pinto. The Portuguese emphasized the importance of their membership in the European Community in our meetings. Portugal hopes negotiations for admission will be completed by March 1985, thereby enabling admission in January 1986. In explaining Portugal's objectives, the Minister of Agriculture told the delegation that EC membership would promote more stability within Portugal and thereby assist the political stability and security of southwestern Europe. Portugal's stability would be the consequence of a strengthening of democratic forces in the country and of an improvement of its economic structure. Negotiations for admission had resolved many of the issues, but several remained, including fishing, which was close to agreement, and the status of Portuguese tomato paste, wines, cereals, olive oil, and sugar. In the opinion of Portuguese officials, delay of its membership was the result of confusion within the European Community and difficulties in the negotiation of Spain's admission, which with a larger agricultural economy is a greater threat to the Mediterranean members of the EC. The U.S. delegation listened with great interest, since 36 per cent of Portugal's agricultural imports (1982) come from the United States. The Portuguese cautioned that there would be a decrease in imports of grains and soybeans, but the full impact of this would not be evident until Portugal had become fully integrated into the EC ten years later.

Foreign Minister Gama raised several other issues in his meeting with the delegation. In response to questions, he stressed the importance of U.S. assistance to Portugal and emphasized the role of Economic Support Funding in encouraging more private investment in scientific, technical and business concerns. The Foreign Minister said that U.S. military assistance could aid Portugal's military in acquiring new technology, fighter interceptors, maritime patrol aircraft, and increasing mechanization of the army with more tanks. Negotiations with West Germany were progressing well on the construction of a new frigate. Turning to a question about the strength of the Communist Party in Portugal, Mr. Gama pointed out that Communist parties tend to be weakest in the developed countries in Europe—an observation that stressed the importance of Portugal's economic growth. On other issues, the Foreign Minister emphasized the importance of close collaboration with the United States in southern Africa, and explained that the lack of an embassy in Israel, which Portugal has recognized, was the consequence of financial pressures and concern about diplomatic retaliation from the Arab states. The U.S. delegation urged the Foreign Minister to send an ambassador to Israel.

BELGIUM

The primary purpose of the delegation's visit to Brussels was its exchange meeting with the European Parliament. However, the delegation did have meetings with the U.S. Ambassador to the European Community, George Vest, and with the U.S. Ambassador to NATO, David Abshire. The delegation also had a meeting scheduled with Belgian Foreign Minister Leo Tindemans, but weather delayed Mr. Tindemans and Deputy Foreign Minister Paul De Keersmaeker took his place.

The two U.S. Ambassadors presented a varied portrait of U.S. relations with West Europe. Ambassadors Vest noted the long-term continuation of trade and economic problems between the United States and the Community, which were discussed in greater length in the delegation's meeting with the European Parliament. One significant improvement in trade relations had been the resolution in early January of the dispute between the U.S. and EC over imports of tube and pipe steel from Community members. A difficult time was ahead in U.S.-EC relations, but the overall U.S.-EC relationship was good, in Ambassador Vest's opinion. Ambassador Vest also commented that the institutions of the EC were beginning to take stronger interest in security issues, which means more attention to NATO affairs and the strength of the European voice within NATO.

Ambassador Abshire's remarks noted the unprecedented interdependence of economic and security issues in NATO but emphasized the positive steps NATO's members were taking to address the Alliance's needs. The Ambassador praised the leadership of NATO's new Secretary General, Lord Carrington, and observed that the Alliance's framework and institutions were generally healthy. He said the Alliance had been especially successful in establishing a consultative framework for INF deployment which would be a model for consultations regarding the forthcoming Geneva arms control negotiations. Noteworthy measures had been adopted in NATO's new six-year infrastructure agreement to improve minimal operation and air facilities—actions which Ambassador Abshire thought directly addressed criticisms of NATO's capabilities made in the Nunn-Roth amendment. In response to widespread concerns about NATO's conventional weakness and the consequent possible need of an early use of nuclear weapons, he said NATO was beginning to implement steps to upgrade conventional weapons and enlarge ammunition stocks. This improvement of conventional capabilities would be a leading priority for NATO during the coming years.

The meeting with the Belgian Foreign Ministry concentrated on the major issue in U.S.-Belgian relations, namely the beginning of the scheduled deployment of ground launched cruise missiles in Belgium in March 1985. Because the government of Prime Minister Wilfried Martens appeared to be wavering in its commitment to follow the schedule, the delegation asked about Belgium's intentions. Deputy Foreign Minister De Keersmaeker explained that a decision to deploy could have political repercussions in the country and bring about the defeat of the present coalition, which supports deployment, in elections scheduled later in 1985. De Keersmaeker warned that a government controlled by the opposition could halt deployment. Based on these remarks, it appeared likely that Prime Minister Martens would advise President Reagan later in January that actual deployment should be delayed until after the national election, thereby hopefully preventing the election of a government opposing deployment.

Other major bilateral issues discussed with the Deputy Foreign Minister included East-West technology transfer and Belgium's consideration of a nuclear cooperation agreement with Libya. To the former, Mr. De Keersmaeker stated a concern that the United States was seeking stricter controls on some forms of technology transfer to Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union than Belgium preferred. As to the second issue, he noted Belgium's appreciation of U.S. concerns about nuclear cooperation with Libya but sought to assure the U.S. delegation that Belgium would follow a prudent course on this matter.

ISRAEL

The delegation's visit to Israel sought not only to gain an understanding of Israel's economic needs and its internal situation but also to acquire a sense of Israel's perception of major parties and issues in the Middle East. The delegation began its review of the Israeli situation with a briefing by U.S. Ambassador Samuel W. Lewis and the Consul General in Jerusalem, Wat T. Cluverius. Their presentations focussed on three issues affecting Israel—Lebanon, the national economy, and the status of the Middle East Peace Process. Ambassador Lewis commented that U.S.-Israeli relations had improved since the Israeli-Lebanese-U.S. agreement on Lebanon of May 17, 1983, but the Israel, itself, had become increasingly disillusioned with its involvement in Lebanon. Without Syrian withdrawal of its forces in Lebanon, Israel was prepared to begin a unilateral withdrawal of its forces, which is, in fact, what the Israeli government announced only a few days after the delegation's visit to Jerusalem and Tel Aviv. The economy was Israel's second problem, and here, the Ambassador noted some progress by Israel but added that additional measures needed to be taken if Israel were to receive higher levels of U.S. assistance. Three steps were especially important—improved management of the monetary system, a reduction of employment in the public sector, and the shift of more money and employment to the private sector. Turning to the third issue, the Middle East Peace Process, Ambassador Lewis and Consul General Cluverius cited examples of some progress—the reopening of channels between Egypt and Jordan, the recommencement of negotiations between Israel and Egypt over the status of Taba, and the more moderate policies of the new Israeli government on the West Bank.

The delegation then had meetings with the leadership of the Israeli government in both Tel Aviv and Jerusalem. The first meeting was with Vice Premier and Foreign Minister Yitzhak Shamir, who, in answering questions, gave a tour de horizon of Israel's foreign policy concerns. Mr. Shamir expressed his gratitude for the reference to the issue of Soviet Jews made by Secretary of State Shultz in his meeting with Soviet Foreign Minister Gromyko in Geneva. Looking at Israel's neighbors, Jordan and Egypt, the Foreign Minister stressed the importance of finding agreement with Jordan but stated strong concern about the relationship of King Hussein with Yasir Arafat. Mr. Shamir said he could better assess Egyptian policy after the conclusion of the first round of talks on Taba, but he added his concern about Egypt's failure to normalize fully its relationship with Israel. When asked about the U.S.-Israel Free Trade Zone, the Foreign Minister remarked negotiations were nearly completed, the major remaining difficulty being textile imports into the U.S. from Israel. In response to questions about Israel's rescue program for Ethiopian Jews, Mr. Shamir explained Israel had acted to save them from a regime which was both pro-Soviet and anti-Jewish. The cost of the operation was undetermined, but it could run into the hundreds of millions of dollars.

The focus of the meeting with Prime Minister Shimon Peres was Israel's role in Lebanon and the Middle East Peace Process. Prime Minister Peres stated his government's intention to begin a unilateral withdrawal of its forces from Lebanon and to take steps which would assure protection of Israel's northern region. These would be the maintenance of the Southern Lebanon Army, maintenance of the right to overfly Lebanon and patrol along its coasts, the deployment of UNIFIL north of the area controlled by the Southern Lebanon Army, and an assurance that Syria would not move its forces beyond their present positions. On Jordan and the West Bank, the Prime Minister said Israel would attempt to persuade Jordan to participate in negotiations and that his government wanted to promote economic development for the Arab population on the West Bank and to encourage more local leadership.

Israel's security and defense needs were subjects examined in depth in two meetings. The Deputy Director General of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Hanon Bar-on, observed that the Soviet Union was striving to exacerbate regional differences in the Middle East and thereby to undermine the Peace Process. Although the Soviets had suffered setbacks in Egypt in 1972 and in the Camp David Accords, they had gained footholds in South Yemen, Ethiopia, and, most visibly, in Syria. With an army of 500,000 troops and 4,000 tanks, Syria's military strength surpassed that of any of America's allies.

Soviet assistance to Syria, particularly the provision of MIG-23s and advanced air-to-air missiles, was one of several points emphasized by Defense Minister Yitzhak Rabin, who reviewed Israel's security posture and weapons needs. Mr. Rabin's assessment of Israel's present position was that it was generally secure but that Israel faced threats from Arab countries which had not signed peace treaties with Israel and from terrorism. Lebanon, he stated, could again become a base for terrorist attacks into Israel unless the Southern Army controlled the region in the south and an expanded UNIFIL force was deployed in other areas previously controlled by Israeli forces. Moving to Israel's military needs, Defense Minister Rabin stated that U.S. assistance was especially important for the supply of tanks, artillery, and aircraft. In the last category, he reiterated the importance of the next delivery of 75 F-16s which is to commence in 1986. When asked about the Israeli fighter aircraft, the Lavi, Mr. Rabin said production would begin in the 1990s. Approximately one-half of the Lavi's parts will be American manufactured, and Israel could not export the Lavi without U.S. permission since some of the technology used in the plane was subject to export controls.

The meeting with Finance Minister Yitzak Moda'i concentrated totally on the state of Israel's troubled economy. Moda'i briefly explained the origins of the problems, pointing out as some of the reasons Israel's sixfold population increase since 1948, the lack of natural resources, the building of a national infrastructure "from scratch", and the cost of five major wars. At present, Israel faced significant budget deficits because of government overspending and high inflation, which decreased the value of revenue collected through taxes. Moda'i remarked that there was no other alternative to solve the problem than a quick, deep budget cut, but that, in addition, there would have to be structural changes in the economy and an accommodation of the needs of employees and unions. Because of Israel's serious shortage of foreign currency reserves, estimated to be no more than a two month supply, the Finance Minister stated that Israel had discussed with the United States the possibility of extending to Israel a safety net of foreign currency. Despite Israel's present economic problems, Moda'i remained confident about its future and predicted that it would begin recovery after a difficult period of 1-2 years.

Two other meetings with former Israeli ambassadors to the United States provided broad overviews of issues affecting Israel and the United States. In a luncheon hosted by Minister Without Portfolio Moshe Arens, the former ambassador commented extensively on the potential danger to Israel from Lebanon after the withdrawal of Israeli forces and the drain on the Israeli economy created by Israel's defense burden and the cost of its military presence in Lebanon. Simha Dinitz, now a member of the Knesset, pointed to the ongoing threat Israel faces from Syria. A militarily strong Israel is an asset to the United States and a requirement for Arab willingness to negotiate, since no Arab leader will negotiate with Israel if he believes he can destroy it. Ambassador Dinitz also explained that the present National Unity Government in Israel was a result of extraordinary problems posed by Lebanon and the economy. He cautioned the delegation that the government would survive strains presented by these two issues but that it could split over any other issue if either major party saw such division to its advantage.

DENMARK

The delegation's visit to Denmark was overnight, intended primarily to receive a Soviet aircrew in order to enter into the Soviet Union. However, the delegation had requested a briefing on Denmark by U.S. Ambassador Terence A. Todman and pertinent Embassy staff. Ambassador Todman outlined Denmark's role in NATO and the difficulty its present government has had in meeting some of its NATO obligations. Denmark's government, a four-party coalition, controls only 78 seats in a 175 seat Parliament. Consequently, the government has had to accept some defeats on NATO issues, most notably the Parliament's vote to withhold infrastructure funding for INF deployment. However, the government has not had to resign because of these defeats, and on a motion of no confidence would likely win because of the support its economic policies enjoy. Like most of its European neighbors, Denmark's economy has undergone hard times, and the government has responded by lowering spending in order to reduce the deficit. Defense is the only area in the budget where cuts have not been implemented, although there is a freeze on defense spending, but Denmark has tried to fill its NATO role in the Baltic.

THE SOVIET UNION

In Moscow, the delegation was briefed by U.S. Ambassador Arthur H. Hartman on the internal political and economic situation in the Soviet Union and on the current state of U.S.-Soviet relations. Its first meeting with Soviet officials was with representatives of the Institute of the USA and Canada of the USSR Academy of Sciences, including Director G.A. Arbatov.

Mr. Arbatov argued that U.S.-Soviet relations were still poor, and that while the agreement to begin new arms control discussions in Geneva was an encouraging step, nothing concrete had materialized. Arbatov also stated that past negotiations with the Reagan Administration had only been a cover for a U.S. arms buildup and a quest for military superiority.

Unless this attitude changed and a realization of the impossibility of nuclear war developed on the American side, Mr. Arbatov argued that the Geneva talks would fail to accomplish their purpose. Members of the U.S. delegation rejected the idea that U.S. policy supports the idea of a winnable nuclear war and stressed that Soviet human rights policy has made it difficult to foster the proper political atmosphere necessary for progress in arms control efforts.

The delegation also met with Deputy Minister of Foreign Trade A.N. Manzhulo. Mr. Manzhulo stressed the Soviet policy of just and equitable trade based on equality and freedom from preconditions and efforts to obtain political leverage on the issue of human rights. Manzhulo also argued that past efforts to link trade to human rights issues had failed and that in 1984 U.S.-Soviet trade had reached a near-record level of $3.5 billion.

However, Manzhulo pointed out that legal instruments like the Long-term Grain Agreement and Most Favored Nations (MFN) status were needed to regularize trade and make it more predictable and reliable. He also criticized U.S. efforts to prevent Western Europe and Japanese companies from selling equipment and technology to the Soviet Union as an example of discriminatory trade policy that disrupted East-West trade. The delegation pointed out that human rights concerns were an inevitable and integral part of U.S. trade policy toward the Soviet Union and that both sides typically employ linkage in various aspects of U.S.-Soviet relations to advance their objectives.

The U.S. delegation held a highly productive session with Dr. O.N. Bykov, Deputy Director of the Institute of World Economics and International Relations, and several staff members of the Institute. Bykov stressed that the Soviet position at the upcoming Geneva talks would include insistence on agreement in all three subgroups (strategic, intermediate, and space weapons) before agreement in any one of them could go forward. This insistence stemmed from the reality of the interaction of weapons in all three subgroups. Bykov also argued that the issue of the President's Strategic Defense Initiative (SDI) would be raised by the Soviet delegation because it undermines strategic stability by complicating the relationship between strategic offensive and defensive systems and forces both sides to compensate for the other's offensive and defensive deployment if the SDI is deployed and the ABM Treaty is scuttled.

The final meeting in Moscow took place with August Voss, Chairman of the Council of Nationalities of the Supreme Soviet of the U.S.S.R. Human rights concerns were repeatedly raised by the delegation, particularly with respect to harassment, detention, and arrest of Soviet jews seeking to emigrate. Mr. Voss argued that criticism of the Soviet Union on the issue was "far-fetched and based on false information." He denied that there was no right to emigrate, that some 260,000 Jews have emigrated since World War II and that this accounted for the recent decline of emigration approvals from over 50,000 in 1979 to under 900 in 1984.

According to Mr. Voss, the relatively few denials for emigration were due to work in military related industries, access of applicants to classified information or because of an applicant's imprisonment for crimes under Soviet law. The delegation pressed Mr. Voss on these issues and presented a series of individual cases for his consideration and response.

Accompanying Mr. Voss was Yuri Zhukov, a political observer for the Soviet Communist Party newspaper, Pravda. Mr. Zhukov objected to the delegation's criticism of the Soviet Union's human rights policy and its policy regarding the practice of religion. He pointed out that a recent visit to the Soviet Union by some 270 American religious officials was highly successful. That group visited Jews, Chrisitans and Moslems in the Soviet Union and according to Mr. Zhukov returned to the United States stating there was no religious discrimination in the Soviet Union. Additionally, when pressed by the delegation about Soviet press reports that blamed the United States for the assassination of India's Prime Minister Indira Ghandi and for fomenting terrorism in Italy, Zhukov denied the Soviet press contained such articles. The delegation, through the U.S. Embassy staff, has presented copies of these articles to Zhukov for his further comment because the Members believed that the political atmosphere for constructive U.S.-Soviet relations is crippled by such irresponsible reporting.

In addition to raising human rights concerns with Soviet officials, the delegation also conducted a series of meetings with Soviet Jewish refuseniks, Soviet Christians, and divided family members. These meetings revealed a pattern of harassment that begins with the application to emigrate. Loss of job and subsequent charges of "parasitism", planting by authorities of drugs and small arms in refusenik apartments for purposes of arrest for "anti-Soviet slander", persecution of other family members including children of those seeking emigration, the formation of an official Anti-Zionist Committee to increase anti-Semitism, and pressure on Soviet Jews to conform to the system all indicate an increase by the Soviets of human rights violations that are associated with the recent downturn in U.S.-Soviet relations. These developments make it essential that the future conduct of U.S. relations seek to correct worsening human rights conditions in the Soviet Union to avoid a "detente without a human face."

AUSTRIA

The delegation's last series of meetings was in Vienna, Austria, where there were conferences with U.S. representatives to some of the arms control and international organizations in the city as well as with officials of the Austrian government. The delegation's first meeting was with our U.S. Ambassador to the Mutual Balanced Force and Reduction Talks, Maynard W. Glitman, who was shortly thereafter named to the American negotiating team at Geneva. Ambassador Glitman briefly reviewed the eleven year history of the MBFR talks and then explained the major areas of disagreement between the NATO and Warsaw Pact delegations. The major problems were the following: A geographical asymmetry which would allow the Soviets to pull back into designated number of forces into the western part of the Soviet Union but require the United States to remove its share of the reduced forces to the United States; a dispute over the number of military forces the Warsaw Pact claims it has in the region affected by the negotiations; significant problems in verification of the strength of ground forces; disagreements over the inclusion or exclusion of conventional arms in the negotiations; and the status of the West German army, which would have to disband a sizable number of its troops and place them into reserve units. Ambassador Glitman saw no agreement forthcoming on any of these issues.

The country team briefing was led by U.S. Ambassador Helene Von Damm, and it provided a review of the few issues which actually affect the very friendly relationship between the United States and Austria. A neutral and politically stable country, which has an economy that is outperforming many of its European counterparts, Austria faces no major internal changes except for the possible development of a "Green" movement comparable in its environmental interests to that in West Germany. Three bilateral issues received special attention in the briefing. Austrian policy on East-West technology transfer has caused concern in the United States, and U.S. officials have repeatedly urged Austria to take measures to reduce the diversion or export of sophisticated, militarily-related technology to Warsaw Pact countries. In December 1984 Austria's Parliament passed legislation tightening Austrian export controls, but their effectiveness must await a future test. A second issue is Austria's consideration of the Northrop F-5E as an interceptor for its air force. Austria is examining this aircraft along with aircraft manufactured in Britain, France, and Sweden, and it will likely make its decision by May 1985. The last issue concerned works of art which were seized by the Nazis after the end of the Second World War and which ended up in Austria's possession. Austria has returned some of these items to their original owners, but many remain in Austrian government hands. It is hoped that Austria will try to return as many as possible to the original owners and contribute either through donation or by their direct sale the value of the remaining art works to Jewish and Christian chairty groups which work with surviving victims of Nazi repression.

After the country team briefing, the delegation met with the Minister of Public Economy and Transport Ferdinand Lacina. Mr. Lacina wished to discuss the impact of U.S. trade policy on Austria with the delegation. As an export-dependent country, Austria was greatly worried about the effect of U.S. anti-dumping restrictions on Austrian steel. Mr. Lacina stated that company record showed that Austria was not dumping steel into the U.S. marketplace. He also wished to assure the delegation that Austria did not wish to act as a loophole for the diversion of advanced technology to the Soviet Union and the Warsaw Pact, and that Austria had changed its laws in order to stop illegal transfers of technology. The U.S. delegation's primary concern was Austria's forthcoming decision on the F-5E. Lacina explained that Austria's decision would be influenced by its desire to purchase an aircraft at a reasonable price and by a public desire to avoid the establishment of a large military. He did add that Austria was interested in the offset arrangements to be available if Austria purchased the F-5E.

The meeting with Austrian Foreign Minister Leopold Gratz covered some of the same issues, particularly the status of the F-5E. However, Foreign Minister Gratz also desired to convey an understanding of Austrian foreign policy, which he pointed out sought good relations with its neighbors. At present, relations were good with Hungary, Yugoslavia, and Poland, the only problem being Czechoslovakia with which Austria had poor relations because of violations of its border by Czech border police. Turning to human rights and the status of refugees, Mr. Gratz expressed his hope that an improvement in U.S.-Soviet relations might allow for an increased emigration of Soviet Jews. He said Austria would continue to keep its borders open to refugees—a commitment which costs Austria about $50 million annually. Asked about the status of art works Austria acquired after the defeat of Nazi Germany, the Foreign Minister stated Austria intended to sell the unclaimed works and distribute the money to Jewish and Christian charities.

The last meeting with Chancellor Fred Sinowatz presented an opportunity to discuss Austria's general political situation. Chancellor Sinowatz referred repeatedly to Austria's neutral status and the nature of its outlook on Europe which had been shaped by the Austrian-Hungarian Empire—a longstanding historical entity whose post World War I components had been arbitrarily separated from one another by the Iron Curtain. Europe had been one, not two, bodies before this division. The Chancellor warned against the belief that the West could bring the Soviet Union down through economic pressure; its people had known immense hardship and could endure more. But as a neutral, Austria also wanted the United States to remain so strong that nothing could alter the international balance.

Austria was symbolically the proper place to end this trip. Its geographic and political position gives it a unique vantage point into both eastern and western Europe. It is the one nation from which the Soviet Union voluntarily withdrew its forces after the end of the Second World War. The important services it has given to human rights and arms control have made it an actor in two of the most important issues on the East-West agenda. Its role as a contact point between eastern and western Europe in business and culture is a reminder of the hope that someday the division of Europe can perhaps be peacefully ended.

Mr. Chairman, we believe this trip provided a valuable opportunity to learn on a first hand basis the issues which affect the relations of the United States with several of its key allies as well as with its leading political adversary. The Congress will face many important foreign policy decisions in the coming year, and we believe the knowledge gained from this two-week mission will help us in contributing to the deliberation of the Congress on these matters.

Sincerely yours,

TOM LANTOS,
Cochairman,
U.S. Congressional Delegation.

LIVING UP TO PAST COMMITMENTS: THE PHILIPPINE SCOUTS AND THE BATTLE FOR BATAAN

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. PANETTA] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to introduce legislation to redress a longstanding inequity in our treatment of a very special group whose vital services to our Nation have passed virtually unacknowledged. My first bill simply authorizes equal pay for equal risk for veterans of the World War II Philippine Scouts who fought so bravely as part of the U.S. Army. Second, I would like to introduce a companion resolution to express our deep gratitude to the people of the Philippines and Filipino-Americans who took up arms on behalf of the United States and Allies during World War II.

Before turning to the legislation at hand, I believe it is important to pause and reflect upon the events of over 40 years ago. Prior to the outbreak of war, when the Philippines were an American territory, a crack unit of Filipinos—known as the Philippine Scouts—was organized under the direction of Gen. Douglas MacArthur. The unit, a fully incorporated part of the U.S. Army and never numbering more than 12,000 soldiers, was to serve a pivotal role in the valiant defense of the Bataan Peninsula. General MacArthur was later to describe the Scouts as "excellent troops, completely professional, loyal, and devoted." They were an elite organization with a high esprit de corps in which membership was considered an honor by Filipinos and the strictest standards were followed in selection.

In recruiting the Scouts, General MacArthur pledged, and I quote:

War is the great equalizer of men. Every member of my command shall receive equal pay and allowances based on the United States Army pay scale, regardless of nationality.

At the onslaught of the war in the Pacific when the enemy attacked Pearl Harbor and invaded the Philippine Islands, these soldiers became key to the success of our entire South Pacific strategy. It was the continued resistance on Bataan that denied the Japanese an essential base for the projected thrust into the South Pacific. The enemy was forced to retain large army and naval forces in the Philippines, which otherwise could have been employed against allied shipping of men and materials to Australia and New Caledonia from the United States and Middle East. Their protracted defense of these islands against incredible odds allowed the United States to recover from the first blows of the war and regroup for what would ultimately prove to be a successful counterattack.

The defenders of Bataan suffered extremely high casualties and many of those who survived the harsh conditions of battle did so only to be held as prisoners of war by the Japanese. On a tragic note, it is estimated that one out of every two members of the Philippine Scouts captured by the enemy following the collapse of the Allied effort at Bataan did not survive captivity. Other members fortunate enough to escape were organized in guerrilla units to carry on resistance efforts and to support the return of General MacArthur and his liberating forces.

Despite the valiant services of the Philippine Scouts who fought and sacrificed side by side with American soldiers, and despite the fact that the Scouts were a fully incorporated unit of the U.S. Army, the Philippine Scouts received only a fraction of the regular pay received by their American counterparts. In fact, while an American private was earning $30 a month during the war, a Philippine Scout with comparable rank and length of service received only $9 for his exposure to the same hardships and dangers.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that the time has come for Congress to redress this longstanding inequity in our Nation's treatment of this very special group of World War II veterans. The legislation I am introducing today to correct this injustice is direct and simple. It authorizes the Department of the Army to make a lump-sum payment to former Scouts or their survivors equal to the difference between the pay received by American soldiers of corresponding grades and lengths of service and the total amount actually received by the individual Scouts. In addition, this measure would direct the Secretary of the Army to redetermine the rates of retirement pay presently received by a small number of former Scouts to reflect adjustments in their basic pay. The latter provision is minor when measured in terms of dollars as there are now less than 300 former Scouts receiving regular or disability pay from the Department of the Army. In fact, as of 1979, the estimated cost of implementing the entire bill was set at a little over $9 million. I think that you would agree that it is a small price to pay for a commitment ignored for over 40 years.

While the budgetary impact of these pay equalization measures is small, their symbolic value is immense. Congressional authorization of equal pay for the Philippine Scouts would provide a meaningful demonstration of our gratitude for their faithful and gallant service during World War II. I again urge my colleagues to support this worthwhile measure.

Finally, as a complement to the pay equalization legislation, I am introducing a commemorative resolution to pay tribute to the people of the Philippines and Filipino-Americans who fought on behalf of the allied war effort in the South Pacific. My resolution would designate the week of April 1, 1985, as "National Philippine Veteran Week," marking the 43d anniversary of the historic battles of Bataan and Corregidor. It is only fitting that we take this occasion to express our gratitude for the loyal and courageous service of the Filipino people in the common struggle for freedom.

In addition to the fighting forces of the Philippine Scouts, the U.S. Armed Forces operating in the Pacific theater during World War II were aided by units of the Philippine Commonwealth Army and Naval Insular Force as well as the guerrilla units organized during the occupation of the islands. Additionally, two units of Filipino-Americans—the 1st and 2d Filipino Regiments—were trained and assembled in the United States for service in the South Pacific.

Enactment of this resolution would provide a meaningful demonstration of our gratitude for the faithful and gallant service of Philippine soldiers and guerrillas in assisting the allied war effort during World War II. I urge my colleagues to join with me in honoring these special veterans, as they so justly deserve.●

JUDGE KELLY'S DECISION IN JOHNSON VERSUS UNITED STATES

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRICE] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, a frenzy of litigiousness is sweeping the country. It seems that almost every loss, hurt, or damage is being attributed to the fault or responsibility of someone else. Lawyers are widely blamed for stirring up this kind of business, in which litigation plays a large role. One wit has said that justice is what lawyers study to circumvent. But the courts and legislatures, too, must assume considerable responsibility for the chorea-like affliction of legal claimmaking that is now epidemic.

Today, the Federal Government is the defendant in an extraordinary number of tort cases—probably over 40,000. Asserted claims exceed $100 billion. These totals are climbing. It is important to bear in mind that the Government's defendant posture in these cases can lead to enormous outlays of taxpayer dollars, not considered at all in our well-publicized intention to cut the Federal deficit. We in Congress have not done enough to face this enormous problem.

Our courts often encourage inclinations to sue by loosening previously established criteria for liability, by making new law, or simply under the guise of dispensing fairness. But there are still some fine judges in the land.

With a good deal of pleasure—somewhat detectable from my letter to Judge Patrick Kelly of the U.S. District Court for the District of Kansas, which I include at the end of my statement—I recommend to my colleagues in the Congress, and to everyone else interested in topics such as those mentioned after this sentence, that they read the decision in the case of Johnson versus U.S.—handed down by Judge Patrick Kelly in November 1984. You will see how a judge can effectively cope with complicated scientific and medical issues, particularly in a case involving 53 witnesses, 42 days of testimony, thousands of exhibits, and more than 5,000 pages of trial testimony; how a judge distinguished between sound and less validly held scientific opinions respectively offered under oath by different scientists of some renown; whether the opinions of scientists who were "heroes" in the Silkwood and other cases deserve special regard in other trials or, on the other hand, whether their scientific views and conclusions can be validly rejected; how a judge explains in clear, layman's language the types of ionizing radiation, radium 226, and its natural decay products; the health and safety impact of radium 226 with a half-life of 1,602 years, in an environment where radon gas is removed about as fast as it is generated; radium and radioactivity in our natural environment; radiation doses and applicability of safety standards; the history and development of radiation standards; how the scientific method works; statistical risk calculations; and that the label "hazardous" cannot be broadly tied to anything that is radioactive without an understanding of the doses involved.

Read Judge Kelly's decision in Johnson versus U.S. Whatever your background, you will learn something of interest.

This is the letter I recently wrote to Jude Kelly:

U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES,
Washington, DC, January 31, 1985.

Hon. PATRICK KELLY,
U.S. District Court for the District of Kansas, U.S. Courthouse, Room 232, 401 North Market Street, Wichita, KS

DEAR JUDGE KELLY: Your decision in the consolidated lawsuits identified as Johnson v. United States is lucidly written, excellently reasoned, and solidly based. I must quickly add that I am not a lawyer. My opinion is influenced by my own background and experience—principally my association with nuclear matters for four decades during my service on the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy and on the House Armed Services Committee.

I can appreciate the great extent of your patience and diligence, and the learning experience you rapidly acquired in health and safety aspects of nuclear radiation in the course of the trial. The testimony of 53 witnesses and the review of more than 5,000 pages of transcript amounted to a considerably body of information from which to distill essential validity.

I have had similar experience, but over a long period of time, not in a single episode. In legislative capacities, I too have had to listen to hypotheses and findings of nuclear scientists and related health and safety specialists, to distinguish between suppositions—however enthusiastically embraced—and objective findings, to pay close attention to diverse scientific views held by different professionals in nuclear fields and, most importantly, to ascertain and comprehend the views of the most preeminent scientists in particular disciplines.

Dr. Lauriston Taylor, Dr. Robley Evans, Dr. Robert Rowland—what can I say about such exceptionally knowledgeable and able persons except that they are great national assets. The Joint Committee on Atomic Energy invariably sought their advice, among other scientists held in high esteem by their peers.

You were outspoken in your judicial evaluation of the testimony of Dr. Morgan and Dr. Gofman. In the past, on the Joint Committee, I too had occasion to listen to their testimony on radiation effects. Suffice it to say that I and the rest of the committee were largely persuaded to accept the scientific principles and standards recommended by the National Council on Radiation Protection and Measurements, the International Commission on Radiological Protection, and the National Academy of Sciences—National Research Council, and related thoughts expressed by preeminent scientists such as Drs. Taylor, Evans, and Rowland. As you did, we rejected the idea that—using the words in your decision—"all of the most eminent radiation scientists in this country and the entire world are as incompetent as Dr. Gofman claims, and that only Dr. Gofman has been able to define the true risks for radiation." From his testimony before the JCAE and his writing (including "Population Control Through Genetic Pollution," which he coauthored and was published in 1970 by Nelson-Hall Company), I can appreciate your judgment that—again, using words from your decision—there "is a bias in him which destroys his credibility as an objective witness in radiation cases."

Your decision was particularly interesting to me. I hope it is widely read because it deserves to be, in the national interest.

Sincerely,

MELVIN PRICE,
Chairman Emeritus.●

A TRIBUTE TO EDWIN D. ESHLEMAN

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, it is my sad duty to officially inform the House today that in January of this year, last month, Edwin D. Eshleman of Pennsylvania died in Lancaster, PA.

Ed served in this body from 1967 through 1976. He was a distinguished legislator, an educator, who will be sorely missed by his friends, by the district that he served, and by this country.

I am today taking this special order in honor of Ed Eshleman who was a devoted and effective public servant and a man greatly loved by those who knew him and worked with him.

Mr. Speaker, I would be very glad at this time to yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GAYDOS] who must get to another meeting, but wanted to participate in this special order.

Mr. GAYDOS. I thank my colleague for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, today we gather here to pay tribute to a former colleague of ours, Ed Eshleman of Pennsylvania, who passed away last month after fighting a losing battle with cancer.

Ed Eshleman served in this body for 10 years, from 1967 to 1976. In that span of time, Ed developed a reputation in the House as a man who cared about how government affected people rather than how people affected government.

I knew Ed quite well. Not only did we start out together in the House, but we also served together on the Education and Labor Committee. In fact, we both served in the Pennsylvania State Legislature at the same time.

Ed was a colleague and a friend. He was concerned about his friends and his constituents.

A few days after Ed's death, a letter written by one of his constituents in Lancaster appeared in one of the local newspapers. I'd like to read that letter into the RECORD because it says what all of us today feel about Ed. The letter writer obviously knew Ed well, trusted him, and, even more, liked and respected him.

The death of our former Congressman, Edwin D. Eshleman, has brought forth richly deserved laudations from persons in every walk of life. Although Ed was a "rock-ribbed" Lancaster County Republican, he never allowed partisan politics to stand in the way of helping a Democratic or Independent constituent.

There are thousands of persons on the "other side" of the political fence who have been touched by the honesty, graciousness and very desire to help that marked our late Congressman.

Despite the heat and passion of political campaigning, never was the slightest implication raised that Ed was anything less than a man of uncommon integrity. Few men in political life have enjoyed such respect from all sides as has Ed Eshleman.

Ed liked to boast that he was a "stubborn Lancaster County Dutchman," but he was the first to suggest a sensible compromise solution when that seemed practical. Moreover, he served his constituents with a fidelity rarely seen today.

He had a knack of knowing—perhaps it was his political instinct—exactly what his constituents wanted, and he voted in accordance with the majority regardless of his personal feelings.

Ed knew very well that a small number of politicians were dishonest and corrupt, but that did not deter him from defending with all his vigor the principles and institution of representative government as well as the necessity for strong, healthy political organizations.

He will be missed by his legion of friends and admirers. But Ed has left a legacy that will serve countless generations of Lancaster Countians. What finer memorial could one have?

That letter, Mr. Speaker, gives us a better insight into Ed Eshleman than anyone of us here could. I would hope that when I leave Congress, my constituents can say the same about me as this one said about Ed Eshleman.

□ 1250

I conclude by thanking again my colleague for giving me priority in time, especially when the minority leader wishes to speak.

Mr. WALKER. I want to thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who is the dean of the Pennsylvania delegation and who did serve with Ed Eshle-man. His remarks are very much appreciated.

I would be very glad at this moment to yield to the distinguished minority leader of the House who served with Ed while Ed was in the Congress.

Mr. MICHEL. I thank the gentleman for yielding, and I want to thank him especially for taking the time for this special order. It was news to me that Ed had passed away during the period in which we were not in session and would not have been privy to that news. I am sorry to hear that, because as I recall, when Ed left this House he was a relatively young man, did have his health problems at the time, and just felt that he wanted an easier way of life than pursuing the vigors of this particular job.

But aside from those beautiful things that have already been said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GAYDOS], upon which I certainly could not enlarge, other than my own personal knowledge of the way Ed worked here in the House during those 10 years, he was not the most flamboyant of our Members, the most raucous or one who would be on his feet every day, but he worked in a rather quiet, mysterious sort of way. I think that was probably in keeping with the conservative nature of Lancaster County and the people there.

We all knew, from the manner in which Ed conducted himself on this floor of the House, that that was the general nature of his constituency. And while they might, too, have been of quiet, reserved character, nevertheless every person in the country is deserving of having a voice in this House through their elected Representatives. As the gentleman has said, Ed represented his district so well, in keeping with the feelings and philosophy of that particular district.

I am certainly sorry to hear of his having passed, as I said, at such a relatively young age. He was one of those nice persons that we get to know in politics as friends whom we might otherwise have never ever touched. So, for me, I would look back on those 10 years during which I used to see Ed sit right over here, about the second or third seat in, and we would talk about a number of things. I personally feel that I have lost a dear friend in Ed's passing.

I appreciate the gentleman's opportunity for me to say just these few words in his behalf.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for his very fine remarks.

Ed was very proud of the fact, after he left the Congress, that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL] had been elected as the minority leader because he very much appreciated his abilities while he was here.

I would be very glad to yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GOODLING].

Mr. GOODLING. I want to thank my colleague for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, Ed Eshleman, who served this body for many years, was a dedicated Congressman who understood and served his constituency very well. In addition to this commitment to public service, Ed also knew how to enjoy himself.

Now, this was something I learned when I came to Congress. I knew all about Ed before I got here and before I ever met him, because, of course, he served with my dad—another hardheaded Pennsylvania Dutchman. In fact, I do not know how they made out when they disagreed on anything. But dad used to say and tell us about all of the wonderful characteristics of Ed Eshleman.

And then soon after I came here, my wife Hilda and I first met Kitty when Ed and Kitty and Hilda and I went on a trip with one of the committees to the Middle East. Even though we had to work long, hard hours on that trip, we also had a little time to play. I can remember, with great appreciation, the times we spent with Ed and Kitty on that trip. We were either pushing each other through the pyramids or we were trying to straighten each other's camels; but we just had a most enjoyable time.

And then what a magnificent example Ed set by showing the rest of us how to enjoy life. Even with his physical adversities, which could have made it very difficult for anybody else, it never made it difficult for Ed to enjoy life. Even though these adversities were strong at times, he showed the rest of us just how you can accept things and how you can show others how to love and how to enjoy life.

I think it is probably that characteristic of Ed that will help to sustain Kitty in these days and years to come. I think the greatest tribute that we could pay to Ed is to try to honor him by emulating his love of life and his love of people.

I thank the gentleman for giving me this opportunity to share.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania very much.

I would be glad at this time to yield to another gentleman from Pennsylvania, another next-door-neighbor Congressman to Ed Eshleman when he served in this body, Mr. SCHULZE.

Mr. SCHULZE. I thank the gentleman for yielding, and I, too, would like to thank him for taking this special order, a time when we honor a colleague who was much honored while he was here as an outstanding Member of this body.

Mr. Speaker, I had the pleasure of working with Ed Eshleman when he served in this body, and I had the honor of knowing him personally over many succeeding years. He was a trusted friend. The very foundation of this country is its hard-working, self-sacrificing people. Ed was one of those people.

He had many careers and interests in his life, and the one common thread among them was that they were in the service of others. He had a deep desire to teach, to give our children all the opportunities possible to make good lives for themselves, and it was his hope that they would share with their communities some of what they had learned.

Ed was a man of the people. He gave support, and it was returned to him. He gave and received guidance. He befriended and was himself befriended. Each circle was complete and fit neatly within the other.

But that alone does not convey all of Ed Eshleman. He was a gentle, yet stern man. He did not tolerate dishonesty and was himself one of the most honest and forthright men I have ever had the good fortune to know. He had an amazing strength of character, but he did not allow that to overshadow or suffocate anyone. Still he knew his own mind and followed his instincts. He was a born leader, if there ever was one.

We remained friends throughout his long battle with cancer, and I can tell you that he did not change one iota. He suffered his pain quietly, continuing on his determined path to reach out to as many young students as possible and instilling them with a sense of duty mingled with adventure.

His hopes for America did not die with his passing. They are alive in each child he touched and in every man and woman he helped during his long and distinguished public service career.

He probably would not have thought of it as his bequest to his beloved Pennsylvania, but it is an enduring legacy to leave the world a little better than you found it. Measured in people, Ed Eshleman certainly left behind a lot of improvements.

When I first met Ed Eshleman, when I came to Congress, I was introduced to him as "Dutch" Eshleman, and I thought, where does that come from, this "Dutch" Eshleman? Then later I learned, of course, that he represented Lancaster County, which is historically the Pennsylvania Dutch area. In fact, I think that Ed Eshleman and his colleague, Mr. WALKER, coauthored a book on Pennsylvania Dutch, which I would commend to all to read.

But that Dutch Eshleman proved to be a very good nickname. He was a man of the soil. Those who know the Pennsylvania Dutch know that they are frugal, they are tough, and they get everything they can for as little as possible. They work their fields and their farms very well, and they produce probably the best products that it is possible to produce in the agriculture field.

And that was Dutch Eshleman. That was Ed Eshleman. The products that he produced in Congress, the things that he worked on, were absolutely the finest that could be produced.

He was highly respected by the Pennsylvania delegation. As the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GAYDOS] referred to a short time ago, we often meet. We meet on a regular basis as a delegation from Pennsylvania. I remember times when we would have a point in contention and things would go back and forth, and suddenly Ed would break into the conversation and everyone would be quiet. The room would quiet down, and Ed would sift from this complicated argument the succinct points, put them together, and everyone, protagonists and antagonists, would sit there and nod their heads, and an agreement was reached and we went on with the meeting. He was respected on both sides of the aisle.

Finally, let me say that I spent a lot of time with Ed in the woods. Ed was an outdoorsman. He was a hunter. He and his son Lee and my sons and I had almost an annual event going deer hunting. I know that you can tell a lot about a man when you work with him in committee or when you work with him in Congress or maybe on the golf course or someplace else, but I think a man's true character comes through when you are out in the woods and there are not a lot of people around to impress; you just sit and talk. That is when the real Ed Eshleman impressed me, with his basic honesty and his decency. When we would go hunting, he would bring a young man, either from Lancaster County or from somewhere else, and he would introduce him around, and I would say, "Ed, who is that young man?"

And he would say, "That boy would probably never have the opportunity to go deer hunting if he didn't come with me." He did not do it in a flamboyant way, but he wanted that young man to have the opportunity to know what it is like to not only enjoy hunting but to experience the outdoors and the communing with nature which goes along with it.

I had and still have nothing but the utmost respect for Ed Eshleman and for his memory. One of my regrets is that when they renamed the post office in Lancaster for Ed, I was unable to attend. I honored him mentally that day, as we do today.

Ed will be missed. I personally will miss him. I often ask when things get tough, "What would Ed Eshleman have done in this circumstance?"

I truly will miss Ed Eshleman, and I hope that his family realizes that over the years those of us who are Members of Congress often do not spend as much time with our families as we would like, but I hope that his family in retrospect will realize the great good that he did, not only in Lancaster County and Pennsylvania, but for the country and the world as well. We miss him, we love him, but he will be with us always.

Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCHULZE] for his very fine remarks, and I appreciate his participation in this special order.

I am very pleased to yield to the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT], the distinguished minority whip of the House.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to rise in this tribute to the memory of our former colleague, Ed Eshleman. I do come from another part of the country, but I did have an opportunity to serve here in the House with Ed Eshleman and got to know him and respect him and appreciate him and love him very much.

There are Members in this Chamber that you get to know when you serve with them on a day-to-day basis and that you grow to respect, and there are a few that you get to know as a gentle man. I think that applied to Ed Eshleman so appropriately. When there seemed to be a furor all around us, there always seemed to be a calm in the center with Ed Eshleman, and you could go back and find him in his usual spot here in the Chamber and you could seek his counsel, and it was always good, sound, low-key, but very valuable counsel.

I appreciated the relationship that I had in serving with Ed Eshleman here in the House. I did not know him as well or serve with him as long as some of the others here who have spoken before me today, but I do honor his memory and appreciate the fact that I had the opportunity to know this gentleman from Pennsylvania.

One of the things I observed about Ed that I think we could all take to heart was that he really did care about the people that he represented. You could see it in the way he conducted himself as a Member. You could see it in conversations with him. He was always thinking about their interests and what he could do as their Congressman here in Washington, to see that they were properly represented by the Government he had the opportunity to serve in. I think those are two valuable things we should remember about Ed Eshleman, that he was such a kind, gentle person, and that he was so concerned and caring about the people he represented in Pennsylvania.

So, Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania for having this opportunity for us all to express our appreciation for him and to extend our best wishes to his family as we remember the great service he gave us.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for his remarks. I know Ed Eshleman appreciated, when the gentleman from Mississippi came to Congress, that this was going to be one of the young leaders of the future, and he was certainly right in that regard. I thank the gentleman again for his remarks.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COUGHLIN].

Mr. COUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, I thank my dear colleague and esteemed colleague and congratulate him for taking out this special order.

Mr. Speaker, I pay tribute today to our former colleague, Edwin D. Eshleman, whose long and gallant battle against cancer ended last January 10 when he died at the age of 64 at home in his beautiful and beloved Lancaster County, the heart of the Pennsylvania Dutch country.

Those of us who were privileged to know and serve with Ed Eshleman always will remember him as a warm and unpretentious person whose industry and plain ways marked him as a man of the people he served. Through his many hospital bouts caused by cancer, he would return to his duties in the U.S. House of Representatives where his driving interest was in the field of education.

A five-term Member of Congress, first elected in 1967, Ed Eshleman began his public-service-oriented career as a school teacher. He served in Pennsylvania State government and was elected in 1955 to the first of six consecutive terms in the State assembly. Establishing himself quickly as a solid, hard-working public servant, Ed Eshleman rose rapidly to leadership positions both in the Pennsylvania house and the Republican Party. He served as chairman of the house education committee, assistant Republican leader, majority whip, and later as minority whip. He was an influential force in strengthening and redirecting the Commonwealth's education programs.

Ed Eshleman's unquenchable thirst for improvement and excellence in education continued during his service in the U.S. Congress. As a respected and nationally recognized spokesman on education issues, he served as ranking member of the House Education and Labor Subcommittee on Postsecondary Education and later as ranking member of the Select Education Subcommittee.

A Coast Guard veteran of World War II who won a commendation for conduct in action, Ed Eshleman was honored by Congress in 1983 when the post office in Lancaster was named for him. It was an honor well-merited for a gentleman whose contributions to our Nation's education system were matched only by his community efforts in his native Lancaster County.

Ed Eshleman, in his busy career and continuing fight against cancer, found time to write a book, "Congress, Pennsylvania—the Dutch Representatives." He was aided in writing the book by his administrative assistant, ROBERT S. WALKER, who succeeded him as U.S. Representative.

After retiring from Congress, Ed Eshleman returned to his career roots, serving as a circuit teacher at area colleges and high schools. From a deep personal commitment, he fought the disease of cancer, not just for himself, but for his fellow citizens. He was chairman of the local American Cancer Society's fund-raising efforts and served his community in other volunteer capacities.

That he will be missed by his friends and former constituents in Lancaster County is undisputed. He served them and the U.S. House of Representatives with honor and distinction. His contributions at the national, State, and local levels in serving the public are highlighted by his accomplishments in the field of education.

I hope his wife and family are comforted by the knowledge that Ed Eshleman left a legacy of devoted and effective public service, and of respect and warmth by those who knew and worked with him.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman very much.

The gentleman knows that Ed Eshleman appreciated the relationship that he had with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COUGHLIN] over the years that they served in two legislative bodies together and I thank the gentleman again for his remarks.

Ed Eshleman was my predecessor in the Pennsylvania 16th Congressional District seat. He was also my boss, because for the 10 years that he spent here in the House of Representatives, I had the privilege of working on his staff for that entire period of time.

I learned a great deal from him in that period of time, because Ed Eshleman was an educator in the finest tradition. He really lived by Plutarch's maxim that, "The very string and root of honesty and virtue lies in good education."

He intuitively knew that the most basic function of a legislator is to educate, and he did it well.

Born into a family of educators and raised in Millersville, PA, he was the son of Reeder and Mary Green Eshleman, from whom he inherited a fierce pride and sense of devotion to community involvement. His father was a prominent educator who later became the Lancaster County Superintendent of Schools and he instilled in his son the solid values of education, civic activity, and hard-nosed integrity, the legacy which is now passed on to his family and to all those whose lives he touched during almost 50 years of service to the people of Lancaster County.

He graduated from Penn Manor High School, but his education at Franklin and Marshall College was interrupted by World War II. During his 18 months of service, where he saw action in Anzio, Salerno, and Normandy, he received commendations for his conduct as a lieutenant.

He returned to graduate from Franklin and Marshall and later did graduate work in political science at Temple University.

After the war, he began his formal teaching career in the Lancaster County public schools. Reflecting his commitment to the ideal of strong mind and strong body, he also coached high school basketball teams, once leading his teams to back-to-back championships, which was one of his proudest accomplishments. In fact, through most of the 10 years that Ed was in the House, he and I would drive back and forth to Lancaster County, and when he reflected on many of those trips about his career, it was not just a lot of his political accomplishments that he would talk about, but rather the accomplishments as an educator, particularly his accomplishments when he coached what he regarded as one of the finest groups of young men that he had ever had a chance to deal with.

He entered State government as the director of the State bureau of county audits in Harrisburg in 1949 and moved on from there to become executive assistant in the Pennsylvania Treasury Department.

He won the first of his six elections to the State House of Representatives in 1954. It was there that he began to show the innate legislative skills and leadership qualities that would serve him so well in the State house and later when he became a Member of Congress.

Years afterward, when he was asked why he entered politics, he remembered the advice of Graybill Dean, the late Lancaster County Republican chairman. Graybill Dean had told him at that time, "The big fellow has the know-how and the wherewithall to take care of himself, but the only person the little fellow has is his elected official."

Ed took that advice to heart and it was put to good use for the remainder of his career. It was that dedication to helping the little guy that became Ed Eshleman's trademark in public office, earning him the reputation for honesty and integrity that would serve him well for the rest of his life and serve so many others that he touched during his life.

In the Pennsylvania General Assembly, he quickly rose through the ranks to occupy leadership positions. He became chairman of the house education committee, where he could devote his energy and attention to improving the quality of education in the Pennsylvania public schools.

He was elected majority whip, reflecting the confidence that his peers placed in him.

Very few State legislators ever reach national prominence while they are serving in a State legislature, but Ed did and he did it in very typical fashion, quietly, forthrightly, yet effectively.

When the Supreme Court in 1962 held that prescribed prayer and Bible reading in the schools was unconstitutional, it was a Pennsylvania case, the Abington against Schempp case, that was at issue. Ed moved to change the wording of the State law to make the Bible reading exercise voluntary rather than mandatory. His action called for simply changing the law to read "may" rather than "shall," but the State senate changed the language back to mandatory. The house bill went on to become law, however, and it made the existing statute a moot question, and as a result of that simple change of a word the Supreme Court, the U.S. Supreme Court's implementation of the prayer ban was delayed in our State for a full year.

Though he received national prominence, he never lost sight of his duty to his constituents and in particular helping the little guy. It was the fierce dedication, combined with integrity beyond reproach, that proved to be the decisive factor in his seven-way primary race for Congress which he won in 1966. He won an easy election in the general election that November and was never seriously challenged in the four elections that followed. The confidence placed in him by the voters of the 16th District would prove well founded.

Jack W.W. Loose, who is one of the foremost experts in Lancaster County, PA, history profiled the spirit of the typical Lancastrian in a foreword to a book Ed and I coauthored called "Congress, Pennsylvania—The Dutch Representatives," which was referred to earlier by one of my colleagues. Jack Loose says in that book, the portion which he authored:

> Always responsive to the challenges, for that is what brought most settlers here originally, but never rash nor gullible, the solid citizen of the Pennsylvania Dutch district has relied on his limitless faith in God and himself. His religious heritage has taught him that he is responsible for his own decisions and for his own welfare. Self-reliance is a virtue that he had developed to an uncommonly high degree. He may be unsophisticated and direct, but he is intelligent, perceptive and wary of new-fangled notions. His heritage has stimulated him to pursue private enterprise relentlessly. The same guide admonishes him to conserve his capital, borrow cautiously and employ the investment of others with the same care as applied to his own. He is strict with himself and he expects the same from those he elects to serve in his government.

Those were the character traits that Ed Eshleman brought with him to Washington as he served in Congress for 10 years from 1966 to 1976. Much of what Jack Loose writes about was very much involved with the legislative philosophy that he had with him, the votes that he cast and the legislation that he sponsored in this body.

Once again, in coming to Washington he was able to secure for himself a seat on the House Education and Labor Committee, allowing him to further his lifelong interest in improving educational quality. He rose to become the ranking Republican on the Agriculture and Labor Subcommittee and then moved to become the ranking Republican on the Select Education Subcommittee and later bacame the ranking Republican on the Postsecondary Education Subcommittee. From those vantage points he established himself as an effective concerned voice on education issues, overseeing the creation and implementation of the many college assistance programs that have educated millions of college graduates and students. As he did in committee, he quickly earned a reputation on the House floor as someone who could be depended upon for solid advice, continuing to build his career around the idea that blunt honesty, brutal though it may be at times, still had a place in modern politics. Not one for flashy or headline grabbing statements, as he wrote himself in his book, he was an independent voice and his voice is usually the result of an independent judgment that he made, rather than any political or ideological expediency.

His counsel was often sought on the House floor because he was known as a representative who was not afraid to speak his own mind on policy matters.

He also left his mark on constituent operations. He was the first representative in the Pennsylvania Dutch seat to expand his congressional office operations and use modern technology to turn his district office into an aggressive problem-solving unit, reaching out to help his constituents.

In order to increase communication between himself and his constituents, Ed began the first regular series of newsletters, radio reports, newspaper columns, and questionnaires. He put in a hotline telephone service between Lancaster and Washington. In addition to returning home every weekend, he established a procedure for holding regular congressional office hours in post offices throughout the 16th District.

As a result, he developed a near-legendary rapport with the people that he represented, never losing his ability to see issues not through the eyes of a Washingtonian looking at Lancaster County, but through the eyes of a Lancaster countian looking at Washington.

One of his former staffers relates a story in which he had to draft a press release for Ed that was to go back home. As is sometimes the case, a little more "Washingtonese" than needed to be had crept into the release. After reading it, Ed leaned back in his chair, looked at the staffer and said, "Well, you can write, but is anyone in Rawlinsville going to want to read it? Write it so the people in Rawlinsville will read it." This staffer happened to be from Rawlinsville.

The message came through loud and clear: Remember your roots, remember the people back home and cut out the bureaucratic mumbo-jumbo. From then on, rather than asking "Will it play in Peoria?" the standard question in writing a press release, constituent letters or anything having to do with the district became: "Will they want to read it in Rawlinsville?"

The late 1960's and the early 1970's, as anyone who lived through them knows, were one of the most turbulent periods in our Nation's history. Decisive, gut-wrenching debates over the Vietnam war, the assassinations of Bobby Kennedy and Martin Luther King, the subsequent race riots and demonstrations, the elections of 1968, and finally the pain of Watergate and the fall of South Vietnam were all events that seared the national conscience.

All Americans were tested, but none more so than our elected officials. Ed would later call his decision to support impeachment of former President Nixon one of his most soul searching, and made so much more because Nixon was so extremely popular in his district. And he would later call his vote to continue the Vietnam war his most difficult to cast.

Another of his tough decisions was to support admitting the Vietnamese boat people into America, despite the fact that his constituent mail was running heavily against that kind of immigration policy. His reason for supporting the Vietnamese was something which comes as close to providing insight into Ed Eshleman's philosophy as any of his public comments.

He said, "Should we have let them float? We are a Christian Nation; 70,000 people fled in panic, what could we do? I don't think there's much question of what you do, not if you want to be able to look at yourself in the mirror in the morning when you shave."

Ed's rock-ribbed integrity, blunt honesty, and fierce devotion to his family were the anchors that pulled him through those years. Dealing with thorny national issues was not the only problem he faced, however. He also had to come to grips with serious personal health problems; two bouts with cancer, and open heart surgery. Through it all, he dealt with those problems as he did with all others: bluntly, forthrightly, never shrinking from the task ahead and perhaps most importantly, with a sharp sense of humor.

The people of the 16th District rallied behind him as he battled through operation after operation for his cancer and heart troubles. His openness and candor about not only Watergate and the Vietnam crisis but also his health problems, reinforced his constituency's respect for him, and in so doing, he managed to turn what would be for ordinary politicians a major political liability into real political capital.

Despite his personal problems, Ed thrived on his ability to work with and help the voters of the 16th District. "Always put more marbles on the pile than you take off—if you don't, you soon run out," was one of his favorite sayings. He never ran out. Always adding more marbles to the pile and benefiting peoples' lives immeasurably while doing so.

But to Ed, regardless of all else, family always came first. Ed genuinely enjoyed his family. The faster he could get out of Washington at the end of the week and back home to Kitty and their two sons, Bruce and Lee, the better. And it was to them that he returned after stepping down from Congress in 1976.

When he stepped down, though, despite the health problems, he also went back to teaching; he resumed his teaching career becoming a, something that he created, a "circuit teacher," touring college campuses and high schools to pass on the reflections on his life as a public individual, about the workings of Government and in an imperfect world.

More than anything else, he wanted the next generation to learn the lessons that he had learned, to see the flaws that he had seen and to avoid the mistakes that he had made, so that they could enjoy the same opportunities that he had enjoyed. He said:

If I can only light a few sparks within the students to get involved in the political process, then it is all worth it.

He seemed to instinctively know, as it seems all good natural educators do, that as Henry Brooks Adams has written, "A teacher affects eternity; he can never tell where his influence stops."

Ed lit more than a few sparks; his influence lives on in Lancaster County and among all those whose lives he touched. He gave much more to the community and to Lancaster County than he ever took from it. Those of us who were fortunate enough to know him, to be counted among his friends, know that he added much more to our lives than he ever asked in return. I regarded him as a mentor from whom I learned much, but more than that, he was a friend.

"He was a gutsy man," Charlotte Reinhold, executive director of the Lancaster County Cancer Society said upon hearing of Ed's death. Her comments sum up the feelings of everyone who knew him and who knew of his work to battle the disease that would eventually take his life.

"He was the only man ever to lead three cancer crusades for us," she added. He threw himself into the fight against cancer not only for himself but for all the millions of others who were afflicted by that disease.

Upon learning that his cancer would be terminal, Ed didn't flinch or feel sorry for himself. Instead, he lived the rest of his life by the quote from Peter Marshall's book, "It is not the duration of life that counts, but it is the donation to life that matters."

With that as his guide, he spoke before group after group of cancer patients, constantly imploring them not to give it, urging them on and telling them to live the rest of their days with the zest that he did.

Through tireless efforts, he more than doubled the amount of contributions to the Lancaster County Cancer Society in just 1 year. In recent years, he submitted himself to experimental test after test, many of them resulting in excruciating pain, all the while knowing that the test would be of no benefit to him, but still hoping that they would yield a clue to a cure that would help future patients.

His battle, and the way he fought it, was an inspiration to all of us. John Bergey, president of the Lancaster County cancer unit said upon hearing of this death,

Ed Eshleman was much more than a fine statesman, teacher, and citizen of Lancaster. Unbeknownst to most, Ed spent countless hours volunteering his time to help conquer the dreaded disease of cancer. We * * * will miss him, but his legacy of concern will live for a long time.

As another of his former staffers says, he never complained or wondered, why me? Although given the circumstances he had every reason to. Instead he plowed on, knowing that what he was suffering and what was being learned because of it would perhaps help someone else some day.

That was really Ed Eshleman.

Through it all, he never lost his quick sense of humor; that was amply demonstrated in dedication proceedings last year for the Lancaster Post Office that was named in his honor. Mr. SCHULZE referred to it a little while ago.

Despite his poor health, he was there, and the wit sparkled through when he said, "Whenever the postal rates are hiked, I want my name taken off—at least for a couple of months." I assume he will want his name taken off right about now.

He lived his life with energy and devotion, and he was one who cherished the heritage from which he came; his family; he was a man who loved his country and fought for a better tomorrow for all Americans.

In the epilogue to Ed's book, another distinguished historian of our area who just happens to be my father, Dr. Joseph Walker, writes:

From the opening of the Continental Congress * * * the holder of the Dutch Seat has had a reputation among his colleagues for hard work, stable counsel and service to constituents. He has sometimes been in the foreground, as was Frederick Muhlenberg—the first speaker of the House of Representatives—James Buchanan or Thaddeus Stevens. More often he has exerted his influence through the effective service on committees, consistent research of legislative matters before the House, and good relations with the leadership in the executive branch * * *. For 200 years, Lancastrians have filled the Dutch Seat with solid, useful men who reflect accurately its own steady, diversified progress and prosperity.

Ed Eshleman maintained that standard of excellence, carrying on the tradition as it was passed on to him. He skillfully blended the two roles, becoming a national influence on matters of concern to his constitutents, never letting his national attention overshadow his responsibility to his constituents.

At the same time, he never let official business detract from family life; understanding that this family was a vital part of the team that allowed him to represent the 16th District so well.

Not many men move through life like Ed did, fighting the battles he fought, asking the questions he asked, taking on the causes he took on, and yet still managed to emerge with their reputation and their integrity fully intact.

It is a testimony to the strength of his character that Ed Eshleman did. He will be missed as a husband. Kitty Eshleman was certainly his partner throughout this whole public career. He will be missed as a father. He loved his sons like no man has loved a family. He will be missed as a teacher. And I will say he will certainly be missed as a friend.

Mr. McDADE. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to my good friend and our former colleague, the late Edwin Eshleman of Lancaster, PA, who passed away earlier this year. I had the privilege of serving with Ed during his 12 years in the Congress and I greatly respected his work and service to his constituents of the 16th District of Pennsylvania.

Ed was a fine man and an outstanding legislator. My sympathies go out to his wife, Kathryn, and his two boys, Bruce of Elton, SC, and Lee of Harrisburg, PA.

All Pennsylvania citizens and particularly those in the Lancaster area benefited from the years of public service by Ed Eshleman. Ed served Pennsylvania and the Nation at the local, State, and Federal levels with vigor and devotion. During his 10 years on the Education and Labor Committee, he became a nationally known figure in his efforts to improve opportunity in the area of education and personal development. He was a key figure in several efforts to improve America's system of education and his legacy in that field continues to live on.

I am proud that we saw fit to honor Ed by naming a post office building in his honor during the 98th Congress. It is so much more meaningful that Ed was with us and able to be recognized by this tribute to this long and generous service as a public servant. It is equally fitting that this House pay tribute to him for his dedication, loyalty, and concern.

Those of us who served in the Congress with Ed will long remember his contributions, both in office and in private life. We also will remember the personal warmth and cheer that he brought to those of us who consider him a friend. I speak for all of his friends when I say we will all miss Ed very much.

I wish to thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Hon. ROBERT S. WALKER, who was Ed's administrative assistant, for taking the time today to honor our friend.

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, Congressman MCDADE has quite eloquently portrayed our acquaintanceship with our former colleague, Ed Eshleman, and I simply wanted to add to the record my recollections, all warm ones, of his service in the Pennsylvania General Assembly and in the U.S. Congress. He was a fine gentleman.

● Mr. YATRON. Mr. Speaker, I join with my colleagues today to help honor and pay tribute to a distinguished former Member of this body, the late and most esteemed Congressman Edwin D. Eshleman. My tenure in the House of Representatives overlapped with Congressman Eshleman's for four terms and I was also privileged to have served with him in the Pennsylvania General Assembly for 4 years. Our congressional districts were adjacent and we were thus close to many of the same issues.

Congressman Eshleman was first and foremost a teacher and throughout his public career he was known as a gifted educator and advocate of education and higher learning. He shaped education programs at the State level and influenced the course of public education policy at the Federal level. An eloquent discourser, Congressman Eshleman was always depended on to reason through the problems and issues of our day and to articulate their solutions with a clarity and logic that made them readily apparent and easily implemented. The contributions Congressman Eshleman made in Congress and through all the years of an extraordinary public career are too great and numerous to measure. Their salutary effects have been long lasting and they will continue to help many in the years to come.

I am thus proud to join in praising the memory of our late distinguished colleague, in commending the value of his public service, and, in thanking him posthumously for all his life's work and beneficial achievements. I know I join my colleagues as well in a more poignant offering of condolences to Congressman Eshleman's wife, Kathryn, and their two sons.●

● Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague BOB WALKER for arranging this special order to pay tribute to Congressman Ed Eshleman. I was privileged to serve with Ed and was deeply saddened to learn of his passing on January 11, 1985.

Ed joined us in Congress in 1966, having already served the people of Lancaster for 10 years in the Pennsylvania State Assembly. He brought with him a profound and sensitive understanding of the problems facing American education and a deep desire to improve the lives of his constituents and Americans across the country.

Recognized immediately as an individual with insight and perseverance, Ed was assigned to the Committee on Education and Labor. He rose to positions of leadership on two subcommittees and became a national spokesman and a recognized expert on postsecondary and select education.

Ed retired from Congress in 1975, but those of us who knew him knew that this would not be the end of Ed Eshleman's service to his home community. From his new vantage as citizen-scholar, Ed continued to shape politics in Lancaster until he succumbed to cancer.

Ed Eshleman established a standard toward which we all should strive. He cared deeply for his constituents and he worked hard to improve the lives and educational opportunities of all Americans. His death is a personal loss, and I would like to offer my condolences and best wishes to his wife Kitty, and his sons Lee and Bruce.●

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the subject of my special order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. FOLEY). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

THE AFRICAN FAMINE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentlewoman from New Jersey [Mrs. ROUKEMA] is recognized for 60 minutes.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mrs. ROUKEMA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the subject of this special order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. ROUKEMA. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. MITCHELL. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, drought in Ethiopia and 24 other African nations, has been and continues to be extraordinarily severe. Lasting as long as a decade in some regions, the scorching drought has laid waste to parts of central Africa, turning much of mountainous highlands there into a brown uninhabitable moonscape.

Relief workers in Ethiopia say that 1 million people could die there in the coming year. While Ethiopia has grabbed the world's attention, the crisis is much wider. The United Nations Food Agriculture Organization [FAO] has said that more than half the countries of Africa may need food aid in the coming year. Besides Ethiopia, there is famine to the point of starvation in parts of Sudan, Chad, Mali, and Mozambique. Severe hunger has also been reported in Zimbabwe and Zambia.

The images are becoming familiar around the world. Dying children with aged faces; holocaust-like camps where limp and almost lifeless human beings wait passively for bowls of gruel; stretcher bearers setting out at sunrise to collect the night's harvest of dead bodies.

Triggered by these haunting images, questions of blame and responsibility are being asked abroad with growing outrage: Did nature cause this horror or did man? Regardless of the cause, what continues to be baffling is that we are in on the threshold of the 21st century. With all of the technological advancements of man in our generation, how could this tragedy have been overlooked for so long? It is truly ironic that the continent that is credited for the origin of man, must suffer the consequences of neglect by his own.

Fortunately, the rest of the world is recognizing this crisis, and help is coming. For the 24 countries most seriously affected by the drought, an estimated 3.3 million tons of grain will be coming this year. About 30 international agencies and governments of the developed world have pledged 2.3 million tons of grain and a large share of additional contributions will come from the U.S. Agency for International Development.

A recent trip to Africa permitted me and my colleagues that accompanied me, to observe with striking clarity the devastating effects of famine on the people of that continent. Much of what we saw and learned reinforced my conviction that the United States must act swiftly to reduce the deadly toll of famine on the African Continent.

My colleagues and I returned home more committed than ever to making increased famine relief and recovery assistance for drought-ravaged areas of Africa an urgent legislative priority in the 99th Congress.

Mrs. ROUKEMA. I thank the gentleman for his comments.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to my colleague from Maryland [Mr. HOYER].

Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker. I want to thank my colleagues, Congressman SILVIO CONTE and Congresswoman MARGE ROUKEMA for scheduling this special order to bring to the attention of this body and the public the severity of the hunger situation on the continent of Africa.

As we stand here today, the worst human disaster in recent history is happening in Africa. Estimates run as high as 35 million people—a number equal to one-sixth of the population of this country—are directly affected by the drought conditions on the continent. United Nations officials have also estimated that up to 23,000 people may die each day unless relief is found. At that rate, the number of Africans who will die in 1 year might equal the number of residents in New York City.

The American response to this tragedy has been overwhelming. The American people, as is often the case, have responded quickly and generously to the threat of starvation. According to a January 1, New York Times article, the American public had donated more than $40 million in 2 short months for aid to starving Ethiopians through various private relief and development agencies. The U.S. Government has also responded by providing approximately $370 million in emergency aid to the continent of Africa since October 1, 1984.

So why with this outpouring of support through the generosity of our citizens and our Government are we here today expressing our concerns about the ever-worsening conditions in Africa? Because we are not doing enough. It is extremely hard for those of us in the United States to come to the stark realization that despite our ever-increasing efforts, we have not been successful in our fight to combat world hunger. As an example, 10 years ago, member nations of the United Nations made a historic commitment to eliminate world hunger within a single decade. However, today, even though those member nations are still committed to that goal, there is even more hunger in the world.

In the early 1960's, President John F. Kennedy laid out two goals for this Nation: One was to get a man to the Moon before the end of the decade, which we did. The other was to eliminate hunger "within our lifetime." Unfortunately, that goal is as elusive today as it was then.

How can this be? America is recognized as the world's breadbasket. In my own congressional district in Maryland, lies the world renowned Beltsville Agricultural Research Center. The Center is primarily responsible for research leading to increases in food yields. Scientists test new fertilizers which may aid food production efforts in the more arid parts of the world, such as the Sahel region in Africa. Elsewhere throughout our Nation and our world, efforts have been and will continue to be made to alleviate world hunger. Yet we are still behind in our efforts. As an example, Africa is the only continent in the world that grows less food today than it did 20 years ago.

The United States has shipped to the country of Ethiopia alone approximately 276,000 metric tons of emergency food pledges since October 1. Yet it is estimated by the United Nations that the total food deficit of the 20 drought-affected countries for the 1984–85 crop year is 6.8 million metric tons of cereal grain.

We can't stop the suffering completely, we all realize that. But we also cannot sit idly by and do nothing, for if there is any central theme to the great religions of the world, it is for each of us to have as our principal objective to reach out to feed the hungry, uphold the poor, and love one another—that is what this hunger issue is all about, and there can be no greater moral imperative for us all.

In view of the severity of this problem, I would like to commend my colleagues Congressman MICKEY LELAND, chairman of the House Select Committee on Hunger, and Congressmen HAROLD WOLPE and TED WEISS who have worked with Congressman SILVIO CONTE and Congresswoman MARGE ROUKEMA in crafting a bipartisan bill, H.R. 1097, to alleviate the suffering in Africa. Through this initiative, we can move toward relieving and eliminating the scourge of hunger that afflicts too many of our fellow men and women.

Mrs. ROUKEMA. Mr. Speaker, as we gather this afternoon millions of people on the African Continent are suffering in the midst of the worst drought of the century. Famine and the diseases fostered by famine are decimating an entire generation of Africans.

Together with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONTE], I have reserved this time today for a special order on the Africa famine. This is an opportunity for Members of this House to express their deep concern for the tragic situation unfolding on the continent of Africa and for the need for timely and sufficient emergency food aid to its many victims.

I would like to use my time to relate some recent experiences of my own.

It certainly is not every day that one feels like crying in the midst of a family grocery shopping trip.

No words can adequately describe the outright sense of mourning that overwhelmed me when, 48 hours after returning from a factfinding trip to Ethiopia, I visited my neighborhood supermarket. My senses and my memory were assaulted by the cornucopia we Americans take for granted.

It was late November, and I had just been transported from the richest nation in the world to the poorest of the poor and back again in less than 1 week. As I stood in that supermarket I experienced severe "culture shock."

Just a few days before, I had been standing in the middle of an Ethiopian refugee camp. At every turn, a child tugged at my skirt, imploring, "Sister, Sister!" I stood helpless in the face of the pleadings of famished mothers and emaciated fathers. The stench of death was everywhere.

The sounds, the smells, and the sights of mass starvation, deprivation and disease jolt one's sensibilities and release emotions long repressed. Such an experience transforms the way one looks at the world, perhaps forever.

This human catastrophe has been vicariously experienced by millions of people around the world as the media have vividly portrayed its gruesome reality in our living rooms. Reams of newsprint and hours of newstape have seared our souls with the tragic drama unfolding on the African Continent.

All of this gives new meaning to the 17th century words of John Donne: "No man is an island * * * Any man's death diminishes me because I am involved in mankind; and therefore never send to know for whom the bell tolls; it tolls for thee."

America's humanitarian tradition seems to spring from Donne's words. We answer the query of Cain, "Am I my brother's keeper?", with a prayerful, "Yes."

Indeed, our country's response to this human catastrophe has been exemplary. At President Reagan's personal insistence, our official efforts have been second to none in the international community. The characteristic generosity of the American people has manifested itself in an outpouring of contributions to the various private voluntary relief agencies.

However, to stem the tide of death and disease more aid, from both the Government and the private sectors, will be required from the United States and the international community over the months and years ahead. Aid knows no politics when the misery of hunger threatens a continent.

Clearly, the need has outpaced our budgeted resources. This crisis has drained our Government's emergency drought and famine relief fund. Emergency feeding operations will be severely hampered if new resources are not available and programmed in the next few weeks. Thus, this Congress must fashion a fast-track and approve an emergency supplemental appropriation.

H.R. 1096 is a bipartisan compromise measure to provide such fast-track assistance. My colleague, Mr. CONTE, at this very moment is working in a markup in the Appropriations Committee to see it that this emergency supplemental comes before the Congress quickly.

While I do have persisting concerns about the aid efforts, I am not worried about Congress' response. We will respond, and we are doing everything possible with concerned colleagues on both the Appropriations Committee and the Foreign Affairs Committee to ensure that this response is neither a dime short nor a day late.

Were Mr. CONTE here, he would go into an explanation of the details of our compromise. It is a package of $701 million. It is divided between immediate food aid and nonfood aid of a developmental and refugee and rehabilitative nature.

Mr. Speaker, at this point I insert in the RECORD the details of H.R. 1096:

FACTSHEET: THE AFRICAN FAMINE RELIEF AND RECOVERY ACT OF 1985—H.R. 1096/1097

Food aid, $526.5 million.
Non-food aid, $175 million.
Total package: $701.5 million.

1. EMERGENCY FOOD AID—$526.5 MILLION

A. Provides $526.6 million in title II, P.L. 480 assistance. Includes money sufficient for acquisition and transport to port of 1.1 million metric tons of food (@ $360 per metric ton), with the remainder to be used for internal transportation costs (approx. $133 million, one-half of such costs).

B. Directs the President to use existing authority to meet remaining need (approx. 200,000 metric tons). Legislation addresses total emergency food aid need for the remainder of FY 1985 at 1.3 million metric tons.

2. DISASTER ASSISTANCE—$137.5 MILLION

A. $110 million to be used for relief, rehabilitation, and recovery projects, including providing seeds, farm implements, blankets, clothing, water projects, etc. of the total used for just rehabilitation and recovery projects, not less than 80% shall be provided as grants to PVO's and international organizations in carrying out such projects.

B. Not less than 18% of the total ($25 million) to be used for emergency health care projects.

C. $2.5 million is appropriated to increase food aid monitoring and help prevent diversions of assistance. The President is also directed to take any additional steps deemed necessary to ensure that U.S. assistance is provided to those for whom it is intended.

3. REFUGEE ASSISTANCE—$37.5 MILLION

A. Not less than 54% of this total ($20 million) is made available for the U.N. Development Program (UNDP) Trust Fund for projects proposed at the Second International Conference on Assistance to Refugees in Africa (ICARA II). These projects address immediate development needs, primarily agriculture-oriented, created by refugees and displaced persons in famine-affected African countries. These projects are ready for implementation and awaiting funding.

B. The remainder of this total ($17.5 million) is appropriated for use by the State Department's Bureau of Refugee Programs.

4. MID-YEAR NEEDS ASSESSMENT

A. Not later than June 30, the President is required to report to the Congress with an assessment of the African food and disaster assistance needs for FY 1985, together with a projection of the total funding required to provide an appropriate U.S. contribution toward meeting those needs.

B. If current funding levels are insufficient to meet the desired U.S. commitment, the President is urged to request supplemental funding sufficient to accomplish that purpose.

This bill is closest to the mark in calculating a realistic estimate of the need. We can reasonably assure Congress and the American people that this emergency aid bill will forestall the need for additional emergency legislative actions later this fiscal year.

While I do have persistent concerns about the aid efforts, I am not worried about Congress' response. We will respond and I am doing everything possible, along with my concerned colleagues on the Appropriations and Foreign Affairs Committees, to ensure that this response is neither a dime short nor a day late.

While attention remains riveted primarily on the emergency humanitarian requirements, there are emerging policy concerns of equal importance and more enduring consequence. First among them are the impediments fostered by civil strife and ruthless Government action that are unnecessarily slowing the delivery of food.

In addition to the certified evidence of Ethiopian Government seizure of Western food shipments at the Port of Assab, reports persist of Ethiopian Government attacks on food convoys and refugees. Actions such as these only underscore the need for the international community to exert more influence over the actions of the Ethiopian Government. Short of withholding food shipments we must use all moral suasion possible to gain the agreement of the Ethiopian Government and other affected groups to ensure safe passage of food aid delivery vehicles and personnel. Clearly, the United Nations and the International Red Cross could supervise these deliveries in a neutral manner.

Safe passage would be a major humanitarian breakthrough in the improvement of food delivery to those in dire need as well as a means to reduce the costs of transportation which are rapidly becoming prohibitive.

I am not suggesting that we seek to intervene in the domestic politics of a sovereign nation. However, our food aid must not be used as a political weapon. At present, the full weight of the international community has not been brought to bear on the Government of Ethiopia. For example, the United States should call upon the Soviet Union, which thus far has been recalcitrant, and the United Nations, which has been less than diligent in this area, to use all diplomatic means possible on behalf of the suffering millions. The United States should lead by bringing the bright spotlight of world opinion on the Ethiopians and the Soviets to obtain their cooperation.

By agreeing to safe passage, the Ethiopian Government could move to restore a measure of goodwill in the world community and gain credibility for its resettlement program which is falling far short of its targets in restoring the nation's agricultural economy.

Accommodation in this vital area would also establish a foundation for future cooperative long-term development aid, which is essential if Ethiopia is to become economically viable. Continued dependency on short-term emergency relief erodes its economic and agricultural base, degrades its ability to become self-sufficient and relegates the nation to a state of eternal hand-to-mouth existence.

Indeed, not only Ethiopia, but all of sub-Sahara Africa is in such jeopardy. We must look beyond today's humanitarian imperative. We who have eyes to see and ears to hear observe the political, strategic, and economic importance of the continent and its population. If these millions are impoverished they hold the seeds of a future harvest of continued political and social unrest and threaten the vital geopolitical and stragtegic concerns of the West.

Therefore, it becomes even more important that we bring the benefits of a new "Green Revolution" to Africa. The United States has traditionally supported African development through the transfer of agricultural technology and aid assistance. Indeed, our participation in the World Bank's International Development Association and the United Nation's World Food Program, International Fund for Agricultural Development and the Food and Agriculture Organization, has created many local success stories. These programs remain crucial if the momentum of agricultural innovation is to continue.

However, without fundamental changes in the agricultural, economic, and population policies of the various African governments, the seeds of progress sown by agricultural innovation will fail to flower. We must work to change the ill-conceived and regressive perceptions of governments that view agriculture as the primitive sector of their economies to be tolerated and taxed solely for the benefit of the urban and industrial sectors. Only when this antiagricultural mindset of postcolonial Africa changes, can genuine progress be made toward the elimination of the conditions that foster these catastrophic famines.

Historically, America's abundant resources and moral leadership have been the world's fortress against hunger. American political and economic innovation provides a beacon lighting a brighter future for a dark continent and the only response to John Donne's admonition "Do not ask for whom the bell tolls. It tolls for thee."

Mrs. ROUKEMA. Mr. Speaker, at this point I yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. PURSELL].

Mr. PURSELL. Mr. Speaker, first, I would like to compliment the gentlewoman from New Jersey for an outstanding piece of work and leadership on her trip to Ethiopia and her leadership in initiating the compromise and working with our Appropriations Committee in respect to assistance to not only Ethiopia but Africa itself and other countries.

I had the occasion to travel to Africa during the first Reagan years and, in fact, had a protocol on the Republican side and had an opportunity and the honor to meet African leaders in respect to Rhodesia, Tanzania, Somalia, and some of the other countries, and witnessed on our tour with our congressional delegation, on behalf of the Appropriations Committee at that time, the famine and the concerns that we had as a nation, the leader of the free world, in respect to assisting our colleagues in Africa as well as other countries aside from Ethiopia.

I am today in the well to address a specific issue which I am excited about. A group in our congressional district, along with the University of Michigan, private, high-tech people, have come to me and asked me to take a look at what we call remote sensing devices, in which we can track water tables and look at some high technology in a country like Africa and Ethiopia to assist that nation, through our Agency for International Development, under the leadership of Peter McPherson, who is a Michigan man himself, and I have recommended to AID that they take a look at our proposal on this sensing high-tech project in recommending to the subcommittee and not the supplemental that is being marked up at this hour, as you nicely mentioned today, but for the full foreign aid appropriation bill that will be subsequently before the subcommittee and full committee later in the spring and summer, in which we will present testimony looking at this project in order to assist developing a long-term solution to this crisis rather than just spending dollars, a quick fix, which is important, nevertheless, and I support the appropriation effort and your leadership, but I want to be very careful in saying constructively, in developing public policy, that we ought to look at the long-range problem of not just this famine but subsequent famines, because the history of Africa is very clear, because of population problems and the movement of tribes and individuals, nomads, and the arrangement of the land itself and the terrain and the seasonal climate that they have to deal with, that it is not just an economic or political problem, in the sense of who is in the government and has power, in terms of refugees and the governmental conflicts that are now existing in various provinces, but more importantly I think the long-term concern that I have is addressing a solution that we could constructively help, through our appropriation process in the Congress and the leadership of the gentlewoman from New Jersey, to find a long-term solution to a problem that is critical for Africa and maybe other parts of the world.

I just wanted to briefly outline that proposal. One of the most promising avenues of assistance is to use America's technological leadership to help African nations find new sources of water.

I am supporting the famine prevention project being organized by a group of our leading companies in the field of remote sensing technology. They propose to use their instruments and analytical skills to detect potential underground water sources.

Now, how does remote sensing work and how can it be of help?

Working much as oil companies do to find drilling sites, these scientists can use various satellites and airplanes to analyze oil and determine the most likely places to find water.

Maybe this is potentially helpful in the West and to some of our southern colleagues who are having water shortages, rather than trying to attempt any water diversion from the Great Lakes.

Anyway, an analysis of surface temperature variations is the most promising method of detecting possible water reservoirs.

Other techniques include patterns of vegetation, soil composition and surface features which may indicate hidden water deposits.

I reemphasize that: Hidden water deposits that are in and have been located, to some extent, in Africa, by previous remote sensing technologies. But I want to emphasize that it has not been intensive enough to really constructively integrate the technology into the government and the private sector and the public sector, through our AID organization, as well as the leaders of Ethiopia and other countries.

So if enough water can be found and developed, it might be possible to break the cycle of drought and famine in Africa.

I propose the following: That leaders of the famine prevention project be allowed to testify before the appropriate congressional committees on their long-range proposal.

I will invite them, through the subcommittee chaired by DAVID OBEY, and Representative JACK KEMP, of our subcommittee, to make that presentation during our congressional hearing.

Next, that Congress consider alternatives to encourage long-range plans to prevent drought and famine.

That one plan that we could do would be to earmark a portion of our relief dollars. As a fiscal conservative, I suggest that we do not always have to add money. We can take the existing appropriation and use earmarked funds and set aside some dollars for a high-tech project. We could do that in order to bring about this high-tech project, in terms of our long-range solution, and that such proposals would not involve new spending, to any extent; that we would agree on a fixed figure, as you have in the compromise, that we would keep it within the framework of those dollars, because of the deficit and what we want to do to achieve a balanced budget in this nation, along with trying to help our fellow brothers.

In the course of my work in the Appropriations Committee, I visited Africa, of course, as I indicated, and I think a project like this deserves some attention by the subcommittee. I will offer that leadership with your help and with the Members and colleagues who are speaking today who have an intensified, sincere effort to lead this nation to the support of any-long-term solution as well as the short-term problems that now exist in Africa.

I remember my former superintendent of schools, Russell Isbister—God love him—who said to me as a young man when I was a county commissioner that "We are not our brother's keeper; we are our brother's brother."

I think that is important to remember here, that as a leader of the free world we act not just in our self-interest but act to help the free world so that we can make a major contribution in solving the long-term problems of famine. That is a constructive policy I would like to help provide with your leadership on this project.

Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentlewoman from New Jersey for yielding.

Mrs. ROUKEMA. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman, and I appreciate his focus of attention the next step, which is, of course, long-term development if we are to keep these tragic nations from living a hand-to-mouth existence.

Mr. Speaker, I yield now to my colleague and friend, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. EMERSON], who as a member of the Select Committee on Hunger accompanied us on the trip to Ethiopia.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentlewoman from New Jersey to yield first briefly to the gentleman from Virginia?

Mrs. ROUKEMA. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. WHITEHURST. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentlewoman for yielding, and I wish to just take a moment to say that I have listened to the dialog and salute the gentlewoman from New Jersey for what she is doing. I want her to know that she can certainly count on my support.

Mrs. ROUKEMA. Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. EMERSON].

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to join with my colleagues to discuss the famine in Africa, particularly in Ethiopia, and I compliment the gentlewoman from New Jersey [Mrs. ROUKEMA] for her leadership in giving us this opportunity.

As a member of the Select Committee on Hunger, I traveled with the gentlewoman from New Jersey [Mrs. ROUKEMA] and other colleagues to Ethiopia in November 1984. During that trip the select committee toured relief camps for famine victims and met with United States and Ethiopian Government officials, as well as the private voluntary organizations providing relief efforts. As you may be aware, about 10 million people are at risk due to the drought, and thousands have already died.

The select committee found some progress in several areas. When we arrived on November 24, there was a great concern over a possible shortfall in food supplies from December through mid-January. While we were there, the chairman, the gentlewoman from New Jersey, and our delegation cabled the AID Administrator, Mr. McPherson, and our President to request that an additional 10,000 metric tons of fortified foods be sent to Ethiopia to help cover this projected deficit. AID was able to divert a ship that was bound for India, got it pointed out of the Indian Ocean and into the Red Sea. At the same time, large new commitments were finalized by the World Food Program and other Western donors which will fill this gap. In addition, the administration announced its intention to tap the International Wheat Reserve, thereby freeing up 300,000 tons of additional source of disaster assistance for Africa.

The logistics of transportation and distribution in Ethiopia seem to have improved somewhat. The Ethiopian Government has increased its capacity to handle shipments coming into the ports and then transporting them to feeding centers around the country. These shipments are being processed faster at the docks, and more trucks are now available. Assessments are being made of how to improve the transportation and distribution systems when increased shipments arrive in 1985.

We closely explored the question of whether our aid was in fact reaching those in need and not being diverted. The private voluntary organizations assured us that the food provided by the United States was being distributed properly. The Agency for International Development has expanded its operations in the country.

Administrator McPherson has directed the placement of AID field personnel, and they are stationed at the American Embassy, working in conjunction with the Ethiopian Government's relief and rehabilitation commission. AID has monitors to constantly check on the distribution of food shipments.

During our visit we met with a number of Ethiopian officials, including Chairman Mengistu. We exchanged frank opinions on the need for improved government-to-government relations. In December 1984, the congressional delegation met with President Reagan to report to him on the situation as we witnessed it. We stressed that the United States can be proud of its response to this human catastrophe.

The food assistance is beginning to alleviate the crisis, but more will be needed from the United States and the international community, and certainly from the private groups who are doing such a splendid job there.

According to AID reports, over 900,000 metric tons of emergency food aid have been provided to sub-Saharan Africa by the United States. This figure is over and above the regular Public Law 480 food Programs. The total U.S. contribution to sub-Saharan Africa, approved so far for fiscal year 1985, is 1.9 million metric tons valued at $603 million.

Private donations have increased as well. According to Interaction, the American Council for Voluntary International Action, the 15 major relief agencies operating in Ethiopia have received $60 million for relief efforts in that country.

There is no question in my mind as to the need for additional aid for Ethiopia and the other African countries affected by the famine. However, I want to stress the need for caution and accurate assessments of both the extent of the need and the ability of the governments and other organizations within the famine-affected countries to absorb the donated food and to contribute toward a reversal of the factors at the root of the problem.

Correction of the problem of Africa's shortage of food will come by encouraging African farmers to produce more food by modern techniques and by increasing the ability of the poor to purchase these products.

Several of the policies of the governments in question act as a disincentive for domestic food production and inhibit such food production, private sector activities encouraging economic growth are not adequate, and insufficient attention is given to basic human needs such as education and training.

So our attention today is focused on the emergency need in Africa. It is there, and the United States has been and will continue to be a most generous contributor of aid. It is my hope that we will also be able to contribute to the permanent reversal of the causes of the famine-related problem in sub-Saharan Africa.

I have said many times in reports that I have given in and around my district since we have returned from Ethiopia that you really cannot verbally describe the situation there. A lot of pictures were taken, and as I look back on those pictures, they do not really reveal the whole story. This situation is something you really have to see, touch, feel, smell, and hear to grasp the dimensions of it.

I think that we came back from Ethiopia with a lot of impressions that will be with us forever. But one of the most compelling impressions on me was the fact that the country, at least the famine area to which we traveled, is lacking in an infrastructure, and I do not think that problems of that sort can be overcome overnight. It is not that we and other humanitarian nations of the Western World cannot provide the famine relief. The question is, how much really, given the logistical limitations, can they absorb?

I think, as we address this problem this year, we have to be very careful in our assessment of that factor. I also think, in terms of the actions that the U.S. Government may take, that we have got to be very careful to not give the impression to the rest of the world and certainly to our own citizens that the United States is going to wave a magic wand and everything is going to be all right. I think that we have got to do what we need to do, and I think AID is in the best position to assess what we should do and what we can do, but I think we should not let the rest of the Western World off the hook.

I think they, too, have an obligation to participate with us in relieving this tragic stituation.

Finally, I want to say that I do not want our Government to do anything that is going to diminish the efforts of the private relief organizations that are doing such a magnificent job here. These organizations have the expertise to sensitively administer humanitarian aid. They are the real experts in the field. We know that over $60 million has been contributed in recent months through private sources, so we do not want to give the impression that the U.S. Government is going to handle the whole thing, because I think some of the best efforts that are taking place there are those that are being made by the private relief agencies, such as Catholic Relief Services, Lutheran World Services, World Vision, Bread to the World, and many other church groups and private organizations. We really need to encourage them and we need to encourage our own citizens to participate directly.

I think one of the things the gentlewoman and I are glad to be able to give some assurances on, because we had the assurances from the organizations that are operating there, is that money contributed by our constituents for famine relief actually goes for famine relief and that the administrative costs are handled in some other manner, but they do not come out of the direct contributions that our people are making.

I thank the gentlewoman for yielding.

Mrs. ROUKEMA. Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. EMERSON].

I want to stress two points that the gentleman made. One is the world contribution. We have set as our historic portion of the contribution for humanitarian aid a 50-percent level and that is consistent with what I think it should be.

Mr. McPherson, our AID Administrator, has already set up, and I believe it is in May, I am not sure about the date, but he has set up a conference in Europe of donor nations to assure precisely that the other industrialized countries in the European Common Market and Japan will do their fair share and we should stick to that proposal.

Second, I want to endorse everything the gentleman from Missouri said about the private voluntary organizations. They have a proven record of aid going directly to the people. They know how to work in these countries. They know how to assure deliveries and they are our best hope and they are the agencies through whom we should be directing our assistance.

I thank the gentleman very much.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to my colleague, the gentleman from New York [Mr. MOLINARI].

Mr. MOLINARI. Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank Congresswoman ROUKEMA and Congressman CONTE for reserving this time and join my colleagues in expressing my concern over the famine that is affecting millions of lives throughout sub-Sahara Africa. At the same time, I commend the Agency for International Development for the relief work it has done since the beginning of fiscal year 1985. The United States has already far surpassed the record amount of food aid that was donated in fiscal year 1984.

The African famine is not a recent development; rather it has been building for a number years. In November 1983, I served as the congressional adviser to the World Conference of the Food and Agriculture Organization, an agency of the United Nations. At that conference, the issue which received the most attention was the drought in Africa and the severe famine which was a result of that drought. In a land such as Africa, which has few resources even in normal circumstances, this is particularly devastating.

When I returned to the United States, I committed myself to do whatever I could to ensure that our Government responsed in a timely and effective manner.

Although a few Members of Congress were aware of the situation in Africa at that time and actively involved, the issue had not yet caught the attention of the public in general. Just 1 year ago, on February 21, 1984, I joined five of my colleagues at a press conference which was held to draw attention to the famine in Africa and the need for passage of a supplemental appropriation in order to continue U.S. food aid to those starving there. Eventually, the supplemental was passed, but the famine quickly faded from the minds of most people, both here on Capitol Hill and elsewhere.

Now, thanks to extensive media attention, the famine in Africa and particularly Ethiopia, is an issue that has remained at the forefront of American concern for several months. Once people saw the extent of a famine which has placed millions on the brink of disaster, Americans responded by opening their hearts and their pocketbooks. They have contributed over $60 million of their private funds and are calling upon us to ensure a continued response by the U.S. Government.

Unfortunately, this year, as last, we are facing a crisis in the level of funds remaining in our Food Aid Program. AID has done a remarkable job in obtaining funds from any possible source but funds for this fiscal year will soon run out. Several weeks ago, a deadline of March 1 was given as the date on which, without additional funding, our Food Aid Program would be interrupted. That date is approaching all too quickly.

Last year, the House Appropriations Committee moved in a few hours to approve $150 million of additional food aid. I urge them to act as quickly this year. The original supplemental last year was held up for months as funding for more and more programs was added to it. That cannot happen again this year. If anything, the situation is even more critical.

As you know, various proposals for food and nonfood aid for Africa ranging from $235 million to almost $1 billion have been offered. I am confident that the United States will continue to contribute at least its fair amount to the African relief effort. Traditionally, our share has been one-half of all donations. In fact, that is the goal of the various legislation which has been offered.

Timely passage of a supplemental appropriation is as important as the amount contained in the supplemental. I hope we can all work together to accomplish our goal of continued assistance to those in Africa who are in desperate need. The entire Nation is now familiar with what is at stake and we must act quickly to avert further tragedy.

Mr. Speaker, I would just like to make some further comments on the package that the gentlewoman has put together, which I think should be noted.

Emergency food aid in the package that is now being deliberated would amount to some $526 million. We should understand that of that amount, $133 million will be expended just to transport overland the food that this country is sending, so when we talk about dollars, we must remember that the dollars that we are spending are not merely to purchase food aid. We have in that wonderful package $137 million for disaster assistance to be used for such things as relief, rehabilitation, seeds, farm implements, blankets, clothing, and water projects.

One figure that does not seem to be a very sizable figure, but I think one of the most important elements of the package, is that $2.5 million is appropriated for the monitoring of the transportation to be sure that the food gets where it is supposed to get and to prevent diversions of assistance. I understand that funding will be used to hire additional AID personnel.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that this country is responding in a responsible manner and we are doing more than our fair share, which is the history of this great Nation.

I thank the gentlewoman very much.

Mrs. ROUKEMA. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman and I yield to my colleague, the gentleman from New York [Mr. WEISS].

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentlewoman for yielding to me.

First of all, I want to express my appreciation to the gentlewoman from New Jersey for taking this special order to focus on this really very critical, critical problem, and, second, to give her full commendation and credit for the role that she has played in helping to forge a bipartisan compromise over the course of these past months which will result hopefully in the early part of next week in a very significant African famine relief bill going through the House of Representatives, hopefully to be followed almost immediately by action in the Senate.

Yesterday, the better part of the day was spent with the gentlewoman from New Jersey [Mrs. ROUKEMA], myself, and the chairman of the Africa Subcommittee, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLPE], the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONTE], the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LELAND], and all of our staffs appearing before the Foreign Affairs Committee and the Appropriation Committee's two subcommittees dealing with this matter. The remarkable thing is that this was an issue which really had no partisan politics involved in it whatsoever. We came before the committee with a package agreed upon between Members of both parties. Because of the kind of presentation the gentlewoman was able to make with us at the same time, there was just no question but that there was a united effort in this House to get the relief to the people who are on the verge of starving, far too many who have already starved, and because of the gentlewoman's efforts, combined with others, I think we have seen the kind of rapid action in this House which is not often seen. So I want to give her full credit for the role that she has played and hopefully we will be able to join together and undertake efforts of this kind in the future for the well-being and betterment of humanity, whether in this country or elsewhere.

Again, my very, very sincere thanks to the gentlewoman.

Mrs. ROUKEMA. Well, the gentleman is very kind, I say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WEISS], but I think equal if not more credit goes to the gentleman from New York and his colleague, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLPE] on the Foreign Affairs Committee for the initiative and actions of the gentleman from New York. The gentleman has been discussing this problem for months, if not years, and to a large extent, the actions we are now seeing are the cumulative results of the gentleman's efforts and I thank him for his help.

Mr. WEISS. I thank the gentlewoman so much.

Mrs. ROUKEMA. Mr. Speaker, I yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. GUNDERSON].

Mr. GUNDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I am not going to take a great deal of time here this afternoon; I think there is so much that has been adequately said already. I do think that I must join, however, with everyone else in a special commendation to the lady from New Jersey for her leadership and efforts in this regard.

It is so easy for all of us to become involved and committed from an emotional perspective to what we have seen on the evening news. I think, however, it is a much different thing to try to develop that emotion and channel it into a rational and proper public policy in the real world in which we live, and I think you've tried to do that, and have done it successfully, and I mean that sincerely.

Mrs. ROUKEMA. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. GUNDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to just make three comments outside of my remarks I am going to submit for the record.

My first and foremost needs to be reemphasized, from the distinguished Prime Minister this morning, when she talked about Africa and its famine, and who was providing aid and who was not; we had better not lose sight of the fact that the United States alone is committing up to 50 percent of the food relief needs in the entire continent, and when you add the other countries of the West, I think quickly we recognize in the great East-West dialog and competition of ideas and ideology we have, who really is committed to helping people; who is committed to sending arms.

The second point that I want to make is a point which I hope this Congress can consider from an aside, outside of this issue—but I think this issue has very great significance and lessons for us all to learn.

Clearly, Africa is in the problems it is today because of drought. But let us not underestimate that many of their problems are also because of mismanagement of farm programs and inadequate government policies.

As we go forth with the development of a farm bill in dealing with our own agricultural problems in this country, I hope we will keep that in mind and never lose sight of our need for a food policy in the United States.

The third thing I want to bring up is something that I think is important when we deal with famine relief. It is easy to talk about the need for economic assistance to provide the food and the transportation. When we talk, as they have earlier today about the $160 million, I believe it is for transportation, then I think we have to ask ourselves the question of, how do we provide that food? Not just, do we provide dollars but how can we best do it?

I would like to suggest that the United States has a unique role there, and I would hope that our AID people, that our Department of Agriculture and others would recognize that as we channel our Public Law 480 money and programs into this, we, in the United States, have a very special task, not only to provide the cereals—I am all for providing the cereals—but equally important, to provide the processed, fortified food.

If you will take a look at any of the studies or, as our colleague from New Jersey and others have done, to visit these camps, you will find that most of the people who tread over miles and miles to get to a food camp arrive there very malnourished, very sick as a result of this; they are in need of concentrated doses of high protein, of high calorie supplemental food.

Second, I think when you look at the scarcity of the food cooking materials, what we need to do is provide some type of food which, with a minimum of cooking, with a minimum of water, with the minimum of preparation will be able to provide that particular protein substance that is so essential.

Third, when we look at countries such as Ethiopia with their problems in transportation; their security problems due to the civil war, their rugged terrain, et cetera, I think then it becomes incumbent upon us as we recognize the difficulties in keeping that food chain open that we put a special emphasis from the U.S. perspective in providing high protein, high caloric food commodities which will give the most nutrition per pound of food that is transported.

Now why do I say all this? I say it because the United States, unlike any of the other countries providing food assistance to Africa, has a special opportunity in that we have the processed foods. Most of these countries cannot do that; they can only provide the cereals in their basic forms.

We produce, through our Public Law 480 program, the processed foods, and I would hope that as we go forth with this, we do not only provide the dollars; we do not only provide the transportation but we also take the leadership in how those dollars, how that food is provided that is of the most benefit to the people in the area.

Again, I want to commend the lady for her work, and I commend to her colleagues who are listening and to the American public as we debate this special supplemental and as we try to move forth, let us deal with a rational public policy perspective and not just the emotions, because I think they have succeeded in bridging and uniting those two concerns.

Mr. Speaker, the world is faced with a catastrophic disaster in Africa to an extent that both immediate short-term and extensive long-term responses are required from the community of nations. But it is the United States which is uniquely qualified to respond to this drought and famine which has devastated much of the African continent.

The bleak facts have been presented on the front pages and covers of our major newspapers and magazines, and brought right into our homes by the evening news, yet they bear repeating. Twenty countries are experiencing food shortages resulting from 3 years of drought, and widespread death is occurring in a number of these. The total food deficit for these nations for the 1984-85 crop year is estimated by the United Nations at 6.8 million metric tons of cereal grain; the drought is estimated to affect some 150 million people.

Unquestionably, these facts dictate that an immediate short-term response to the hunger problem be undertaken by the world. Clearly, large quantities of food and nonfood assistance are required.

I recently had the opportunity to discuss the famine with Mr. John Wise, a representative of a Wisconsin milling firm, who had gone to Africa to view conditions firsthand. Mr. Wise concluded that the United States opportunity and ability to respond to the famine is unique. Frankly, ours is one of the few countries in the world with the food surpluses and ability to produce enriched foods which these starving Africans can consume. In addition, the demand for these enriched commodities is increased by the circumstances of the drought and famine.

In Ethiopia for example, the people arrive in food camps after walking as much as 30 miles and, as such, in extremely malnourished condition. The scarcity of fuel and water for cooking also necessitates food with minimal preparation requirements. Finally, small children are particularly vulnerable to malnutrition and disease caused by famine and thus require highly nutritious foods.

It is our enriched foods which can quickly respond to these needs. The efficiency of American agriculture provides the raw materials for foods such as CSM—a corn, soy, and dry milk mixture—which is high in protein and of high caloric content. And our Government already has a range of these foods available for aid through the Public Law 480 Food for Peace Program.

The sponsors of today's special order, and concurrently the sponsors of H.R. 606, are to be commended for their prompt response to the immediate famine problems we confront in Africa. While the original bill would provide a $628 million supplemental, it is my understanding that the Foreign Affairs Committee has reported an amended version, supported by Representative ROUKEMA and Representative CONTE, providing $701 million in total assistance. The increase has been provided to cover higher transportation costs as determined by the Agency for International Development.

This supplemental is important because it will meet the American objective of providing 50 percent of the nearly 3.9 million metric ton food aid needs of the famine nations. The legislation is complete in that it also provides $175 million for nonfood relief assistance such as emergency shelter, medical care, and refugee programs.

Clearly, the passage of authorizations and appropriations for this supplemental aid is a near-term priority for Congress and the starving people of Africa. I urge my colleagues to support it.

Finally, we must also consider the long-term problems which will continue to face the African Continent. We must, in the future, address the system and deficiencies of Afrcian agriculture which have permitted this famine to occur. If we do not do so in a manner which will allow Africa to provide itself, supplementals such as this may confront us again and again.

For now, what we are doing is necessary and the least we can be asked. Already our Government's response, through steps taken by the administration, has been generous. We should now meet our further responsibilities by completing our obligations to world society and the people of Africa.

Mrs. ROUKEMA. I thank my colleague from Wisconsin, and I would like to point out, of course, that as you know, this year we will, the Congress will be addressing the question of reauthorization of the Public Law 480 program in the farm bill; that will be a unique opportunity to address some of these very valid concerns of yours.

Also, on the Committee on Foreign Affairs we will be reauthorizing a foreign operations bill which also can be the vehicle for addressing these real problems of infrastructure, agricultural and economic innovation, development innovation that America is so uniquely in a position to provide for Africa, and create another green revolution for the continent of Africa so that we will not have these persistent cycles of famine and devastation.

Mr. GUNDERSON. Just a quick comment in that regard.

Mr. Speaker, anyone who looks at hunger anywhere in the world will quickly discover you will never solve the hunger problems until you solve the poverty problem, on any type of long-term basis. So I think it is a good point to bring out in this debate.

Mrs. ROUKEMA. I now recognize my colleague, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. CHANDLER].

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. Speaker, I, too want to join my colleagues in commending the gentlewoman from New Jersey for her leadership. I think the comments today have been excellent. Mine will support those of Mr. PURSELL in a slightly expanded way.

Mr. Speaker, 150 million people in Africa, the world's least developed are affected by chronic food shortages. In Ethiopia, 6 to 10 million people are directly affected by the current famine. Almost all of rural black Africa is starving.

The severe drought is the latest and most visible exacerbation in Africa's long history of failing to provide food for its swelling population. The United States must help starving Africans, but must also seek long-term solutions to the African's situation at the same time. Paradoxically, one of the answers lies in preserving life, which will have the long-term effect of reducing the population growth.

Black Africa is the world's poorest region; 29 of the world's 36 poorest nations are in sub-Saharan Africa. All are in desperate need of both immediate and long-term survival assistance; 9 of every 10 people live in absolute poverty in the rural areas. They have the highest population growth rates, and face the most severe environmental problems in the world. Most of the adults will not live past 40 years, and they know they will lose half of all their children to disease and malnutrition.

According to Dr. Lewis Thomas, the eminent medical researcher—

> Two-thirds of the world population's disease problems in the underdeveloped countries are, in part, the result of poverty and malnutrition, which are in part due to overpopulation. But the problem reverses itself, the overpopulation is in part due to disease, poverty, and malnutrition. It is not one problem; it is a system of problems, and to change the system without making matters worse will not be easy. But to decide to let matters stay as they are and let nature continue to take its course would create the setting for future events that would be politically as well as morally unacceptable.

Chronic illness—disease—is the most serious problem in Africa. And, it is a well-known fact that most chronic illness in Africa—and other developing countries—is related in one way or another to contaminated water supplies and poor sanitary environment. Because of its scarcity, water has always been Africa's most precious commodity. However, most of Africa's water is contaminated with human feces and is the greatest cause of debilitating disease, along with malaria and malnutrition. Humans, animals, food supplies—all potentials are either diminished or extinguished by contaminated, unsafe water.

Few changes or other forms of assistance would benefit the health and productivity of Africa as dramatically as sufficient supplies of safe water and hygienic methods of sanitation to control water-related disease. Control of disease that is preventing the people from realizing their potential would lead to control of the population growth rate and the stabilization of Africa itself. How so? Child survival would slow down the birth rate. Keeping children now living alive would eliminate the need for their replacement. Parents who expect their children to die, inadvertently force the population growth rate upward by giving birth to more children than they want, to replace their losses. On the other hand, if parents know that their children are more likely to live, then they will give birth to fewer children. Already,[7] countries in the developing world have reduced their infant death rates and birth rates. According to UNICEF's 1985 report—

> If every developing nation had infant death rates and birth rates as low as Sri Lanka's, there would be 7.5 million fewer child deaths each year, and 35 million fewer births.

Once freed from the hazards and uncertainties of disease and overchildbearing, parents can be in control of their situation and future.

Black Africa is the only region in the world where the population is growing faster than food supply. The rural economy of rural black Africa has traditionally favored and dictated large families to ensure assistance and family survival. There is an old African saying, "Plenty kids, plenty poverty." But because half of all the children die in infancy or early childhood from disease and malnutrition, custom-bound parents accordingly must produce as many more children as early as they can. To ensure their heritage, many African women, often merely children themselves, impoverished and malnourished, give birth to too many children too close together, reinforcing the poverty-population cycle.

Chronic poor health and high mortality caused by water-borne disease have taken a high toll in African lives and suffering. Parasitic, infectious, and communicable diseases historically have undermined the health and capability of the poor to subdue and control their environment. The most common and severe disease, malaria and diarrheal infections, kill more than 1 million African children every year. Malaria, sleeping sickness and bilharzia—worm-infestations—together affect more than 200 million Africans, causing chronic invalidism and high mortality. Because of the loss of energy and vitality, most of the people are reduced to a listless struggle for mere survival. Control of a single disease, infectious diarrhea, alone would save the lives of hundreds of thousands of children every year and help to bring down the birth rate.

At one time, in our country, we had to worry about dying prematurely or suffering for life from many of the same diseases that are killing most people in Africa and other parts of the developing world. Again quoting from Dr. Thomas—

> The contamination of water by human feces was at one time the greatest single cause of human disease and death for most of us and remains so along with malnutrition and malaria for the 3rd world. However, much of the credit for our good health today goes to the sanitary engineers and plumbers and not to the presence of the medical profession. Only when the plumbers and the sanitary engineers completed their work in the construction of our cities in the early years of the 19th century did typhoid fever, cholera and dysentery—the chief threats to survival—begin to vanish. And you can be sure that if we went back to the old ways of finding water to drink, those diseases would reappear.

In just 15 years the African population will have doubled, and 80 African towns will each have more than 1 million people. That future population will have no more of a chance for survival and progress without modern methods of water purification than do the people of today. We will see the doubling of all the present problems that are concomitant with population growth if we do not act now to stabilize population growth with modern methods of water purification. Africa's permanent recovery is contingent upon safe water to sustain a healthy people and their environment.

This is a crucial point in Africa's long-delayed development. What we do for that country now, we do for ourselves and the world. Tropical deforestation is extinguishing ecosystems upon which other systems are dependent, perhaps causing global climatic changes. The effects of natural disasters, such as the drought, are worsened by poverty, environmental damage, and rapid population growth. Much of the sub-Saharan land has been deforested, due in part to lack of sufficient water, in part to cattle overgrazing, and in part to cutting down of trees for use as fuel. Today 20 percent of Africa is desert, but if land use patterns don't change drastically, 50 percent of Africa will be desert in 50 years. In less than 20 years, Ethiopia's forest covered land area already has been reduced from 16 percent to 3.1 percent.

Vast areas of land to be reforested as quickly as possible in order to maintain ecosystem balance. Reforestation is dependent upon a healthy energetic people and modern methods of water delivery and purification. Upon this basis the country will continue to exist and progress and play its role in the global ecosystem balance.

We will long wait to see the results of our work in Africa. Although it is the African countries themselves who will have to take the final responsibility for improving the physical and social status of its population, we and our Government and other governments and organizations can work together now to give Africa the basis it needs to restore both reason and hope for successful development.

Mrs. ROUKEMA. I thank my colleague.

The issue of child health and infant mortality of course is a complex one, but you are quite correct and we are grateful for your including that aspect of the subject in this discussion here today.

I think it is an appropriate time to acknowledge the contribution of our colleagues, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HALL] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LELAND], the chairman of the Select Committee on Hunger in their efforts last year in seeing to it that a child health and nutrition bill was passed for overseas relief. They were particularly concerned with some of the issues that the gentleman discussed. One of the greatest scourges among children, whether in the starvation category or the malnutrition category is dehydration. The problem of dehydration is high on the death list.

Their bill to the amount of $50 million is currently being programmed through AID and I think we should all be grateful for their vision last year and for their leadership in seeing to it that Congress addressed this problem. But more obviously needs to be done as the gentleman pointed out.

Mr. CHANDLER. I believe the gentlewoman is referring to the substance that has been created. If you take a dehydrated child and simply administer water, if anything, that exacerbates the problem. But a substance has been developed, the contents of which I do not recall, that upon feeding the child, within hours, regains consciousness if it has been lost, regains vitality, and so forth.

But again it is the short-term solution. It does not ignore, I do not suggest that, but it does beg the question of how do you purify those water supplies so that you avoid that dehydration in the first place.

Mrs. ROUKEMA. Well, it is an essential medical adjunct at the current time.

Mr. CHANDLER. Absolutely.

Mrs. ROUKEMA. But it does not address the long-term problem, the fundamental problem.

Mr. CHANDLER. If we can demonstrate to those families that their children will survive—in the seven or eight other countries where that has been the case we will, I believe, see population rates decline.

Mrs. ROUKEMA. I thank the gentleman very much.

Our colleague from Nebraska [Mr. BEREUTER] has been quite patient. I think he has a visual display to help understand the problem.

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the gentlewoman for the leadership she has shown, not only on the committee, but for taking out this special order.

The gentlewoman and I, in addition to her leadership role as the ranking member of the Select Committee on Hunger, does serve on the International Development Organization Subcommittee of the Banking Committee and therefore has that additional valuable perspective.

I was preparing for a special order myself when I noticed the nature of the gentlewoman's special order and I thought I would share with my colleagues an experience I had this past week in the district work period in my own district. I visited the Creek Mills in my own district and in the process I watched the preparation of processed grain being loaded for our Public Law 480 programs and specifically for our famine assistance programs in Africa.

We have heard many comments about how our grain is delivered and many sources of misinformation, I think, have been all too prevalent.

I would like to show this 50-pound sack which happens to be delivering in this instance corn sorghum milk. It says: "Furnished by the people of the United States of America. Not to be sold or exchanged."

It has the contract number for quality control and inventory control, plus the distributing private voluntary organization, in this case CARE.

□ 1430

Now, if you take a look at the reverse side, you also see the same message in 12 other languages, including those that are commonly used in the continent of Africa. Not only is processed grain being provided, like this corn soya milk, but bulgur wheat, fortified processed wheat, fortified corn, in interesting and relevant combinations.

I would simply like to say that the material that we are providing today in this way comes from the heartland of the United States, from 50 miles from the geographic center of the continental United States.

I watched a traincar being loaded, one of many that day, headed for the Port of Corpus Christi and then for Nigeria. This 50-pound sack I showed you is not a typical sack. It is lined with plastic to be insect resistant, and the material that is provided needs only the addition of milk or water and it becomes something, frankly, that is more nutritious than the average American schoolchild receives for breakfast at home or school.

It seems to me, after hearing some comments from various sources and seeing some resource material, that indeed we might be well advised to deliver more processed product because it seems to me, from what I have heard, that some of the grain delivered directly is not used well, cannot be used well under certain conditions, depending on the condition of the person to be assisted. Frankly, it is of no parochial interest to me because the grain can come directly from States like my own or the processed grain, but I would hope, and I fully expect, that the Select Committee on Hunger is looking at the proper distribution and allocation of food, be it processed or raw commodities.

I thank the gentlewoman for yielding me this time.

Mrs. ROUKEMA. I thank my colleague, and I would like to just briefly summarize two points that I think have been made in one form or another during this special order but I believe bear repeating.

One of those is the fact that we have heard about problems with respect to distribution, problems particularly in Ethiopia, but there may be in other countries, about food diversions, black marketeering and other efforts by local governments to prevent food from being distributed.

With respect, specifically, to the problem in Ethiopia, it is my concern and the concern of many in Congress, I know, that they want to carefully distinguish between essential humanitarian aid which is being delivered, and not let a backlash develop or any hesitancy or withholding of assistance develop because of the unsavory and, in some cases, illegal conduct of the local government.

With respect to this, I do not think, particularly in Ethiopia, that either the United Nations or the U.S. Government has exercised and exerted all influence and moral suasion possible to get the cooperation of the Ethiopian Government for what is known as granting of safe passage for food delivery.

I know that this is the desirable thing to do, but I think, in the absence of the leadership in the United States, and exerted influence by the United Nations, perhaps using the spotlight of public opinion on the Soviet Union, who thus far has been recalcitrant to help in any way in assuring food deliveries within the country of Ethiopia, I think that we must use the spotlight of public opinion to force the Ethiopian Government to grant the United Nations and the International Red Cross their request to guarantee safe passage.

Not only will that assure that food is being delivered but it will also greatly reduce the transportation costs in country and relieve many of us and actually open the pursestrings of many other countries who are skeptical about these food deliveries.

I guess, finally, I must repeat and underscore the need for a long-term look at the needs of Africa to promote a green revolution in Africa. That will require the cooperation and changing of agricultural and economic policies of the African nations themselves, but the United States' ability and innovation, both in agriculture and direct economic aid, as well as through World Bank resources, can provide daylight for the Dark Continent that they have not yet received. It will take a generation, perhaps, but we have no alternative. We do not want Africa to become permanent wards of the world and all of the political and social unrest and volatility that goes with that. It is enlightened self-interest and it is humanitarian need in the best tradition of Donne's admotion: "We are all involved with mankind."

Mr. BEREUTER. I thank the gentlewoman for her excellent leadership and for taking this special order today. Indeed, it is enlightened self-interest. I was trying to provide a few parochial examples of what it means directly in employment in a part of our society, at ports, at processing facilities, and at the production point.

● Mr. OWENS. Mr. Speaker, the world is again witnessing massive hunger and even starvation in Africa—a mere decade after there was similar human tragedy in Ethiopia, Mali, and other parts of the Sahel. Again people of goodwill are responding with compassion to the faces of starvation, even as they are overwhelmed by the ever-increasing projections of the numbers of likely victims.

HISTORIC FACTORS

Africa's current food shortages and economic dependency have roots in the history of its relationship with European nations and the Western Hemisphere. Before Europeans became involved, agriculture was the primary economic activity in Africa. Sophisticated techniques had evolved which were suited to the needs of the people and their fragile environment and which helped them cope with cyclical droughts and crop failures due to other causes. Adequate food, security, and self-reliance were common before European colonialization. Methods had been developed for storage of surpluses and complex patterns of trade had been developed around food availability.

The slave trade, which over a period of nearly 300 years took from Africa many of the most able-bodied men and women—totaling as many as 100 million people—severely disrupted the food producing and storing capacity in much of the continent. The colonial period which followed further damaged Africa's ability to feed itself.

Colonialism was a system for extracting wealth from the continent; agricultural products were part of this wealth. Colonial powers normally emphasized production which met their needs and tastes, not the needs of the people of Africa. Cash crops were planted for export in order to pay the taxes mandated by the colonial governments. These cash crops frequently displaced food for local consumption.

Colonial powers oversaw the development of roads and railways in Africa. This transportation network, however, was designed to facilitate the flow of material goods between Africa and European nations, not to facilitate the development of Africa. The impact of colonialism on human resources was as profound as on the natural resources and wealth of the African Continent. It created many forms of dependency and it limited human development. The education and training which were provided under colonial rule were usually inadequate or inappropriate to the needs and cultures of the African peoples.

The problems of hunger must be viewed in the context of this history. While it would be an oversimplification to argue that slavery and colonialism are the direct causes of hunger in Africa today, it must be recognized that these factors disrupted old patterns which historically had helped African people cope with periodic crop failures. They have had a lasting influence which has weakened rather than strengthened African capacities to cope with crop failures today.

CURRENT ECONOMIC DEPENDENCY

Economic development as carried out in much of Africa is fueled by the desire for rapid industrialization. Unfortunately, the models which have been adopted have frequently served primarily the interests of a few privileged groups in Africa and the economic interests of Eastern and Western Europe, Japan, the United States, and other industrialized nations. Many of the development plans which are encouraged and financed by these industrialized nations are large in scale and based on high technology. Even when launched with the highest of ideals, these plans frequently fail because the required technical and economic infrastructures do not exist in most African countries.

MILITARISM AND INSTABILITY

Many of the countries of Africa currently facing famine are also involved in wars, civil strife, or threats to their stability and security. Mozambique, one of the countries most hard hit by the current drought and food shortage, is at the same time confronted with South African-backed guerrilla forces which are wreaking havoc on the nation's economy and infrastructure. Ethiopia has been involved in military conflict for many years with Somalia and with separatist or autonomist movements in Eritrea and Tigray. Chad's civil strife has been exacerbated by military intervention from Libya and France.

The frequent correlation between hunger and military conflict reflects the terrible consequences of militarism and fighting in Africa where cyclical droughts and the negative impact of inappropriate development already make millions of people vulnerable to hunger and starvation. Nations which are involved in military conflict or which face concerted destabilization, end up channeling their already limited national resources into armies and military hardware rather than into the needs of their people. When famine situations develop, military priorities, instability, and insecurity make relief efforts all the more complex, as is now the case in Ethiopia.

A further destructive consequence of militarism in Africa is its relation to foreign debt. Military assistance, whether from East or West, rarely comes without a price. The assistance is often in the form of arms sales for which payment is required, thus deepening foreign debts of African nations to industrialized powers.

FAMINE AND DEVELOPMENT

Recurrent famine in many parts of Africa must be addressed through wise development plans. This much is clear. Less clear is the precise nature which will be most effective for development. Plans must consider the issues noted.

First, many African nations will need long-term development assistance from the industrialized and more affluent nations of the world for many years. It should be provided in a way which is sensitive to the needs and particularities of the individual nations. The assistance should be provided at a scale which allows community participation in planning and implementation and as a technologic level which is appropriate to community needs and capacities. A fundamental aim of long-term assistance should be food self-reliance for the millions of African women and men who are now dependent on imported food.

Second, effective strategies for economic development and food production will require recognition of the particular historic economic role of women. Aid programs and governments must involve men and women in planning and implementing development programs.

Third, new international financial arrangements must be devised which free debtor countries from the requirements of export of crops and minerals as their primary role in the international economy.

Fourth, the United States, the Soviet Union, and all nations must recognize the legitimacy of African nations choosing their own economic and political systems to meet the needs of their people.

Fifth, the nations of Africa ultimately are responsible for finding solutions to the military conflicts on the continent. Nonetheless, the industrialized powers have the responsibility to abstain from outside manipulation and escalation of local conflicts and from placing them in the framework of the cold war or other international conflict. They must further refrain from arms sales which deepen foreign debts and make local conflicts more lethal. The United States and Western European nations must use their considerable leverage to stop the destabilizing efforts and military intervention of South Africa in the southern portion of the continent. Only when the people of Africa are freed from the suffering caused by war and the distorting effects of militarism on their countries will the necessary resources, energy, and commitment be devoted to development of economic systems which meet the needs of people.

Much of the developmental assistance characterized by high technology, whether from socialist or capitalist industrialized nations, has resulted in severe vulnerability to oil price inflation. This consequence has been a significant factor in the large scale debt of many African countries and in their increasing dependence on industrialized nations. Their debts to private banks and international lending agencies, such as the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund, rival the more publicized debts of Mexico and Brazil on a per capita basis. Yet, because of their weaker economies and smaller populations, the absolute amounts of their debts do not pose a threat to the international financial system. The countries of Africa, therefore, do not have the leverage of larger debtor nations to negotiate terms of repayment.

In this modern context, the cash crop system remains a reality in much of Africa. Agricultural exports are the primary source of foreign exchange, and little of the balance is used to better the conditions of the majority of African people who are rural and poor.

The International Monetary Fund imposes numerous conditions on debtor nations in order to assure they meet their obligations; the conditions must be met if new loans are to be secured or old debts are to be rescheduled or refinanced. These conditions frequently include requirements that the debtor nations export products and reduce imports in order to gain foreign currency, requirements that they devalue their currencies, and requirements for other changes in the management of their economies. Similar conditions for economic and developmental assistance to Third World countries are now being established by the U.S. Government.

Many countries of Africa, regardless of political orientation or alliance, have thus lost or are losing control over their own economies. The pressure to export tends to exacerbate the problems of economies which in many cases were already distorted and which have traditionally provided raw materials to the rest of the world. As many African nations are required further to emphasize production and development of their resources for export, they are increasingly placed in the position of having to import basic necessities for their own people.

POVERTY AND PEOPLE

Rarely do middle class and wealthy people go hungry in the countries experiencing drought or famine. Food is usually available to those with money. It is the poor—and usually those in rural areas—who go hungry; indeed, even in normal times they often exist on the margins of national economies.

Although the current famine is rooted in the past and nourished by current power struggles, the problem must be addressed now—before we can deal with the complex underlying factors. Hunger is curable. Food is the immediate solution, and we must begin to provide the vast quantity of emergency food relief which is needed.

Once emergency relief has begun, we must address the more basic causes of famine in Africa and other parts of the world. This will require that we not use other nations as our surrogates in power struggles. It will require that we not hold nations hostage to indebtedness which forces them to grow export crops while ignoring domestic needs. It requires that we recognize that we share this world and its resources fairly with others. It requires that we become a good neighbor to all nations.

America has met many challenges. It can meet the challenge of limited resources in a world that seems ever closer.●

● Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, we are all facing a grim situation: that of millions of human beings who are about to die of continued starvation in Africa.

There has been little rain in recent years, none in many regions, too much fighting among insurgents and dictators who usurp the right to make such life-or-death decisions without advice or guidance, lack of international training, assistance, helping to build wells and roads and other dire causes.

Nevertheless millions have already died and millions more will die, while the world is spending over $1 trillion in 1985 on military programs and manpower. Some of that money is necessary to protect one nation from another since no one else will do so for them. Some of it feeds the families of enlisted men and officers and contributes to the lives of those people. But the magnitude of that figure spent on protection when measured against the greatness of our highest ideals and principles of civilized justice and of secular law and when measured against the needs of so many people who can be helped for a few dollars per year until they, too, have the know-how, the health and the stamina to join the productive citizens of this world—when measured against all that, surely we can agree to help and surely we can help effectively for far less money and food otherwise going to waste while ruining the farmer of our own country for lack of buyers.

Mr. Speaker, I am a cosponsor of a bill, H.R. 100, which seeks to address this problem as adequately as presently seems possible and I urge all of our colleagues to become interested and involved in this matter affecting the basic dignity of human life on our globe.●

● Mrs. SCHNEIDER. Mr. Speaker, today we are confronting the severe famine which is affecting over 20 African countries. The unprecedented media coverage of this tragedy has brought it to the attention of millions of concerned American citizens. The tragic conditions in Africa seem endless.

In Ethiopia alone 2.5 million people are in life-threatening situations and 150 million Africans are affected by the drought.

Crop levels for 1984 in some areas of Africa are reported to be as much as 40 percent below the already low levels of 1983.

There are reports of starving Africans resorting to eating the seeds intended to be planted this fall, leaving little or none for next year's harvest.

The United States, always a leader in humanitarian assistance to developing countries, once again leads the relief efforts. To date, the United States has been the largest food donor to Africa, contributing more food aid than all the other donors combined.

Yet there is no significant improvement in sight.

We face a problem in Africa of a magnitude that most of us cannot imagine, a problem that will not even begin to be solved until we appreciate its origins. Although a natual disaster of tremendous proportions set into effect the suffering that we are witnessing, we can and must accept the human error that has compounded the tragedy.

Food and emergency aid are absolutely necessary for relief efforts now, but we must also look for long-range policies that will prevent future natural disasters from being worse than they need to be. We can begin by focusing on assistance that will make effective use of existing natural resources without burdening the people with technologies that require high levels of costly energy.

First, the American public must appreciate that this effort will take time. Solving the problem rather than responding to the crisis requires patience. The initial results of projects aimed at developing small, least-cost energy, high density food plots are extremely encouraging. Ongoing work in Mexico, India, Togo, South Africa, and China are using biointensive methods based on research demonstration that a complete diet can be grown on a plot of 2,800 square feet. This is one-tenth the area required by traditional methods, and one-third of that required on mechanized U.S. farms. This biointensive method of food production can be done with simple hand tools, requires no petrochemical inputs for fertilizers or pesticides, no irrigation systems, or expensive machinery, and consumes only a fraction of the water required in conventional farming. It is truly an appropriate technology for the 1 billion poverty-stricken individuals in developing nations.

I would like for this body to invest greater effort in forward-looking solutions to world hunger, solutions based on self-sufficiency rather than emergency relief. It is time to appreciate the limits of exporting fully developed, energy-intense technologies to developing, energy-poor nations. It is time to take an aggressive stand by encouraging the use of our development aid for projects that satisfy the needs of small farmers rather than increasing their dependence on expensive fuel. We can do this by creating and implementing a new model of least-cost energy as the starring point for our development programs.

If we are to make progress in ending famine in Africa, then we must encourage the development of agriculture markets that fit the needs and capabilities of the small farmer. We must encourage the growth of food crops rather than cash crops in countries that are not self-sufficient. We must take the responsibility to ensure that the development aid that we provide to African nations is used to promote independence, and not a new cycle of famine and starvation.●

● Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleagues, Representatives ROUKEMA and CONTE, for organizing this special order on Africa. One can scarcely pick up a newspaper without reading something about the African famine and its effects on individual lives. I know that my constituency, and I'm sure all our constituencies, is particularly disturbed and touched by the enormity of this tragic famine.

I would like to bring to my colleagues' attention a report which was recently released for the Office of Technology Assessment on the African food crisis. The report predicts that the sub-Saharan Africa food situation will continue to decline and that a solution to these problems will only be reached with new approaches and long-term commitment on the part of African nations and those nations assisting them. The OTA report points to the small, subsistence-level farmers and herders as they key to such a solution and warns that this faction, which raises most of Africa's food, has been largely ignored.

I would urge that as we continue the debate and votes on African developmental assistance, in the imminent emergency supplemental as well as in later long-term considerations, that this very interesting report should be taken into serious consideration.●

● Mrs. SMITH of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank my colleagues, Mr. CONTE and Mrs. ROUKEMA, for providing this opportunity to address the critical situation that is facing the millions of hungry people in Africa. I compliment their leadership in the continuation of our American philosophy of sharing, caring, and meeting the needs of those less fortunate, not only here at home, but around the world.

We are all keenly aware of the tragic famine that has stricken an estimated 150 million people of the nations of Africa. And this number is growing constantly, as evidenced this year in the loss of thousands of innocent lives in Ethiopia, Sudan, and 18 other African nations.

In this time of immense human suffering, we must not only make expenditures to provide relief, in addition, we need to ensure that the aid that we provide truly reaches the hungry. Many in this Nation and in other countries are working to accelerate grain shipments, provide land vehicles, lend voluntary assistance, and send medical aid to those in desperate need. As Members of Congress, it is our responsibility to facilitate the creative capabilities of private, voluntary organizations, concerned citizens, and the appropriate Government agencies to deal with the current crisis.

I would like to take this opportunity to commend the Agency for International Development for its fine work in coordinating the African relief effort. But even more impressive is the response of the American people to the African situation. Last December, I helped shovel the first of 1,000 tons of Great Northern beans that were sent by farmers in western Nebraska to contribute to the famine relief effort. The residents of Crete, NE, are sending 50-pound bags of flour to the sub-Saharan, drought-stricken areas.

These are the actions of compassionate, concerned people, who are truly sacrificing to lend aid to those needing relief. But these same citizens are concerned that the aid we send actually reaches the people that need assistance. Recently, the New York Times reported that perhaps only a third of our aid extends beyond the the comparatively well-to-do cities to the tragically malnourished in the more remote areas.

This acute hardship is faced at a time of crisis for our Nation's agricultural community as well, but for much different reasons. Grain is in surplus here in America, waiting to be used by those who most need it. My hope is that we can quickly take action to address both of these crises, partly by sending our plenty to those in Africa—simply put, sending our resources where they are needed.●

● Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to express my concern for the victims of the worst drought and famine in this century. More than 150 million people in at least 28 countries in Africa face famine as a result of this drought. The African crisis has raised public consciousness about the problem of hunger in the world, and underlined the need for an appropriate response by the United States.

The drought has placed 7.7 million people at some risk of starvation, with 2.5 million of those in immediate life-threatening jeopardy. As we know, during the first 3 months of fiscal year 1985 the United States has provided $348 million to aid victims of the famine. In the past, the United States has provided at least half of the international food aid in emergencies and it is important that we do as much as we can to continue that level of support. We will soon consider an emergency supplemental appropriations bill to provide more aid to those starving in Africa. I believe that it is imperative that this legislation be passed quickly so that the necessary assistance reaches Africa in time to save lives.

Emergency food aid is of unmistakable value to the people of Africa, but it only addresses the most visible part of the dilemma which confronts them. Assistance is needed to store and transport the supplies, medical care must be provided for refugees and other famine victims, and, above all, a long-term program of aid designed to improve agricultural practices and procedures must be implemented. If we do not take these steps, I fear the tragedy of Ethiopia and her sister countries will be repeated often in the future. We have all been touched by the news photos of the starving in Africa and we must certainly do what we can to address their immediate needs. But we must also be prepared to help the nations of Africa begin to do the things necessary to insure that the children of those now driven by hunger far from their homes do not have the same experience in their lifetimes.

Mr. Speaker, the people of the United States have historically given from their hearts to ease the suffering of people in need in the world. We now have budgetary problems in this country that must be addressed, but we also have an ability to do more in Africa. I urge my colleagues to take the opportunity which soon will be presented by the urgent supplemental appropriations bill to bring relief to those so desperately in need of it, and to be prepared to make the kind of long-term commitment that will hopefully make other emergency measures of this kind unnecessary.●

● Mr. McGRATH. Mr. Speaker, several months ago when BBC footage of the famine in Ethiopia flashed across the television screens of our Nation, our collective heart went out to a people in utter despair.

When such massive suffering, unbeknownst to most of us was witnessed, Americans responded with a ground swell of compassion and charity. I am sure many of my colleagues became aware as I did, of constituents who decided the best way to celebrate the true spirit of the Christmas/Chanukkah season was to forgo an exchange of family gifts and instead pledge their allotted holiday money to famine relief efforts.

Our Government has also generously responded by providing more than $366 million since October 1 to the nations of Africa for famine relief, with $150 million alone provided to Ethiopia. We can be justifiably proud of our response to the humanitarian needs on the African Continent. However, the situation there is still critical. We cannot afford the luxury of sitting back to admire what we have accomplished. There is much more to be done.

Nearly 200 people die each day in Ethiopian feeding camps, while millions of others throughout the continent are confronted by the real possibility of death by starvation. We must develop new ways to meet the life-threatening prospects of drought victims. One of the greatest needs is to find easily digestible nourishment. Often the emergency food provided to those whose bodies have been ravaged by starvation is rejected because it requires breakdown by the digestive system that the body is unable to perform.

If another drought disaster of this scope is to be avoided, the provision of farming technology is imperative. Within the constraints of our laws toward the affected nations we must provide for the teaching of skills which will yield enough food for the African population.

I commend my colleagues Mr. CONTE and Mrs. ROUKEMA for reserving time for this special order to focus on the future needs of those whose lives have been imperiled by the drought. I urge my colleagues to support ongoing relief efforts when this body addresses the relevant legislation.●

● Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, I would like to applaud the efforts of my colleagues from both sides of the aisle who have joined together to fashion H.R. 1096, a bill which will provide famine relief for the millions starving in Africa. As a cosponsor of H.R. 100, I am pleased to also identify my name with H.R. 1096.

This bipartisan effort is eloquent testimony to the spirit of sharing and giving that is the hallmark of the American people.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased and proud to join with my colleagues here in the House of Representatives and with the American people, who have opened their hearts and generously responded to the cry for help from Africa.●

● Mr. MORRISON of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, it is time to fully mobilize the resources of this great Nation to meet the challenge of the current famine in sub-Sahara Africa. Over 150 million people in 24 countries are in some way affected by the worst drought in recent history. Every moment we delay leads to a further loss of life. Those who survive may be developmentally impaired for the rest of their lives.

In Ethiopia, 300,000 people have died; 2½ million people in that country are reported to be in immediate life-threatening jeopardy. Almost 8 million people are affected by the famine.

In Mozambique, the Government has a minimal stock of 1,300 tons of grain when the need is estimated at 3,450. Estimates are that 100,000 people in that country died in 1983.

In Burkina Faso, which has the highest reported infant mortality rate in the world, crop losses are severe. One northern province of that nation has reported a 95-percent crop loss for the second consecutive year.

In Cameroon, severe water shortages are plaguing both human beings and livestock. Refugees from Chad, pouring over their border in search of food, are further stretching scarce resources.

In Somalia, a country of only 4 million people, three-quarters of a million refugees are totally dependent on assistance for all basic needs. They continue to cross the Ethiopian border attempting to escape the desperate conditions of their country.

We also know of the plight of people in Mauritania, Niger Kenya, Sudan, Senegal, Burundi, Ruanda, Tanzania, Angola, Botswana, Lesotho, Zambia, and Zimbabwe.

Despite these facts, the administration has cut its food aid request for 1986, citing as the reason its uncertainty about the continuation of the drought. They request an appropriation which would provide 395,000 metric tons of food. Clearly, they are underestimating the current need for food aid, just as they have done for the past 2 years.

Fortunately, Members of the House of Representatives are more realistic in their request. H.R. 100, a bill cosponsored by over 90 Members of the House, provides funds for 1.7 million metric tons of food. H.R. 606 would include an appropriation for 1.2 million metric tons of food.

But immediate food aid, as important as it is, is not enough. Money is needed for medical care, clothing, blankets, and other emergency aid for those suffering from the famine. So, also, is money for long-term development programs, refugee aid, food transportation, and food storage. In each of these areas, my colleagues in the House have seen fit to be more generous than the President would have us be.

And, given the political situation in a number of African countries, we must do all that we can to ensure that food provided is received by all those in need, not just those who subscribe to the political ideology of the ruling leaders. The voluntary agencies working in Africa are devising creative plans to ensure that this occurs. Their efforts in this area, as well as in the entire distribution operation, must be applauded. But more is needed, and only the Government can provide the funds to ensure that all of those suffering receive the help they so desperately need.

Mr. Speaker, Michael Burek of the British Broadcasting Co. has brought the human tragedy of hunger and starvation in Africa into the consciousness of the world. We are all aware of the problems. It is time to move from awareness to action, from study to implementation, from compassion to responsibility.●

● Mrs. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call attention to the efforts of a small group of seventh graders in my district who worked to alleviate some of the pain and suffering of their fellow human beings.

The seventh grade of Regional School District No. 7, under the direction of their teacher, Mr. Bruce Miller, raised $1,800 to aid the people of Ethiopia. They donated the money to Africare to purchase agricultural tools and seeds to aid the Ethiopian people. The money was raised through a dinner they organized from start to finish.

Their actions reflect a variety of lessons that go beyond any one subject. Geography, agriculture, international trade, and Third World economics are all valuable academic lessons. But these remarkable young people are learning compassion for others, and an understanding of the complex yet fragile web of interdependence of one person upon another, regardless of age, color, or nationality.

With the rapid advances in technology, our world is only growing more complex with each passing day, not less. The opportunities to reach out across the boundaries of both space and experience to relate to others on an individual level are what provides us with an understanding of the scope of these complex problems as well as alternative solutions.

I commend Mr. Miller, and the entire seventh grade at R.S. No. 7 in Winsted, CT, for their innovative and heartfelt response to the plight of the starving Ethiopian people.●

● Mr. WIRTH. Mr. Speaker, we have all noted here the extraordinary aid given by individual Americans to the famine-stricken peoples of Africa. By the end of January, the American Council for Voluntary International Action, known as Interaction, reported to us that they had received hundreds of thousands of dollars in private donations and $60 million in total aid for Ethiopian relief activities. It is gratifying, in fact overwhelming, to witness such an outpouring of concern.

The American people, by their generosity, have sent a clear signal to the Congress that we should set aside political concerns and address the problem of famine with great urgency. We have responded by assembling several commendable legislative packages in order to continue our massive relief programs for the remainder of fiscal year 1985. The House and the Senate committees responsible for these bills have placed them at the forefront of their agendas and have already begun hearings and markups

Yet despite this expeditious approach, we are already beginning to see bottlenecks emerge, bottlenecks on both sides of the Atlantic which threaten to choke off the short-term and long-term aid that are essential parts of any strategy for Africa's revival. The most serious obstacle we face in getting food aid to starving people is political strife. In Ethiopia, in Mozambique, in Chad, and in the Sudan, governments beleaguered by armed insurgencies withhold food shipments from famished people in areas controlled by insurgents.

But while we cannot deny the strength of these armed movements, we also cannot deny the right of all people to food. In short, Mr. Speaker, access to food should not hinge on political alliance. The Congress must be adamant that the tremendous food aid which the American people have so generously donated is received by those people who truly need it. We must warn the Government of Ethiopia that we will not tolerate the confiscation of food shipment destined for the northern regions of Ethiopia, where starvation has become the norm. We cannot condone that government's use of vital food aid as a carrot with which to lure starving people from their ancestral homelands in the north to uncertain futures in southern Ethiopia. The guerillas operating in Tigray and Eritrea have agreed to the "safe passage" of aid-carrying vehicles operated by internationally recognized relief organizations, but the government refuses to guarantee such passage.

Mr. Speaker, 6 years ago, America and her allies, in concert with the International Red Cross, the U.N. High Commission on Refugees and a number of private voluntary organizations, began massive food shipments to Cambodia, which was also facing famine conditions. The Government of Cambodia was given the type of logistical assistance necessary to better distribute the food aid. But instead, government officials kept most of the aid within city limits and away from the rural areas where people suffered from starvation and malnourishment. At the same time, bags of grain and other staples were diverted to swelling black markets, where government officials and others reaped huge profits.

The same phenomena are occurring in Ethiopia and some other African countries receiving food aid. Let us avoid our past mistakes, and unambiguously inform African governments that we will not permit the obstruction and diversion of food aid intended for srarving people.

Let us also begin to focus on how we can assist these countries in the future. While we have responded to the current crisis with speed and vigor, we bear partial responsibility for the state that Africa finds itself in. Over the past few years, American development assistance has steadily eroded, a trend that is highlighted this year in the administration's foreign aid budget request. Now more than ever, that request is tilted toward military assistance at the expense of long-term agricultural and economic development aid. In fact, the aid proposal, by increasing military assistance by 15 percent, directs over two-thirds of foreign aid to developing countries for security purposes. Meanwhile, under the proposed fiscal year 1986 budget, total development assistance levels will decline by nearly $500 million, and will affect efforts in health care, family planning, and agriculture programs.

Although it may be beyond our control to break the bottleneck impeding the flow of food aid to African famine victims, it is certainly within our power to open the bottleneck that appears to be closing in on long-term development assistance. We must reverse the decline in America's share of long-term aid and follow on the heels of our relief effort with a carefully planned and well-funded agricultural and economic aid program that will help Africans chart a course of self-sufficiency in food.

I am encouraged by the legislative approach taken by both H.R. 100, the Weiss-Wolpe-Leland bill and H.R. 606, the Conte-Roukema bill. Each seeks supplemental appropriations not only for food aid, but also for long-term development assistance. Although they differ over the totals to be spent, they share the common objective of beginning the eradication of hunger in Africa. I have joined as a cosponsor of H.R. 100 and urge my colleagues to seriously evaluate these two legislative proposals and support them as a means of loosening one of the major bottlenecks we confront. And as we continue to send aid to Africa, let us also continue to pressure recalcitrant African governments into fairly distributing the food aid so generously donated by people around the world. By opening these two bottlenecks and keeping them open, we can attain the goal of ensuring that the people of Africa have sufficient food supplies, now and in the future.●

● Mr. NELSON of Florida. Mr. Speaker, in Ethiopia, a drought-stricken country, the enormity of the hunger problem baffles the mind. As I visited the feeding centers where gentle humans are restoring life to some of the starving, I was bewildered as to how to solve this crisis.

The problem of famine in Africa is real. Twenty nations have been affected. Seven are critical. Just in Ethiopia alone, over 7 million people are threatened by starvation.

A severe drought is a major cause. The rains either did not come or were less than is required to germinate the seeds in the fertile soil.

Agriculture techniques are backward. There are few drilled wells, little irrigation, almost no fertilizer used and severe topsoil erosion. If there is to be problem solving, it will be long term and it will be painful. Attitudes will have to be changed to use modern agricultural methods. And in Marxist countries, the collective farm reduces the farmer's incentive to produce for himself and only aggravates the sparse production.

There have been four major droughts in Ethiopia in the last 35 years. People have died of starvation. But this is the worst drought and death is apparent throughout the land.

My visit to Alamata and Korem, two feeding centers 250 miles north of Addis Ababa, was shocking. The emaciated bodies of young and old were overwhelming. One's emotions cannot be controlled as you see the helpless trying to survive. The huge numbers dulled my sense of hope.

Thousands have died and thousands more died in remote villages which statistics will not record. But there is hope—because humankind is responding—and responding well.

The free world is responding swiftly by sharing its abundance of food, medicine, and blankets. Help from Western nations, from the private sector and from government, is pouring in. People are acting out of their best humanitarian instincts.

The United States is leading the pack. There are not many "ugly Americans" in Africa today. We are responding from our generosity. And America is responding mightily.

Americans are responding as a government. President Reagan has announced his intention to provide one-half of the food assistance needed in Africa this year—a $500 million U.S. contribution. For Ethiopia, a Marxist state, with whom we have strained relations, $130 million in food is already planned. This Government-supplied grain is distributed by many private volunteer agencies, such as Catholic Relief and World Vision, and soon some will be given directly to the Ethiopian Government relief agency. The sacks bear the words: "Donated by the People of the United States of America."

The private sector is also responding. For 1985, food assistance to Ethiopia through private organizations is estimated to be $125 million, with another $22 million spent on Ethiopian refugees elsewhere.

The private sector from Florida responed magnificently. A flight of mercy was organized, funded, loaded, and flown to Addis Ababa, which bespeaks the generosity of Floridians.

The mission was conceived by my wife, Grace Nelson, as a needed response to the problems she had seen in Africa last summer. In Mali, she held a starving child in her arms. She has not been able to forget it. After organizing some fundraising activities, the thought of a flight of mercy came from a discussion with the editor of the Florida Times Union. He suggested that although people wanted to help, they needed a concrete mission to respond to and one which could be tracked to a successful conclusion.

This story is an American success story. A DC-8 was chartered and loaded with 40 tons of food, medicine and blankets, in the midst of ongoing fund drives. WCPX-TV in Orlando collected over $80,000 and two truckloads of blankets. World Vision, a Christian humanitarian organization, provided the mechanism for obtaining the 2 tons of medicine and 38 tons of fortified food, 11 tons of which were donated by a former Ethiopian official in Indiana. This special mixture of oats, powdered milk, and honey, known as ATMIT, is indigenous to Ethiopia. Another $120,000 was raised before the flight departed Chicago on January 12.

The plane was so long you could hardly see from one end of the cargo bay to the other. During the 24-hour journey, our group of "food shepherds" slept on top of the pallets of fortified food using some of the donated blankets for warmth. It was a good feeling to know that our mission was one of trying to help the starving by actually taking food to them.

Our landing was the first of a stretch DC-8 on the Addis Ababa runway. TransAmerican Airlines and World Vision soon had the cargo unloaded.

Success does not come easily and indeed we soon had our problems. Food was being delayed to the feeding centers because rebel activity in the region interrupted transportation of supplies. When we finally were cleared for an old DC-3 to fly us to the camps, we found they were running dangerously low on food. But our supplies arrived just in time.

I shall never forget the children, also starved for affection, clinging to my hands and arms smiling in spite of their physical deprivation. They were proof that the World Vision feeding center was successful because only a few weeks before they had been lifeless and lethargic. Others were in intensive care, often with their mothers, as nutritional supplements were administered—sometimes through a tube because they were too weak to eat.

The staff was loving and kind, it showed. The nuns at the Missionaries of Charity compound ministered to the dying. These sisters are sponsored by Mother Teresa of Calcutta, who had just paid a visit, greeting and blessing each person in the camp—9,000 of them. What a lesson in love.

There are those who say, "let them die." Their theories of overpopulation and survival of the fittest are practical, they say. Besides "why should we care about a foreign, strange land?" Fortunately, most of America does not think that way. The good will, hopes and prayers of Floridians were obvious in our specific flight of mercy. Many have responded before, others are following.

This mission was successful because of the spirit and character of our people. Perhaps it is best summed up in Matthew chapter 25. "When you did it for the least of these, you were doing it for me."●

● Mr. LOWERY of California. Mr. Speaker, I rise on the occasion of this special order in reference to the ongoing tragic situation in Africa.

I commend my colleagues on both sides of the aisle for their statesmanship and compassion in considering aid for the several hundreds of thousands in danger of starvation in Africa. I strongly support increasing aid to these unfortunate victims.

However, during the consideration of relief legislation, there has been little or no mention of Ethiopia's failure to effectively anticipate and ameliorate famine conditions in its own countryside. To this end, I recently introduced House Concurrent Resolution 43, a measure that criticizes the Ethiopian Government for its failure and for its hinderance of relief efforts.

Mr. Chairman, I strongly support the efforts of this committee to help the suffering going on in Africa, but the United States cannot solve the problem alone. The Soviet Union, although in a firm alliance with Ethiopia, has responded to aid needs with little more than symbolic gestures, sending last year approximately 10,000 metric tons of rice and several tons of salt, even though Ethiopia is an exporter of salt.

The Ethiopian central government (Dergue) has done little on its own to help the suffering of its people. In fact, instead of diverting resources toward irrigating agrarian lands, it has chosen to equip its 500,000-person military organization. Moreover, the Dergue has proven reluctant to assist in the food distribution efforts in Eritrea and Tigre, areas of civil strife. For example, aid ships full of supplies have been delayed at unloading docks in favor of Soviet cargo ships laden with military goods. Supply trucks have also been delayed or actually destroyed to areas with reported rebel activity, with devastating effects for innocent civilians.

Mr. Chairman, a clear message must be transmitted to the Government of Ethiopia that the relief system is not available for its individual and political disposal, that those who seek to assist famine victims will no longer abide by further restrictions or hinderances. Whether as language in a supplemental measure or in resolution form, I hope my colleagues here and in the full House will join in a bipartisan effort to demonstrate to the Dergue and Colonel Mengistu the imperative need for direct reform and responsibility in this grave matter.●

● Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, there are few problems confronting the world today that are more pressing than world hunger, and more specifically, the famine that is plaguing millions of Africans.

Yesterday, in his testimony before the House Foreign Affairs Committee, Secretary of State Shultz spoke about the food crisis in Africa saying that, "If they—millions of African people—are to survive, they need urgent assistance in terms of food, medical care, and shelter." The Secretary was right; we must continue to aid the African people.

We can no longer put the plight of these suffering people on the back pages of our consciousness. We can no longer relegate Africa to the status of puppet in the drama of East-West confrontation. The African people need our help. We are responding, but we must make sure that we continue to do so for as long and as much as it is necessary.

Ethiopia is not the only nation crippled by this tragedy—Niger, the Sudan, Kenya, and Mozambique—to name a few are all suffering. This is not a political question. It is a question of survival; it is a question of heeding the call of poor, starving people who have nowhere else to turn.

The U.S. Government, as I said, has responded to this call, but I believe that we can do more. I believe we have to do more in order to truly confront the epic misery and privation confronting these people. This means not only food aid but long-term development assistance. As the Bible says, it is time to turn our swords into plowshares so that our brothers and sisters in Africa may live; so that they may have the promise of a future.●

● Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, we are starting a new Congress which must rapidly deal with an old problem: the African famine. This is an enormous task, one which requires both immediate attention and long-term focus; it is a task which demands our continuing attention.

This famine is the result of a drought which is now over 3 years old in many regions. We were warned 3 years ago that this famine was on the horizon. Yet, we waited until the death toll had reached tragic proportions before we began to seriously address the problem.

Last fall, media reports began flooding our lives with reports of starving children in Ethiopia. These reports prompted an overwhelming and generous response by Americans and people around the world. Relief agencies working on the African Continent were inundated with calls. This winter, the Peace Corps sent out a request for volunteers with farming backgrounds and received thousands of applications within weeks. The United States has already committed twice as much aid this fiscal year as we sent last year. I am proud to be a citizen of a country which expresses such compassion for peoples halfway around the world.

Still, Africa is not out of danger. In fact, its situation worsens daily. We must not allow our past deeds of good will to lull us into a false sense of complacency about the African situation. It will be a long time before Africa can stand on her own again.

Currently, 21 countries in Africa face food shortages. The United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization [FAO] recently estimated that the combined food needs in Africa will come to 6.6 million tons of food this year, twice the amount needed last year. Our past aid has saved tens of thousands of lives, but there are millions in danger.

This December, several relief sites in Ethiopia, Sudan, Mali, Mozambique, and elsewhere ran precariously low on food, because of inconsistencies and delays in food shipments. While the food pipeline was filled at our end, the lag between the time food left the United States and the time it actually reached the hungry was too long. Mr. Speaker, this situation did not happen overnight; we were warned this fall that this type of catastrophy would occur if food shipments were broken. We cannot allow a break in food shipments again or we will face the same severe and unnecessary loss of lives later on this spring.

In January, President Reagan announced an increased assistance program for Africa, a move which I applaud. Yet, Peter McPhearson, Administrator of the Agency for International Development, stated that unless supplemental appropriations are passed by Congress by March 1, U.S. shipments of food will again be interrupted.

Mr. Speaker, it is already February 20. We must all work to get additional funds passed by the end of this month. Early this winter, Congressman WEISS introduced H.R. 100, which I cosponsored, to appropriate over a billion in supplemental appropriations for fiscal year 1985. The United States traditionally supplies half of international emergency assistance for disasters, and these funds, in addition to the amount already committed, would bring U.S. assistance up to half of the total projected need for 1985. Representatives ROUKEMA and CONTE introduced H.R. 606 which would provide a smaller, but still substantial amount of assistance. A compromise bill, H.R. 1097 has been introduced which would provide $526.5 million for additional food assistance and $137.5 million for disaster assistance. We must pass these supplemental provisions before further delay results in the needless loss of lives.

But we also face another challenge. In the coming months, in addition to appropriating vital emergency aid, we must also work to improve our assistance programs and consider ways to help Africa in the long run. This must include increasing our research and development efforts of applicable agriculture; increasing technology transfer to Africa; and encouraging more educational programs both in the United States for Africans and in Africa for her people.

We have faced this challenge before. Fifteen years ago, southern Asia was on the verge of famine, while Africa was a net food exporter. Today, Asia is largely food self-sufficient, while Africa, where food production per capita has declined steadily each year, is in the midst of the worst famine in this century. Political turmoil and drought contributed to this famine, but much of the starvation could have been prevented had we heeded advance warnings and initiated a proper agricultural development program. Asia's agricultural success took several years and is due mainly to the research and extension work done under the "Green Revolution." Unfortunately, most of the technologies which aided Asia are not transferable to Africa, due to different soil and climate conditions, as well as a poorly developed research and extension system in Africa.

The drought has caused tremendous damage in Africa. Farmers have left their land, seed stocks have been eaten, and soil erosion has increased the desert's spread. Because of this damage, Africa will need enormous help not just in emergency food assistance, but in longer-term assistance as well. I feel strongly that the United States should contribute to this revival.

This is an enormous task. But we cannot allow ourselves to be satisfied with anything less. It has been estimated that food shortages will occur in Africa for years to come. Africans will continue to starve until Africa can once again support her own.

I would like to call to my colleagues' attention to an article which appeared in the February 11, 1985 Christian Science Monitor.

[From the Christian Science Monitor, Feb. 11, 1985]

FOOD AID TO AFRICA SLACKENS BUT NEED EXPECTED TO DOUBLE NEXT YEAR

(By David K. Willis)

The world aid effort to feed the hungry in Africa is caught in a crunch.

Aid from private, individual pockets and purses is slowing down. Efforts by the United Nations, private agencies, and governments are beset by politics in Ethiopia and are not well coordinated overall, diplomats and private analysts agree.

Yet famine in Africa is worsening. The UN estimates that the 21 worst-hit countries will need twice as much food aid this year as they needed last year.

A complex picture of the situation emerges from Monitor telephone interviews with public, private, and government sources in London, Rome, New York, and Washington.

On the one hand:

The massive response from individuals in the West to pleas for food donations to Africa—a response that has seen about $60 million donated in the US and as much as $112 million in Europe since October—is beginning to slacken.

The fear is that the graphic television pictures of African famine victims aired last autumn might only have created a donor cycle in the West—a cycle, as one analysis has it, of "shock, pity, giving, feeling better, and forgetting."

The slowdown is reported by private agencies here such as Oxfam International and Save the Children, and also by a private campaign that raised $1.12 million in Britain to send wheat to Ethiopia between June and December last year.

Overall coordination of the global aid flow remains a problem. While the US and some other governments continue to pour food and other supplies into Africa (the US effort alone may reach $1 billion in the fiscal year ending Sept. 30), private aid agencies and the UN may not be coordinated enough to respond well to the current situation.

Some private agencies are unhappy with new coordination machinery set up by the UN. "The UN is so compartmentalized," says Hugh Mackay, director of overseas operations for Save the Children (UK). "It lacks the sense of urgency that is so needed."

At the same time, some private donors think the private agencies themselves need to show more efficiency to match their generous motives. "Well meaning, but too often disorganized," is how one donor characterizes the agencies.

Meanwhile, the situation in Africa is worsening:

Famine in the Horn of Africa, westward in the Sahel, and south in Mozambique is growing so much worse that the 21 most needy countries will need 6.6 million tons of food aid this year, according to the latest famine report by the UN Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO) in Rome. The countries needed half that amount—3.3 million tons—last year.

Pledges from donors have reached 4.4 million tons, but the FAO reports that "less than half of the known pledges have yet to be delivered." There are fears of an aid "gap" after April, though the UN World Food Program says pledges are in sight after April.

Growing alarm is heard here about the Sudan, which so far has lacked the kind of dramatic television coverage that roused public concern for Ethiopia.

So many refugees are pouring into Sudan from other countries—including as many as 250,000 from Uganda and 100,000 from Chad—that the total number is now put at 1 million. They exacerbate drought conditions in Dafur and Kardofan to the west, and in the Red Sea hills among the Beja nomads. Large crowds are camping at Omdurman, on the bank of the Nile opposite Khartoum.

The population of a former watering hole called Wad Kowli, also just across the Ethiopian border, has jumped from a handful of people last December to some 85,000 today as refugees from the province of Tigre drag themselves across into Sudan. Conditions are so desperate that the private agency in charge, Save the Children (UK), reports that the camp will need to be moved in 20 days because it has almost run out of water.

In Ethiopia, the FAO now estimates that 7.7 million people face food shortages or starvation. This is more than 1 million higher than estimates made last autumn.

In northern Ethiopia, in the Tigre and Eritrea provinces that are waging civil war against the Marxist government in Addis Ababa, so many areas are now uninhabitable that refugees are fleeing across the border into Sudan at a rate that may be as high as 2,000 people a day.

"You also have politics," says one international aid official. "The port of Massawa, to the north, isn't being used because it is the port for areas held by rebels in the civil war." So, he notes, "You still have Ethiopia, a country of 40 million people, depending on a single small U-shaped port—Assab on the Red Sea—with only five berths."●

● Mr. LEVIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, today's special order on Africa recognizes the immediacy of the crisis throughout that troubled continent.

This Congress, my home district in Michigan, and concerned Americans across this country have become increasingly alarmed at the urgent plight of those in dire need in Chad, Ethiopia, Kenya, the Sudan, and elsewhere. Ten million lives are at risk. It is literally vital that we in Congress act as quickly as possible.

Last night, the House Foreign Affairs Committee agreed on a compromise proposal providing emergency supplemental appropriations for African aid in the amount of $701.5 million. The legislation is presently before the Appropriations Committee, which I hope will move it swiftly to the floor.

Seldom does our legislative agenda provide us with more tangible evidence of the challenge confronting us. What is needed is clear and very real: Wheat, corn, sorghum, and chick peas; blankets and tents, transportation to take these materials to the people who need them and personnel to distribute them, and medicine for the sick.

The list is short—the task is enormous. By the time we see the faces of the starving children on the evening news, many of them have already died. Many more will die before $705.1 million will meet even the most immediate needs. Let us demonstrate that we have the resolve to rise to this challenge.●

● Mr. AuCOIN. Mr. Speaker, last Christmas eve a cargo plane flew from Portland, OR, to Addis Ababa, Ethiopia on a mission of mercy. Oregonians watched its progress on television while they celebrated the holidays; the flight represented their gift of life to those dying of disease and starvation.

A month previous the U.S. National Bank of Oregon had initiated a drive, Oregonians Helping Ethiopians, for relief funds by opening the doors of the bank's 186 branch offices to donors with a promise to match the first $50,000 collected. Evergreen International Airlines of McMinnville, OR, had already offered to donate all costs of a flight to Ethiopia.

Within 2 weeks an extraordinary outpouring from 10,000 people of all ages and incomes raised $580,000. Many businesses, too many to recount here, gave food, medical supplies, and storage space. With labor donated by the bank and other volunteers, a planeload of supplies was purchased and readied within days. Once in Ethiopia, the goods were immediately distributed by World Vision.

With remaining funds, a ship was outfitted and sailed from Portland last Saturday, with a much greater store of food and medical supplies. Northwest medical teams has just sent a corps of 15 volunteer doctors and nurses to Ethiopia to serve the emergency health needs of refugees there. Another group is preparing to leave in March.

To my knowledge Oregon's was the first statewide private effort for African famine relief. The Oregon project has inspired others throughout the country and has demonstrated, once again, that the human community does not end at arbitrary State or national borders, but extends as far as awareness of human suffering can take it.

Mr. Speaker, the efforts and concerns of Oregonians have been repeated nationwide. In 1985, Americans donated nearly $60 million to provide for the needs of the hungry and homeless in Africa. But even this great outpouring cannot begin to address the need.

Conditions in the Horn of Africa, the Sahel and Mozambique are desperate. Nearly 21 African nations will need 6.6 million tons of food aid this year—double the need level of last year. In Ethiopia alone nearly 8 million people face food shortages or starvation.

To meet the increasing demand, the United States doubled its contribution to African relief efforts for fiscal year 1985. However, our emergency feeding programs have been all but depleted after only 3 months. The U.S. Agency for International Development estimates that U.S. feeding programs will be crippled if additional funds are not approved by Congress by the end of this month.

It is absolutely imperative that Congress approve additional money as soon as possible. For that reason, I fully support the proposals to provide an additional $701.5 million for emergency famine relief. Of this total, $526.5 million is earmarked for food aid and transportaiton costs. An additional $137.5 million is earmarked for emergency shelter, land rehabilitation, and refugee assistance programs, marking the beginning of U.S. efforts to prevent similar disasters in years to come.

Aside from emergency relief efforts, the United States must provide the wherewithal for the proud people of Africa—seeds, tools, and technical help—for them to grow their own food and become self-sufficient as they have been for centuries. I pledge my efforts to working for legislation that will meet the long-term development needs of Africa.●

● Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to express my deep concern over the suffering of the thousands of people starving in Ethiopia. Like my colleagues, I have been horrified by the reports that over 300,000 people perished from starvation in 1984. The effects of the current drought plaguing the country could be even more devastating. Following 3 successive years of exceptionally low rainfall, the 1984 crop harvest is significantly smaller than any harvest in the last 3 years, and it is estimated that this meager harvest will be consumed by the end of February. In fact, the total food aid requirement for Ethiopia and its refugees in 1985 will be 1.5 million metric tons of grain. If the food aid requirement is not met, the number of people who die every day in Ethiopia's feeding camps could climb well beyond the current figure of 200.

No group has endured greater hardship in Ethiopia thant he Falashas. At least 2,000 Ethiopian Jews have died in refugee camps in Sudan since last spring and still 3,000 are believed to be in Sudanese refugee camps. While as many as 15,000 Ethiopian Jews have managed to emigrate to Israel, an estimated 7,000 still remain in Ethiopia. Those Jews remaining in Ethiopia suffer more than the horros of the famine. They are caught in the crossfire between the government and rebel armies. Moreover, Ethiopian Jews have been subjected to religious repression by a government that has supported the burning of Hebrew books, the incarceration of teachers, and the closing of schools where Hebrew is taught. Recently, two Ethiopians who had escorted three of our colleaggues—Senators TRIBLE and DECONCINI and Representative ACKERMAN—to Falasha camps were attacked and beaten by men identified as government authorities. It is imperative that we not sit idly by and allow this repression to continue.

We cannot cease our efforts until every Ethiopian Jew is allowed to emigrate to Israel. I pledge my continued support for efforts to provide assistance to combat the drought, such as H.R. 100, which would provide over 700 million in supplemental assistance to drought-stricken Africa, and I urge our Government and all other governments, to do all that they can to see that the Ethiopian Jews are allowed to emigrate.●

● Mrs. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, Americans have witnessed with horror the drought and famine which has struck Africa in recent months. In all, 150 million people in 27 countries are affected by this disaster. Our Nation has reacted generously to this tragedy as individuals and groups from all walks of life and backgrounds have donated vast amounts of relief money.

I am proud to be an original cosponsor of H.R. 100, a supplemental appropriation bill which will provide major increases in famine relief and recovery assistance for fiscal years 1985 and 1986.

Specifically, the bill increases funds for the Food for Peace title II program by $787 million. This will provide money to purchase and ship 1.7 million metric tons of food, an estimated half of Africa's emergency food needs. As the world's largest food producer, the United States has traditionally provided at least half of international food assistance in emergencies.

The supplemental bill also contains an additional $225 million in nonfood aid, mainly for projects to promote long-term recovery. It is vital that we link emergency aid to projects that promote a return to normal farm production.

This recovery aid has four main components. First, $80 million for rehabilitation programs involving the health, water, and agricultural development needs of the poor. Second, $70 million for foreign disaster aid, such as shelter, blankets, and fertilizer. Third, $50 million for assisting refugees and displaced persons. Fourth, $25 million for overcoming the transportation and storage problems of regular food aid programs of the poorest Africans.

Mr. Speaker, the World Food Council at its 10th anniversary session last June stated that hunger today is largely created by human error or neglect. Human indifference perpetuates it and human resolve can eradicate it. I firmly agree with this assessment and have seen for myself how American aid has saved lives throughout Africa and the world. I urge my colleagues to support H.R. 100 and other legislation which promotes relief for this horrible tragedy in Africa.●

STATEMENT ON THE IMPACT OF THE FISCAL YEAR 1986 REAGAN BUDGET ON THE 21ST CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT OF OHIO

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STOKES] is recognized for 30 minutes.

● Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, on February 4, 1985 President Reagan submitted his fiscal year 1986 budget to the Congress and the American people. The President's fiscal year 1986 $973.75 billion budget plan would finance a massive $30 billion increase in defense spending with severe cutbacks in domestic programs, totaling nearly $40 billion. I oppose this unfair, irrational, and irresponsible transfer of funding from programs for the people to programs for war. Once again, it appears that this budget is being balanced on the backs of the poor and the disadvantaged. Already, the American people have begun to understand the truly negative impact of this budget, and have begun to speak out in opposition to it.

In my own congressional district—the 21st District of Ohio—it is patently clear that the passage of the President's budget will hurt the quality of life for many needy and disadvantaged people. The fiscal year 1986 budget will produce another victim—the middle class.

Further, not only does this budget hurt people, but also it will stunt ongoing community revitalization efforts. Major metropolitan centers, such as the Cleveland area, are just beginning to progress after years of decay and the devastating impact of the Reagan recession. This budget, if passed, will set the clock back on the revitalization of these great urban centers.

I have consulted with numerous program experts in my district with respect to the impact of the Federal budget proposals in the areas of employment, education, health, housing and transportation, et cetera. That impact, not only in my district, but also in districts across America, must be our primary focus as we begin deliberations on the President's budget request. For those reasons, I would like to share with my colleagues my analysis of how the 21st Congressional District of Ohio will fare under the administration's budget plan.

STATEMENT ON THE IMPACT OF THE FISCAL YEAR 1986 REAGAN BUDGET ON THE 21ST CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT OF OHIO

EMPLOYMENT

Despite continuing high levels of unemployment in Cleveland, Ohio and in other parts of the country the federal government will play a diminishing role in supporting local employment and training programs. Federal support for employment and training activities has been drastically cut since 1980, when $8.1 billion was available under the Comprehensive Training and Employment Act. Job training appropriations have now dwindled under the Job Training Partnership Act (JTPA) to $3.5 billion in FY 1985 and will further decrease to $2.8 billion in FY 1986, under the President's budget plan. Fiscal year 1986 funding for the largest component of JTPA—the Employment and Training Block Grant—would be frozen at $1.886 billion. The second largest JTPA component—the Summer Youth Employment Program, now funded at $825 million, would lose $100 million in FY 1985 and another $60 million in FY 1986. With Summer Youth jobs funding reduced to a total program level of $664 million, summer jobs for 67,000 teenagers across the country would be eliminated. A third JTPA component—the Dislocated Workers Program, now funded at $223 million, would be cut by $120 million in FY 1985 and by another $3 million in FY 1986. Finally, the $617 million Job Corps Program, a fourth JTPA component—would be terminated altogether.

In summary, the President's budget proposals for employment and training assistance represent bad news for the unemployed residents and the youth of the 21st District and the Cleveland area. More than 61,000 people are unemployed in Cuyahoga County. Of these individuals, more than half live in the City of Cleveland, which had an unemployment rate of 13.2 percent in December 1984, the most recent month available. This high level of unemployment reflects the large proportion of low income and minority Cleveland families who need job training and large number of middle income persons who need retraining because of plant closings and fewer job opportunities in the auto and steel industries.

No additional help will be coming to Cleveland from Washington, D.C., however. The tremendous need for job training assistance for Cleveland residents is currently addressed by Cleveland's share of about $20.0 million in funds from JTPA. For FY 1986, the City of Cleveland can expect to receive at most about $13 million in JTPA funds—a loss of about $7 million under the President's proposed budget. Most of the loss would be realized by the closing of the Cleveland Job Corps Center, which currently receives in excess of $5.0 million from the U.S. Department of Labor. If President Reagan is successful in terminating the successful Job Corps Program, 530 disadvantaged Cleveland youth each year would lose valuable skills training in allied health occupations, clerical and data entry positions. Cleveland would also lose the resources for the Summer Youth Employment program in the amount of about $500 thousand. As a result, more than 625 much needed summer jobs for teenagers would be lost. It is doubtful that these young people could be accommodated in the City of Cleveland's other job training programs.

ELEMENTARY AND SECONDARY EDUCATION

President Reagan's FY 1986 budget fails to give education the high priority called for by the President's National Commission on Excellence in Education by freezing at about FY 1985 levels the three largest federal elementary and secondary education programs for compensatory, handicapped and vocational education. These programs would be funded at $3.647 billion, $1.306 billion and $738 billion, respectively, in the FY 1986 budget. Several other but smaller education programs, however, would receive deep budget cuts, including Impact Aid (22 percent), bilingual education (17 percent) and Special Programs under the Chapter 2 Block Grant (69 percent). Additionally, the budget calls for a rescission of the $75 million in FY 1985 funding appropriated for the new Magnet Schools Grants for school districts undergoing desegregation. Overall, the President's budget request for elementary and secondary education programs totals $7.481 billion, a decrease of $271 million below the FY 1985 appropriated level.

The Cleveland Public Schools and other urban school districts will have difficulty maintaining quality programs for the disadvantaged, handicapped and language minority children under the Administration's virtual freeze on federal support for elementary and secondary education. In FY 1985, the Cleveland Public Schools can expect to receive about $18-19 million in elementary and secondary education aid, including $13.5 million in aid from the Chapter 1 Compensatory Education program. About the same amount of funding would be available for Cleveland's school children in FY 1986, under the President's budget plan.

Of major consequence to the 21st District is the President's decision to cancel $75 million in FY 1985 funding for a new program financing the development of magnet schools in desegregating school districts.

The Cleveland Public Schools received $7 million in FY 1980 and $4 million in FY 1981 to finance the implementation of desegregation activities, primarily the establishment of magnet schools. These dollars are no longer available due to the enactment of the Chapter 2 Block Grant in FY 1982. If Congress concurs in the termination of the new Magnet Schools program, Cleveland will lose a valuable and much needed infusion of new resources to strengthen and further develop the City's magnet schools.

HIGHER EDUCATION

Under President Reagan's FY 1986 budget proposals, the dream to pursue a higher education at the college of one's choice would no longer become a reality for many students in the 21st Congressional District and throughout the nation. A reduction of 25 percent in federal support for student financial aid is included in the FY 1986 budget, with total funding for student grants, loans and work opportunities dropping from $8.3 billion in FY 1985 to $6.3 billion in FY 1986. The President's budget also proposes a major restructuring of federal student aid programs which would place a heavy burden on parents and students to finance a larger share of college expenses. Most notably, eligibility for Pell Grants, National Direct Student Loans and College Work Study would be restricted to students from families with adjusted gross annual incomes of $25,000 or less. A similar income cap of $32,500 for eligibility for Guaranteed Student Loans (GSLS) would be established. Additionally, no student would be able to receive more than $4,000 annually in aid from the Department of Education and each student would be required to contribute $800 to his or her college expenses before receiving any federal assistance. These proposals would have the greatest impact on students from middle income families.

Assistance for higher education is a high priority for many families in the 21st Congressional District. Yet, under President Reagan's proposals, students from one-third of all families in the district would be ineligible for federal Pell Grants, National Direct Student Loans or College Work Study. About 15 percent of 21st District families would be ineligible for Guaranteed Student Loans, which carry a lower interest rate than commercial loans.

Needless to say, under President Reagan's proposals, many bright and talented 21st District students would be unable to attend the college of their choice because of fiancial need. A cap of $4,000 on the total amount of assistance that each student may receive would permit many students to attend only lower cost two and four year colleges.

More than 40 percent of the 65,000 students currently enrolled in the 13 higher education institutions in Cuyahoga County receive one or more types of aid from the Department of Education. Students most affected by the $4,000 mega-cap on federal student aid would be graduate and professional students and students attending more expensive institutions, such as Case Western Reserve University (CWRU). For example, one-third of the undergraduate enrollment, or about 940 students, at CWRU would lose about $1 million in federal aid under the $4,000 mega-cap proposal. The 2,700 graduate and professional students at CWRU who now receive GSLs would also lose more than $1 million in assistance under the mega-cap.

However, at the other end of the spectrum, even lower cost institutions such as Cuyahoga Community College and Cleveland State University may find the very neediest students being squeezed by the $4,000 mega-cap.

The proposed income caps on Pell Grants, Guaranteed Student Loans and other aid programs would work a particular hardship for middle income students at all types of institutions. Roughly 20 percent of those students now receiving Pell grants could become ineligible and as many as 60 percent of those students now receiving National Direct Student Loans and College Work Study on some campuses could become ineligible for this assistance due to the proposed income ceilings.

MEDICARE

The Medicare program is the cornerstone of this nation's commitment to adequate health care for 27 million aged and 3 million disabled persons. The Medicare program is the single most important Federal program protecting older Americans from financial hardship due to age or major illness. Despite recent Congressional reforms to increase cost-sharing and to bring program costs under control, Medicare is once again the victim of the Reagan budget ax. Unfortunately, it will be the elderly who will bear the brunt of the burden.

In his FY 1986 budget proposal, President Reagan has proposed a total of $3.9 billion in Medicare reductions, in addition to the $332 million in the fiscal year 1985 medicare savings passed by Congress in 1984. The total Medicare savings in the FY 1986 budget is $4.2 billion. These reductions will come in the form of legislative and regulatory changes. The most significant reductions requested by the President include an extension of the physical fee freeze which began on July 1, 1984 and a freeze on medicare reimbursement rates for hospitals, and skilled nursing facilities. Additionally, the President, has proposed that the out-of-pocket costs which Medicare beneficiaries must pay for Part B premiums, deductibles and co-payments for home health services be increased.

Part B is the portion of Medicare which pays for physician and other medical services, including x-rays and diagnostic tests; outpatient services and home health care. Additionally, the Administration proposes to begin Medicare coverage on the first day of the month following the month in which age 65 is achieved. This proposal will mean that many seniors will have to go an additional month without the financial security of medicare coverage.

To achieve this projected cost savings in the Medicare program, the elderly will be once again be asked to reach into their pockets. The President's proposals would shift nearly $700 million in additional costs to the most vulnerable segment of our population. Beginning in 1986, monthly premiums for Part B would increase from $15.50 per month to $16.60 for month. The premium would continue to rise by two percentage points each year until 1990.

Due to recent Congressional reforms in the Medicare program, our senior citizens are caught up in a Catch 22 situation where the right to health care is no longer an option many of them can afford. Medicare is the only health insurance program most older Americans have. Nevertheless, Medicare covers only about 45 percent of their total day-to-day medical expenses. For Ohio, and the Cleveland Metropolitan area in particular, the President's proposals will result in severe financial hardship for a significant number of people. In the Cleveland metropolitan area, nearly 72,000 or roughly 13 percent of the population is 65 or older. Moreover, 3 out of 10 people admitted to Cleveland area hospitals are Medicare recipients.

The average medicare beneficiary receives $284.30 per month for social security. The average daily hospital cost is $245.00. For many low-income elderly, faced with delays in inflation adjustments in social security, cutbacks in housing, and food stamp programs, and rising utility costs, increased medicare deductibles and co-payments may force many elderly citizens to forego some other basic necessity.

In addition to the elderly, hospitals in the Cleveland area will be faced with added financial pressures as a result of the President's proposals. Currently, 5 hospitals (Cleveland Metro General, Mt. Sinai, St. Lukes, University Hospitals, and St. Vincent's Charity Hospital) in the Cleveland metropolitan area provide 90 percent of all medical indigent care services rendered in Cuyahoga County. All of these hospitals are located in the 21st Congressional district. In 1984, the total cumulative cost of uncompensated care provided by these institutions was more than $65 million. The added financial burden which will be placed on our elderly population because of the President's policies, will almost certainly be felt by these hospitals, as more and more medicare beneficiaries become unable to afford the increased cost of the program.

Additionally, the President's budget proposal to freeze hospital reimbursements and his refusal to even offer any financial compensation to hospitals that serve significant numbers of the medically indigent, may threaten their very existence. No one would argue that hospitals must share in bringing down the costs of health care. However, hospitals should not be forced to make the choice of serving the health care needs of the poor or keeping their doors open.

MEDICAID

The medicaid program helps States to pay for medical services for the poor. The medicaid program is the largest federal health program for poor mothers and children. In fiscal year 1985, the program is expected to provide services for nearly 24 million persons, including 11 million children. For these individuals, the medicaid program is the only way to pay for check-ups, medical treatment, dental care, hospitalization and needed drugs. Additionally, for several hundred thousand pregnant women, the program pays for prenatal and delivery services.

The rising cost of the Medicaid program has placed a strain on both federal and state budgets. Since 1981, nearly every state in the nation has been forced to place limits on the number of mothers who can qualify for Medicaid.

In recent years, the State of Ohio has not only been forced to accept federal reductions in the medicaid program but has had to trim its own budget as well. Since 1982, 84,000 people have lost medicaid benefits in Ohio, including 50,000 children.

President Reagan's fiscal year 1986 budget proposals include $1.1 billion in Medicaid reductions in fiscal year 1986 and $6.5 billion over fiscal years 1986-88. The reductions in the Medicaid program would be achieved by placing a cap on federal matching payments to states. Under the cap, medicaid spending would increase by only 3 percent in fiscal year 1986 over last year's spending. This small rate of increase in federal reimbursements is well below the rate of medical care cost inflation. States would have increased flexibility to adjust their programs to meet lower federal reimbursements.

In Ohio, 144,500 persons are eligible for Medicaid. However, only 70,000 persons or 49 percent, are being served. The President's proposal to cap federal payments to the states will have a severe impact on Ohio, particularly the 21st Congressional district. Of all Ohio medicaid recipients, 17 percent live in the Cleveland area.

According to officials at the Ohio Department of Public Welfare, the state projects that in fiscal year 1986 a 14 percent increase over last year's medicaid expenditures will be necessary to meet the needs of medicaid recipients. If the President's proposal is approved, by mid-1986, the state of Ohio will experience a $40 to $50 million shortfall for Medicaid. This shortfall would force the state to trim medicaid eligibility, reduce services and take other actions to limit medicaid expenditures.

Moreover, medicaid law authorizes states to pay premiums for certain low-income elderly in the Medicare program. With the President's proposal to increase out-of-pocket expenses for the elderly, an additional financial burden may be shifted to the medicaid program if a significant number of seniors become unable to pay for the costs of their Medicare Part B premiums. Under this scenario, a significant amount of the burden will be felt in the 21st district where nearly 13 percent of the population is 65 or older.

FAMILY PLANNING

Family planning (Title 10) is the primary voluntary family planning program funded by the federal government. The program provides over 50 percent of available federal support for family planning services and the national network of family planning agencies through which all subsidized services are provided. The goal of the program has been to serve a population of nearly 11 million women at risk of unintended pregnancy. This includes 5 million adolescent women ages 15 to 19 and 6 million adult women ages 20 to 44 in families with incomes below 200 percent of poverty. Services include physical exams, contraception, counseling, cancer detection, health and social service referral, and community education.

As a direct result of the federally funded family planning program, in 1981 alone, more than 800,000 unintended pregnancies—about half of them among teenagers—were averted. If these unplanned pregnancies had occurred, there would have been an estimated 282,000 additional births and 433,000 more abortions that year. In the State of Ohio, family planning saves $5.30 in taxpayers dollars for every $1.00 of public funds invested.

Despite the apparent need for family planning services nationwide, the Reagan Administration has consistently taken actions to erode funding for the program. In fiscal years 1982 through 1985, President Reagan proposed to repeal the family planning program as a categorical grant program and place it in a block grant. Each time the Congress has rejected the Administration's proposals. In spite of past Congressional objections to his policies in this area, President Reagan has again, in his FY 1986 budget, proposed to consolidate family planning activities into a primary health block grant. Budget authority for the primary block grant would be set at $550 million. In addition to family planning services, the block grant would include, black lung clinics and migrant and community health centers. Taking inflation into account, this amount results in a net 3 percent reduction in funding for these programs.

In FY 1984, Cuyahoga County spent roughly $670,000 in federal funds for family planning and served over 25,000 women, most of them low-income teenagers. For FY 1985 the County expects to receive $539,200 in federal family planning funds, 17 percent below the FY 1984 amount. If the President's FY 1986 proposals are successful, nearly 3,700 low-income patients would have to be dropped from the program over the next two years. For many of these women, denied access to the program will most likely result in an unintended and unwanted pregnancy. Moreover, the Cleveland area has one of the highest teenage pregnancy and infant mortality rates in the nation. If Mr. Reagan has his way, what is now a national problem may become a local tragedy.

HEALTH MANPOWER EDUCATION AND TRAINING

One critical health manpower program marked for extinction by the Reagan Administration is the National Health Service Corps (NHSC) Scholarship Program. The NHSC was established in 1970 to help eliminate the maldistribution of medical personnel throughout the U.S. Students participating in the program exchange their future medical services to medically underserved communities for scholarships paying tuition and a monthly stipend. The National Health Service Corps Scholarship program has afforded medical students, a great many of them disadvantaged minorities, a unique opportunity to develop their professional talents, and then offers them the chance to provide medical services in their own communities.

Since its inception, the NHSC has experienced remarkable success, particularly through physician placements in community health centers. In communities served by these health centers, child immunizations have increased by as much as 50 percent, hospitalizations decreased by 60 percent and the incidence of preventable diseases has declined dramatically. The NHSC has been cost-efficient as well. For every $1 spent on prenatal care, an estimated $4 to $6 is saved on newborn intensive-care costs. Despite the well documented effectiveness of the National Health Service Corps, the President has proposed no funding for new scholarships in his FY 1986 budget.

Currently there are 105 NHSC practitioners in the State of Ohio. Nearly 50 percent of the state's total are providing health care services at community health centers in the Cleveland area. In 1984, over 39,000 medically needy and poor residents sought medical and dental services from NHSC physicians and dentists practicing at the Hough Norwood Community Health Center. For communities with significant numbers of poor and underserved individuals, the Presidents decision to terminate the NHSC scholarship program will severely affect their ability to continually ensure that accessible and affordable health care is available to all in need.

Additionally, President Reagan has proposed to eliminate federal assistance for students pursuing careers in the health professions. Financial assistance is provided for health professionals and nurses under Titles 7 and 8 of the Public Health Service Act. For FY 1986, the Administration projects it will save nearly $210 million for this purpose.

Today, the cost of an education is simply out of reach for most Americans and federal assistance has become increasingly necessary as the costs of medical education continue to rise. Recent projections indicate that students graduating from some private medical schools in 1985 will have accumulated debts of $50,000 to $60,000, and that by 1986 debts of $40,000 will be typical of all students graduating from both public and private schools.

Moreover, with sky-rocketing medical school costs, federal financial aid programs have been extremely important toward ensuring that equal opportunities for access to a medical education is available to students from every socioeconomic stratum. Moreover, the continuation of medical education assistance is particularly important to well qualified disadvantaged and minority students who would otherwise be denied this opportunity simply because they lack the necessary financial resources.

The 21st Congressional District includes one of the greatest concentrations of outstanding health professions schools and health facilities anywhere in America. Any proposal to reduce or repeal financial aid for health professions students attending these colleges or universities may result in significant decreases in enrollment.

Since 1983, the federal government has provided no new funds for the Health Professions Student Loan (HPSL) Program and an increased number of students have had to look to the more expensive guaranteed loan programs for support. However, schools have been allowed to use the funds that have been repayed by former students to offer new loans to incoming students.

At Case Western Reserve University (CWRU), which has one of the finest medical and dental schools in the area, over half of the students receive some type of financial assistance. Last year, 43 students received loans from the HPSL Program for a total $168,000. Without any additional revenue, the elimination of the HPSL Program would result in the depletion of the school's HPSL loan fund and fewer financially needy and minority health professions students would receive aid. For the nursing school at CWRU, the elimination of funding for nurse education and training would have an even greater impact. Of a total enrollment of 309 students, 145 students receive financial aid. The President proposals would result in the loss of over $650,000 in aid for the nursing school.

AID TO FAMILIES WITH DEPENDENT CHILDREN

The Aid To Families With Dependent Children (AFDC) Program provides cash assistance to low-income families with children, primarily single parents. About 3.7 million families currently receive AFDC benefits, but these families represent only a fraction of all poor families. AFDC payments average only about $24 a week per person nationally.

During the past four years, about 725,000 families lost AFDC benefits entirely due to budget reductions initiated by the Reagan Administration. Federal expenditures for AFDC program were reduced by more than $2 billion during the period.

For FY 1986, the Reagan Administration again plans to reduce AFDC benefit expenditures by about $271 million or 3%. These budget "savings" would be offset by $145 million in increased administrative costs associated with the Administration proposed program changes for a net AFDC budget cut of $126 million. In order to achieve budget savings, the Administration proposes four program changes which are identical or similar to proposals already considered and rejected by Congress. They include:

Requiring employable AFDC recipients to work or participate in job training programs; all AFDC applicants should be required for jobs.

Requiring single minor parents to live with their parents to be eligible for AFDC benefits.

Denying AFDC benefits to employable parent or relative caring for children when the youngest child reaches 16.

Establishing a state administrative block grant for costs of adminstering AFDC and other welfare programs.

In Cuyahoga County, about 119,000 parents and children receive AFDC benefits each month. Most are 21st District residents and all "employable" parents would be affected by the Administration's workfare proposals. An uncertain number of beneficiaries would be affected by the other proposed AFDC program changes.

LEGAL SERVICES

For the fifth consecutive year, President Reagan has proposed to terminate the Legal Services Corporation (LSC) at a time when the need for the LSC has never been higher. With the number of families in poverty at record high numbers, more and more people are in need of assistance for the often desperate legal problems that can accompany poverty. In the 21st District, more than 100,000 persons, or 20 percent of the total population of the 21st District, have incomes below the poverty line and qualify for services funded by the LSC. Currently, the Legal Services Corporation receives $305 million in federal support and provides vital funding to the Legal Aid Society in Cleveland.

If President Reagan's FY 1986 budget proposal is approved, the Legal Aid Society in Cleveland would lose $1.7 million in resources needed to assist low-income citizens with such every day problems as tenant-landlord disputes, social security disability payment terminations and consumer protection issues. Under the President's budget, the Legal Aid Society would be forced to lay off more than 15 lawyers who together handle more than 3,000 cases each year. This lost capacity to help poor and disadvantaged citizens in the 21st District translates into a profound and direct denial of essential services to needy clients.

MASS TRANSIT

Urban mass transit programs throughout the nation would be severely affected by Administration budget proposals which would slash federal funding for Urban Mass Transportation Administration (UMTA) programs. The FY 1986 budget includes only $1.127 for federal assistance for mass transit programs compared with a FY 1985 appropriation of $3.382 billion. In slashing the federal mass transit budget by nearly three-fourths, President Reagan would abolish mass transit operating assistance grants and discretionary capital grants. Additionally, interstate transfer transit grants (grants obtained in substitution for old I-490 projects) would be funded under the program previously reserved for substitute highway projects.

To replace these programs, a scaled-back formula capital assistance program, financed by the one cent gasoline tax dedicated to transit, would be funded at $1.1 billion, with an increased local matching requirement of 30 percent.

The President's proposals would completely alter the current structure of federal mass transit programs established in 1982 and revoke the historical federal commitment to mass transit. These proposals would impair the ability of urban cities, such as Cleveland, to maintain a high degree of mobility for their residents and sustain economic vitality and growth.

For FY 1985, Cleveland's Regional Transit Authority (RTA) will receive at least $30 million in federal resources to operate and maintain rapid transit services in Cleveland. Under the President's budget, RTA would lose nearly 50 percent of this aid, including $11 million for operating assistance and at least $6 million in formula and discretionary capital grants. Additional dollars could be lost in FY 1986 depending upon RTA's success in competing for interstate transfer Transit grants. Major capital investment projects that would be jeopardized by the Administration proposals include the rehabilitation of the Red Line from Burke Airport to Windemere; improvements to the Terminal Tower station, and planned bus replacement. The drastic cut in federal operating subsidies, comprising 10–11 percent of RTA's total operating budget, would force either fare increases, service reductions or some combination of these actions to offset the sudden and striking loss of vital federal resources.

AMTRAK

Amtrak, which provides passenger rail service largely in the Northeast and the Midwest, would receive no federal funding in FY 1986 under President Reagan's FY 1986 budget. In FY 1985, Amtrak received $684 million in federal subsidies.

If Congress approves a termination of federal support to Amtrak, it is expected that Amtrak would have to declare bankruptcy on October 1, 1985. This would mean the termination of Amtrak's Lake Shore Limited rail service to Cleveland with terminal points in Boston, New York, and Chicago. The Lake Shore Limited services 40,000 Cleveland area riders annually.

Amtrak also buys about $1.3 million in goods and services annually from Cleveland area businesses. Thus, the Cleveland area economy would lose this source of revenue if Amtrak is forced to shut down due to the loss of its federal subsidy.

HOUSING

The Federal government currently provides housing assistance to over six million households. This broad undertaking reflects the national housing policy which Congress adopted in 1949 and has reaffirmed in successive amendments to the Housing Act. In that Act, Congress stated that a decent and safe living environment should be provided to every American family as soon as possible.

Over the last 12 years, Congress has provided $86 billion in housing assistance through the Farmers Home Administration (FHMA) and the Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD) toward the goal of providing housing to those who are not ordinarily accommodated by the private market. This year, however, the Administration, through its FY 1986 budget proposals for HUD and FMHA would impose a moratorium on producting new units of federally subsidized housing and would terminate the FMHA housing assistance programs. In 1988, after the end of the proposed moratorium, the Administration plans to split federal allocations for new assisted housing units between rural and urban areas.

If Congress approves a two year housing moratorium the city of Cleveland would suffer the loss of at least 1,395 units of subsidized housing and probably more. About $14 million normally received by the City for planning and development purposes would also be lost. The city of Cleveland estimates its housing losses under the President's budget to include the following:

70 units under the Section 202 Elderly/Handicapped Housing Program;

200 units under the Rental Rehabilitation Grant Program;

50 units under the Housing Development Action Grant;

300 units under the Public Housing Modernization Program;

75 units under the Section 312 Program;

200 units under Section 8 Moderate Rehabilitation Program; and 500 units under the Section 8 Existing Housing Program.

The Administration contends that these cuts are necessary in order to reduce the deficit and reform the delivery of Federal housing assistance. However, a freeze on housing development programs will mean that the 100,000 housing units which historically have been produced each year nationwide will not be available to mitigate the effects of an annual loss of 350,000 units from the marketplace because they are either substandard or have been demolished.

PUBLIC HOUSING OPERATING SUBSIDIES

The Reagan Administration proposes an appropriation of $1.0 billion to pay operating subsidies to public housing agencies (PHA's) in FY 1986. This amount is 20% below the $1.4 billion appropriation for this purpose in FY 1985. Although Congress approved these funds to pay 100% of the entitlement amount due PHA's under HUD's Performance Funding System, the Administration has asked Congress to rescind $253 million of the $1.4 billion appropriation based on the assumption that these funds will not be needed due to new regulations and projected energy cost savings.

In FY 1984, the Cuyahoga Metropolitan Housing Authority received $25 million in federal operating subsidy payments to maintain the 11,800 public housing units in Cleveland. Of this amount, about $16 million was needed for utility payments, leaving only $8 million to finance essential maintenance, security and other operational activities. Even with the federal subsidy and rental income, the CMHA experienced a deficit of $3.5 million in FY 1984.

For FY 1985, CMHA expects to receive about $24 million in federal subsidies, based on receiving 100 percent of its entitlement. If Congress approves the Administration's rescission proposal and public housing operating requirements are greater than expected, CMHA could experience a significant loss in federal resources. This could have a critical impact on CMHA's ability to provide services to its residents, since the Authority already anticipates an operating deficit of at least $2 million in FY 1985.

A similar situation exists for FY 1986. According to the Council for Large Public Housing Authorities, about $1.3 billion will be needed in FY 1986 to provide PHA's with 100 percent of their operating subsidy requirements. If the President Reagan's budget request of $1.0 billion is approved, resulting in a 20 percent funding shortfall, PHA's across the country, including CMHA could face considerable difficulty in sustaining needed operations.

PUBLIC HOUSING MODERNIZATION

The President proposes a partial moratorium on the Public Housing Modernization Program for one year—FY 1986. During this year, the $1.7 billion Public Housing Modernization Program would be replaced by a $175 million Emergency Modernization Needs Program. This represents a sharp reduction of 90 percent in funding for critical public housing modernization projects. The definition of emergency needs under the interim program has not yet been defined by the Administration. Therefore, it is not possible to determine how much of these funds will be distributed to CMHA. At a minimum, however, Cleveland should qualify for funds to meet emergency heating needs at the Carver Park development.

The impact of the moratorium upon Cleveland will mean that CMHA will not receive funds to upgrade 300 now vacant substandard units. A high vacancy rate means that CMHA will continue to lose valuable income. CMHA has performed a study which reveals that in order to bring all its units up to standard, CMHA should receive $143 million in modernization funds. In FY 1984 CMHA received only $2 million in modernization funds for the second stage funding of Old Cedar Homes in the 21st District. The funds will modernize 651 apartments.

COMMUNITY AND URBAN DEVELOPMENT

Included in the programs to be eliminated by the fiscal 1986 budget is the popular Urban Development Action Grant Program (UDAG). This program is administered by the Department of Housing and Urban Development as part of its community planning and development efforts and was funded at $444 million in FY 1985. UDAG grants leverage private sector money for urban and small city revitalization projects.

UDAG funds have been used in the 21st District to provide financing for businesses which have provided over 800 new permanent jobs, thereby refuting the Administration's contention that the program does not create new jobs. Indeed, the program has been a vehicle for the creation of jobs. Out of the total of the jobs brought to Cleveland through the UDAG program, 23 percent are held by minorities. The termination of this important economic development and job creation tool will mean a loss to Cleveland of an average of $15 million a year in federal resources and an average private sector investment of $75 million. The abolishment of the UDAG Program would also mean that potentially 3,200 new jobs may not be realized because future UDAG grants would be used by the City to attract and assist new businesses to either retool, or to relocate in the Cleveland area.

Coupled with the termination of the UDAG Program is the Administration's intention to reduce funding for the Community Development Block Grant (CDBG). The FY 1986 budget includes only $3.1 billion for CDBG grants, down from the $3.5 billion appropriated by the Congress for fiscal year 1985. These funds are used by City of Cleveland and local communities to fund a wide range of activities, such as the acquisition and disposition of real property, construction of public facilities, rehabilitation of housing and business properties, and the provision of public services. CDBG allocations made by the City for street improvements and public services would probably be cut at least 10 percent below current levels in FY 1986 as a result of the lower level of federal support.

Section 108, an important loan guarantee component of federal community development activities is slated for zero funds in FY 1986. The Section 108 programs allows the City to finance the costs of rehabilitation and acquisition of publicly-owned building over an extended period. The loss of this important loan guarantee program will mean that $1.2 million a year and 125 jobs will be lost to Cleveland. The Administration plans to make the FY 1986 zero funding request permanent by offering legislation to repeal Section 108.

EPA CONSTRUCTION GRANTS

This program provides grants to municipal agencies to assist in the construction of municipal waste water treatment plants. As a result of legislation enacted in 1981, the federal share for new projects has been reduced from 75 percent to 55 percent beginning in 1985. For FY 1986, the Administration again requests $2.4 billion (the annual level of funding provided since 1982), but is also asking for legislation to phase out the program by 1990. Under the proposal, remaining appropriations would be dedicated to the completion by 1990 of 11 existing projects which are now under construction.

The rationale advanced for the elimination of federal sewage construction grants is that their original purpose has been eliminated: the backlog which existed in 1972 currently does not exist. Further, the Administration believes that the duty to treat local water supplies is a state and local responsibility. These arguments are strongly refuted by the statistics which describe the State of Ohio. In Ohio, the priority project list for cities applying for EPA construction grants is comprised of 632 communities. In fiscal year 1984, grants to 34 projects were disbursed. However, in fiscal year 1985, the projects receiving aid will be less than half those of 1984. Obviously, towns, such as Bedford, Ohio, in the 21st District—number 432 on Ohio EPA's list—would not be able to obtain more than $7 million in resources needed to retrofit its existing plant for conformance with the requirements of the Clean Water Act.

Although the State of Ohio is now considering the establishment of a loan program to finance the difference between the costs financed by the federal government and the total amount required to build local sewage plants, the phase out of the federal program before the States have had the chance to establish a new financing structure could cause the reemergence of the backlog which existed in 1972. That backlog will certainly be greater than the 632 Ohio municipalities which are currently in need of assistance to build wastewater treatment facilities.

OFFICE OF REVENUE SHARING

The Administration seeks to phase out the General Revenue Sharing program on September 30, 1985, one year prior to the expiration of the State and Local Fiscal Assistance Act of 1972 which authorizes the distribution of $4.6 billion annually to over 39,000 units of local government in FY 1984, 1985 and 1986. The Administration believes that general revenue sharing no longer meets the purpose for which it was originally proposed in the seventies. It states that many beneficiary local governments do not need the revenue assistance because they are now hold surpluses instead of the deficits they ran previously. Further, the Administration states that the redistributive effect is random and the formula does not benefit the states with the greatest need.

The funds are provided to local governments through a formula which reflects the income of the community. Relatively higher payments go to communities with high tax efforts and low per capita incomes. Therefore, the most generous per capita payments go to thousands of poor rural communities as well as to financially troubled major cities. The proponents of the general revenue sharing program believe that it has made significant contributions toward reducing fiscal disparities between local governments receiving assistance.

The impact upon the 21st District of the termination of general revenue sharing would be a loss of $12-13 million. These resources are particularly useful to local communities. For example, in Cleveland, revenue sharing funds have been used to pay for the following programs:

$2.9 million for fire programs, 21 percent of the City budget for fire programs;

$2.8 million for health programs, 10 percent of the City budget for health;

$620,000 for libraries, 100 percent of the City budget for library programs; and

$5.3 million for parks and recreation, 24 percent of the City's budget for this item.

The positive impact that revenue sharing has upon Cleveland is best demonstrated by the amount that it receives for the library system. Without revenue sharing dollars, the City would have had to raise the entire amount from the residents of the City in the form of additional taxes. If the Administration's request is honored by the Congress, then the prospect of local taxes rising to replace the lost revenue sharing dollars is a firm prospect.

SMALL BUSINESS ADMINISTRATION/ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION

In the Budget for fiscal year 1986, the Administration intends to terminate funding for the Economic Development Administration and the Small Business Administration. Both programs have had a positive effect upon Cleveland and the 21st District.

The Economic Development Administration (EDA) which is funded through the Department of Commerce, has as major goals the stimulation of economic growth, the provision of permanent private sector jobs and the leveraging of private sector dollars. In order to accomplish its goals, the EDA utilizes industrial and commercial loans, provides technical assistance, and offers loan guarantees. Since 1965, EDA has used its resources to provide assistance to regions where advanced technology or foreign competition have caused severe economic distress, and where the businesses have moved taking jobs with them.

The Small Business Administration (SBA) is an independent agency in the Executive Branch. This agency offers to small business technical assistance, procurement information for the federal government, advocacy for the use of small business, research and technology, and also makes available a corps of retired executives for consultation.

Both the EDA and the SBA offer technical and financial assistance to businesses which are of sound value and, have sufficient resources to secure the repayment of the loans granted. The loans are made to firms which have tried to obtain funds from the private banks and have been turned down. In the case of the EDA, the borrower must have been turned down by two banks while SBA loan assistance is made available when the borrower either can not obtain funds or is unable to obtain the loan at a reasonable rate.

The Administration contends that the loan guarantees and loans made by both programs compete with private sector activities and therefore should be eliminated. The Administration further contends that neither program has created jobs at a reasonable cost and has created businesses which aid upper income groups. The Administration arguments are refuted by the statistics for the 21st District.

Combined funds of private sector, SBA and EDA have totaled over $10 million in the 21st District. These funds have been used to create over 400 jobs by aiding firms in retail, manufacturing, and construction. For example, the funds from EDA have been used to develop the Midtown Industrial Park and the Cleveland Industrial Park. An important fact to note is that these jobs were created at a cost of $4,000 per job, substantially under the Administration's estimated cost of $20,000 per job in the EDA program.

The termination of these two programs will mean that nearly 150 jobs provided annually by SBA-assisted firms and 350 jobs created by EDA loans made on an annual basis will be lost to the City of Cleveland.●

INDIAN JUVENILE ALCOHOL AND DRUG ABUSE PREVENTION ACT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BEREUTER] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Speaker, today, the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. DASCHLE], the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. UDALL], the gentleman from Montana [Mr. WILLIAMS], and this Member are reintroducing the Indian Juvenile Alcohol and Drug Abuse Prevention Act. We invite the attention and support of our colleagues in this very worthy effort.

For decades, researchers have documented the use and consequences of alcohol and drug abuse among Native Americans. Inevitably, stereotypes developed about Indian drinking, although the phenomenon began with the introduction of alcohol by early European explorers, who brought whiskey, horses, guns, and tools for trading purposes. While the reasons leading to such high rates of alcohol and drug abuse among Indian people are complex, most Indian and non-Indian researchers alike point to joblessness, dislocation from tribal homelands, decline in traditional culture and spirituality, and stresses on the family unit as being among the major causes of alcohol and drug abuse. Clearly, something needed to be done.

As a result, in November 1983, this Member and the gentleman from South Dakota, Mr. DASCHLE, began discussing the extensive problems of alcohol and drug abuse that we had observed among Indian youth on reservations in our own States and across the Nation. We discovered that alcohol-related illnesses and deaths among Indian people are considerably higher than among non-Indian people. On many reservations, alcohol plays a role in 95 percent of automobile fatalities. On some reservations, fetal alcohol syndrome occurs as frequently as 1 in 100 births, whereas its occurence in non-Indian populations is approximately 1 in 700 births. Children born to alcoholic mothers are almost always retarded, and most suffer facial abnormalities and abnormalities to extremities. The use of inhalents, such as paint thinner and cleaning fluid, occurs among Indian young people at a rate almost twice as high as among non-Indian young people. The results of this use range from damage to the central nervous system to kidney failure. In addition, the vast majority of contract health care dollars—up to 70 percent—provided through Indian Health Service goes to treat alcohol and drug-related problems. Clearly such statistics demand a reassessment of the problem and a new, innovative approach.

Thus we set out to establish what was being done, and how effective those efforts were. Our investigations over the course of a year and a half revealed that of some 200 Indian Health Service alcohol treatment centers, only one or two of them addressed the needs of youth. Prevention and education programs were sporadic at best. And while no one would say that treatment of adult alcoholics should be reduced, we decided that the way to seriously combat the problem would be to develop a program that stressed prevention and taught prevention techniques to children from kindergarten age on up through high school graduation. Pursuing such a strategy, we decided, would provide a better opportunity to accomplish a permanent change over time in attitudes and self-concept.

The time has come to stop the insidious hold of alcohol and drugs on Indian communities. Our legislation will, we believe, complement tribal initiatives already under way by requiring alcohol and drug abuse prevention instruction in reservation schools. It represents a comprehensive assault on the problem—one that engages the resources of the tribes and the Federal Government as well. Our bill also provides alternatives to incarceration, where appropriate, for those young people picked up on alcohol and drug-related charges. Finally, it provides for the use of facilities now existing in Indian country for treatment and rehabilitation.

Mr. Speaker and distinguished colleagues, we need your assistance. Our legislation is carefully crafted to secure bipartisan support. It is the product of months of consultation with Indian people, among them, health and education specialists. We would welcome inquiries about the measure, and hope that through discussions about the extent and tragic consequences of the problem, as well as through hearings, we will be able to build a strong case for a full-fledged prevention effort that will stop the useless waste of young lives and talent among Indian people.

I submit the full test and a section-by-section summary of the bill for printing in the RECORD at this point:

H.R. 1156

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Indian Juvenile Alcohol and Drug Abuse Prevention Act".

TITLE I—INTERDEPARTMENTAL AGREEMENT

SEC. 101. (a) Within 90 days after the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Health and Human Services shall agree by means of a memorandum of agreement to—

(1) coordinate the Bureau of Indian Affairs and Indian Health Service alcohol and drug abuse programs existing on the date of enactment of this Act and programs established by this Act;

(2) identify Federal, State, local, and private resources to combat alcohol and drug abuse among Indians;

(3) delineate the responsibilities of the Bureau of Indian Affairs and the Indian Health Service to coordinate alcohol and drug abuse-related services at the central, area, agency, and service unit levels;

(4) determine the scope of the Indian juvenile alcohol and drug abuse problem and its estimated financial and human costs;

(5) authorize the Bureau of Indian Affairs agency superintendents and education superintendents and the Indian Health Service service unit directors to enter into agreements described in section 102; and

(6) provide for biannual review by the Secretary of the Interior and Secretary of Health and Human Services of the agreement under subsection (a).

(b)(1) The Secretary of the Interior and Secretary of Health and Human Services shall consult with and solicit the comments of interested Indian tribes and Indian individuals and Indian organizations in developing the agreement under subsection (a).

(2) The agreement under subsection (a) shall be submitted to Congress and published in the Federal Register within 90 days of the date of enactment of this Act.

SEC. 102. (a) At the request of any Indian tribe, the Bureau of Indian Affairs agency superintendent, the Bureau of Indian Affairs education superintendent, and the Indian Health Service service unit director for such tribe shall enter into an agreement with such tribe to coordinate resources and services related to alcohol and drug abuse prevention, identification, treatment, and follow-up care.

(b) Such agreement shall—

(1) identify the responsibilities and referral resources of all agencies and programs providing alcohol and drug abuse-related resources or services within such tribe's service area; and

(2) be modified semiannually to reflect changes in the availability of resources and services related to alcohol and drug abuse prevention, identification, education, treatment, and follow-up care.

SEC. 103. The Secretary of the Interior, acting through the Bureau of Indian Affairs, and the Secretary of Health and Human Services, acting through the Indian Health Service, shall bear equal responsibility for the implementation of this Act in cooperation with Indian tribes.

TITLE II—EDUCATION

SEC. 201. Section 304 of the Indian Elementary and Secondary School Assistance Act (20 U.S.C. 241cc) is amended by—

(1) striking out "and" at the end of paragraph (1);

(2) striking out the period at the end of paragraph (2) and inserting in lieu thereof "; and"; and

(3) adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(3) the training of counselors at schools eligible for funding under this title in counseling techniques relevant to alcohol and drug abuse.".

SEC. 202. Section 423 of the Indian Education Act (20 U.S.C. 3385b) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(e) 10 percent of the fellowships awarded under subsection (a) shall be awarded to persons who are receiving training in guidance counseling with a specialty in the area of alcohol and drug abuse counseling and education.".

SEC. 203. Section 315(a) of the Adult Education Act (20 U.S.C. 1211a(a)) is amended by—

(1) striking out the period at the end of paragraph (5) and inserting in lieu thereof "; and"; and

(2) adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(6) to provide alcohol and drug abuse counseling services to better enable Indians in need of such services to take advantage of educational and employment opportunities.".

SEC. 204. (a) The Secretary of the Interior shall require Bureau of Indian Affairs schools and schools operated under contract under the Indian Self-Determination and Education Assistance Act (Public Law 93-638) to provide a program of instruction regarding alcohol and drug abuse to students in kindergarten and grades one through twelve.

(b) Schools providing programs of instruction under subsection (a) are encouraged to emphasize family participation in such instruction.

SEC. 205. (a) The Secretary of the Interior shall—

(1) establish summer recreation and counseling programs for Indian youth on reservations;

(2) require such Bureau of Indian Affairs schools and schools operated under contract under the Indian Self-Determination and Education Assistance Act as he determines to be necessary to remain open during the months of June, July, and August of each year to provide adequate facilities for such programs; and

(3) provide, as needed, salaried coordinators for such programs.

(b)(1) In addition to the facilities described in subsection (a)(2), the Secretary of the Interior is encouraged to use public facilities, other than those described in such subsection, and private facilities wherever possible for programs established under subsection (a)(1).

(2) Facilities which the Secretary may use under paragraph (1) shall be used under such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon by the Secretary and the authority having jurisdiction over any such facility.

(c) The Secretary of the Interior shall coordinate any programs established under subsection (a)(1) with any other summer programs for Indian youth.

SEC. 206. The Secretary of Interior shall, within 120 days of the date of the enactment of this title, publish an alcohol and drug abuse newsletter in cooperation with the Departments of Health and Human Services and Education to report on Indian alcohol and drug abuse projects and programs. The newsletter shall be published once in each calendar quarter and shall be circulated without charge to schools, tribal offices, Bureau of Indian Affairs agency and area offices, Indian Health Service area and service unit offices, Indian Health Service alcohol programs, and other entities providing alcohol and drug abuse-related services or resources to Indian people.

TITLE III—FAMILY AND SOCIAL SERVICES

SEC. 301. (a) Any training program for community health representatives funded under the Act of November 2, 1921 (25 U.S.C. 13) shall include not less than two weeks of training on the problems of alcohol and drug abuse and shall include instruction in crisis intervention, family relations, and the causes and effects of fetal alcohol syndrome.

(b)(1) The Director of the Indian Health Service shall, either directly or through contract, make available training on the problems of alcohol and drug abuse, including instruction in crisis intervention, family relations, and the causes and effects of fetal alcohol syndrome to—

(A) the Bureau of Indian Affairs Superintendent of Education (or his designee);

(B) the Bureau of Indian Affairs Agency Superintendent (or his designee);

(C) Indian Health Service service unit directors;

(D) Bureau of Indian Affairs social workers;

(E) Indian Health Service doctors, nurses, nurse's aides, and paramedical personnel;

(F) Bureau of Indian Affairs school personnel;

(G) personnel of schools operated under contract under the Indian Self-Determination and Education Assistance Act; and

(H) supervisors of emergency shelters established under section 402(c) of this Act.

(2) The Director of the Indian Health Service shall also offer, upon request, the training described in paragraph (1) to—

(A) members of school boards governing—

(i) schools operated by the Bureau of Indian Affairs;

(ii) schools operated under contract with the Bureau of Indian Affairs; and

(iii) public schools on or near Indian reservations and public schools in Oklahoma, Alaska, and California with significant numbers of Indian students;

(B) members of parent advisory committees of Bureau of Indian Affairs schools;

(C) members of child welfare protection committees serving Indian communities;

(D) educators at Tribal colleges which do not otherwise provide alcohol and drug abuse training to their personnel;

(E) Urban Indian Center counselors;

(F) home-school-liaison personnel funded under the Indian Elementary and Secondary School Assistance Act;

(G) Tribal Council members;

(H) Tribal court judges;

(I) Administrators of the Women, Infants and Children Program operated by the Department of Agriculture;

(J) personnel of public schools on or near Indian reservations and public schools in Oklahoma, Alaska, and California with significant numbers of Indian students; and

(K) any interested member of the Indian community.

(c) The Secretary of Health and Human Services shall, upon request, provide certification to any person who completes training under this title for the purposes of obtaining academic credit or certification at any post-secondary educational institution.

TITLE IV—LAW ENFORCEMENT

SEC. 401. The Director of the Bureau of Indian Affairs shall, in the training of Bureau of Indian Affairs law enforcement personnel, provide education on the problem of alcohol and drugs among the Indian juveniles.

SEC. 402. (a)(1) Subject to paragraphs (2) and (3), any tribal, Federal, or Bureau of Indian Affairs law enforcement officer who arrests an Indian juvenile for any offense related to the abuse of alcohol or drugs shall, in lieu of incarceration, place such juvenile in a temporary emergency shelter described in subsection (c) or a community-based alcohol or drug abuse treatment facility to the extent such facilities are available.

(2) Paragraph (1) and any regulation promulgated under paragraph (3) of this subsection shall not supersede any tribal law.

(3) The Secretary of the Interior, in consultation with the Attorney General of the United States, shall promulgate guidelines under which a law enforcement officer may place an Indian juvenile arrested for an offense related to the abuse of alcohol or drugs in a facility other than an emergency shelter described in subsection (c) for the benefit of the Indian juvenile or the safety of the community.

(b) In the case of any State which exercises criminal jurisdiction over any part of Indian country under section 1162 of title 18 of the United States Code or section 401 of the Act of April 11, 1968 (25 U.S.C. 1321), such State is urged to require its law enforcement officers to—

(1) place any Indian juvenile arrested for any offense related to the abuse of alcohol or drugs in a temporary emergency shelter described in subsection (c) or a community-based alcohol or drug abuse treatment facility in lieu of incarceration to the extent such facilities are available; and

(2) observe the guidelines promulgated under subsection (a)(3).

(c)(1) The Director of the Bureau of Indian Affairs shall establish a program and approve a compensation schedule under which households of Indian families will be compensated to serve as temporary emergency shelters for Indian juveniles apprehended by any law enforcement officer for offenses related to the abuse of alcohol or drugs.

(2) No emergency shelter established under a program established under paragraph (1) shall commence operation until—

(A) the tribal council of any tribe to be served by such shelter approves such shelter; and

(B) such shelter meets the licensing requirements promulgated by the Bureau of Indian Affairs under paragraph (3).

(3)(A) The Bureau of Indian Affairs shall, within 120 days of the date of enactment of this paragraph, promulgate standards by which the emergency shelters established under a program under paragraph (1) shall become licensed.

(B) Such standards shall require that any individual supervising such shelter have completed the training described in section 301(b)(1) of this Act.

(4) The costs of construction of any emergency shelter are not authorized by this Act.

TITLE V—JUVENILE ALCOHOL AND DRUG ABUSE TREATMENT AND REHABILITATION

SEC. 501. The Director of the Indian Health Service shall, within 6 months of the date of enactment of this Act, conduct a study to determine—

(1) the size of the juvenile Indian population in need of residential alcohol and drug abuse treatment;

(2) where facilities to provide such treatment are or should be located; and

(3) the cost of providing such treatment.

SEC. 502. (a) The Director of the Indian Health Service shall provide a program of comprehensive alcohol and drug abuse treatment services, including detoxification and counseling services, and follow-up care in Indian Health Service facilities and in facilities operated under contract under the Indian Self-Determination and Education Assistance Act to to Indian juveniles and adults in need of such services.

(b) No health facility described in subsection (a) shall be required under this section to provide inpatient services if such facility is primarily an outpatient facility.

(c) The Director shall report on the progress of the program provided under subsection (a) to relevant committees of the Congress within 18 months after the completion of the study described in section 501.

SEC. 503. (a)(1) The Secretary of Health and Human Services shall, in consultation with the Indian Health Service and the Bureau of Indian Affairs, identify and utilize wherever possible existing federally owned structures suitable for use as residential alcohol and drug abuse treatment centers for Indian juveniles to meet the needs identified in the study under section 501.

(2) Any structure described in paragraph (1) may be used under such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon by the Secretary of Health and Human Services and the agency having responsibility for the structure.

(3) The Secretary of Health and Human Services may, directly or by contract, renovate any facility described in paragraph (1). Any such renovation shall conform with such terms and conditions as have been agreed upon under paragraph (2).

(b) The Secretary of Interior shall identify for the Secretary of Health and Human Services any existing Bureau of Indian Affairs facilities which could be utilized for residential alcohol and drug abuse treatment centers for Indian juveniles.

(c) If there is not an adequate number of facilities which may be renovated under subsection (a)(3) to meet the treatment needs identified in the study under section 501, the Secretary of Health and Human Services shall seek specific authority to construct such facilities as he finds necessary to meet such treatment needs.

TITLE VI—DEFINITIONS, EFFECTIVE DATE, AND AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 601. For the purposes of this Act, the term—

(1) "Indian tribe" means any Indian tribe, band, nation, or other organized group or community of Indians, including any Alaskan Native village or regional or village corporation as defined in or established pursuant to the Alaska Claims Settlement Act (43 U.S.C. 1601, et. seq.) which is recognized as eligible for special programs and services provided by the United States to Indians because of their status as Indians;

(2) "Indian" means any person who is a member of an Indian tribe;

(3) "juvenile" means any Indian under the age of 18;

(4) "service unit" means an administrative entity within the Indian Health Service serving one or more Indian tribes within a geographical area defined by regulation by the Indian Health Service;

(5) "service area" means the geographical area served by a service unit;

(6) "Indian Health Service area office" means an administrative entity within the Indian Health Service through which services and funds are provided to service units within a geographical area defined by regulation by the Indian Health Service;

(7) "Bureau of Indian Affairs area office" means an administrative entity within the Bureau of Indian Affairs through which funds and services are provided to agency offices within a geographical area defined by regulation by the Bureau of Indian Affairs; and

(8) "agency office" means an administrative entity within the Bureau of Indian Affairs serving one or more Indian tribes within a geographical area defined by regulation by the Bureau of Indian Affairs.

SEC. 602. (a) Except as provided in subsection (b), this Act shall become effective October 1, 1985.

(b) Titles I and VI and section 402(b)(3) of this Act shall become effective on the date of enactment of the Act.

SEC. 603. (a) There is authorized to be appropriated $5,000,000 to carry out the amendments in title II, the provisions of titles III and IV and the study in section 501 of this Act.

(b) There is authorized to be appropriated such sum as Congress determines to be necessary to carry out sections 502 and 503 of this Act after taking into consideration the findings of the study conducted pursuant to section 501.

SUMMARY OF JUVENILE INDIAN ALCOHOL AND DRUG ABUSE PREVENTION ACT

Section 101. Memorandum of Agreement to be made between Secretaries of Interior and Health and Human Services to coordinate programs and delineate responsibilities dealing with the prevention, identification, treatment and follow-up care of alcohol and drug abuse. Memorandum will include authority for agency level BIA Superintendents and IHS Service Unit Directors to enter into agreements with tribes regarding alcohol and drug abuse efforts.

Section 102. At the request of a tribe, IHS Service Unit Director and BIA Superintendent will enter into agreement with the tribe to coordinate programs dealing with the prevention, identification, treatment and follow-up care of alcohol and drug abuse.

Sections 201, 202 and 203. Amend the Indian Education Act to:

(a) include as Part A eligible activities drug and alcohol abuse counselling

(b) earmark in Part B fellowships a 10% setaside of fellowships for people pursuing degrees in counselling with an emphasis on alcohol and drug abuse counselling

(c) include as Part C eligible activities alcohol and drug abuse counselling

Section 204. Require all BIA and Contract schools to provide alcohol and drug education in grades K-12.

Section 205. Secretary of the Interior shall establish summer recreation and counselling programs for youth on reservations. Shall require, as necessary, BIA and Contract schools to remain open in the summer for these programs. Secretary may enter into agreements to keep public and nonpublic facilities open in the summer for youth programs. The Secretary may, as needed, provide for salaries coordinators for summer youth programs.

Section 206. Secretary of Interior shall publish, in cooperation with the Secretaries of Education and HHS, a quarterly alcohol and drug abuse newsletter reporting on tribal alcohol and drug abuse projects and programs. Publication shall be circulated free of charge.

Section 301(a). Community Health Representatives shall receive not less than two weeks training in alcohol and drug abuse, including instruction in crisis intervention, family relations and fetal alcohol syndrome.

Section 301(b)(1). IHS shall provide, directly or through contract, alcohol and drug abuse training to the following people: BIA Education Superintendents, BIA Agency Superintendents, IHS Service Unit Directors, BIA social workers, IHS doctors, nurses, nurses' aides and paramedics, BIA school personnel, Contract school personnel, and supervisors of emergency shelters.

Section 301(b)(2). IHS shall offer, directly or through contract, alcohol and drug abuse training to the following people: BIA, Contract and public school boards personnel (on or near reservations, including Oklahoma, Alaska and California), parent advisory committee members, child welfare protection committee members, Urban Indian Center counsellors, home-school liaison personnel funded under the Indian Education Act, tribal college educators (unless the college already offers this service to its employees), tribal council members, tribal court judges, WIC personnel, public school personnel on or near reservations (including Oklahoma, Alaska and California) and other interested community members.

Section 301(c). The Secretary of HHS shall provide certification for completed alcohol training for the purpose of obtaining academic credit at post-secondary institutions.

Section 401. The BIA shall provide, as part of its training for law enforcement personnel, education regarding alcohol and drug abuse.

Section 402(a) (1), (2) and (3). Indian juveniles arrested by federal, BIA or tribal law enforcement officers shall, when possible, be placed in emergency shelters or other facilities in lieu of incarceration. The Department of Interior shall establish guidelines for placement of youths in non-jail facilities. No guidelines or regulations can supercede tribal laws.

Section 402(b) (1) and (2). Where states exercise criminal jurisdiction in Indian country, law enforcement personnel are encouraged to place juveniles in emergency shelters or other facilities in lieu of incarceration. States are encouraged to follow regulations established by the Secretary of Interior regarding placement of juveniles.

Section 402(c) (1) (2), (3), and (4). The BIA is directed to establish a program to compensate families to serve as temporary emergency shelters for juveniles apprehended for alcohol and drug related offenses. Emergency shelters must meet BIA licensing requirements and be approved by tribal councils. Supervisors of emergency shelters shall have training in alcohol and drug abuse. No emergency shelter construction costs are authorized by this bill.

Section 501. IHS shall, within 6 months, provide a report to Congress on the size of the juvenile Indian population in need of residential alcohol or drug treatment, where such facilities should be located and the cost of providing such treatment.

Section 502. IHS shall provide comprehensive alcohol and drug treatment services, including detoxification, counselling and follow-up care.

Section 503. The Secretary of HHS, in consultation with the Directors of IHS and BIA, shall identify possible buildings that can be used as juvenile Indian alcohol/drug abuse residential treatment facilities. The Secretary of HHS is given the authority to renovate facilities, either directly or by contract, so that they may be used as juvenile treatment facilities. The Secretary of Interior shall make known any BIA facility suitable for juvenile treatment purposes. If not enough existing facilities are available, the Secretary of HHS shall seek authority to construct residential alcohol and drug treatment facilities for Indian juveniles.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 days in which to extend their remarks in the RECORD on the subject of my special order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

THE DISPUTED ELECTION IN THE EIGHTH DISTRICT OF INDIANA

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GINGRICH] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, I take the floor this afternoon to talk about the case of the people of Indiana and Rick McIntyre, who won election in Indiana, and the problem we have in getting the people of Indiana adequate representation in the Congress and the very grave danger to this congressional system from the policies which have been followed by the Democratic leadership in not seating Mr. McIntyre.

The case is very simple. On election night Mr. McIntyre won the election in Indiana. Because of a mathematical error in counting the precincts twice by a Democratic judge in one particular county, for a brief period of time it appeared that the Democratic incumbent, Mr. McCloskey, had won, but in fact there was a mathematical error which was discovered, and when the votes were counted accurately, the secretary of state of Indiana concluded that Mr. McIntyre had won by 34 votes—a narrow victory, but nonetheless a victory.

The secretary of state of Indiana certified that Mr. McIntyre had won and sent the certificate to the House of Representatives, and on the day this Congress was convened the Clerk of the House reported that Mr. McIntyre had won, and indeed on the vote for Speaker Mr. McIntyre voted. Only after the vote for Speaker did the Democratic leadership move to stop Mr. McIntyre and to force him to stand to one side.

This is an unprecedent step. There were claims that there was confusion, that the 34 votes were too narrow, and that in fact there had to be a recount. Interestingly, the Democratic incumbent who had been defeated, Mr. McCloskey, did not file under the Federal Elections Act and did not seek to make a case and in fact behaved as though he had been defeated. But here on the House floor the Democratic leadership decided to do something which constitutionally is unprecedented, to stop the people of Indiana from having their Representative, even though the secretary of state of Indiana had certified that he had won.

A recount was underway. So without doing more than protesting with our votes and speaking out, we stood to one side for approximately 1 month, and when the recount was over, under Indiana law, in 15 counties, following the procedures of Indiana law, with Democrats in a majority of the recount situations being in charge, because they have local control, not only did Mr. McIntyre win the recount but he won by a larger margin; that is, he went from 34 votes ahead of Mr. McCloskey, the Democrat who had been defeated, to 418 votes ahead of Mr. McCloskey, the Democrat who had been defeated.

Once the recount was done, it was clear. There were no mathematical errors. They had carefully and scrupulously followed Indiana law. They had taken the steps necessary to prevent cheating, and they had taken the steps necessary to prevent the voting of ballots which may have been cast by fraud. They had done precisely what Indiana requires, and at that point Mr. McIntyre's margin had gone up to 418 votes. And yet on the last day we were in session before the Presidential holidays recess, this House voted, with only five Democrats voting to follow the Constitution, with only five Democrats voting to seat the man who had won the election and the recount.

Why did only five Democrats cross the line? I think there are two reasons. First, many good, decent Democrats have been misled by their leadership and have been told things which are simply not correct, and, second, many Democrats are afraid because some very powerful Democrats have put their prestige, indeed possibly their careers, on the line in an effort to take a seat which the people of Indiana have voted not to give to the Democratic incumbent.

We stand then today in a very unprecedented and a very dangerous situation. We stand in a situation in which for the first time in American history the people of a congressional district are being denied representation while a task force looks at the election.

Now, let me make very clear that there is nothing wrong with the task force looking at the election. I serve on the House Administration Committee, and I think when there is any question, we ought to investigate the elections and we ought to make sure the correct persons are seated. But historically, if the State government certifies that a member has won an election, if the State government is willing to put its honor and its prestige on the line and say, "We believe we have counted these votes honestly, and we believe Mr. McIntyre has won," historically we always seat the winner while looking at the election.

The reason for that is very simple. If we establish the precedent in this House that 218 Members can decide to deny an election winner and set him or her to one side and say, "We are not going to seat you while we decide some other things," and then go through long, complicated counting procedures and through the difficulties of staff work and for a variety of reasons drag it out—and, after all, the people of Indiana are now into their second month with inadequate representation—then the people of the Eighth District of Indiana have not been represented for the first 7 weeks of this Congress and they are literally being taxed without representation. That is precisely what the American Revolution was about.

This could drag on for months, with a truly clever political machine willing to place its own partisan interests above the Nation and above the Constitution. They could drag out a recount for 4, 5, or 6 months and could find all sorts of reasons to dispute it. And I have been told there is some dispute about what the Democrats were told on the day on which we voted. Some people suggested that within 45 days the work of the task force could be done. Others suggested that by April 30, a far longer period than 45 days, the task force's work could be done, and that is without any complications.

Now, we are not suggesting that the people on the task force are not trying to be sincere and to be dedicated and to be good citizens. What we are suggesting is that the task force could continue its policies while Mr. McIntyre was seated, that seating Mr. McIntyre would provide representation for the people of Indiana based upon the Indiana secretary of state certification, based on the election count and the recount, and that during the period the task force was meeting, at least the people of Indiana would have all their voices, rather than being one short and the people of the Eighth District would have their voice instead of being unrepresented.

Now, this opinion is not a partisan Republican opinion. Very sincere and very competent Democrats who have looked at this issue, five of them, took the very courageous risk of turning aside their party whip and voting against their party's leadership, an act for which some of them may indeed be punished ultimately, an act of great courage, because the pressures were enormous.

The Washington Post, hardly a Republican newspaper, on February 11 wrote an editorial entitled, "A Seat for Mr. McIntyre." I want to quote it, because the Washington Post is a liberal newspaper normally and normally not a newspaper that goes out of its way to be decisively helpful to Republicans, but it is a newspaper which has looked at this issue and which has come to the conclusion, which I think every Member of this House should look at.

> On the day the 99th Congress convened, a cloud remained over the election results in Indiana's 8th District. Incumbent Democrat Frank McCloskey appeared to be the victor on election night. He was ahead by 72 votes. But after a correction had been made in the count in one county, Republican challenger Richard McIntyre pulled ahead by 34 votes.
> Indiana's secretary of state certified Mr. McIntyre as the winner, but the Democrats demanded a full recount in each of the district's 15 counties. That recount had not been completed by the first week in January, and both men showed up to be sworn in when the House met. Because the earlier count had been so close and the recount was still in progress, the House, on a party-line vote, refused to seat either man that day, though both have been on the payroll temporarily. The postponement was reasonable at that time.
> Last week a recount of all counties in the 8th District was completed, and the final figures show Mr. McIntyre to be the winner by a comfortable 418 votes. There are no allegations of fraud, and even though thousands of ballots were disqualified during the recount, the action was taken, in 90 percent of the cases by election commissions dominated by Democrats. Nevertheless, the House on Thursday refused once again to seat Mr. McIntyre—even conditionally—because the Committee on House Administration is reviewing the returns. This process is expected to take another 45 days.
> Mr. McCloskey has every right to challenge the result of the election in court, as former Rep. George Hansen has done in his tight Idaho contest. But there is no need for the House to wait for a judicial determination to seat the winner. Nor is it necessary to leave the people of Indiana's 8th District without a voting representative in Congress until April. The votes are in. They have been counted twice. The margin of victory is comfortable, and Indiana election officials have twice certified the winner. The House is the final judge of the qualifications of its members, but until and unless the Committee on Administration finds otherwise, Mr. McIntyre ought to be seated.

That is the Washington Post calling for the seating of Congressman McIntyre.

Let me make this case again to reinforce the Post's point. The burden of proof is on the Democrats who lost the election, not on Mr. McIntyre who won the election. The secretary of state said on election night that Mr. McIntyre won. The secretary of state has said now that the recount is done, Mr. McIntyre has won. Therefore, the burden of proof is on those who would take away his seat, not on him. He should be seated until there is proof conclusive that he should not have won. Every indication at the present moment is that he is seated, that he has won, that the people voted for him. And yet what do we find? We find that the people of the Eighth District of Indiana have no representation.

Other people around America are beginning to notice this case. The Winkler County News from the small town of Kermit, TX, wrote this editorial entitled "Poor Losers," and it is interesting that it was a Texan who was the Democratic leader who moved to take the seat away from the people of Indiana, and here is a Texas newspaper commenting in an editorial entitled "Poor Losers."

Residents of Indiana's Eighth Congressional District are being denied representation in Washington in a blatant abuse of power by Democrats controlling the House of Representatives. Richard D. McIntyre was elected to the House from the Eighth District last November, but he still is on the outside looking in. The election was a close one. Mr. McIntyre was certified the winner over the Democrat Frank McCloskey by a scant 34 votes in December. Mr. McCloskey demanded a recount, which was not expected. Now the recount has been completed by county election commissions that were dominated by Democrats in 11 of the 15 counties comprising the Eighth District. Mr. McIntyre again emerged the winner, but by the more substantial margin of 415 votes. The Democrats are turning out to be poor losers. Representative Tony Coelho of California, chairman of the party's Congressional Campaign Committee, insists the returns still are not conclusive. He points out that 1,000 ballots were ruled invalid in the precinct with a heavy pro-McCloskey vote, but conveniently ignores the fact that thousands more were ruled invalid in precincts that favored Mr. McIntyre. Election officials in Indiana are satisfied that the election of Mr. McIntyre was on the up and up, but the Democratic leadership in the House is insisting that the seat remain open until the House Administration Committee, which it controls, has had a chance to investigate the case. The investigation, of course, is a last ditch effort to find some reason to give the seat to Mr. McCloskey. This is believed to be the first time the House of Representatives has ever refused to seat a person whose election was duly certified by State election authorities. If the Democratic majority is allowed to impose its will in this manner, the implications are frightening. Why bother to have elections if the party controlling Congress can overrule the results? If McIntyre is not seated promptly, voters in Indiana should seek an order from a Federal Court granting them the representation in Congress that is being duly denied to them by the losing side in the November election."

Now, let me point out two things from this editorial from the Winkler County News in Kermit, TX. First of all, they make very clear that in 11 of the 15 counties that did the recount, Democrats provided the majority of the counters, so it was not a Republican steal of a seat. In 11 out of the 15 counties it was local Democrats in Indiana trying to hold an honest election and those local Democrats reported that Mr. McIntyre won.

Second, if we were truly going to be bipartisan, we would have a task force on the election similar to the way we run the Ethics Committee. On the Ethics Committee there are as many Republicans as there are Democrats. There are an equal number. They can only make a decision by ensuring that both parties agree; however, the election task force has two Democrats and only one Republican.

The fact is that if we truly were interested only in a bipartisan way of counting the ballots, we would have a task force that had the same number of Democrats as Republicans and that sought to make truly bipartisan decisions.

Now, I think there is a great deal of wisdom in the Winkler County News assertion:

Election officials in Indiana are satisfied that the election of Mr. McIntyre was on the up and up, but the Democratic leadership in the House is insisting that the seat remain open until the House Administration Committee, which it controls, has had a chance to investigate the case. The investigation, of course, is a last ditch effort to find some reason to give the seat to Mr. McCloskey.

It should worry every Member of this body that papers from the Washington Post to a Texas weekly are beginning to suggest that this body would take a seat away from the people of Indiana, would give that seat to a man who lost the election, because that indeed strikes at the very heart of the electoral process.

Major cities have also looked at this case. The Detroit Free Press, on February 14, 1985. Detroit, again, is not Texas, it is not Washington; a third voice from the Nation at large.

On February 14, the Detroit Free Press, in an editorial entitled, "Democracy in America," says as follows:

On today's op-ed page, Rep. Guy Vander Jagt gives a fairly detailed chronology of an outrage taking place in the U.S. House of Representatives. The Democratic leadership of the House had decided not to seat Richard McIntyre who, in the judgment of Indiana's secretary of state, won the right to represent Indiana's 8th District in Congress. House Speaker Tip O'Neill, Majority Leader Jim Wright, and Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Tony Coelho defend their action by saying the election was improperly conducted, that Republicans threw out lots of votes—particularly in black precincts favorable to Mr. McIntyre's opponent, Frank McCloskey—and that the voters deserve a fresh, new election.

None of these pious justifications make much sense. No one has questioned the honesty of the election and nearly 90 percent of the ballots thrown out were discarded by Democratic election officials. What Democrats really want is to increase their sizable majority—they control more than 58 percent of the House seats, even though they won only 50.03 percent of the votes for those seats—by stealing a close election.

A couple of interesting things have happened since Rep. Vander Jagt wrote his piece, however. First, five Democrats refused to endorse their leadership's decision to ignore democratic tradition. In a vote to kill a Republican-sponsored "privileged motion" that would have seated Mr. McIntyre, Romano Mazzoli and four colleagues thumbed their noses at their party leaders.

Second, Mr. McIntyre and Everett Robertson, Jr.—an 8th District voter—have filed suit in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, charging that House officials violated their First Amendment rights to free speech and Fifth Amendment rights to due process under the law by refusing to seat Richard McIntyre, give him an office, perform support services, and repay his travel expenses to and from his district. The suit asks the court to seat the Republican, force House Speaker O'Neill to administer the oath of office to the Republican, and demand that House officers give him an office, perform typical duties for the congressman, and grant him admission to House chambers. Democrats have asked to have the suit dismissed.

In a perfect world, the court would agree. The House's imperious action has no precedent in American history. Of the 82 challenged seatings of members-elect since 1933, 81 favored the winner. The only exception was the Rousch vs. Chambers case in 1961, in which Indiana's Republican secretary of state certified two winners but de-certified the Republican incumbent, George Chambers, for alleged vote fraud.

The fraud in the McIntyre case illustrates the danger Alexis de Tocqueville described in Democracy in America—that "the unbounded power of the majority . . . is favorable to the legal despotism of the legislature." Such tyranny, he warned, can weaken people's respect for their leaders and for the rule of law.

Certainly, it's made lots of people question the integrity of the House leadership, which abandoned a tradition that Congress has honored for nearly two centuries when it refused to seat a certified winner of an election. Boss O'Neill and his henchmen have made a mockery of the democratic process and have sullied the Democratic Party in the process. They deserve whatever grief angry voters and politicians give them for denying Richard McIntyre his rightful place in the 99th Congress.

Now, the Detroit Free Press is asserting three things that every Democrat should consider before voting again, on seating McIntyre.

They are setting first, that the Democratic leadership—"What Democrats really want is to increase their sizable majority . . . by stealing a close election."

I am convinced that the overwhelming majority of Democratic Members of this House have no intention of stealing an election. However, I am also convinced that they have gone along with a process which the Detroit Free Press says, "The House's imperious action has no precedent in American history.

So in an unprecedented way, Democrats in this House have been going along with a process which is wrong, which is unconstitutional, and which again quoting de Tocqueville, "the unbounded power of the majority is favorable to the legal despotism of the legislature."

And they call it tyranny. And they warn, de Toqueville warns, "Such tyranny can weaken people's respect for their leaders and for the rule of law."

And then the Detroit paper goes on to say:

Certainly it's made lots of people question the integrity of the House leadership, which abandoned a tradition that Congress has honored for nearly two centuries when it refused to seat a certified winner of an election.

Now, my plea to every Democrat who is not totally bound to the leadership, who is not frightened by the whip, who is not unwilling to challenge the Democratic Campaign Committee, is to look at this case before we vote again.

There are no constitutional grounds; there are no precedents, there are no legal grounds for refusing to seat Rick McIntyre while waiting for the task force to report. There is every precedent for seating Rick McIntyre, who won the election. There is every precedent for seating Rick McIntyre who has been certified by the State of Indiana.

Only the tyranny of the majority would prevent his seating, and let me say to my colleagues on the Democratic side of the aisle: If you seek to run this House by tyranny, then you give those of us in the minority no alternative except to oppose tyrants.

Clearly, in the McIntyre case, we have begun an extraordinarily dangerous precedent which, if continued, would have the gravest, the gravest dangers for this country. Because it establishes the precedent that some time in the next few centuries of America's history anyone with 218 votes could simply expel and then argue about anyone they did not want to be seated. By refusing to seat them, could then create, based on the precedent of 1985.

The ground rule that says "After all, we're not sure, why don't we have a task force, and let's not seat them while we're looking?" It is a far more serious constitutional challenge than the vast majority of Democrats have yet come to consider because they have two good reasons for not thinking about it.

First of all, if they really think about it, they might decide that McIntyre is right; that the people of Indiana deserve representation. And then, they might have to vote against their leadership.

Second, it is just so much easier to hide from the issue, to ignore the facts, to wander in and vote and hope no one notices.

This House had a chance Thursday a week ago to seat the man who won the election, to do what the constitutional precedents would suggest, to give the people of Indiana in the Eighth District a voice in Congress. This House failed.

It runs a very real risk now of being a body which is an affront to the Constitution and which is violating the very basic American principle of no taxation without representation. Because in fact, the people of Eighth District of Indiana have no representation at the present time because of the Democratic leadership's decision.

What do the people of Indiana think? Let me cite first the leading paper in the State, the Indiana Star, dated February 13, 1985. An editorial entitled, "Suing for a Seat."

This is from Indiana now, from the State capitol.

And what does the Indiana Star say?

There is yet another twist in the tangled tale of Indiana's 8th Congressional District election. Republican Richard McIntyre, twice declared the winner and twice rebuffed by a Democrat-controlled House of Representatives, has now taken his case to a Washington, D.C. federal court.

McIntyre this week filed suit against Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill and the 221 Democrats who voted to keep the Eighth District seat vacant pending a House investigation of the election. He is asking that he be permitted to take office until the House rules on its own findings.

Indiana Secretary of State Edwin J. Simcox had certified that McIntyre had defeated Democrat incumbent Frank McCloskey by 34 votes and a later districtwide recount gave McIntyre a 418-vote edge.

On the opening day of Congress, Rep. Lee Hamilton, D-Ind., arguing that the certification was invalid and the election still unsettled, urged that McIntyre not be seated. It would be a disservice to the 500,000 residents of the 8th District "to seat the wrong man today only to have him unseated tomorrow," Hamilton said.

McIntyre's suit contends it is a much greater disservice to deny representation to the 500,000 residents of the 8th District, thereby violating their constitutional guarantees of free speech and association.

The House has the prerogative of judging the qualifications of its own members. That authority derives from the Constitution and ought not be questioned. In several respects, therefore, McIntyre's recourse to the judiciary is regrettable.

Yet McIntyre is miffed, and justifiably so, at the House's partisanship. Minutes after the House voted on Jan. 3 to deny Republican McIntyre his seat, it voted to seat another certified winner, Democrat Richard Stallings of Idaho, whose election is being contested by Republican George Hansen. In 82 other elections contested through the years, the House has allowed the certified winner to serve while disputes were settled. So McIntyre's case is unprecedented.

The best outcome would be for the House to recognize that it has made an unfortunate exception in McIntyre's case and permit him to be seated conditionally. If that were done quickly, the suit would be moot and the court would not have to determine if it has jurisdiction.

An in-House settlement would be eminently preferable to a possible testy confrontation between two branches of government.

In other words, the Indianapolis Star is saying to the Members of this House, "You have made a mistake, reverse your decision now before the court rules and seat McIntyre until the task force reports."

Let me draw the distinction which the Indianapolis Star refers to. On the date that the Democratic leadership refused to seat McIntyre in a close election, Republicans in this House unanimously voted to seat a Democrat from Idaho in a very close election. We said he was certified even though there might be a contest, even though there is a lawsuit, even though the incumbent Republican, who was defeated is contesting it, he should be seated because the Democrat had the certificate from Idaho.

There is no moral or legal ground to stop McIntyre from being seated if in fact the Democrat from Idaho is being seated. Yet the very Democrats who voted to seat the Idaho Democrat voted not to seat the Indiana Republican. It is clearly an act of discrimination. It is an act which has no precedent and it involves, I think, a very, very dangerous step against the Constitution.

Let me suggest also that we look at the Eighth District. Let us look first in the Evansville Press at a letter, an open letter, written to Mr. McCloskey, the defeated Democrat, by Dale McConnaughay in the Evansville Press, Evansville, IN, in the Eighth Congressional District.

Mr. McConnaughay says as follows. This is an open letter.

DEAR MR. MCCLOSKEY: You have waged a long, valiant and what for you as well as your opponent has to be a frustrating campaign.

That frustration is shared by 8th District constituents who, more than three months after the election, remain without a congressman. Many of those constituents have called this office, or written letters, expressing that frustration. You have no doubt heard from many others.

Some of them say they will never vote again. Fortunately, they appear to be in the minority. Most others have simply become cynical. But that cynicism, left unchecked, represents a cancer to the body politic, to our very democratic tradition.

That tradition, that system, is one that we cherish and respect because it has never failed in exalting individual valor, statesmanship and sacrifice for the common good, especially in the most trying of times where systems themselves seem to fail us.

The time has arrived to again summon those qualities.

What has become evident is that the proper course of action in the current dispute, one representing the best interests of 8th District constituents, cannot be inspired by the system unless it is instigated by the individual.

If you persist in asking your Democratic colleagues who control the U.S. House of Representatives to essentially ignore the 8th District vote, to ignore the certificate of victory awarded your opponent, and to vote among themselves whom to seat, then you may have held onto a seat, but paid a terrible price to do so.

Your own colleagues' apparent reluctance to engage in so brazen, public and raw an act of power politics last Thursday, when five House Democrats defected from the party line and voted their conscience to seat your opponent.

Added evidence of reluctance by your colleagues can be found in the delays. House officials say it could be May—an added three months—before a congressman is seated from this district. As one who has served in that seat and understands the constitutional significance of taxpayer representation, you must find that unacceptable.

No one suggests you abandon your convictions or your proud fight; rather, that you step aside for now until the House completes its investigation, permitting conditional representation from this district by an opponent who at the moment holds the more valid claim to the seat.

What is gained by denying 500,000 residents of the 8th District a voice in Congress over the next three months?

Do you strengthen your claim to be a man who has the best interests of the people of your district at heart?

Do you show yourself to be a fair man who plays by the rules, even where those rules may appear less than favorable to your cause?

Do you enhance your reputation as a public servant?

Or, do you invite the incisive remarks from people like Rep. Bill Frenzel, the ranking Republican on the House Administration Committee, who charged last Thursday that: "The only way McCloskey can win is if he confuses his cronies so that they violate the law of the United States and the State of Indiana and vote him into Congress."

Much has been said in the long period since the November 6 election about "good faith."

Voters cast ballots in good faith on November 6. However, technically flawed ballots may have been, it seems a terrible miscarriage of justice to have tossed out thousands of them district-wide lacking conclusive evidence of any fraud.

The various local bipartisan commissions conducting recounts of ballots did so in good faith, though again flawed by inconsistent procedures from one county to the next which neither you nor your opponent protested sufficiently at that time.

The results soon after the election saw your opponent certified the winner by fewer than 50 votes. A Republican secretary of state who delayed certifying a winner can be criticized only for not having delayed that certification long enough, until the full recount was complete. But when that recount was complete, the margin of victory for your opponent grew to more than 400 votes.

"Good faith" on your own part should require respecting House tradition and permitting an opponent holding a victory certificate to be seated conditionally until you have satisfied the burden of proof that he doesn't have the right to his seat.

Since this is the kind of individual valor, statesmanship and sacrifice for the common good which is so desperately needed just now to regain some measure of voter trust and confidence.

In other words, a local editorial writer in the Eighth District of Indiana who has personally watched every day the process unfold comes to the conclusion that Mr. McIntyre won the election, that he won the recount and that, in fact, the time has come to change things. The time has come for this House to seat the winner, to give representation to the people of the Eighth District of Indiana.

Consider the editorial again from Evansville from the Evansville Press entitled "Time To Take a Seat." Notice this pattern. In Texas, a local writer says, looking at this process, the House is cheating. It is unfair. The Democratic leadership is doing something unprecedented.

In the Washington Post, they say the time has come to seat Mr. McIntyre.

In Detroit, they say the time has come to seat Mr. McIntyre.

In the State Capitol of Indiana, they say the time has come to seat Mr. McIntyre.

By a personal individual editorial writer in the Eighth District of Indiana, the time has come to seat Mr. McIntyre.

And now from the Evansville Press an editorial entitled "Time To Take a Seat."

I quote:

TIME TO TAKE A SEAT

The time has come for the United States House of Representatives to lay politics aside and consider the people of the 8th Congressional District of Indiana.

In its most recent action, the House once again refused to seat either Richard McIntyre or Frank McCloskey as the winner of last November's election. Instead, the House is conducting its own investigation of the close race and will report its findings by late April. As a result, it is likely the 8th District will be without representation until May, or beyond.

This is reprehensible and unacceptable.

That the House has the right to—and should—investigate the close election is not the question here. What is questionable is why the House does not seat the apparent winner until information to the contrary comes to light.

Mr. McIntyre, the Republican, was certified the original winner by a very slender margin, fewer than 50 votes; now, after a recount, he has again been declared a winner, by a more substantial 418 votes.

Mr. McCloskey, the Democrat, argues that the recounts were conducted under haphazard and inconsistent rules, and with that this newspaper agrees. But no where is anyone alleging fraud, and most of the commissions that participated in the recounts were dominated by Democrats. The fact that the recounts were inconsistent should not hinder the seating of Mr. McIntyre until the Democrat controlled House proves that recount certified the wrong man, or until a more consistent recount is ordered by the House Administration Committee, which now is handling the matter.

The argument that neither candidate should be seated until that committee reaches a decision ignores the fact that there are two other disputed elections now before the committee, and in both cases, the certified winner has been seated pending a resolution.

No one argues with Mr. McCloskey's right to challenge the result of the election. But Mr. McIntyre should be seated—conditionally—while that challenge is being resolved so the people of the 8th District of Indiana at least have someone in Congress to handle their affairs.

The votes are in. They have been counted twice. Mr. McIntyre has won both times. A serious responsibility now rests with the House. It must determine either that the recount was in error and another recount is justified, or it must seat Mr. McIntyre. In either event, it must follow its own tradition and seat the certified winner, Mr. McIntyre, in the interim.

By refusing to do so would only prove many people's worse suspicions: that the U.S. House of Representatives is more interested in playing politics than serving the people it has been entrusted to represent.

All voters in all districts, should remember that the next time the polls open.

Now, that is an editorial from the Evansville Press, in the Eighth District, saying that it is time to seat the winner of the election and making the point that in other contested elections we seat the man or woman who is certified as the winner while we look at the election.

If this was just a partisan matter, if this was just fun and games at party politics level, frankly, as a Republican, it might be tempting to let the seat go vacant until May, because, as the news media around the country begins to focus, as I have quoted already from Indiana, from Detroit, MI, from Texas, and from Washington, DC, as the news media begin to focus on the Democratic Party in this House, the vision of the Democratic leadership stealing the seat is so disturbing that it is helpful to Republicans to drag this out, to have several months of reminding the country that the Democratic leadership is willing to deny representation of the taxpayers of the Eighth District, to violate the basic American principles of fair play, and to break the constitutional precedent.

In fact, there is one article which should chill every Democrat in this House, in terms of the longrun implications of this current procedure.

On January 28, 1985, in the Detroit News, in an editorial under "Our Opinions," entitled, "The Undemocratic Party," the following was written:

The Democratic Party, ostensibly the party of compassion and fairness, had decided that Republican votes don't count in Indiana's 8th Congessional District. Indiana's secretary of state has certified Richard McIntyre as the victor in his race against previous incumbent Democrat Frank McCloskey, and a recount this week widened his ostensible margin of victory from 34 votes to 415 votes.

But House Speaker Tip O'Neill and Tony Coelho, chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, have declared the voters and the Indiana officials wrong. Nothing has changed the fact that Frank McCloskey won on Election Day, and an honest, complete, and nonpartisan vote count will confirm that, Rep. Coelho said recently. So the Washington pols have voted themselves the power to overturn the judgment of the people of Indiana.

Here's what happened. Republicans learned on election eve that the returns from two precincts had been counted twice, giving Mr. McCloskey an apparent victory. They asked the local county clerk to notify the secretary of state that the results from that county were in error, but the clerk, a Democrat, refused. Republicans took the matter to court, where a Democratic judge eventually ordered the clerk to amend the results. When that was done, Mr. McIntyre was certified the winner by the secretary of state (a Republican), and the results were forwarded to the clerk of the U.S. House of Representatives.

Under normal procedures, that would have been the end of the matter. No one had alleged fraud in the election, and no one implied that Mr. McIntyre had done anything shady or undignified. Democrats didn't even bother to challenge the results under the Contested Elections Act, which sets forth a procedure for reviewing very tight elections. The law in effect lets the House review an election much as a court would—taking depositions, reviewing evidence, even demanding a new election. At first, they tried to have the recount thrown out, asking a federal court to find fault with Indiana's recount procedure. The judge dismissed the case.

Meanwhile, a series of recounts was taking place in Indiana. County clerks appointed three-member, bipartisan election review boards, which examined ballots and double-checked procedures. Those recounts enlarged Mr. McIntyre's margin by 381 votes.

Still, Reps. O'Neill and Coelho wouldn't rest. They strong-armed colleagues into accepting House Resolution 1—the first legislation of the session—that essentially gave the House Administration Committee, and not the people of Indiana, final say about the election. The Democratic leaders argued that a 1961 case, in which Democrat Ed Rousch was seated after earlier results had given Republican George Chambers the victory, offers a precedent. But in that case, the Indiana secretary of state invalidated his own certification of victory for Mr. Chambers, after verifying charges of election fraud. As we noted above, there were no such charges or changes in certification this time around.

House leaders have merely confirmed that they believe in the one-man, one-vote concept only if it favors Democrats. Consider a few interesting statistics: Democrats won 50.03 percent of the popular vote for House seats this year, but district lines drawn by state legislatures gave them 58.16 of the seats in the House. By the same token, the membership on key committees hardly reflects Americans' preferences on policy. Democrats hold 58.7 percent of the votes on the Budget and Armed Services committees and 61.4 percent of the seats on the Appropriations Committee.

The McIntyre case demonstrates with frightening clarity how politicians can abandon their principles for partisan reasons. In a fairer world, the House would seat Richard McIntyre provisionally, and let the courts or the sovereign people of Indiana do what they must to resolve matters further. He has, by any reasonable standard, won that seat fairly. His only sin seems to be that he didn't win by enough votes to make Tip O'Neill happy.

Let me carry you back, for a moment, to what newspaper after newspaper has said about our current situation.

Very strong words have been used. From the Detroit News, the words, "freightening clarity, how politicians can abandon their principles for partisan reasons."

From the Indianapolis Star, "McIntyre case is unprecedented."

From the Evansville newspaper we are warned by Mr. McConnaughay of cynicism, a cancer to the body politic, to our very democratic tradition.

From the Evansville newspaper's own editorial, they say it is "reprehensible and unacceptable." They charge that the House of Representatives is "playing politics."

From the Detroit Free press, they cite de Tocqueville's warning of the legal despotism of the legislature of tyranny.

Every person who voted to seat McIntyre, the five Democrats who had the courage to rebel against their party's whip, the 180 or so Republicans, now face a real choice. By any reasonable standard, as measured in Michigan, in Texas, in the Washington Post, in Indiana itself, this House is now violating the constitutional precedent. Every time we walk in this body and we permit tyranny and we permit a majority to steal a seat from the people of Indiana, every time we vote without the people of Indiana's Eighth District having a vote, we tolerate tyranny.

It is precisely this kind of erosion, this kind of arrogance of power, which most worried the Founding Fathers. They were very aware, in the Wilkes case in Britain, just before the American Revolution, of the dangers that a legislative body would decide not to seat someone chosen by the people. The Founding Fathers knew well the political bosses, ideological factions, interest groups could make decisions which deny to the people their voice, their spokesman, their seat. The Founding Fathers would never have tolerated this kind of scene. So we face a real challenge. And I urge every Democrat who voted not to give the people of Indiana a voice to look again at this case.

What you have been told by your leadership is simply not correct. It is not true to assert that the Democratic incumbent ever had a majority. It is simply not true. The only time he appeared to have a majority was a mathematical error because one clerk counted two precincts twice. There has never been an accurate or honest count which in any way gave the Democratic incumbent the majority. He lost the election. He lost the recount by a bigger margin.

It is simply not true to suggest that Indiana's law is peculiarly vague or strange. The fact is the State of Indiana has adopted very strict rules precisely to prevent cheating, to prevent stuffing the ballot box, to prevent voting by people who might put in a number of ballots without having the number of people.

The reason they have to initial each ballot is to make sure that a real person voted, and to turn that law on its head and suggest that those votes were thrown out in order to cheat is a disgrace. It is to shame the people of Indiana. It is to suggest that the State of Indiana would steal a seat. It is to suggest that the secretary of state and the legislature would conspire. In effect the honor of the State of Indiana is being smeared by those who suggest that a duly sent certificate should not be counted.

It is simply wrong to cite the 1961 case. It is factually inaccurate. There has never been a certificated winner in modern times who was not seated if his certificate was valid. The 1961 case is a red herring thrown across the path to stop the argument. Some members of the Democratic leadership have systematically and deliberately confused the issue and have sought to avoid an honest and fair hearing.

The fact is that McIntyre has won the election and McIntyre has won the recount. The people of Indiana's Eighth District deserve a hearing, and the challenge to those of us who believe that is to now ask, "What should we do when faced with a legislative tyranny which is willing to stop the people of Indiana from having their representation?"

I deeply urge every Member to look at this case. If you already believe that McIntyre should be seated, ask yourself, "What are the moral burdens and obligations you carry to insure in the next few days that McIntyre is seated and that the people of Indiana have their true voice?"

On the other hand, if you have not yet been convinced, look at the case. Read the Washington Post editorial, read the Indianapolis editorial, read the Evansville, IN, editorial, read the Detroit editiorials, read the Texas editorials. Why is it, if your leadership's case makes any sense, that again and again around the country, when people look at this case, they say, "You ought to seat McIntyre"? If the Democrats' case is so powerful, why did it fail to convince the Washington Post?

The fact is that there are no good, decent, legal grounds to avoid seating McIntyre.

Finally, every citizen who studies this case should ask himself, "What should I do? How did my Member vote? Does my local news media understand this issue?" Because I think it really was said exactly correctly in the Evansville Press in the Eighth District, in the editiorial entitled, "Time To Take a Seat," when they said at the very end: "All voters in all districts should remember that the next time the polls open."

The fact is that if this House has the power to steal a seat from the people of Indiana, it has the power to steal a seat from the people of Texas; it has the power to steal a seat from the people of Georgia; it has the power to steal a seat from the people of California; and it has the power to steal a seat from the people of New York.

If this year they can deny Rick McIntyre and the people of the Eighth District a seat, then what can they do the next time? If we sit by passively and allow a handful of men to impose their will, to seize a seat, then what will they try next time? And what, 20 or 30 or 40 years from now, will their successors try?

We have here a clear case. The time to reassert the precedent that a certified winner sits in this House until the election committee reports is now. The time to draw the line and say the people of the United States deserve representation, full representation, for 2 full years is now.

I hope that every Member of this House will look carefully at this case, for in the next few days you will have a chance to vote again, and I hope this time you will vote, not as the Democratic whip insists, not as the Democratic Campaign Committee asks, but you will look at the real facts of the case and you will decide to vote to seat the person whom the people of Indiana elected, the secretary of state of Indiana certified, and the recount indicated won, and then allow the task force to do its work.

Mr. Speaker, that is the only reasonable and honorable procedure.

A STUDENT SPEAKS OUT ON CUTS IN THE STUDENT LOAN PROGRAM

(Mr. SEIBERLING asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

● Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, recently I received a touching letter from one of my constituents who is a high school senior considering her plans for college. She is afraid that if the Congress adopts the President's proposed cuts in the Student Loan Program and other student assistance programs, she will not be able to afford to attend a college that has her desired field of study. The full text of her letter is as follows:

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE SEIBERLING: I have just finished reading an article about President Reagan's plans for the Guaranteed Student Loan and financial aid.

I am, at the moment, extremely confused. Being a senior at Stow High School, I have done much thinking about college and my plans and goals. Because I am paying for my college expenses by myself, I am greatly in need of any aid I can receive. It is possible for me to attend a nearby university with an academic scholarship I have received; however, this university does not have my desired major in their curriculum. I am in need of assistance to attend Ohio State University.

As a current high school student, I have faced many changes because of the stressed "Excellence in Schools." President Reagan seems very concerned about high school students and their college board examinations, but may I ask what benefits a high SAT or ACT score has if one cannot afford to attend a quality university to which he has been accepted because of these scores? It seems to me that someone who is interested in bettering students would also want these people to attend a university to further this education. It has been expressed many times by various people that the future of this country is dependent on the people in my age group. Where is the country going if we cannot get more than a high school diploma?

This issue is extremely important to me and many other affected students. I hope we will receive your support.

Sincerely,

LAURA A. CASTNER.

I think that this letter clearly states why the Federal Government should have a responsibility to provide some financial assistance to students and to educational institutions. In order to provide equal opportunity for advancement in our society, the Federal Government should provide assistance to those who could not afford an education without the Government's help.

As we make difficult budget choices in the coming months, I urge my colleagues to consider how our decisions affect the lives of our constituents like this high school senior.●

PRODUCTIVITY INCENTIVE ACT

(Mr. SEIBERLING asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

● Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing legislation to encourage better labor-management relations and greater productivity in the United States.

The domestic manufacturing sector of the economy has been under severe pressure from foreign competition over the past decade. While foreign competitors have frequently had advantages in terms of newer production facilities and lower labor costs, I'm convinced that one of the most important factors in the import revolution has been the productivity gains made by our foreign trading partners.

Under the prevailing wage system in this country, employees often feel that they have little stake in the company's performance. Wages usually bear no direct relationship to company earnings, and companies usually adjust to downturns in the business cycle simply by laying their employees off. As a result, workers perceive their pay increases as being wholly independent of the company's profitability, and no clear link is established between pay and productivity. The hourly wage system gives employees little incentive to use their experience and ingenuity to help their company become more profitable by cutting costs and increasing productivity. The result has meant all-too-often that American manufacturers cannot compete with the productivity gains made by their foreign competition. Profits decline as imports penetrate the American market. Jobs are lost.

The prevailing wage structure also emphasizes the divergence rather than the community of interest between employer and employee and thereby contributes greatly to the antagonism that has been so characteristic of labor-management relations in the United States. We cannot afford such antagonism if we are to remain competitive in the changing global economy.

There are signs that workers and management are beginning to understand better the need to emphasize community of interest in the labor field. A Washington Post article of February 17 detailed the efforts by the U.S. auto industry to rethink its wage structure. General Motors, which committed recently to produce the Saturn, a completely new car for the American market, is examining ways of increasing worker involvement in quality and productivity improvement. The basic objective of the Saturn project is to improve productivity by nearly 50 percent, stripping some 60 of the 130 worker hours it now takes to build an average GM car. GM intends to achieve that goal by using its work force more effectively and, apparently, by drawing on the wealth of knowledge and experience of its employees to maximize productivity in the assembly line.

This is welcome news. Congress can and should help efforts to improve productivity by providing incentives to do so. My bill would encourage employers to adopt a wage base and a bonus determined by reference to company profits or cost savings, with the bonus comprising up to one-third of the employee's annual income. To offset any additional cost associated with establishing and running this new wage system, employers would receive a tax credit equal to 10 percent of the bonus in the first year of operation, 5 percent in the second year, and 3 percent in the third.

The bill would give workers a strong incentive to be more cost conscious and productivity conscious, since their pay would depend to a degree on the earnings of the company or increases in productivity. To the extent that profit or gain sharing are adopted, the system would give the company a means of adjusting its labor costs during economic downturns without cutting the workers' base pay or, more important, without resorting to the traditional layoffs to maintain a specified level of corporate profitability. The resulting job security cannot help but produce greater loyalty on the part of employees, and an improvement in employer-employee relations. The bill should not be construed as a one-way street. It would be reasonable for employees, in exchange for their acceptance of a bonus wage plan, to be given more of a say in company operations, particularly those which tie directly to productivity, and hence to their bonus.

My bill is not a cure-all for our country's economic problems, but it should help improve job security as well as productivity, and many other changes are in order if we are going to reverse our poor productivity growth over the past few years. If we concentrate instead on dividing up a diminishing economic pie, we will all be losers. Our goal should be to enlarge the pie by examining policies and practices which hinder productivity, and replacing them with practices which encourage productivity gains and enhance job security.

A copy of the Washington Post article follows these remarks.

AUTO INDUSTRY SEEKS A NEW WAGE MODEL

(By Warren Brown)

When the U.S. auto industry introduced the assembly line early in the century, it revolutionized the way the American worker was paid. With a firm grip on the pace of production, U.S. manufacturing industries installed the hourly wage system—which has prevailed ever since.

Now the auto industry once again has become a laboratory for pay in America as manufacturers search for new ways to tie blue-collar wages to corporate performance.

General Motors Corp., for example, is examining the concept of "gain sharing," in which blue collar employes, working closely with management on the factory floor, are rewarded for their contributions to both quality and productivity.

These experiments may well change both the way millions of people are paid in this country and how a whole range of products outside the auto industry are manufactured.

But market forces unlike those of the early days of the industry are behind the new pressures for change. The assembly line permitted development of the mass production capabilities needed to meet vast, unmet consumer demand for an emerging product. And the hourly wage was a means to stabilize the industry work force.

Today, the search for a new pay system in America is the result of a much different challenge—shrinking domestic markets, largely caused by foreign competition. U.S. manufacturers are searching for new ways to compete in a post-industrial society.

The current focus for change is the new Saturn project announced recently by General Motors. GM Chairman Roger B. Smith said his company was going outside the current corporate structure to create Saturn Corp., a completely new car company for the American market.

Saturn's basic objective is to produce up to 500,000 subcompact cars annually, beginning by 1990. Its overall goal is to change domestic auto production methods radically, to strip 60 worker-hours from the average 130 hours GM now uses to build one car, and to come up with a pay system that more closely reflects production costs and corporate performance.

Ford and Chrysler are working on similar projects with similar aims. Ford calls its program Alpha. Chrysler has Concept 90.

In announcing the Saturn project, Smith said GM was giving the new company a "clean sheet" to build its cars. This would include a new relationship with the United Auto Workers union and the way its members would be paid, he said.

Neither Saturn nor UAW officials have offered any details on what type of pay system might be devised at the new GM company. But besides "gain sharing," company officials are using such terms as "pay-for-knowledge" (also known as "versatility premium"), and "employe involvement" to describe the system they hope will emerge eventually.

The push for a new wage system for the U.S. auto business follows a decade of decimation and change for the industry's work force. Imports rose from 15.2 percent of overall U.S. auto sales in 1970 to 23.4 percent in 1984 (reaching an all-time high of 30.5 percent in the third quarter of 1982).

Since 1979, the auto industry work force has been cut more than 40 percent—a loss of 656,000 jobs.

The erosion of jobs and the wave of imports appear to have created a new setting for labor-management relations in the industry as employer and worker search for ways to meet competition. These efforts at cooperation are intensifying as the major Japanese auto companies begin to set up manufacturing operations on American soil using techniques and traditions from their home country.

But not all will be imitation on the part of the Americans. GM's Smith, for example, said the Saturn operation will be designed "to leapfrog the Japanese." And George Hoffer, an economist and auto industry analyst at Virginia Commonwealth University in Richmond, predicted that the "Japanese mystique will disappear" as more Japanese auto makers are producing vehicles in this country.

By 1990, the Japanese will be able to make as many as 900,000 cars a year in the United States, according to Maryann N. Keller, a director and analyst at New York-based Vilas-Fischer Associates.

Japan's Honda Motor Co. Ltd. and Nissan Motor Co Lt. built a total of 234,111 vehicles in the United States last year. Both companies, which so far operate without a union, are planning to expand U.S. production facilities.

Toyota Motor Corp. and General Motors Corp. have formed a joint-venture company, New United Motor Manufacturing Inc. [NUMMI], to build up to 250,000 subcompact cars annually in Fremont, Calif. Production began last Dec. 4. Toyota also is allowed to build its own cars here under the joint-venture agreement.

Mazda Motor Corp. last December announced plans to invest $450 million in a new auto assembly facility in Flat Rock, Mich., where it plans to build 240,000 small cars annually. Mitsubishi Motors Corp. also is considering the possibility of assembling cars in this country.

The Japanese are coming here with new work rules, new production methods and a resolve to create a domestic work force that is willing to share the risk as well as the rewards of free enterprise. They are seeking a basic attitudinal change, one that would make employes more like entrepreneurs.

The Japanese objective is simple. At home, they enjoy an advantage in production costs over their American competitors estimated at more than $1,500 a car. They want to retain as much of the advantge as possible in their assembly operations in the United States.

U.S. auto industry analysts say the Japanese are traveling a difficult road. This country's car business traditionally has been characterized by inflexible work rules, an imbedded hourly-wage mentality and executive compensation practices that seem to assume guaranteed returns on investments, analysts say.

It will be difficult for the Japanese to alter this culture. But all of the Big Three domestics—GM, Ford Motor Co. and Chrysler Corp.—are acting as if the Japanese will succeed.

"That is the reason behind Saturn," Hoffer said.

"The main reason for Saturn is to break away from old union contracts and to establish flexibility in the workplace. GM no longer wants to have people on one specific line doing one specific job. The traditional auto assembler clearly will have a less important role in the cost of production," Hoffer said.

That does not mean assembly workers will disappear. "Your can't make a car without them, but there will be fewer of them. Their wages, as a result, will not be that much of a problem in the overall scheme of things," Hoffer said.

For example, to get 500,000 cars a year, Saturn officials will hire 6,000 production workers—3,000 per shift on a two-shift workday. GM would have had to hire about 10,000 production workers to get a similar output in 1975 and about 8,000 people to get a comparable yield in 1980, according to some industry analysts.

By assigning workers multiple tasks—the completion and quality of which would be aided by high-technology tools—Saturn would further lower the cost of production wages, Hoffer said.

GM's assembly workers currently receive an average base wage of $12.82 an hour, including cost-of-living allowances, according to UAW spokesman David Mitchell. GM would be able to increase those wages with relatively little pain by having a smaller work force that worked more efficiently.

NUMMI, which will negotiate with the UAW in the spring, is looking at a program comparable to gain sharing. NUMMI appropriately calls its program the "Suggestion Plan." Like gain sharing, the NUMMI plan would reward individual workers or worker teams based on their specific contributions to better product quality and efficiency.

"That kind of thing is very big at Toyota," said Tina Bunyard, a spokeswoman for the company. NUMMI currently has an average base wage rate of about $11 an hour. But "attendance awards" and other bonuses could lift that rate up to GM's average $12.82 hourly level, NUMMI officials said.

GM and Ford already have profit sharing, which means that workers share a part of those companies' annual earnings. GM's profit-sharing pool last year was $282 million—an average of $515 for each of the company's 547,000 employes—out of earnings of $4.5 billion.

"Since 1985, we've always asked for profit sharing from the companies," said the UAW's Mitchell. "The companies said 'no' until 1982, when they didn't have any profits to share."

A ranking Chrysler official said last week that the company would push for profit sharing in contract negotiations scheduled next October. Mitchell said the UAW "does not regard profit sharing as a substitute for wage increases. We believe in wage increases, cost-of-living allowances and profit sharing on top of wages."

Mitchell said "there are really no fundamental changes" in the way the union approaches worker compensation." But he added that the union is not inflexible. "The UAW has always bargained based on the realities at the given bargaining table," he said.

With the growth of domestic production of Japanese cars, both the UAW and U.S. auto makers are being forced to rethink those realities, according to Audrey Freedman, labor economist at the The Conference Board in New York.

Mazda is a case in point, Freedman said. The Japanese auto maker has invited the UAW to represent what are expected to be 3,500 workers at its planned assembly facility in Flat Rock, near Detroit. But she said that Mazda is likely to push programs such as pay-for-knowledge.

GM officials said that they already are conducting some pay-for-knowledge experiments.

Nissan officials in Tennessee said that their comparable pay plan, which they call the "versatility premium," is running at top gear.

"We see no reason to have four maintenance men doing four separate maintenance jobs, when one can do all four," said Wayne L. Wright, Nissan's vice president for human resources in Smyrna.

"The better they become" at doing many jobs, "the more they earn," said Wright, who added that Nissan's U.S. workers receive a base hourly wage "in line" with the $12.82 paid at GM and Ford.

In terms of hourly wages, "Our competitors are well aware that they pay too much. We're guilty of that, too," Wright said. average hourly wages at GM and Ford are $3.60 above the $9.22 average for all manufacturing workers in the United States, according to the latest (October 1984) final figures provided by the Bureau of Labor Statisitcs.

But Wright said that Nissan is getting more for its money because most of its 2,300 employees are trained to do more than one job. "This works to the benefit of the employees, as well," he said. "It upgrades their skills, makes them transferable and, when one job goes down, they don't have to go home."

Increasing plant and worker efficiency, and designing compensation plans to better support those goals, probably is the best way to cut costs, Wright said.

Peter J. Pestillo, Ford's vice president for employee relations, agrees with that assessment.

"I think one of the ways to produce cars more efficiently, and therefore cheaper, is to use your work force more effectively," Pestillo said. "Workers know how to save effort and give you yield and the kind of quality you need. To the extent that you engage them in that, you get it.●

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Saunders, one of his secretaries.

JOINT RESOLUTION TO APPROVE THE COMPACT OF FREE ASSOCIATION RELATING TO THE TRUST TERRITORY OF THE PACIFIC ISLANDS—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 99-29)

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, without objection, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs and ordered to be printed:

(For message, see proceedings of the Senate of today, Wednesday, February 20, 1985.)

RULES OF COMMITTEE ON VETERANS' AFFAIRS FOR THE 99th CONGRESS

(Mr. MONTGOMERY asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

● Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the rules of the House, I am pleased to submit for printing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a copy of the rules of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs which were adopted at the organizational meeting on February 7, 1985. The rules were agreed to by a unanimous voice vote.

RULES OF COMMITTEE ON VETERANS' AFFAIRS FOR THE 99TH CONGRESS

RULE I—GENERAL PROVISIONS

The Rules of the House are the rules of the committee and subcommittees so far as applicable, except that a motion to recess from day to day is a motion of high privilege in committees and subcommittees. Each subcommittee of the committee is a part of the committee, and is subject to the authority and direction of the committee and to its rules so far as applicable.

RULE II—MEETINGS

(a) The regular meeting day for the full committee shall be at 10 a.m. on the second Tuesday of each month, and at such other times and in such places as the chairman may designate; however, a regular Tuesday meeting of the committee may be dispensed with by the chairman.

(b) The chairman may call and convene, as he considers necessary, additional meetings of the committee for the consideration of any bill or resolution pending before the committee or for the conduct of other committee business. The committee shall meet for such purpose pursuant to the call of the chairman.

(c)(1) Each meeting for the transaction of business, including the markup of legislation, of the committee or each subcommittee thereto shall be open to the public except when the committee or subcommittee, in open session and with a quorum present, determines by roll call vote that all or part of the remainder of the meeting on that day shall be closed to the public: Provided, however: That no person other than members of the committee and such congressional staff and such departmental representatives as they may authorize shall be present at any business or markup session which has been closed to the public. This paragraph does not apply to subparagraph (2) of this paragraph, or to any meeting that relates solely to internal budget or personnel matters.

(2) Each hearing conducted by the committee or each subcommittee thereof shall be open to the public except when the committee or subcommittee, in open session and with a quorum present, determines by roll call vote that all or part of the remainder of that hearing on that day shall be closed to the public because disclosure of testimony, evidence, or other matters to be considered would endanger the national security or would violate any law or rule of the House of Representatives: Provided, however: That the committee or subcommittee may by the same procedure vote to close one subsequent day of hearing.

RULE III—RECORDS AND ROLL CALLS

There shall be kept in writing a record of the proceedings of the committee and of each subcommittee, including a record of the votes on any question on which a roll call is demanded. The result of each such roll call vote shall be made available by the committee for inspection by the public at reasonable times in the offices of the committee. Information so available for public inspection shall include a description of the amendment, motion, order or other proposition and the name of each member voting for and each member voting against such amendment, motion, order, or proposition, and the names of those members present but not voting. A record vote may be demanded by one-fifth of the members present or, in the apparent absence of a quorum, by any one member. With respect to each record vote by the committee to report any bill or resolution, the total number of votes cast for and the total number of votes cast against the reporting of such bill or such resolution shall be included in the committee report.

RULE IV—QUORUMS

A majority of the members of the committee shall constitute a quorum of the committee for business and a majority of the members of any subcommittee shall constitute a quorum thereof for business: Provided, That any two members shall constitute a quorum for the purpose of taking testimony and receiving evidence.

RULE V—HEARING PROCEDURES

(a) The chairman, in the case of hearings to be conducted by the committee, and the appropriate subcommittee chairman, in the case of hearings to be conducted by a subcommittee, shall make public announcement of the date, place, and subject matter of any hearing to be conducted on any measure or matter at least one week before the commencement of that hearing unless the committee determines that there is good cause to begin such hearing at an earlier date. In the latter event, the chairman or the subcommittee chairman, whichever the case may be, shall make such public announcement at the earliest possible date.

The clerk of the committee shall promptly notify the Daily Digest Clerk of the Congressional Record as soon as possible after such public announcement is made.

(b) So far as practicable, each witness who is to appear before the committee or a subcommittee shall file with the clerk of the committee, at least 48 hours in advance of his or her appearance, a written statement of his or her proposed testimony and shall limit his or her oral presentation to a summary of the statement.

(c) When any hearing is conducted by the committee or any subcommittee upon any measure or matter, the minority party members on the committee shall be entitled, upon request to the chairman of a majority of those minority members before the completion of such hearing, to call such witnesses selected by the minority to testify with respect to that measure or matter during at least one day of hearing thereon.

(d) All other members of the committee may have the privilege of sitting with any subcommittee during its hearings or deliberations and may participate in such hearings or deliberations, but no such member who is not a member of the subcommittee shall vote on any matter before such subcommittee.

(e) Committee members may question witnesses only when they have been recognized by the chairman for that purpose, and only for a 5-minute period until all members present have had an opportunity to question a witness. The 5-minute period for questioning a witness by any one member can be extended only with the unanimous consent of all members present. The questioning of witnesses in both full and subcommittee hearings shall be initiated by the chairman, followed by the ranking minority party member and all other members alternating between the majority and minority. In recognizing members to question witnesses in this fashion, the chairman shall take into consideration the ratio of the majority to minority members present and shall establish the order of recognition for questioning in such a manner as not to disadvantage the members of the majority.

RULE VI—OVERSIGHT

(a) In order to assist the House in:

(1) Its analysis, appraisal, and evaluation of (A) the application, administration, execution, and effectiveness of the laws enacted by the Congress or (B) conditions and circumstances which may indicate the necessity or desirability of enacting new or additional legislation, and

(2) its formulation, consideration and enactment of such modifications or changes in those laws, and of such additional legislation, as may be necessary or appropriate, the various subcommittees, consistent with their jurisdiction as set forth in Rule VIII shall have oversight responsibilities as provided in paragraph (b).

(b) Each subcommittee shall review and study, on a continuing basis, the application, administration, execution, and effectiveness of those laws, or parts of laws, the subject matter of which is within the jurisdiction of that subcommittee, and the organization and operation of the Federal agencies and entities having responsibilities in or for the administration and execution thereof, in order to determine whether such laws and the programs thereunder are being implemented and carried out in accordance with the intent of the Congress and whether such programs should be continued, curtailed, or eliminated.

In addition, each such subcommittee shall review and study any conditions or circumstances which may indicate the necessity or desirability of enacting new or additional legislation within the jurisdiction of that subcommittee (whether or not any bill or resolution has been introduced with respect thereto), and shall on a continuing basis undertake future research and forecasting on matters within the jurisdiction of that subcommittee.

(c) Each subcommittee shall review and study on a continuing basis the impact or probable impact of tax policies affecting subjects within its jurisdictions.

RULE VII—BROADCASTING OF COMMITTEE HEARINGS

Broadcasting, either by radio or TV of all open committee hearings and meetings shall be permitted when, in the judgment of the chairman, in consultation with the ranking minority member, such action is warranted. Photographs shall be permitted during hearings of the full committee and subcommittees as the chairman decides.

All coverage shall be subject to the following provisions:

(1) If the television or radio coverage of the hearing or meeting is to be presented to the public as live coverage, that coverage shall be conducted and presented without commercial sponsorship.

(2) No witness served with a subpoena by the committee shall be required against his or her will to be photographed at any hearing or to give evidence or testimony while the broadcasting of that hearing, by radio or television, is being conducted. At the request of any such witness who does not wish to be subjected to radio, television, or still photography coverage, all lenses shall be covered and all microphones used for coverage turned off.

(3) Not more than four television cameras, operating from fixed positions, shall be permitted in a hearing or meeting room. The allocation among the television media of the positions of the number of television cameras permitted in a hearing or meeting room shall be in accordance with fair and equitable procedures devised by the Executive Committee of the Radio and Television Correspondents' Galleries.

(4) Television cameras shall be placed so as not to obstruct in any way the space between any witness giving evidence or testimony and any member of the committee or the visibility of that witness and that member to each other.

(5) Television cameras shall not be placed in positions which obstruct unnecessarily the coverage of the hearing or meeting by other media.

(6) Equipment necessary for coverage by the television and radio media shall not be installed in, or removed from, the hearing or meeting room while the committee is in session.

(7) Floodlights, spotlights, strobelights, and flashguns shall not be used in providing any method of coverage of the hearing or meeting, except that the television media may install additional lighting in the hearing or meeting room, without cost to the Government, in order to raise the ambient lighting level in the hearing or meeting room to the lowest level necessary to provide adequate television coverage of the hearing or meeting at the then current state of the art of television coverage.

(8) Not more than five press photographers shall be permitted to cover a hearing or meeting by still photography. In the selection of these photographers, preference shall be given to photographers from Associated Press Photos and United Press International Newspictures. If request is made by more than five of the media for coverage of the hearing or meeting by still photography, that coverage shall be made on the basis of a fair and equitable pool arrangement devised by the Standing Committee of Press Photographers.

(9) Photographers shall not position themselves, at any time during the course of the hearing or meeting, between the witness table and the members of the committee.

(10) Photographers shall not place themselves in positions which obstruct unnecessarily the coverage of the hearing by the other media.

(11) Personnel providing coverage by the television and radio media shall be then currently accredited to the Radio and Television Correspondents' Galleries.

(12) Personnel providing coverage by still photography shall be then currently accredited to the Press Photographers' Gallery.

(13) Personnel providing coverage by the television and radio media and by still photography shall conduct themselves and their coverage activities in an orderly and unobtrusive manner.

RULE VIII—NUMBER AND JURISDICTION OF SUBCOMMITTEES

(a) There shall be five standing subcommittees as follows: Oversight and Investigations; Hospitals and Health Care; Education, Training and Employment; Compensation, Pension and Insurance; and Housing and Memorial Affairs. All proposed legislation and other matters related to the subcommittees listed under standing subcommittees named below shall be referred to such subcommittees, respectively;

Oversight and Investigations: Investigative authority over matters that are referred to the subcommittee by the chairman of the full committee for investigation and appropriate recommendations.

Hospitals and Health Care: Veterans' hospitals, medical care, and treatment of veterans.

Education, Training and Employment: Education of veterans, vocational rehabilitation, and readjustment of servicemen to civilian life.

Compensation, Pension, and Insurance: Compensation, pensions of all the wars of the United States, general and special, and life insurance issued by the Government on account of service in the Armed Forces.

Housing and Memorial Affairs: Veterans' housing programs, and cemeteries of the United States in which veterans of any war or conflict are or may be buried, whether in the United States or abroad, except cemeteries administered by the Secretary of the Interior, and burial benefits.

(b) The chairman and the ranking minority member shall serve as ex-officio members of all subcommittees and shall have the right to vote on all matters before the subcommittee.

RULE IX—POWERS AND DUTIES OF SUBCOMMITTEES

(a) Each subcommittee is authorized to meet, hold hearings, receive evidence, and report to the full committee on all matters referred to it or under its jurisdiction. Subcommittee chairmen shall set dates for hearings and meetings of their respective subcommittees after consultation with the chairman and other subcommittee chairmen with a view toward avoiding simultaneous scheduling of full committee and subcommittee meetings or hearings wherever possible.

(b) Whenever a subcommittee has ordered a bill, resolution, or other matter to be reported to the committee, the chairman of the subcommittee reporting the bill, resolution, or matter to the full committee, or any member authorized by the subcommittee to do so, may report such bill, resolution, or matter to the committee. It shall be the duty of the chairman of the subcommittee to report or cause to be reported promptly such bill, resolution, or matter, and to take or cause to be taken the necessary steps to bring such bill, resolution, or matter to a vote.

(c) In any event, the report of any subcommittee on a measure which has been approved by the subcommittee shall be filed within seven calendar days (exclusive of days on which the House is not in session) after the day on which there has been filed with the clerk of the committee a written request, signed by a majority of the members of the subcommittee, for the reporting of that measure. Upon the filing of any request, the clerk of the committee shall transmit immediately to the chairman of the subcommittee notice of the filing of that request.●

RULES OF COMMITTEE ON INTERIOR AND INSULAR AFFAIRS FOR THE 99TH CONGRESS

(Mr. UDALL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

● Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, I submit herewith for printing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the rules of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, in accordance with clause 2(a) of House rule XI:

RULES OF THE COMMITTEE ON INTERIOR AND INSULAR AFFAIRS

A. RULES OF GENERAL APPLICATION

Rule 1. Rules of the House.—The Rules of the House of Representatives are the rules of its Committees and Subcommittees so far as applicable, except that a motion to recess from day to day is a motion of high privilege in Committees and Subcommittees. Written rules adopted by the Committees, not inconsistent with the Rules of the House, shall be binding on each Subcommittee. Each Subcommittee of a Committee is a part of that Committee and is subject to the authority and direction of that Committee. Rule XI of the Rules of the House, which pertains entirely to Committee procedure, is incorporated and made a part of the Rules of the Committee which are supplementary to the Rules of the House.

Rule 2. Time, Place of Meetings.—(a) While Congress is in session, regular business meetings of the Committee shall be held in the regularly assigned committee room, Longworth House Office Building, beginning at 9:45 a.m. on each Wednesday, except that whenever any regularly scheduled party caucus or conference conflicts with such meeting of the Committee, then the Committee shall meet at a later time or on Thursday or on such other day as may be mutually agreed upon by the Chair and the Ranking Minority Member. Such meeting shall be called to order and presided over by the Chair, or in the absence of the Chair, by the ranking majority member of the Committee present.

(b) Special meetings shall be held at the call of the Chair or upon written request of Members of the Committee as provided in Rule XI, Clause 2, of the Rules of the House. When a regularly called party caucus or party conference is scheduled to be in session after 10 a.m. on any day, and the Chair is so advised not later than 12 noon on the preceding day, the regularly scheduled Committee meeting for that day shall be rescheduled at a later time or as provided in paragraph (a) of this rule.

(c) Each meeting of the Committee or any of its Subcommittees for the transaction of business, including the mark-up of legislation, shall be open to the public except when the Committee or Subcommittee, in open session and with a majority present, determines by rollcall vote that all or part of the remainder of the meeting on that day shall be closed to the public because disclosure of testimony, evidence or other matters to be considered would endanger the national security or would violate any law or rule of the House of Representatives: Provided however, That no person other than Members of the Committee and such congressional staff and such departmental representatives as they may authorize shall be present at any business or mark-up session which has been closed to the public. This paragraph does not apply to any meeting that relates solely to internal budget or personnel matters.

Rule 3. Agenda for Meetings.—The agenda for Committee meetings, setting out all items of business to be considered, shall be available and delivered to the office of each Member at least 48 hours in advance of the meeting: Provided, That this requirement may be waived by a majority vote, a quorum being present.

Rule 4. Adjournment of Meetings.—A motion to adjourn shall not be approved unless the Chair, in his discretion, recognizes a Member for the purpose of making such motion and the motion is approved by a majority of the Members present and voting.

Rule 5. Committee Procedure.—(a) The date, time, place and subject matter of all public hearings of the Committee or any of its Subcommittees shall be announced at least 1 week in advance of the commencement of such hearings. If the Committee, or any of its Subcommittees, determines that there is good cause to expedite the hearing, it shall make the announcement at the earliest possible date. Any such announcement shall be promptly published in the Daily Digest.

(b) Each hearing conducted by the Committee or Subcommittee thereof shall be open to the public except when the Committee or Subcommittee, in open session and with a majority present, determines by rollcall vote that all or part of the remainder of that hearing on that day shall be closed to the public because disclosure of testimony, evidence, or other matters to be considered would endanger the national security or would violate any law or rule of the House of Representatives: Provided, That the Committee or Subcommittee may by the same procedure vote to close one subsequent day of hearing: Provided further, That two or more Members at a meeting held for the purpose of taking testimony may determine, by a majority vote,

(i) to close such hearing for the purpose of discussing whether testimony or evidence to be received would endanger national security or tend to defame, degrade, or incriminate any person in violation of rule XI, 2(k)(5) of the Rules of the House; or

(ii) to close the hearing as provided in rule XI 2(k)(5) of the House.

(c) No Member may be excluded from nonparticipatory attendance at any hearing of the Committee, or its Subcommittees unless the House, by majority vote, authorizes the Committee or its Subcommittees, for purposes of a particular series of hearings on a particular article of legislation or on a particular subject of investigation, to close such meetings to Members by the same procedures designated in this rule for closing meetings to the public.

(d) Each witness who is to appear before the Committee or one of its Subcommittees shall file with the Committee, at least 24 hours in advance of his appearance, a written statement of his proposed testimony and shall limit his oral presentation at his appearance to a brief summary of his argument, unless this requirement is waived by the Committee.

(e) The right to interrogate witnesses before the Committee or any of its Subcommittees shall alternate between the Majority Members and the Minority Members. In recognizing Members to question witnesses, the Chair may take into consideration the ratio of Majority and Minority party Members present and may recognize two Majority party Members for each Minority party Member recognized. Each Member shall be limited to 5 minutes in the interrogation of witnesses until such time as each Member of the Committee who so desires has had an opportunity to question the witness.

(f) No bill, recommendation, or other matter reported by a Subcommittee shall be considered by the Committee until 2 calendar days have elapsed from the time of the action of the Subcommittee and such action has been reported by the Committee Clerk to all Members of the Committee and, in the case of a bill, a copy has been delivered to the office of all Members so requesting the same, together with a section-by-section explanation and, if a change in present law is involved, a section-by-section comparison with the present law: Provided, That this requirement may be waived by a two-thirds vote of a quorum of the Committee Members.

Rule 6. Quorum.—No measure or recommendation shall be reported from the Committee unless a majority of the Members of the Committee is present, but for the purpose of transacting any other Committee business one-third of the Members shall constitute a quorum. Testimony and evidence may be received at any meeting at which there are present two or more Members of the Committee. A quorum, once established, shall be deemed present unless a Member objects to the transaction of business due to the lack of a quorum. When a call of the roll is required to ascertain the presence of a quorum, the offices of all Members shall be so notified and the Members shall have not less than 10 minutes to prove their attendance. The Chair shall have the discretion to waive this requirement when a quorum is actually present or whenever a quorum is secured and may direct the Clerk to note the names of all Members present within the 10 minute period.

Rule 7. Proxies.—A vote by any Member in the Committee or in any Subcommittee may be cast by proxy, but such proxy must be in writing. Each proxy shall designate the Member who is to execute the proxy authorization, shall assert that the Member is absent on official business or otherwise unable to attend, and shall be limited to a specific measure or matter and any amendments or motions pertaining thereto; except that a Member may authorize a general proxy for motions to recess, adjourn or other procedural matters. Each proxy to be effective shall be signed by the Member assigning his vote and shall contain the date and time of day that the proxy is signed. Proxies may not be counted for a quorum.

Rule 8. Subpenas and Oaths.—(a) A subpena may be issued by a Committee or Subcommittee in the conduct of any investigation or series of investigations or activities when authorized by a majority of the Members of the Committee or Subcommittee and approved by the Chair of the Full Committee and signed by his or her designee.

(b) The Chair of the Committee, the Chair of any of its Subcommittees, or any Member designated by either, may administer oaths to any witness.

Rule 9. Journal, Rollcalls.—(a) The proceedings of the Committee shall be recorded in a journal which shall, among other things include a record of the votes on any question on which a record vote is demanded. A copy of the journal shall be furnished the Ranking Minority Member through the Minority Counsel. A record vote may be demanded by one-fifth of the Members present or, in the apparent absence of a quorum, by any one Member. No demand for a rollcall shall be made or entertained except for the purpose of securing a record vote or in the apparent absence of a quorum.

(b) At the beginning of any meeting of the Committee, the Chair may announce to the Committee, in its discretion, that further proceedings will be postponed on any motions on which a recorded vote is ordered or on which the vote is objected to under Rule 6 until immediately preceding the conclusion of the meeting. In such instances, the Committee shall proceed with the consideration of the next regularly scheduled measures or matters until all such business is disposed of or until such time as the Chair announces that the question will be put on the matter deferred. The question on any motion so postponed shall be put by the Chair and shall be disposed of by the Committee, without further debate, as expeditiously as possible. If the Committee adjourns before the question is put and determined on such motion, then the first order of business at the next meeting shall be the disposition of such motion.

(c) The result of each rollcall vote in any meeting of the Committee shall be made available in the Committee office for inspection by the public. Such records shall constitute the official attendance records of the Committee.

Rule 10. Filing of Committee Reports.—(a) All Members of the Committee shall be given an opportunity to review each proposed Committee report for at least 2 days (excluding Saturdays, Sundays, and legal holidays) prior to filing.

(b) If, at the time of approval of any measure or matter by this Committee, any Member of the Committee gives notice of intention to file supplemental, minority, or additional views, that Member shall be entitled to not less than three calendar days (excluding Saturdays, Sundays, and legal holidays) after the copy of the Committee report in substantially final form is completed, excluding formal or technical changes, in which to file such views, in writing and signed by that Member or Members, with the Clerk of the Committee. In the event that substantial or significant changes are made in the Committee report, such Member shall have not more than one calendar day to review such changes and alter his or her views in responding thereto. All such views so filed by one or more Members of the Committee shall be included within, and shall be a part of, the report filed by the Committee with respect to that measure or matter.

(c) The time requirements of paragraphs (a) and (b) of this rule shall run concurrently and shall not operate to delay the filing of Committee reports.

Rule 11. Record of Committee Proceedings.—(a) Evidence, testimony, and information relevant to any measure or matter before the Committee will be received for inclusion in the record of proceedings as determined appropriate. A formal transcript need not be made in all instances and the Chair may exercise discretion as to content of the record. A complete record of all Committee action, which shall include a record of the votes on any question on which a rollcall vote is demanded, shall be kept and retained in the permanent files of the Committee. All printing of proceedings or of other matter shall be subject to general principles promulgated by the Chair as well as by approval in each instance not only by the Chair of the appropriate Subcommittee but also by the Chair of the Committee.

(b) All transcripts of public meetings and hearings shall be available for review in the offices of the Committee. Unrevised and unedited hearing transcripts shall not be reproduced in any form without the written consent of the Chair or of the Member involved. Transcripts of other public meetings of the Committee and its Subcommittees shall not be reproduced in any form without the written consent of the Chair of the Committee or, as appropriate, of the Chair of the Subcommittee involved, in his or her discretion. Records and transcripts of public meetings of the Committee, conducted during any prior Congress, may be made available for review in the offices of the Committee, but such records and transcripts shall not be reproduced except as permitted by the House of Representatives.

(c) No records or transcripts of Committee meetings held in executive session shall be released unless the Committee directs otherwise. All classified documents, transcripts, or other materials shall be maintained in an appropriately secured location and shall not be released for review by any unauthorized person. Authorized persons must review such classified materials at an appropriate location in the Committee offices, but such material shall not be removed from the Committee offices for any reason without the written permission of the Chair and, as appropriate, of the Chair of the Subcommittee involved.

Rule 12. Broadcasting of Committee Hearings.—(a) It is the purpose of this clause to provide a means, in conformity with acceptable standards of dignity, propriety, and decorum, by which Committee hearings, or Committee meetings, which are open to the public may be covered, by television broadcast, radio broadcast, and still photography, or by any of such methods of coverage—

(1) for the education, enlightenment, and information of the general public, on the basis of accurate and impartial news coverage, regarding the operations, procedures, and practices of the House as a legislative and representative body and regarding the measures, public issues, and other matters before the House and its Committees, the consideration thereof, and the action taken thereon; and

(2) for the development of the perspective and understanding of the general public with respect to the role and function of the House under the Constitution of the United States as an organ of the Federal Government.

(b) In addition, it is the intent of this clause that radio and television tapes and television film of any coverage under this clause shall not be used, or made available for use, as partisan political campaign material to promote or oppose the candidacy of any person for elective public office.

(c) It is, further, the intent of this clause that the general conduct of each meeting (whether of a hearing or otherwise) covered, under authority of this clause, by television broadcast, radio broadcast, and still photograph, or by any of such methods of coverage, and the personal behavior of the Committee members and staff, other Government officials and personnel, witnesses, television, radio, and press media personnel, and the general public at the hearing or other meeting shall be in strict conformity with and observance of the acceptable standards of dignity, propriety, courtesy, and decorum traditionally observed by the House in its operations and shall not be such as to—

(1) distort the objects and purposes of the hearing or other meeting or the activities of Committee members in connection with that hearing or meeting or in connection with the general work of the Committee or of the House; or

(2) cast discredit or dishonor on the House, the Committee, or any member or bring the House, the Committee, or any Member into disrepute.

(d) The coverage of Committee hearings and meetings by television broadcast, radio broadcast, or still photography is a privilege made available by the House and shall be permitted and conducted only in strict conformity with the purposes, provisions, and requirements of this clause. No recording of Committee of Subcommittee proceedings shall be permitted except as authorized pursuant to these rules.

(e) Whenever any hearing or meeting conducted by any Committee of the House is open to the public, that Committee may permit, by majority vote of the Committee, that hearing or meeting to be covered, in whole or in part, by television broadcast, radio broadcast, and still photography, or by any of such methods of coverage, but only under such written rules as the Committee may adopt in accordance with the purposes, provisions, and requirements of this clause.

(f) The following rules shall apply to the Committee and its Subcommittees:

(1) If the television or radio coverage of the hearing or meeting is to be presented to the public as live coverage, that coverage shall be conducted and presented without commercial sponsorship.

(2) No witness served with a subpena by the Committee shall be required against his or her will to be photographed at any hearing or to give evidence or testimony while the broadcasting of that hearing, by radio or television, is being conducted. At the request of any such witness who does not wish to be subjected to radio, television, or still photography coverage, all lenses shall be covered and all microphones used for coverage turned off.

(3) Not more than four television cameras, operating from fixed positions, shall be permitted in a hearing or meeting room. The allocation among the television media of the positions of the number of television cameras permitted in a hearing or meeting room shall be in accordance with fair and equitable procedures devised by the Executive Committee of the Radio and Television Correspondents' Galleries.

(4) Television cameras shall be placed so as not to obstruct in any way the space between any witness giving evidence or testimony and any Member of the Committee or the visibility of that witness and that Member to each other.

(5) Television cameras shall not be placed on the Committee rostrum or in positions which obstruct unnecessarily the coverage of the hearing or meeting by the other media.

(6) Equipment necessary for coverage by the television and radio media shall not be installed in, or removed from, the hearing or meeting room while the Committee is in session.

(7) Floodlights, spotlights, strobelights, and flashguns shall not be used in providing any method of coverage of the hearing or meeting, except that the television media may install additional lighting in the hearing or meeting room, without cost to the Government, in order to raise the ambient lighting level in the hearing or meeting room to the lowest level necessary to provide adequate television coverage of the hearing or meeting at the then current state of the art of television coverage.

(8) Not more than five press photographers shall be permitted to cover a hearing or meeting by still photography. In the selection of these photographers, preference shall be given to photographers from Associated Press Photos and United Press International News pictures. If request is made by more than five of the media for coverage of the hearing or meeting by still photography, that coverage shall be made on the basis of a fair and equitable pool arrangement devised by the Standing Committee of Press Photographers.

(9) Photographers shall not position themselves, at any time during the course of the hearing or meeting, on the Committee rostrum or between the witness table and the Members of the Committee.

(10) Photographers shall not place themselves in positions which obstruct unnecessarily the coverage of the hearing by the other media.

(11) Personnel providing coverage by the television and radio media shall be then currently accredited to the Radio and Television Correspondents' Galleries.

(12) Personnel providing coverage by still photography shall be then currently accredited to the Press Photographers' Gallery.

(13) Personnel providing coverage by the television and radio media and by still photography shall conduct themselves and their coverage activities in an orderly and unobstrusive manner.

Rule 13. Committee Staffs.—(a) Pursuant to Rule XI, Clause 6 of the Rules of the House, the permanent staff of the Committee shall consist of not more than 30 staff members who shall be selected on the basis of fitness to perform the duties of their respective positions as follows:

three shall be chosen by the Committee from nominations approved by a majority of the Members of the Minority party of the Committee;

one shall be chosen by the Committee from nominations submitted by the Chair of each of the standing Subcommittees of the Committee;

one shall be chosen by the Committee from nominations submitted by the ranking Minority party Member of each standing Subcommittee of the Committee; and the balance of any unfilled positions shall be chosen by the Committee from nominations approved by a majority of the Members of the Majority party Members of the Committee;

The staff members selected by the Majority party shall be assigned such legislative, oversight, and administrative duties and responsibilities as the Chair of the Committee may prescribe and shall assist Committee Members in connection with matters related to Committee business. Each staff member nominated by a Subcommittee Chair shall be under the general supervision and direction of that Subcommittee Chair. The staff members selected by the Minority party shall be under general supervision and direction of the Minority party Members of the Committee who may delegate such authority as they determine appropriate.

(b) A Subcommittee Chair shall be entitled to select and designate additional staff members, subject to the approval of a majority of the Majority party Members of the Committee, to assist the Subcommittee in carrying out its legislative, investigative and oversight responsibilities. The Minority shall be accorded fair and equitable consideration with respect to the appointment of additional staff, but Minority staffing shall continue to be approximately one-third Minority representation on the Committee. Such staff members shall be assigned such duties pertaining to Subcommittee business as the Subcommittee Chair or the Minority, respectively, deem advisable and shall be compensated at a salary commensurate with the responsibilities prescribed by such Subcommittee Chair or by the Minority.

(c) Notwithstanding paragraphs (a) and (b) of this rule, the Committee may employ such additional nonpartisan staff as it deems necessary to conduct the administrative and clerical functions of the Committee. Such staff shall be in addition to any staff designated exclusively for the Majority or Minority party and shall be appointed only with the approval of a majority of the Members of the Majority party and with the approval of a majority of the Members of the Minority party. The Chair of the Committee shall establish and assign the duties and responsibilities of such members of the staff and they shall be compensated at a salary commensurate with the responsibilities prescribed.

(d) In the event that staff is not otherwise available pursuant to paragraphs (a) and (b) of this rule, from the funds provided for the appointment of Committee staff pursuant to any primary and additional expense resolution:

(1) The Chair of each standing Subcommittee is authorized to appoint at least one staff member who shall serve at the pleasure of the Subcommittee Chair.

(2) The ranking Minority party Member of each standing Subcommittee is authorized to appoint one staff person who shall serve at the pleasure of the ranking Minority party Member.

(3) The staff members appointed pursuant to the provisions of subparagraphs (a) and (b) shall be compensated at a rate determined by the Subcommittee Chair pursuant to Rule XI, Clause 5(d) of the House of Representatives.

(4) The staff positions made available to the Subcommittee Chair and ranking Minority party Members pursuant to subparagraphs (1) and (2) of this paragraph shall be made available from the staff positions provided under Rule XI, Clause 6 unless such staff positions are made available pursuant to a primary or additional expense resolution.

(e) All staff selected pursuant to this rule shall be approved by the Committee and shall not be assigned any duties other than those pertaining to the business of the Committee and its Subcommittees. The staff of a Subcommittee shall be under the general supervision and direction of the Chair of that Subcommittee. The staff assigned to the Minority shall be under the general supervision and direction of the Minority party Members of the Committee who may delegate such authority as they determine appropriate. The staff of the Committee not assigned to a Subcommittee or to the Minority shall be under the general supervision and direction of the Chair of the Committee, who shall establish and assign the duties and responsibilities of such staff members and delegate authority as determined appropriate.

B. SUBCOMMITTEES: JURISDICTION, COMPOSITION, AND POWERS

Rule 14. Subcommittee Rules.—The Rules of the Committee, where applicable, shall be the Rules of its Subcommittees.

Rule 15. Reference of Legislation.—(a) Except for bills, resolutions, or matters involving Indians and Indian Tribes and the Commonwealths and Territories of the United States which shall be retained for consideration by the Committee unless referred by the Chair to an appropriate standing, select, or special Subcommittee, every bill, resolution, or other matter referred to the Committee shall be referred to subcommittee within 2 weeks from the date of its referral to the Committee unless the Chair, with the approval of a majority of the Majority Members of the Committee, orders that it be retained for consideration by the Committee or that it be referred to a select or special Subcommittee.

(b) A bill, resolution, or other matter referred by the Chair to a Subcommittee may be recalled therefrom by him or her with the approval of a majority of the Members of the Committee for the Committee's direct consideration or for referral to another Subcommittee. The Chair shall so inform the Members of this recommendation, in writing, and such recommendation shall be effective within 1 week if approved by a majority of the Members of the Committee.

(c) A bill, resolution, or other matter referred by the Committee to a Subcommittee may be recalled from such Subcommittee at any time by majority vote of a quorum of the Committee for its direct consideration or for reference to another Subcommittee.

Rule 16. Subcommittees.—There shall be the following six standing Subcommittees of the Committee: Subcommittee on Energy and the Environment; Subcommittee on Public Lands; Subcommittee on General Oversight, Northwest Power, and Forest Management; Subcommittee on Water and Power Resources; Subcommittee on Mining and Natural Resources; and Subcommittee on National Parks and Recreation. Additional standing Subcommittees may be created by resolution of the Committee.

Rule 17. Jurisdiction of Subcommittees.—(a) The jurisdiction, including legislative, investigative, and oversight responsibilities, of the six standing Subcommittees shall, subject to alteration as other Subcommittees are created, be as follows:

SUBCOMMITTEE ON ENERGY AND THE ENVIRONMENT

(a) Recommendations with respect to laws and programs under the jurisdiction of the Committee made by the Council on Environmental Quality in its annual Environmental Quality Report to the Congress.

(b) Selected matters and proposals, as referred by the Chairman, involving the environmental impacts of any laws or programs under the jurisdiction of the Committee.

(c) Regulation of the domestic nuclear energy industry, including regulation of research and development of reactors and nuclear regulatory research and special oversight functions with respect to nonmilitary nuclear energy and research and development, including the disposal of nuclear waste.

(d) Petroleum conservation on the public and other Federal lands and conservation of the uranium supply in the United States.

(e) Legislation concerning the transportation of natural gas from or within Alaska or concerning the disposition of oil transported by the trans-Alaska oil pipeline.

SUBCOMMITTEE ON PUBLIC LANDS

(a) Public lands, generally, including measures or matters related to entry, easements, withdrawals, and grazing.

(b) Measures and matters relating to the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act.

(c) Forfeiture of land grants and alien ownership, including alien ownership of mineral lands.

(d) Forest reserves created from the public domain.

(e) National Wilderness Preservation System and all matters relating thereto.

(f) Preservation of prehistoric ruins and objects of interest on the public domain and other Historic Preservation programs, including the Historic Preservation Fund.

(g) Cooperative efforts to encourage, enhance, and improve international programs for the conservation of land and related resources, particularly as they may affect conservation efforts on the public lands of the United States.

(h) All measures and matters involving the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands and Antarctica.

SUBCOMMITTEE ON GENERAL OVERSIGHT, NORTHWEST POWER, AND FOREST MANAGEMENT

(a) General and continuing oversight and investigative authority over activities, policies, and programs within the jurisdiction of the Committee as may be referred to the Subcommittee by the Chair of the Full Committee, after consultation with the Chair of the principal standing legislative Subcommittee involved.

(b) Such remedial legislation resulting from the findings or recommendations of the Subcommittee as may be referred to the Subcommittee, after consultation with the Chair of the principal standing legislative Subcommittee involved.

(c) Forest management of forest reserves created from the public domain, except matters in the jurisdiction of other subcommittees.

(d) Measures or matters pertaining to Northwest power and the Pacific Northwest Electric Power Planning and Conservation Act, together with jurisdiction over all transmission lines referred thereto by the Chair of the Full Committee.

SUBCOMMITTEE ON WATER AND POWER RESOURCES

(a) Irrigation and reclamation projects and other water resources development programs, including policies and procedures relating thereto.

(b) Compacts relating to the use and apportionment of interstate waters.

(c) Water rights and water related programs of the Geological Survey.

(d) Saline water research and development program and water resources research program.

(e) Water resources planning conducted pursuant to the Water Resources Planning Act.

(f) Programs involving major interbasin movement of water or power.

SUBCOMMITTEE ON MINING AND NATURAL RESOURCES

(a) Mining interests generally, including deep seabed mining and matters involving the Law of the Sea Treaty.

(b) Mineral resources of the public lands, except matters involving the Outer Continental Shelf.

(c) Mineral land laws, and claims and entries thereunder.

(d) Geological survey, except water related programs.

(e) Mining schools and experimental stations.

(f) Proposed long-range domestic minerals programs, including availability of domestic minerals to fulfill all domestic requirements.

(g) All measures and matters affecting geothermal resources.

SUBCOMMITTEE ON NATIONAL PARKS AND RECREATION

(a) Measures and matters related to the National Park System and all of its units.

(b) National Wild and Scenic Rivers System; National Trails System; national recreation areas; and other national units established for protection, conservation, preservation, or recreational development not within the express jurisdiction of the Subcommittee on Public Lands; and such military parks, battlefields, national cemeteries, and parks as the Secretary of the Interior may administer within the District of Columbia.

(c) National outdoor recreation plans, programs, and administration, including the Land and Water Conservation Fund and the Pennsylvania Avenue Development Corporation.

(b)(1) In order to enable the Committee to carry out its responsibilities under Rule X, Clause 2 of the Rules of the House, each Subcommittee shall review and study, on a continuing basis, the application, administration, execution, and effectiveness of those laws, or parts of laws, the subject matter of which is within the jurisdiction of that Subcommittee, and the organization and operation of the Federal agencies and entities having responsibilities in or for the administration and execution thereof, in order to determine whether such laws and the programs thereunder are being implemented and carried out in accordance with the intent of the Congress and whether such programs should be continued, curtailed, or eliminated. In addition, each such Subcommittee shall review and study any conditions or circumstances which may indicate the necessity or desirability of enacting new or additional legislation within the jurisdiction of that Subcommittee (whether or not any bill or resolution has been introduced with respect thereto), and shall on a continuing basis undertake future research and forecasting on matters within the jurisdiction of that Subcommittee.

(2) Pursuant to Rule X, Clause 2, of the Rules of the House, the Chair of the Committee and the Chair of the Subcommittee having jurisdiction over the matter involved or their respective designees, shall meet with representatives of the Committee on Government Operations to discuss and to assist in coordinating oversight plans of their respective Committees.

Rule 18. Party Ratios.—The Chair shall negotiate with the Minority with respect to the size of each Subcommittee, with due regard for the preference of Members for Subcommittee assignments, except that party representation on each subcommittee shall be no less favorable to the Majority party than the ratio for the Committee.

The Chair, if approved by a majority of the Members of the Majority party, and the Ranking Minority Member, if approved by a majority of the Members of the Minority party, may serve as Members of each Subcommittee.

The size and party representation for each Subcommittee during the 99th Congress shall be as follows:

Subcommittee [1]	Total members	Majority party [2]	Minority party [2]
Energy and the Environment	25	15	10
Public Lands	19	11	8
General Oversight, Northwest Power, and Forest Management	10	6	4
Water and Power Resources	13	8	5
Mining and Natural Resources	7	4	3
National Parks and Recreation	20	12	8

[1] The Chair and ranking minority member of the full committee serve as ex-officio members of all subcommittees, but are voting members only on the subcommittees to which they are assigned pursuant to rule 18.

[2] The Delegates from the Virgin Islands, American Samoa, and Guam and the Resident Commissioner from Puerto Rico do not count for purposes of the ratio between the majority and minority parties.

Rule 19. Special or Select Subcommittee.—The Chair is authorized, after consultation with the Ranking Minority Member of the Committee, to appoint such special or select Subcommittees as he deems advisable for carrying out the responsibilities and functions of the Committee. Party representation on each such Subcommittee shall be in the same proportion as that on the Committee.

Rule 20. Powers and Duties of Subcommittees.—Each Subcommittee is authorized to meet, hold hearings, receive evidence, and report to the Committee on all matters referred to it. The Chair of each Subcommittee shall set dates for hearings and meetings of their respective Subcommittees after consultation with the Chair of the Full Committee and of other Subcommittees with a view toward avoiding simultaneous scheduling of Committee and Subcommittee meetings or hearings wherever possible.

Rule 21. Travel.—(a) Subcommittee hearings outside of Washington, D.C., and travel by Members and staff shall be subject to approval by the Chair of the Committee pursuant to regulations promulgated by the Committee on House Administration. Each Subcommittee Chair may, for the purposes of field trips or hearings outside of the District of Columbia, assign any Members of the Committee to that Subcommittee.

(b) Staff members assigned to any Subcommittee may travel in connection with their respective duties only with the approval of the appropriate Subcommittee Chair and with the approval of the Chair of the Committee. Prior to submitting such travel requests to the appropriate Subcommittee Chair, all Minority staff travel shall be subject to such approval as the Minority Members of the Committee deem appropriate. All such travel shall be subject to the regulations promulgated by the Committee on House Administration.

Rule 22. Subcommittee Chair.—(a) The Majority Members of the Committee shall have the right, in order of Full Committee seniority, to bid for Standing Subcommittee Chairs. Any such bid shall be subject to approval by a majority of the Majority Members of the Committee. The Minority shall select a counterpart to the Subcommittee Chair for each of the Subcommittees. The Chair of select and special Subcommittees shall be appointed by the Chair of the Committee, subject to approval by a majority of the Majority Members of the Committee except that no Subcommittee Chair shall be Chair of another legislative Subcommittee of the House.

(b) Members chosen to Chair a Subcommittee shall retain a ranking position on not more than one other retained Subcommittee. Any Subcommittee Chair serving on more than two Subcommittees shall be assigned positions on additional Subcommittees only after all other Members are assigned to Subcommittees and their ranking established on such Subcommittee, then the Subcommittee Chairs may serve in the order of their ranking on the Committee.

Rule 23. Duties of Chair Upon Favorable Action by Committee.—Whenever the Committee authorizes the favorable reporting of a bill or resolution from the Committee, the Chair shall report the same or designate some Member of the Committee to report the same to the House and shall use or cause to be used all parliamentary methods to secure passage thereof, without such additional authority being set forth particularly in the motion to report each individual bill or resolution. Without limiting the generality of the foregoing, the authority contained herein extends in appropriate cases to moving in accordance with Rule XXIV, Clause 5, of the said rules that the House go into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union to consider the bill or resolution; and to moving in accordance with Rule XXIV, Clause 2, of said rules for the disposition of a Senate bill or resolution that is substantially the same as the House bill or resolution as reported.

Rule 24. Committee Budget and Expenses.—(a) Each Subcommittee Chair and the ranking Minority Members of the Committee shall submit to the Chair a budget for each session of the Congress covering the funding required for staff, travel, and miscellaneous expenses. The Chair shall prepare a consolidated budget for each session of Congress which shall include amounts required for all activities and programs of the Committee and the Subcommittees, except those Committee expenses to be paid from appropriations provided for by statute.

(b) Upon approval by the Committee of each such budget, the Chair, acting pursuant to Rule XI, Clause 5, of the Rules of the House, shall prepare and introduce in the House a supporting expense resolution, and take all action necessary to bring about its approval by the Committee on House Administration and by the House.

(c) The Chair shall report to the Committee any amendments to the Committee any amendments to each expense resolution and any changes in the budget necessitated thereby.

(d) Authorization for the payment of additional or unforeseen Committee and the Subcommittee's expenses may be procured by one or more additional expense resolutions processed in the same manner as set out herein.

(e) Committee members shall be advised of the availability of each monthly report, prepared by the Chair for the Committee on House Administration, which shows expenditures made during the reporting period and cumulative for the year, anticipated expenditures for the projected Committee program, and detailed information on travel.

Rule 25. Recommendation of Conferees.—Whenever in the legislative process it becomes necessary to appoint conferees, Majority Members shall be recommended to the Speaker as conferees as determined by the Majority, and Minority Members shall be recommended to the Speaker as conferees as determined by the Minority. Recommended party representation shall be in the same proportion as that in the Committee.●

RULES OF COMMITTEE ON GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS FOR THE 99TH CONGRESS

(Mr. BROOKS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

● Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to clause 2(a) of rule XI of the House of Representatives, herewith are submitted for publication in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the rules of the Committee on Government Operations, which were adopted on February 6, 1985:

RULES OF THE COMMITTEE ON GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS

RULE 1.—APPLICATION OF RULES

Except where the terms "full committee" and "subcommittee" are specifically referred to, the following rules shall apply to the Committee on Government Operations and its subcommittees as well as to the respective chairmen. [See House Rule XI, 1.]

RULE 2.—MEETINGS

The regular meetings of the full committee shall be held on the second Tuesday of each month at 10 a.m., except when Congress has adjourned. The chairman is authorized to dispense with a regular meeting or to change the date thereof, and to call and convene additional meetings, when circumstances warrant. A special meeting of the committee may be requested by members of the committee in accordance with the provisions of House Rule XI, 2(c)(2). Subcommittees shall meet at the call of the subcommittee chairmen. Every member of the committee or the appropriate subcommittee, unless prevented by unusual circumstances, shall be provided with a memorandum at least three calendar days prior to each meeting or hearing explaining (1) the purpose of the meeting or hearing; and (2) the names, titles, background and reasons for appearance of any witnesses. The minority staff shall be responsible for providing the same information on witnesses whom the minority may request. [See House Rule XI, 2(b).]

RULE 3.—QUORUMS

A majority of the members of the committee shall constitute a quorum, except that two members shall constitute a quorum for taking testimony and receiving evidence, and one-third of the members shall constitute a quorum for taking any action other than the reporting of a measure or recommendation. Proxies shall not be used to establish a quorum. If the chairman is not present at any meeting of the committee or subcommittee, the ranking member of the majority party on the committee or subcommittee who is present shall preside at that meeting. [See House Rule XI, 2(h).]

RULE 4.—COMMITTEE REPORTS

Bills and resolutions approved by the committee shall be reported by the chairman in accordance with House Rule XI, 2(l).

Every investigative report shall be approved by a majority vote of the committee at a meeting at which a quorum is present. Supplemental, minority, or additional views may be filed in accordance with House Rule XI. 2(l)(5). The time allowed for filing such views shall be three calendar days (excluding Saturdays, Sundays, and legal holidays) unless the committee agrees to a different time, but agreement on a shorter time shall require the concurrence of each member seeking to file such views. A proposed report shall not be considered in subcommittee or full committee unless the proposed report has been available to the members of such subcommittee or full committee for at least three calendar days (excluding Saturdays, Sundays, and legal holidays) prior to the consideration of such proposed report in subcommittee or full committee. If hearings have been held on the matter reported upon, every reasonable effort shall be made to have such hearings available to the members of the subcommittee or full committee prior to the consideration of the proposed report in such subcommittee or full committee.

RULE 5.—PROXY VOTES

A member may vote by proxy on any measure or matter before the committee and on any amendment or motion pertaining thereto. A proxy shall be in writing and be signed by the member granting the proxy; it shall show the date and time of day it was signed and the date for which it is given and the member to whom the proxy is given. Each proxy authorization shall state that the member is absent on official business or is otherwise unable to be present; shall be limited to the date and the specific measure or matter to which it applies; and, unless it states otherwise, shall apply to any amendments or motions pertaining to the measure or matter. [See House Rule XI, 2(f).]

RULE 6.—ROLLCALLS

A rollcall of the members may be had upon the request of any member. [See House Rule XI, 2(e).]

RULE 7.—RECORD OF COMMITTEE ACTIONS

The committee staff shall maintain in the committee offices a complete record of committee actions including a record of the rollcall votes taken at committee business meetings. The original records, or true copies thereof, as appropriate, shall be available for public inspection whenever the committee offices are open for public business. The staff shall assure that such original records are preserved with no unauthorized alteration, additions, or defacement. [See House Rule XI, 2(e).]

RULE 8.—SUBCOMMITTEES; REFERRALS

There shall be seven subcommittees with appropriate party ratios which shall have fixed jurisdictions. Bills, resolutions, and other matters shall be referred by the chairman to subcommittees within two weeks for consideration or investigation in accordance with their fixed jurisdictions. Where the subject matter of the referral involves the jurisdiction of more than one subcommittee or does not fall within any previously assigned jurisdiction, the chairman shall refer the matter as he may deem advisable. Bills, resolutions, and other matters referred to subcommittees may be reassigned by the chairman when, in his judgment, the subcommittee is not able to complete its work or cannot reach agreement therein. In a subcommittee having an even number of members, if there is a tie vote with all members voting on any measure, the measure shall be placed on the agenda for full committee consideration as if it had been ordered reported by the subcommittee without recommendation. This provision shall not preclude further action on the measure by the subcommittee. [See House Rule XI, 1(a)(2).]

RULE 9.—EX OFFICIO MEMBERS

The chairman and the ranking minority member of the committee shall be ex officio members of all subcommittees. They are authorized to vote on subcommittee matters; but, unless they are regular members of the subcommittee, they shall not be counted in determining a subcommittee quorum other than a quorum for the purpose of taking testimony.

RULE 10.—STAFF

Except as otherwise provided by House Rule XI, 5 and 6, the chairman of the full committee shall have the authority to hire and discharge employees of the professional and clerical staff of the full committee and of subcommittees subject to appropriate approval.

RULE 11.—STAFF DIRECTION

Except as otherwise provided by House Rule XI, 5 and 6, the staff of the committee shall be subject to the direction of the chairman of the full committee and shall perform such duties as he may assign.

RULE 12.—HEARING DATES AND WITNESSES

The chairman of the full committee will announce the date, place, and subject matter of all hearings at least one week prior to the commencement of any hearings, unless he determines that there is good cause to begin such hearings at an earlier date. In order that the chairman of the full committee may coordinate the committee facilities and hearing plans, each subcommittee chairman shall notify him of any hearing plans at least two weeks in advance of the date of commencement of hearings, including the date, place, subject matter, and the names of witnesses, willing and unwilling, who would be called to testify, including, to the extent he is advised thereof, witnesses whom the minority members may request. The minority members shall supply the names of witnesses they intend to call to the chairman of the full committe or subcommittee at the earliest possible date. Witnesses appearing before the committee shall, so far as practicable, submit written statements at least 24 hours in advance of their appearance. [See House Rule XI, 2 (g)(3), (g)(4), (j), and (k).]

RULE 13.—OPEN MEETINGS

Meetings for the transaction of business and hearings of the committee shall be open to the public or closed in accordance with Rule XI of the House of Representatives. [See House Rule XI, 2 (g) and (k).]

RULE 14.—FIVE-MINUTE RULE

A committee member may question a witness only when recognized by the chairman for that purpose. In accordance with House Rule XI, 2(j)(2), each committee member may request up to five minutes to question a witness until each member who so desires has had such opportunity. Until all such requests have been satisfied, the chairman shall, so far as practicable, recognize alternately on the basis of seniority those majority and minority members present at the time the hearing was called to order and others on the basis of their arrival at the hearing. Thereafter, additional time may be extended at the direction of the chairman.

RULE 15.—INVESTIGATIVE HEARINGS; PROCEDURE

Investigative hearings shall be conducted according to the procedures in House Rule XI, 2(k). All questions put to witnesses before the committee shall be relevant to the subject matter before the committee for consideration, and the chairman shall rule on the relevance of any questions put to the witness.

RULE 16.—STENOGRAPHIC RECORD

A stenographic record of all testimony shall be kept of public hearings and shall be made available on such conditions as the chairman may prescribe.

RULE 17.—TV, RADIO, AND PHOTOGRAPHS

When approved by a majority vote, an open meeting or hearing of the committee or a subcommittee may be covered, in whole or in part, by television broadcast, radio broadcast, and still photography, or by any of such methods of coverage, subject to the provisions of House Rule XI, 3. In order to enforce the provisions of said rule or to maintain an acceptable standard of dignity, propriety, and decorum, the chairman may order such alteration, curtailment, or discontinuance of coverage as he determines necessary.

RULE 18.—ADDITIONAL DUTIES OF CHAIRMAN

The chairman of the full committee shall:

(a) Make available to other committees the findings and recommendations resulting from the investigations of the committee or its subcommittees as required by House Rule X, 4(c)(2);

(b) Arrange such meetings, designate participants and submit such reports to the House as may be necessary to carry out the coordination of oversight activities and reporting requirements under House Rule X, 2(c);

(c) Direct such review and studies on the impact or probable impact of tax policies affecting subjects within the committee's jurisdiction as required by House Rule X, 2(d);

(d) Submit to the Committee on the Budget views and estimates required by House Rule X, 4(g), and to file reports with the House as required by the Congressional Budget Act;

(e) Authorize and issue subpenas as provided in House Rule XI, clause 2(m), in the conduct of any investigation or activity or series of investigations or activities within the jurisdiction of the committee; and

(f) Prepare, after consultation with subcommittee chairmen and the minority, a budget for the committee which shall include an adequate budget for the subcommittees to discharge their responsibilities.

SENATE—Wednesday, February 20, 1985

(Legislative day of Monday, February 18, 1985)

The Senate met at 9 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, in executive session, and was called to order by the President pro tempore [Mr. THURMOND].

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

Almighty God, Lord of the nations, here are 100 of the most powerful people in the world, yet somehow collectively the whole is less powerful than its individual parts. We are grateful, Lord, for a political system which gives sovereignty to the people and is designed to represent fairly the unique pluralism of our Nation and protect all minorities. We accept with profound appreciation the equal representation of each State and region and that each Senator is accountable to the people of his State.

But, Father, we have just been reminded of Washington's Farewell Address and his strong argument for honoring and preserving the Union. We beseech You, enable the Senate to find the unity which will maximize the full potential of this powerful body without diminishing the power of each of its parts. In the all-powerful name of Him who was incarnate love. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The distinguished majority leader is recognized.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Senators who have special orders today be recognized in the order in which they appear in the Chamber.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SENATE SCHEDULE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, there will be about nine special orders, limited to 10 minutes each.

At 10:40 a.m., the Senate will stand in recess until 12 noon, so that the Senate may proceed as a body to the Hall of the House of Representatives and hear an address by the Prime Minister of Great Britain, the Right Honorable Margaret Thatcher.

The Senate will reconvene at 12 noon, and there will be a period for the transaction of routine morning business, not to extend beyond 1 p.m., with statements therein limited to 5 minutes each.

Following morning business, the Senate will automatically resume executive session, to consider the Meese nomination.

Mr. President, I say at the outset that I hope my colleagues who are concerned about the farm credit crisis will permit us to proceed with the Meese nomination and come to a vote sometime early afternoon, and then move to the highway bill.

Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas is aware of the crisis in the Farm Belt. There was a meeting this morning at 8 o'clock, attended by staff of various Senators. There will be another meeting at 10 o'clock of Republican Senators concerning the same matter. We are to have another meeting later today with Members on both sides who have expressed deep concern about the crisis in the Farm Belt so far as credit is concerned.

There is an urgency. If we are going to do anything, it should be done within the next 10 or 15 days.

However, the majority leader is unwilling to capitulate and say that whatever they want, we will lay it out on the table because we want a vote on the Meese nomination. There is no question, however, that the farm crisis is an urgent concern.

I hope my colleagues will understand that we are in the process of trying to work out some agreement. Maybe we cannot; maybe we can. I would hope that we can.

However, I also remind my colleagues that, so far as I know, there have been no hearings on any of the proposals. There has been no detailed legislative language proposed, except small portions of the proposals. There is nothing before anyone but a list of ideas, and I do not believe we can pass a list of ideas.

The highway bill, which involves billions of dollars, 150,000 or 250,000 jobs directly and another couple of hundred thousand jobs indirectly, is of great urgency. It is my understanding that the House is prepared to pass a bill pretty much like the one pending in the Senate. We can complete action on that in the Senate this week, and the House can take it up next week, and that will permit contracting to start in all these States for spring work throughout the country.

I would hope those who want to continue to express their concerns about the farm crisis understand that they are preventing progress in this area.

RECOGNITION OF THE MINORITY LEADER

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STEVENS). The minority leader is recognized.

THE FARM CREDIT CRISIS

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, the American farmer today faces a profound crisis. The recovery elsewhere in the economy has left agriculture behind.

When I say elsewhere, I do not mean just anywhere else. The recovery has not hit my State of West Virginia in a great way yet.

For the past 4 years, the value of farmland has been falling, crop prices have been stagnating, and net farm income each farmer receives has tumbled to its lowest level since 1971.

Now, as the time for spring planting nears, farmers are being hit with a severe credit crunch. They are finding fewer and fewer sources of credit to finance the seeds, fertilizer, machinery, and other items needed to produce this year's harvest. Without this credit, farmers will not be able to plant their crops; and without these crops, it is not just the farmer who will lose; the American economy and the consumer will lose, too.

The plight of the family farmer can hardly be overstated. Since 1981, 200,000 farmers have been forced out of business. It is estimated that an additional 12 percent could be forced out by the end of this year. And as many as 30 percent of all farmers could be slipping toward insolvency.

The farmers are not alone. The impact of the agriculture credit crisis is far ranging. Rural banks are threatened with collapse. Farm machinery and chemical suppliers are endangered. And, of course, thousands of jobs, in hundreds of small towns across the country, are on the line.

Mr. President, farmers are used to enduring the vagaries of pestilence and the weather. They have conquered both to make America the breadbasket of the world. But since 1980, the farmer also has had to endure a Government policy so misguided that many may not recover.

High interest rates and declining export markets have put a double whammy on the fortunes of the family farmer. Clearly something is amiss when we have spent $57 billion over the past 4 years to support farm prices and yet many farmers find themselves in the most severe crisis since the depression.

Yet what is the administration's reply to this crisis? "Too little, too late" would be a generous characterization of their farm credit proposals. Of the $650 million in loan guarantees pledged just before the election in November, less than $25 million has been used. Even their revised program announced earlier this month will not do the trick.

Mr. President, Senators BOREN, EXON, DIXON, PRYOR, GORE, SASSER, MELCHER, and others have been at the forefront of efforts to get the administration to support serious, meaningful credit aid to the hard-pressed family farmer. I applaud their efforts and pledge my support to achieve such assistance. The farmers have supported this country since its birth. We cannot turn our backs on them now in their hour of severe need.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR QUAYLE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana is recognized.

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES FOR THE SUBCOMMITTEE ON DEFENSE ACQUISITION POLICY OF THE SENATE ARMED SERVICES COMMITTEE

Mr. QUAYLE. Mr. President, today I am sharing with my colleagues a statement of general principles concerning the Senate Armed Services Subcommittee on Defense Acquisition Policy.

Last year we had, under the former chairman of the Armed Services Committee, Senator Tower, a special task force on defense acquisition policy.

The new chairman of the Armed Services Committee, Senator GOLDWATER, has indicated that he will create a permanent Subcommittee on Defense Acquisition Policy and that I will have the privilege of serving as the chairman of that subcommittee.

Mr. President, as we look to dealing with our current Federal deficit and as we try to obtain more for the taxpayer's dollar, we must recognize that defense will have to take its fair share of budget reductions.

I can assure the Senate that this year's budget debate is not going to be a battle that we are going to fight only in 1985. It is going to continue the remainder of this decade. There is no doubt in my mind that we are not going to be able to spend as much on defense as perhaps we should or would like. Defense is going to have to take a fair share of the cuts this year, next year, and in the outyears.

If the budget deficit problem is going to be corrected, it must be corrected primarily through spending cuts and spending restraints.

Facing an environment of limited defense resources, we will have to continue our efforts to manage more effectively and be vigilant in our oversight of public moneys spent for our national security.

Mr. President, last year, the Senate Armed Services Committee Task Force on Selected Defense Procurement Matters provided solid and substantive perspectives to this body on a range of issues, including weapon system warranties, technical data on spare parts procurement, and small business competition. While the Task Force was active on a number of fronts, it is apparent to me that there is much to do in the future.

It is eminently clear, Mr. President, that we are heading for a fiscal crunch in our military budget. The modernization program that we embarked upon 4 years ago has reaped us considerable benefit in addressing the decline of our military forces, but it is becoming increasingly clear that we will have to do "more with less" in the outyears of our individual military service budgets if we are to combat looming Federal deficits. Given these fiscal constraints, effective management and the efficient allocation of our defense resources take on even more critical importance.

Our defense acquisition system is massive indeed, and constant vigilance by all parties concerned is required to be sure we are procuring the right weapons at reasonable cost. In a system that processes nearly 17 million procurement actions annually, there is always room for improvement.

Last year the extent of congressional interest in the defense procurement process was unprecedented. I congratulate my colleagues who participated in Senate efforts last year to increase competition and make our defense procurement process more efficient.

Still, there are questions which Congress must continue to ask as an active player in defense acquisition policy. How do we get more private sector innovation in developing our weapons systems? How do we assure that we are recruiting the best and brightest civilian and military employees to manage our procurement programs? How do we continue to increase competition in defense contracting—not just on major components, but among the thousands of items supplied by second- and third-tier subcontractors? How do we prevent excessive "gold-plating" of our weapon systems during their development without compromising on quality?

I believe that Congress must begin to focus on these larger, more fundamental problems of the defense acquisition system rather than on temporary management issues or quick fixes. We must look at the acquisition process as a whole and concern ourselves with some of the larger alarming trends we have recently witnessed, such as the long and increasing acquisition times for our major weapons systems.

We must strive to create an environment that will ensure the effective and efficient expenditure of the taxpayer's dollars, while protecting the interests of the ultimate users of our military hardware—the soldiers in the field.

We also must create an environment that promotes the motivation, entrepreneurship, and imagination necessary to continue our leadership in technology. It is essential that we create an environment where efficiency is the norm. We must take a look at current impediments to efficiency in our acquisition process, and avoid the micromanagement that has at times characterized congressional involvement in the defense procurement arena. We must try to get a better sense of where effective oversight ends, and micromanagement begins.

Also, it is important that we allow the defense acquisition system to be responsive and encourage the involvement of new and innovative small businesses. We need to encourage the participation of new players in defense contracting rather than putting up walls of excessive regulation that stifle creativity and contribute to the contraction of our defense industrial base.

It is with these broad goals in mind that I announce today a set of general principles which I believe should guide the work of the new Senate Armed Services Subcommittee on Defense Acquisition Policy.

I believe the following eight principles will enable us to achieve greater program stability, arrest unnecessary cost growth in weapon systems, shorten the time it takes to field a new system into service, achieve high reliability in the field, and provide a broader competitive opportunity for American business.

1. INCREASED COMPETITION

Though the Competition in Contracting Act will make it more difficult for the Defense Department to award contracts on a sole source basis, we need further assurances that DOD will obtain the benefits of competition wherever these benefits are likely to outweigh the costs. Therefore, I believe that we should require the Department to evaluate the feasibility and desirability of utilizing a dual source procurement strategy or other forms of maintaining continuous competition before entering into production of a weapon system and annually thereafter. Every study on competition has shown that competition saves money. The most effective way to ensure that the Defense Department is receiving the lowest possible price from contractors is to make them compete for the business.

2. IMPROVED AUDIT COORDINATION

There is obviously a need for energetic and complete auditing of numerous aspects of weapon system contracts. But since the creation of an inspector general in DOD in 1982, I am becoming concerned that there is a counterproductive duplication of activities among the various departmental audit entities. It has been suggested that we simply have too many checkers today and not enough workers. I am inclined to believe that it would be useful to more clearly define the roles and responsibilities of all DOD audit entities in order to avoid duplication of work.

3. QUALIFIED ACQUISITION WORK FORCE

It should be relatively obvious that in any complex system, the ultimate performance of the system will be primarily a function of the competence, ability, and motivation of those who work in the organization. The defense acquisition process is certainly an example of this. A legislative proposal that I intend to offer will require DOD to institute standards that will ensure that all key personnel involved in the acquisition, maintenance, and support of weapon systems are qualified for such positions by virtue of prior experience and formal training. The legislation will also ensure that there exists an appropriate career path for acquisition personnel, and that there are sufficient top management opportunities, which means flag and general officer positions, to provide adequate incentive and regard for those who have made or wish to make their careers in weapon system acquisition or support.

4. IMPROVED JOINT PROGRAM ADMINISTRATION

Those who have studied the organization of DOD have for some time expressed a concern that there is inadequate commonality of equipment among the military services. It has historically been difficult to force the generation of joint military requirements, and weapon acquisition by more than one service has had a number of problems. It is obvious that greater integration and coordination of the services is required with regard to both generating military requirements and acquiring new weapon systems, and legislation I propose to introduce will encourage new structures to institutionalize the start and administration of joint weapons programs.

5. MANDATORY BASELINING SYSTEM FOR EACH SERVICE

The Air Force has implemented over the last several years a program which requires written agreement among high level personnel with respect to the basic content, cost, and schedule for the program. Changes in the program cannot be made without the concurrence of all of the parties to the original agreement. This baselining system offers promise in reducing the costs associated with substantial changes to weapon systems in midstream. We will look at legislative proposals to establish configuration control mechanisms to ensure that appropriate acquisition officials can stop expensive and unnecessary changes which, historically, have seemed to be a permanent part of weapon system development and production.

6. GREATER INNOVATION BY INDUSTRY IN WEAPON SYSTEM DESIGN

In 1976, the Office of Management and Budget issued Circular A-109, which established processes Governmentwide for the acquisition of major systems. Under that plan, which is still in effect, prospective bidders on a project should be given broad flexibility in the early stages of the procurement cycle in the formulation of concepts to meet certain mission needs. I am concerned that we have gotten away from this fundamentally sound concept. We have so many existing entities in the Government with bureaucracies established to design new weapon systems that there is a tendency for the services to specify details of weapon system design at an early stage and to require that industry proposals meet these specifications. We need to encourage alternate creative approaches for meeting military requirements, and we need to encourage imaginative designs. Accordingly, I would hope to encourage a more adequate balance of R&D and production moneys, the submission of alternative design proposals by the private sector during development of the concept for new major weapon systems, and the use of functional specifications, rather than detailed design specifications, in the issuance of solicitations.

7. IMPROVED COST ESTIMATES

The Congress has already taken steps to require that there be an estimate of the anticipated cost of a weapon system by a party other than those involved in the management of the program. These independent cost estimates assist both the Department of Defense and the Congress in resource allocation. But one weakness of these estimates is that they typically rely on historical data, and seldom do such estimates look creatively at the optimal manufacturing configuration for producing a particular system. I will be exploring means of improving Defense Department cost estimates, most importantly by providing the Department with access to improved manufacturing technology expertise.

8. IMPROVED QUALITY CONTROL

There has been significant congressional interest in the quality control problems revealed last year at the Tucson plant of Hughes Aircraft Co. in the manufacture of Phoenix, Maverick, and TOW missiles. Our Senate Armed Services Committee Procurement Task Force held a hearing on this subject on October 18. Though quality control is largely a management problem and does not lend itself to legislative direction, I am concerned that one reason the Hughes problem arose was an apparent lack of training of quality control personnel working in the Air Force Plant Representative Office in Tucson. I will propose legislation that will require that quality assurance monitoring personnel working for the Defense Department be qualified by virtue of formal training and prior experience to perform their responsibilities. If we cannot for some reason obtain the requisite level of training and experience on the Federal payroll, then we should consider contracting for such services.

These are the eight basic concerns which I envision will be the working foundation for the Subcommittee on Defense Acquisition Policy in 1985. I hope that my colleagues will share my belief that these steps should improve defense acquisition, and I would welcome all Senators as cosponsors when legislation is formally submitted. The Subcommittee on Defense Acquisition Policy will be holding hearings on some of these proposals over the next month.

I would like to make three final points. First, there are a number of import issues in the defense procurement area that relate to the overall organization of the Department of Defense. A typical issue, for example, is whether the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the unified and specified commanders should be more deeply involved in resource allocation. Senators GOLDWATER and NUNN are chairing a bipartisan task force of the Committee on Armed Services to look at these matters, and I am content to let these issues be considered as part of that effort.

Second, there are other acquisition related topics that our subcommittee will give attention to later in the year. Illustrative topics are weapons testing, profit policy, and multiyear procurement.

Third, the three major players on defense acquisition—Congress, the Defense Department, and industry—must strive for a collective recognition of our fundamental problems and a more healthy working relationship. The sometimes adversarial relations between us have to be overcome so that we can agree on strategies to pursue our important defense programs in an environment of limited resources. I am confident that we can improve this vital relationship, and I will strive to do so as chairman of the new Subcommittee on Defense Acquisition Policy.

I am confident that a package of acquisition improvements can be enacted in 1985, and that such a package will be an important step toward ensuring the efficient acquisition of weapons systems in the future. I look forward to working with my subcommittee and Senate colleagues on these issues in the coming months.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Chair state the order of speakers?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Chair is required to recognize those who have special orders in the order in which they come into the Chamber. The Chair has noted that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. BOREN], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MELCHER], and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE] have entered the Chamber in that order.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR BOREN

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. BOREN] is recognized for not to exceed 10 minutes.

THE AGRICULTURAL CRISIS

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, during the recess I held five meetings in my home State of Oklahoma to discuss the present crisis in agriculture. Though I had known before that conditions were not good, I did not know just how serious it really is.

At my meeting in Oklahoma City, which was an official Senate Agricultural Committee hearing, representatives from the Oklahoma Bankers Association and the Community Bankers Association testified. They estimated that 13 to 15 percent of Oklahoma's farmers and ranchers would be forced out of business this year unless additional credit to restructure debt is made available immediately. The additional credit is necessary for refinancing of current debts and for providing operating capital for this year's crops.

Mr. President, the testimony presented by Bill Crawford, of Frederick, and Jim Eatherly, of Tonkawa, is very enligtening. I ask unanimous consent that copies of their testimony be included in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks. I urge each of my colleagues to carefully examine their testimony.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. BOREN. I urge each of my colleagues to carefully examine their testimony. This crisis is real, Mr. President. We simply must act immediately to enact a meaningful farm credit debt restructuring package. If we fail to act now, 13 to 15 percent of the farmers and ranchers in many States in the Midwest will go out of business this year. During the decade of the seventies, we lost 21 percent of the farmers in my home State of Oklahoma. The present condition of Oklahoma agriculture will result in the loss of 13 to 15 percent this year. Surely, we cannot afford to wait. At no time since the Great Depression have we faced a more serious threat to the stability of the agricultural economy.

I urge my colleagues to join with me in my efforts and those of many others to secure a meaningful farm debt restructuring package.

Mr. President, I again say that those of us who have served notice that we intend to delay action on other matters until we deal with the farm crisis are not doing so out of any personal feeling about other items of business pending on the Senate floor. Nor are we motivated by any personal feelings, any kind of negative feelings toward the nominee for the Attorney Generalship of the United States. We are motivated simply by a strong concern with what is happening in the agricultural economy.

I have had some people say to me, "Well, why should we provide special help for the farmers? They are responsible for their own situation. They are adult people who entered into this debt voluntarily."

I think those kinds of comments reflect a lack of understanding of what has been going on in the agricultural community. It was not the farmers who imposed an embargo on overseas sales of their crops, costing them many of their long-term markets which have never been recovered since the ending of the embargo. It was not the farmers who drew up budgets with such record-breaking deficits that they drove up the interest rates for farmers. It was not farmers who developed a series of policies that caused the American dollar to be so overvalued that it made it impossible or next to impossible for our farmers to sell their products overseas. Our farmers are not inefficient. It is ironic and tragic that, indeed, one of the most efficient sectors of our entire economy is experiencing the current difficulty.

Mr. President, we must realize also that it is not only the farmer who is experiencing the immediate trouble today, who is in danger. All members of the farming community are in danger because we are facing the possible collapse of land values if we force too many farms onto the market all at once. As I have said on this floor before, when we had 1½ percent of our farm units liquidated and forced onto the market last year, we had a drop of approximately 10 percent in the value of agricultural land.

What does this mean? It means that the equity not only for the farmer in immediate difficulty is being wiped out; it means that we are facing the destruction of equity in farms for all farmers in America as land values begin to go down. If we had a 10-percent drop in land values when 1½ percent of the farmers went out of business, it is easy to calculate that we could face a devastating drop in land values if we were to have 13 to 15 percent of all farmers forced onto the market in a very brief period of time.

Mr. President, there are farmers, particularly those who are now up in years, who may not have any debt at all on their farms. But they are now in just as much peril as those who are having trouble meeting that payment that is due at the bank right now. Their life savings, for the most part, are reflected in the value of the land which they now own. Most farmers experience little cash income during their lifetime. Their savings, their life's work, is really reflected in the appreciation of the value of the land which they own. So we are facing today not only the tragic bankruptcy and liquidation of the younger farmers of this country, we are facing the potential destruction of billions of dollars in equity that also represent the life savings of those who have worked an entire lifetime on the farm as well.

Mr. President, when we talk about debt restructuring, we are not only talking about the preservation of opportunity for younger people in agriculture; we are talking about the preservation of the equity value of agriculture itself. If that equity value is wiped out through a rapid collapse of agricultural land values, of course, we not only wipe out the equity, billions of dollars in equity, which represents millions of man-hours of work by husbands and wives as partners on the farm; we also threaten the stability of the financial institutions of rural America, whose asset statements are based upon certain values attached to the land which secures loans which those institutions have made; we also face a destruction of a unit of value important to our entire economy.

It is not only farmers, it is not only rural banks that have a substantial investment in the equity value of land. Insurance companies and many other important elements of our economy have investments in land as well. We are talking about the potential collapse of rural America as we know it with an impending domino effect on the rest of our economy. We cannot afford to wait any longer to act.

EXHIBIT 1

TESTIMONY OF WILLIAM CRAWFORD, CHAIRMAN OF FIRST NATIONAL BANK, FREDERICK, OK

Mr. Chairman, I sincerely appreciate the opportunity to appear today before this distinguished panel to address the state of affairs in agriculture on behalf of the Oklahoma Bankers Association.

Farmers today are caught in a cost-price squeeze, due primarily to a sustained period of high interest rates, low commodity prices, unusually poor weather conditions, and high production costs.

Over the past 15 years, the cost of borrowing money, and buying fuel, fertilizer, seed, machinery, and other essentials has skyrocketed, while commodity prices have remained low.

This crisis situation has forced many to leave the family farm. In Oklahoma, 3.8 percent of farmers left the business in 1984. This compares with 2.4 percent in 1983 and 2.1 percent in 1982. This is the worst crisis in agriculture since the Great Depression.

The ag picture in Oklahoma will grow dimmer in the next 6 to 8 months. Dropping land values, continuing high interest rates, a strong dollar, and good crops among competing grower nations suggest a tightening financial squeeze in the year ahead. Our Nation's debt-burdened farm economy is on a downward slide.

A good barometer of what's happening in agriculture is farmland values. Non-irrigated farmland in Oklahoma sold for an average of $668 per acre in 1979. At the end of 1981, non-irrigated acreage was bringing $812 per acre. In October of last year, the value of non-irrigated farmland had dropped to $634 . . . $34 lower than what it was selling for in December 1979.

Irrigated farmland has also dramatically declined in value. In 1979, the price per acre was $919. The price jumped to $1,165 in December, 1981. Today, the value of irrigated farmland has slumped to $814 per acre . . . $104 less than 1979 levels.

And the market for farmland has declined along with the value. In some areas of the State, those who can afford to purchase the land are not farmers, or ranchers, but speculators. And most of us would agree that farm real estate values haven't hit bottom yet.

The value of other collateral commonly held by our ag customers has also declined.

Let me give you an example of the cost-price squeeze I mentioned earlier: In 1952, a new pickup cost $1,600, or four fat steers. Today, if you were to buy a pickup with four fat steers, those animals would have to bring $2.72 per pound, instead of the current price of around .63¢ per pound. Simply put, farm products haven't kept pace with farm operating expenses.

A national survey of ag bankers indicates the financial condition of 85 percent of ag borrowers has deteriorated over the past year. That same national survey asked bankers what percentage of their ag borrowers would they be unable to loan to in 1985. The answer: 13 percent. That same question was asked in 1983 and 1984, with the answers being 3 percent and 7 percent respectively.

It's apparent that ag borrowers in Oklahoma and other midwestern states are unable to service their debt. A 1980 survey of bankers indicated only 8.7 percent of the banks polled experienced a drop in their loan repayment rate. The same question was asked in June, 1984: Is the rate of repayment lower today than a year earlier? Nearly 50 percent of the bankers polled said yes. And when those loans fail to perform, banks must charge them off immediately. Some within the banking industry seek authority to amortize those losses over a 10-year period.

The amount of debt-owned-to-assets-held is at record levels. National figures indicate 16 percent of all commercial-size farm operations (meaning farmers with over $40,000 in annual sales) have debt-to-asset ratios above 70 percent; and 22 percent of farmers have debt-to-asset ratios in the 41-70 percent range. This 38 percent of commercial farmers, roughly 250,000 individuals, who are leveraged above 40 percent in assets owe two-thirds of the total farm debt of about $215 billion. We believe those figures hold true for Oklahoma also.

The best most ag borrowers can hope for is to make their interest payments. Estimates indicate over 90 percent of Oklahoma's full-time farmers lost money in 1984. This alarming figure, coupled with predictions for more of the same for the next 3 to 5 years, has many young farmers voluntarily leaving agriculture. Others leave via bankruptcy.

In the Federal Reserve Banks' 10th District, which includes Oklahoma, farm bankruptcies jumped from .6 percent in April 1983, to 1.3 percent in October, 1984. Foreclosures moved from 1.1 percent to 1.7 percent in the same time frame. Partial liquidations in the same period increased from 4 percent to 5.7 percent.

A western Oklahoma bank reports nearly 50 percent of their 62 ag customers can't service their debt. And almost 10 percent of their ag borrowers may be forced into liquidation within the next year. And some bankers predict that within 3 years, 1 out of every 4 farmers will no longer be in business.

Royalties from oil and gas production have kept many farmers afloat. But, the downturn in that industry is also being felt.

Oklahoma's farmers and ranchers are struggling to survive. They're shrinking their operations, selling off land and equipment, and in turn reducing their debt load. And we're working with them. We realize that agriculture is the backbone of Oklahoma's economy, and we recognize the poor financial condition of most farmers. We are working with them to get through this difficult period. Those ag borrowers that survive this stressed situation will be better business managers because of it. They'll be financially-wise, top-notch managers.

A comprehensive solution is needed to adequately address the farm debt and credit crises.

Any solution to the ag crisis should begin with sincere efforts on the part of the administration and both Houses of Congress to balance the federal budget. We believe that a balanced budget lies at the heart of any solution to the dilemma in agriculture.

In many cases, interest paid is the largest annual expense item for farmers. When the Federal Government brings spending in line with revenues, you'll begin to see an easing in the credit markets, and then interest rates will slide . . . and with that, a weakening of the dollar in foreign markets.

However, there are no easy answers to a problem as complex as this.

We sent several Association representatives to Washington last week to meet with concerned bankers from other states. We feel confident that meetings between farmers, lenders, and government officials, and Congressional hearings such as this are steps in the right direction.

But without immediate action by Congress and the Administration, the human tragedy of the agriculture crisis will worsen, and the prospects for the future will appear dimmer, and dimmer.

Mr. Chairman, I thank you.

TESTIMONY OF JAMES R. EATHERLY, FIRST NATIONAL BANK, TONKAWA, BEFORE SENATOR DAVID BOREN'S AGRICULTURE COMMITTEE HEARING

Senator Boren and Committee Members: It is a pleasure to appear before you today to discuss agriculture conditions, not only in Oklahoma, but across the nation, as well.

I find it shocking that in Africa a farmer and his family must work every hour of the day in order to barely sustain themselves, with a large area of the country existing under starvation conditions, while in America, one good farmer produces food not only for his own family, but he feeds 75 others. Here we have one farmer starving because he cannot produce enough and another going broke because he produces too much!

Oklahoma farmers are experiencing continued financial problems. There is clear evidence of declining land values and an almost non-existent farm real estate market in some areas. Farm commodity prices continue at very low levels, depressing farm income, and classifications of agricultural credits are increasing at commercial banks. These conditions are particularly prevalent in the north central and western sections of Oklahoma. According to various sources, 200,000, or approximately 10 percent of the 2.4 million farmers in the U.S. could well be out of business within four years. The financial distress is most severe in the medium size farms having debt asset ratios above 40 percent.

Ten percent of all farmers fall in this category. Oklahoma farmers are no exception. The passage of a suitable and equitable farm bill has the attention of Congress at this time and rightfully so; but, I am inclined to think it is equally important to address immediately, the financial problems of approximately 10 percent of these American farmers that are barely holding on, with some facing imminent foreclosure. Should this occur, the impact on the value of farm land and machinery and equipment will be substantial; some rural communities will not survive; many of the Nation's 4,300 banks will surely fail!

Two-thirds of the Nation's full service banks are in communities of less than 25,000 people. In fact, half of these banks are in towns with fewer than 5,000 residents. According to the latest estimates, nearly 60 percent of these community banks list agriculture as the single most important source of income for their communities.

Agricultural bankers recognize the problems are both short-term and long-term and would like to have a part in the policy decision making for three reasons:

1. Agriculture banks are an integral part of rural communities and we must attempt to provide the skills and economic climate in which farmers, businessmen, and related customers can survive and prosper.

2. Rural communities as we know them today, will not survive without a strong agriculture base.

3. Banks cannot survive and prosper unless communities survive and communities cannot survive unless banks survive.

Agriculture banks are sensitive to the immediate needs of the agriculture borrower and for those who have a chance for survival, are willing to "write-down" interest rates, adjusted down by an amount which results in a positive cash flow to the customer, in exchange for a 90 percent FmHA guaranty. In addition to the sacrificed earnings which will result from the writing down of interest rates, banks might be willing to share in the financial burdens of agriculture by partially funding this program in the form of payment of a fee of 1 percent of the guaranteed amount.

Small country banks prefer an interest "write-down" in lieu of a loan principal "write-off" because the "write-off" would have to be charged against the banks' capital accounts. If "write-offs" of principal capital were large enough, they could reduce a bank's capital below the capital adequacy ratios acceptable to bank regulators. Agriculture banks are particularly sensitive to bank examinations at present because many small banks are being forced to sign cease and desist orders and other enforcement agreements that place onerous burdens on the banks and their management until capital positions are returned to normal levels. Banks simply cannot give consideration to a large number of "write-offs" because such action would impair capital.

The proposal as outlined, is not a solution to the farmers' problems, but only temporary relief. I have not addressed the all important long-term problem, but conditions will continue to worsen for all farmers until they receive a fair price for their product.

Thank you, Senator Boren, for allowing me to appear before your committee!

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR MELCHER

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana [Mr. MELCHER] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I am paraphrasing an old adage by reversing the gender, "What is sauce for the gander is sauce for the goose," because I am referring to Continental Bank of Chicago as the gander and the small rural banks and their farmer borrowers as the goose that annually lays the golden egg, which is the Nation's food supply. I believe it is fair to call upon the Federal Reserve Board to treat the stressed loans of farmers throughout the country just as well as they have treated Continental Bank. I today call upon the Federal Reserve Board to extend the same helping hand for $3.5 million of stressed farm loans as they provided for the distressed borrowers at Continental.

The reluctance of President Reagan and David Stockman to do anything for the hard-pressed farmers of our country is because of their fears and machinations of increasing the budget deficit. I can offer them a way around their fears by the Federal Reserve Board buying up 3½ billion' worth of distressed farm loans from hard-pressed rural banks, in exactly the same way that the Federal Reserve Board did for Continental Bank, and not listing it as a budget item. If they can do it in one case they can do it in this more urgent case for the Nation's farm operators. They won't have to wait—they can do it this afternoon or tomorrow morning. Either the administration and the Federal Reserve Board do it now or admit they are fakers and really are not concerned about the farm credit crisis.

The small banks in rural America that make the loans to farmers are, if anything, more deserving than Continental because their farm borrowers produce the bread, butter, meat, and potatoes for American consumers all over the country, plus produce the surplus food for the starving in Africa and the malnourished in other areas of the world that receive American food aid.

That farm production is the annual golden egg that comes from America's farms and ranches. The Federal Reserve Board can provide to the rural banks money at the discount rate today of 8 percent, and the small banks can loan it to their farm borrowers at 9.5 to 10 percent. The $3.5 billion, the same amount provided for Continental, will do the job for emergency loans now needed by the farmers and ranchers so they can have credit in time to plant their crops and keep on producing food for the country.

Today I am introducing a sense of the Congress resolution to request this most appropriate action immediately to provide the critical credit transfusion to save the life of rural America.

Mr. President, the prices of agriculture producers are at a very low point in 1985 and were in 1984, and this is the underlying problem of American farmers and ranchers. However, that is going to take a longer term of time to correct. The first action that is needed by the administration and the recognition this Congress should make is the distress that they are now faced with and the need for immediate action.

Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALLOP). The Senator from Wisconsin is recognized.

WHITHER THE FREEZE WITH REAGAN IN CHARGE?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, must we wait 4 more years before we can begin to negotiate an end to the arms race? If we do wait 4 more years, will the nuclear arms technology be so far advanced that widespread nuclear proliferation will be certain and nuclear war, therefore, inevitable? What possible advances can we make for effective nuclear arms control if the freeze is not possible? Congressman ASPIN, the new chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, has answered that question in a speech before the Chicago Council on Foreign Relations by arguing that the form of arms control is not nearly as important as the fact of progress toward lessening the prospect of nuclear war. He contends that first, the freeze, second, the SALT approach that puts a cap on certain weapons to prevent explosive future increases, third, reductions in nuclear arms on both sides as advocated by both Presidents Carter and Reagan, or fourth, build down, that is, the removal of two or three old nuclear weapons for every new one either side installs—any and all these alternatives—can move arms control in the right direction. ASPIN argues we can begin with any of these as long as we begin. That means pushing for whatever will bring the best outcome the Soviets will "sign on to."

Is ASPIN right? What he is saying is that we can continue the arms race or stop it and it does not make any real difference. All these approaches, says ASPIN, have the advantage of either stopping the arms race, the freeze does that or capping the arms race at some prospective future level so it will not explode out of control. Or we can channel it in the direction of newer, more efficient, and more deadly weapons but fewer of them.

On ASPIN's side, it makes little practical sense to push for an arms control approach, which this Senator and a majority of the American people according to the professional polls strongly endorse—that is, the freeze—if the Reagan administration is going to oppose it. When it comes to arms control the position of the President is far more important than the posture of the Congress or than overwhelming public support.

The President alone decides to negotiate and to agree or refuse to agree to the terms of a treaty. Even if the Senate refuses to ratify a treaty the President negotiates, during his term of office the President can agree to abide by the treaty and it has much—if not all—of the same force as if the treaty had been ratified. SALT II, for instance, has been in effect for several years without Senate ratification because the Presidents—both Carter and Reagan—have agreed to abide by it. "Build down" is alive and the freeze is dead because the President will not negotiate the freeze, but he supports a sort of "build down." For the next 4 years ASPIN may be right—the freeze probably is dead until 1989. Our best hope may be that the President will stand by his announcement that he will honor SALT II even though it has not been ratified, and perhaps peace will be served if the President pushes for build down. I say perhaps. On the other hand, "build down" could turn out to be the most deceptive double-cross for arms control ever. Here is why: For the past 20 years the United States has been "building down." We have reduced our megatonnage and the number of our missiles, but we have built a far more powerful and devastating nuclear arsenal. We have literally made more with less by retiring big, clumsy, vulnerable missiles and replacing them with fewer and especially smaller missiles. We have built down the numbers and built up the killing capacity. "Build down" would not stop the heart of the arms race. That is the competition between nuclear weapons scientists of both superpowers to constantly advance the killing power of nuclear weapons.

ASPIN sees this differently, of course. He contends that any of the four approaches will work to reduce the probability of nuclear war. According to ASPIN, the purpose of arms control should be to reduce or eliminate destabilizing weapons on both sides and shift to more stabilizing weapons in order to make sure there is no incentive for either superpower to go first.

Well, that sounds good. But is this what "build down"—the administration's favorite arms control innovation—would in fact do? What is there to assure us that the newer weapons would be more stable. After all, the MX is a new weapons system and one which ASPIN supports. It is also probably the least stable weapon system we will have. If we build down by putting in 100 MX's instead of several hundred single warhead missiles, we build down but we have moved decisively toward a less stable nuclear arsenal. This will always be possible as long as nuclear arms technology races along. This is why we should place the top priority on ending nuclear testing, thereby ending the arms race and then concentrate on agreements that will provide for more stable and secure weapons.

WHO IS TRUMPING-UP CHARGES?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the January edition of the Phyllis Schlafly report lists a number of "trumped-up charges" that U.S. citizens would have to face if we give our advice and consent to the Genocide Convention. These charges are themselves trumped up.

The claim is made that President Reagan could be accused of genocide because he does not stop apartheid in South Africa. The policy of apartheid is totally separate from genocide. Apartheid is the policy of racial segregation as an institution of government. Genocide is the intent to destroy a national, ethnic, racial, or religious group.

Some have called school busing an act of genocide. What a farce. School busing may be many things but it is not genocide. But one only needs to go one step further to see the problems with this argument. The transfer of children is not on a permanent basis and not for the purpose of destroying any group.

Birth control clinics are another claimed source of genocide. The birth control clinics in this country are entirely voluntary in nature. They are not mandatory with an intent to destroy any group.

The claim is made that limiting welfare benefits also could be considered genocide. In cases like these, the clear intent to destroy a group must be shown.

In all the above claims, the proof of intent to destroy is lacking. When thinking of all the evil effects the Genocide Convention might create, ask yourselves: Are the actions being taken with the clear intent to destroy a group? Without such intent, there is no genocide. There is no reason why the United States should delay ratifying the Genocide Convention even 1 more day. I therefore urge the Senate to give its advice and consent to the Genocide Convention.

WHAT CREDIT TO REAGAN ADMINISTRATION FOR DROP IN INFLATION RATE?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, in the 27 years I have been in this body, I have never seen a more grossly unjustified appropriation of credit for a major economic development than the Reagan administration taking and getting credit for reducing inflation. In the President's inaugural address, once again the President took credit for cutting the rate of inflation. The national polls released on election day showed the vast majority of Americans give the administration full credit for bringing inflation under control. Scotty Reston, the highly respected New York Times columnist, on Inauguration Day praised the President for reducing inflation. Mr. President, how about it? Does the administration deserve any credit, any credit at all, for the dramatic moderation of inflation. Mr. President, no development in the past 4 years has been more salutary or more widely approved than the diminution in the inflation rate. Does the administration deserve any credit for this? Any? The answer must be an absolute, unequivocal and resounding: "No!" No! No! No!

Here we have the administration that has given this country by far the most irresponsible fiscal policy in our history. We have a deficit that will not stop. It is not just bigger than ever before. The deficit is three times bigger than it has ever been, ever, at any time. Has the colossal administration fiscal deficit brought down the rate of increase in prices? Of course not. If there is any simple, clear, and undisputed fact of economic life, it is that a government which spends more than it brings in in taxes, stimulates demand in the economy and in the process pushes up the rate of price increases. Does anyone seriously dispute this? Does anyone argue that the way to bring inflation under control is to open up the floodgates to Federal spending and stimulate private spending by cutting taxes? Of course not. That kind of policy, when pursued in the past, has consistently lead to increased inflation. That has been true in Europe, in Asia, in Africa, in Central and South America and it has been true in the United States. But wait a minute. Somehow this did not happen from the time the Reagan administration took office in January of 1981. In the past 4 years the deficit exploded through the roof and inflation diminished. How come? What happened? Why did inflation diminish while the Government following Reagan policies broke all records for fiscal stimulus?

For the answer we have to go back to October 1979 when the Federal Reserve Board, under the leadership of Chairman Paul Volker, decided to change its monetary policies. It forgot about trying to stabilize interest rates and concentrated instead on slowing runaway inflation. So in the fall of 1979, the Federal Reserve Board began to bring the rate of increase in the Nation's credit supply well below the rate of nominal growth in the economy. After a lag of a few months, this, of course, inevitably squeezed the supply of credit. Interest rates climbed to the highest rates by far in this country's history. And after a little more than a year of this tough medicine, interest-sensitive industries like housing and autos began to collapse. By the latter half of 1981 the recession was on, and in 1982 it became the worst recession this country had suffered in nearly 50 years. What slowed inflation? That recession did it. How? Here is how: Unemployment leaped to 10.8 percent. Demand, especially in areas requiring credit, dried up. Wages stopped pushing prices up, as the colossal surplus of workers hammered down wage increases, and even pushed millions of workers into accepting wage cuts. So the long, cruel recession broke the back of inflation.

What did the administration have to do with all this? Absolutely nothing. It deserved no blame for the recession and no credit for breaking inflation. The Fed's monetary policy did the job. The administration, when it spoke at all about monetary policy, criticized the Fed's tough anti-inflation stance. Meanwhile, the administration pursued an expansive fiscal policy with increases in Federal spending and sharp cuts in tax rates that tended to counteract the anti-inflation policies of the Fed. Those mammoth Reagan administration created Federal deficits did, indeed, help bring the country out of the 1981-82 recession.

In a perverse, totally unintended way the huge deficit also kept inflation from rising during the recovery in 1983, 1984 and into 1985. How did the deficit do this? Consider: Because the Federal deficit required $109 billion of additional Federal borrowing in 1982 and an all time record $195 billion of additional Federal borrowing in 1983, plus a mammoth $175 billion in 1984, our interest rates stayed high relative to the greatly moderated rate of inflation.

So how did this keep inflation down? It kept inflation down by attracting enormous investments in American securities by foreigners. Japanese sold the yen to buy the dollar. Britishers sold the pound, the French the franc, the Germans the mark, the Italians the lira. All of them bought the dollar to get the higher interest rate with little or no risk. The dollar has become bloated almost out of sight, while other currencies of our trading partners have fallen sharply. This was an unanticipated anti-inflation bonanza for this country. And what did the Reagan administration have to do with it? Absolutely, positively nothing. How was this drop in foreign currencies relative to the dollar such an anti-inflation bonanza for Americans riding along in the third year of a strong recovery? It meant that Americans could buy more cheaply from abroad with price cuts of 20 percent to 50 percent or more in foreign currencies. It also meant that American firms had to hold down their prices if they competed in this country with Japanese cars or TV sets or British textiles or French wine or German steel and machinery. Can the Reagan administration boast that we planned it that way? Of course not. And if you press a Reaganite to see if the President really wanted this huge adverse trade balance, you will get a "who, me?"

Now, it is true that any good Reaganite could argue that the much maligned Reagan deficit swept America back from the depths of the 1981-82 recession, and on this the Reaganite is correct. The deficits certainly played a big part in the recovery, whatever the price, and it will be a painful price the economy will have to pay in the future. But there is no way, none, that the administration can claim any credit for the improved inflation performance of the economy. That was almost solely an accomplishment of Chairman Paul Volker and the Federal Reserve. The Fed deserves blame for the deep and painful recession. It deserves credit, all of it, for breaking the back of this country's worst inflation.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR PRYOR

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. PRYOR] is recognized.

THE FARM CREDIT CRISIS

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, yesterday I joined several of my colleagues who are interested in agriculture and the disaster we are facing, and spoke about the need to proceed immediately with legislation in an attempt to correct many of the problems our farmers are now facing. I think it is imperative, Mr. President, and I wish to reiterate it at this time, that the Senate immediately turn to the consideration of agricultural credit legislation, and postpone the nomination of Mr. Meese to be Attorney General until after we have disposed of the farm measure.

It is not a question of wanting to delay the Meese nomination. The debate on the merits of his nomination is for another day.

It is simply a question of priorities, Mr. President, and which issue—the plight of the thousands of farm families struggling to survive, or Mr. Meese's nomination—is more important to this Nation. I think the answer is clear, and for that reason I hope that we could proceed today or this week on some type of farm proposals.

Mr. President, the pending farm catastrophe, unless corrected immediately, is a noose around the neck of the economy of this country. We all know the importance of agriculture to our Nation's economy. Everybody cites statistics about it accounting for 20 percent of our gross national product [GNP], and providing millions of jobs to Americans. If you put two and two together, however, it becomes abundantly clear that unless our Nation's agricultural economy recovers, the overall economy of this country cannot sustain its present rate of growth. When the farmers are brought to their knees, we are all going to pay a dear and very costly price later on.

My purpose today, Mr. President, is to point out several things about the pending disaster that need to be brought out, discussed, and solved.

First, contrary to the recent statements of Budget Director David Stockman, most farmers are in financial trouble through no fault of their own. If everybody will remember what has happened the last few years, I think the point will be clear. In 1980, many parts of the country, including the State of Arkansas, experienced one of the most devastating droughts in history. Arkansas producers lost well over $1 billion in agricultural commodities, like soybeans, cotton and poultry. Then, in both 1981 and 1982, production was up, but due to a variety of factors, prices were very low. In 1983, we had the PIK Program, a sort of 1-year stopgap that was designed to give most of our producers some breathing room. Then, last year we had a combination of things, but the net result was still the same—the prices farmers pay for their production costs are increasing, but they are receiving less for their labor and for the product they produce. It is that simple.

So, Mr. President, I take strong exception to Mr. Stockman's statement. Farmers are in a financial crisis because they have had to compete directly with other governments, because they are being hammered by the strong dollar, because they are an "economic prisoner" of our system, and because they are the victims of a "cheap food policy."

Next, Mr. President—and this is potentially the most troubling thing to me—it seems that recent statements by Mr. Stockman and Secretary of Agriculture John Block, coupled with the budget documents that have been sent to Capitol Hill, present us with a new national policy with regard to agriculture. In a nutshell, this policy apparently is: We are prepared to have a large percentage of the farmers of this Nation go out of business, whether it's 10 percent, 20 percent, or 25 percent. This is normal in a dynamic market economy and what we're really seeing is a disinvestment in agriculture which is what should occur. That is the new policy, as best I can tell, from those two officials.

What I want to point out to other Members of the Senate is that, to the best of my knowledge, I am aware of no other country on the face of this Earth that has adopted that type of policy with respect to its farmers or any other segment of its economy. Every country of which I am aware, whether it is Japan, any member of the European Economic Community [EEC], or any other country, has an announced goal of support for the farmers of that nation. It is about time we realize that the investment in agriculture in this country is just as important to our health, well-being and security as any money or support we give for national defense.

Yesterday, Mr. President, I checked the numbers for the last couple of years, and for the coming fiscal year, as contained in the 1986 budget for agriculture, and compared that with total outlays of the Federal Government for those periods. The figures were startling. We are the best fed nation on this planet; our people spend less of their disposable incomes for food than anybody else in the world; and our farmers feed not only our entire population, but also millions of other people. In fact, each farmer feeds an average of 78 people today. For all of this, do you know what total budget outlays for agriculture price support programs, research and extension, crop insurance, and on-budget credit items were in fiscal year 1984—1.5 percent of the budget. For fiscal year 1985, the estimate is a whopping 2 percent, and for fiscal year 1986, under the Reagan budget, agriculture outlays are scheduled to drop to 1.2 percent of the total Federal budget. These numbers are miniscule in comparison to some of the other figures in the budget.

Third, Mr. President, we have to do something meaningful for our producers in the area of international trade if we are ever going to fully solve the problems. This must be dealt with in the upcoming debate on the farm bill, and obviously we must deal with the short-term agricultural credit crisis this week, or next, but I did not want to let this opportunity pass without mentioning international trade problems, and how they relate to agriculture.

We all know our farmers are efficient. They feed millions of people. However, when we talk about free trade and an open market farm bill, we have to be aware of one thing: When it comes to international trade in agriculture, there is no free trade. To the maximum extent possible, we have tried to be open and fair traders. What has been the result? Our farmers and other agricultural producers have been forced to compete with foreign governments. They do not compete with the poultry producer in France, the soybean farmer in Brazil, the pork producer in Canada, or the rice producer in Taiwan. They compete with the respective governments when it comes to competition in foreign markets. I guess the wonder in all of this, Mr. President, is that our farmers have managed to compete as effectively as they have for such a long period of time when they have had to compete against another government.

It seems to me that as we consider farm measures over the next year we have to keep that in mind, and I believe it is time to pull off the gloves and get serious. Either we are going to help our producers in international markets, or we might as well fold up our tents and go home. It is harsh, but it is a fact of life.

To those who would say that we will start a trade war if we pursue this strategy, I would state that we are already in a trade war. We are losing that trade war. The only difference is that we do not even have our guns loaded, nor have we fired a shot.

In December of last year, Mr. President, the Senate Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry issued a report entitled "Trade Policy Perspectives: Setting the Stage for 1985 Agricultural Legislation." That report, which I believe all Senators interested in agricultural matters should review, contains these two sentences:

> Export subsidies are an unfortunate part of today's international agricultural trade picture. Foreign government assistance to production, processing and exports is faced by U.S. exporters of almost all agricultural products.

The report goes on to list the subsidies, by country, for each commodity, and points out several problems our producers are confronting. It points out the enormous subsidies given to poultry producers in the EEC and Brazil—sometimes as high as $400 per metric ton for broilers. It points out the subsidies given to Italian rice producers—in excess of $200 per metric ton; Japanese rice producers—as high as $1,000 per metric ton; and Taiwan rice producers—which were in the neighborhood of $450 per ton.

There are tables for each commodity, and I think Members of the Senate would find it interesting reading. I think, in summary, Mr. President, this report shows how widespread the subsidy issue is in world trade, and more importantly, how we simply cannot continue to sit idly by and be hammered by foreign governments. I hope we can deal with this problem, Mr. President, in our deliberations on the new farm bill.

Obviously, Mr. President, we have to take some steps in the next week or so on the agricultural credit emergency. I will have more to say about that in the next few days. I have specific concerns that Arkansas producers want to have dealt with in the credit area. However, I wanted to come to the floor today and point out several things about our overall agricultural situation that are serious and must be dealt with by the Congress.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. PRYOR. I thank the Presiding Officer.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR SASSER

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SASSER] is recognized for not to exceed 10 minutes.

FARM CREDIT CRISIS

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I indicated yesterday that I have talked with literally hundreds of Tennessee farmers over the past few months about their credit situation. These visits and similar conversations with farmers and farm economists from other States make it clear that our farmers today are facing a disaster unlike anything since the 1930's if the administration and Congress do not act immediately to ease the farm credit crisis.

Make no mistake about it—there is a crisis down on the farm.

From field hearings of the Budget Committee which I chaired in Milan, TN, in early January, to a public forum sponsored by my distinguished colleague from Montana, Senator MELCHER, the message from the farm community has been the same: A sizable percentage of our Nation's farmers will be unable to put their spring crops in the ground unless immediate emergency action is taken here in Washington. Such is the case for my home State, where we estimate that the current credit crisis may prevent 20 to 30 percent of Tennessee's farmers from getting a crop in the ground in the days ahead.

Mr. President, I cannot overemphasize the need to act quickly. If we do not respond with emergency legislation in time for farmers to meet their spring planting schedule, it will simply be too late. Farm families will be forced out of business and in some cases they will be forced off the land and they will lose their homes by the end of this year.

By now, the roots of the present farm credit crisis should be clear to even the most obtuse—perhaps not Mr. Stockman—but for the rest of us. Farmers have been devastated by circumstances beyond their control. Farm income has remained at the depression-era levels over the past 4 years. In 1981, net farm income stood at $31 billion. By 1982, net farm income had slid to $22.3 billion, or a fall of almost one-third in 1 year. In 1983, a further slide to $16.1 billion was reported. This pattern was repeated in Tennessee where net farm income fell from $4,572 per farm in 1981 to $4,274 per farm in 1982.

A component in the shrinking net farm income has been the decline in U.S. farm exports. Due chiefly to an overvalued U.S. dollar, brought about by the worse budget deficits in the history of this country over the past 4 years, American farm commodities are no longer competitive in the world market. The value of our farm exports has declined for 3 years in a row and the U.S. share of the world export market has continued to shrink.

While exports and farm income has been shrinking, farm costs have been steadily increasing. The most agonizing of these production costs have been interest rates which remain at record levels. With real interest rates—that is interest rates corrected for inflation—remaining at historical highs, interest expenses are taking a bigger bite out of farm income than ever before. In my native State of Tennessee, the interest farmers pay on their mortgage debt shot up from $107 million in 1979, to $171 million in 1982, a shocking 60-percent increase in a 3-year period. On the average, Tennessee farm real estate debt increased 28 percent annually between 1970–81.

Paralleling this rapid rise in interest expenses has been a sharp upturn in other production costs. Again in Tennessee, production expenses totaled $1.7 billion in 1979, but grew to $2.2

billion in 1982. And while production costs accounted for 64 percent of a Tennessee farmer's cash receipts in 1960, production accounted for 77 percent of the farmer's cash receipts from 1980 through 1983.

The final ingredient in this recipe for economic disaster has been declining farm land values. Over the past 4 years, farmland values have declined an average of 25 percent nationwide: In some areas this dropoff has been much steeper at close to 50 percent, and in some Midwestern States by as much as 20 percent just last year alone. In Tennessee, farmland value fell from a high of $1,024 per acre in 1981, to $972 in 1982 and $923 in 1983.

Add to this list of depressing figures a few years of bad weather such as the back-to-back drought and flooding we have experienced in Tennessee and you have a farm credit crisis of staggering proportions. Farm debt which stood at $22.5 billion in 1960 nationwide, today stands at somewhere between $220 billion and $240 billion. Interest payments alone for this debt burden now total more than $21 billion a year. Let us reflect for just a moment that net farm income has only been averaging $23 billion a year for the past 2 years. So net farm income has been running only $2 billion above the farmers' interest costs for the past 2 years.

My colleagues may wish to know a bit more about who is actually feeling the impact of the farm credit crisis. It is not the 25,000 very large farms with sales of more than $500,000 a year who are being hurt. Frankly, it is not the 1.7 million small, part-time farmers feeling a tremendous crunch. These persons usually have cash flow from sources off the farm. Rather, it is the middle-size family farm operation, which has little outside income to supplement farm income which is being squeezed the hardest. There are some 641,000 farms all across this country in this middle category. And contrary to claims made by some, the majority of these family farmers are not in trouble because of poor management practices. As I have just presented, Mr. President, these producers have been caught by circumstances beyond their control. Indeed, many of the farmers currently experiencing financial stress were award winning farmers only a few short years ago.

It is not only our farmers who are now feeling the impact of the credit crisis. Financial strains are being felt by commercial bankers, production credit associations, Federal land banks, and other farm lending institutions. There are roughly 4,300 farm banks in the United States. These farm banks make up about 30 percent of the commercial banks in the country. Many of these institutions are beginning to stagger under the pressure of the economic crisis in the farm sector.

The number of farm banks reporting negative earnings is seven times greater today than during the 1970's. Loan losses in farm banks have more than tripled since 1979. And, Mr. President, we are just seeing the tip, of the iceberg in that statistic.

What is troubling are the trends evident in Tennessee's farm banking community. For example, the annual provision for possible loan losses at Tennessee farm banks has dramatically increased over the past 4 years, multiplying nearly four-fold during this period.

These trends underscore real trouble for many farm banks. At the end of December 1984, farm banks accounted for 37 percent of the problem banks in America. Of the 27 commercial banks that failed from June until September of last year, 10 were farm banks.

The cooperative farm credit system has not been immune from the economic ills associated with the present farm credit crisis. During the past 3 years, the farm credit system has sustained loan losses of over $600 million. System loan losses are estimated as topping $300 million for 1984. Also for 1984 nearly $5 billion in farm credit system loans were classified as nonperforming, that is no payments were being made on principle or interest. Five production credit associations have entered liquidation as a result of loan losses in the last 2 years, the first time this has ever happened.

The situation does not look to get better in the near future, Mr. President. The Federal Land Bank of Louisville, which services Tennessee's Federal land bank associations, expects substantial financial stress for the next 2 to 3 years. Much of the high risk business in the production credit associations in Tennessee and the Louisville district was transferred to other lenders or liquidated. This shift in turn, placed greater stress on the PCA's and the farm credit system as a whole. Interest rate spreads are being forced to record highs for those borrowers left in the system to offset loan losses.

Finally, evidence of the extent of economic strain in the farm sector can be seen in the lending activities of the Farmers Home Administration. The Farmers Home Administration currently holds more than 2,400 farms in its inventory as a result of bankruptcy and foreclosure. Prior to 1981, Farmers Home had no more than 231 farms in inventory at any time. Farmers Home has approximately $26 billion in outstanding farm debt. More than one-fourth of this debt is delinquent. Of the almost 270,000 Farmers Home borrowers, more than 30 percent are delinquent on their repayments. Tennessee borrowers with the Farmers Home are fairing better than the national average. Of our 9,300 FmHA borrowers, only 28 percent are delinquent.

Quite clearly Mr. President, the farm credit crisis is impacting more than a few, poorly managed farms. It is my fear that if we do not address this problem in a responsible, reasonable manner the impact of the farm credit crisis will spread from the farm and financial community to the main street shops in our rural communities. Given the clear need for substantial assistance, what has the administration done on behalf of our Nation's farmers facing this credit crunch?

The actions taken by the administration to date are grossly inadequate and have been virtually no help to farmers in Tennessee or other States. Indeed, for the past 3 years, the administration has refused to acknowledge that there even was a farm credit crisis. It was only shortly before the November election that the administration discovered that farmers were being pushed to the brink of economic disaster by forces beyond their control.

The administration's handling of the Economic Emergency Loan Program illustrates this callous disregard for our Nation's farmers. The Secretary of Agriculture had the authority to make up to $600 million in economic emergency loans in fiscal year 1982. Despite pleas from myself and others to implement this program, the Secretary refused to release the available funds. It took court action in 1983 to prod the administration out of its lethargy and into action on the farm credit crisis.

Despite a court order, the administration continued to drag its feet on farm credit aid. The Office of Management and Budget once more became involved in the implementation of the country's agriculture policy by making Economic Emergency Program funds more difficult to obtain. It took further congressional action last year to block the administration's efforts to circumvent a court order and congressional mandate.

Recent programs have faired no better. Despite Secretary Block's assertions to the contrary, the initiatives announced last fall have not done much to aid farmers caught in the credit crunch. No guarantees were made under this program in Tennessee through January 25, 1985. In addition, 3,192 Tennessee farmers applied under this program to obtain credit relief. Yet, only 15 had been granted deferrals through the end of January.

Perhaps the reasons for the administration's failure to adequately respond to the farm credit crisis have been set out by David Stockman in his recent outbursts before the Budget Committee and in subsequent interviews on this subject. In Mr. Stockman's eyes farm foreclosures, families forced to give up land they have held for generations, young persons denied the opportunity to farm are nothing more than necessary elements of dynamic economic growth. The significance of an American way of life carries no weight with Mr. Stockman as he seems content to send the family farm into extinction.

Fortunately, myself and many of my colleagues do not accept the Stockman vision of American farmers. We do understand that we cannot and should not loan American farmers out of debt. But, we also understand that the Federal Government can and should do more to help those farmers caught in dire straits through circumstances beyond their control.

We are presently working on a package of farm credit initiatives which we believe provide reasonable, prudent assistance to efficient farm managers. We have seen and heard of several farm credit packages over the past few days and will likely hear about many more in the hours ahead. I have been collaborating not only with my colleagues in the Senate but with my good friend from Tennessee, Congressman ED JONES who chairs the House Agriculture Committee Subcommittee on Farm Credit.

We propose a farm credit package containing advance CCC commodity loans on up to 50 percent of the farmer's crop, to let him get cash in hand to get a crop in the ground. We would cap the amount of advance payments which could be made under this provision at a reasonable level to avoid the abuses encountered with million-dollar payments under the PIK Program. We would expand the Emergency Loan Guarantee Program for 1985 operating loans and loans to restructure farm debt to $3 billion in guarantees. A guarantee would only be available where the interest rate on the loan was written down to a point where the borrower showed a positive cash flow. The Federal Government and the private lender would shoulder the burden of this interest write-down equally to an interest rate of 8 percent. If the private lender feels they must go below an 8 percent interest rate, they must bear this additional write-down on their own. The Federal share ends at an 8 percent rate.

Furthermore, we call for a moratorium on foreclosures of Farmers Home loans as well as on disposal of Farmers Home inventory property. We back these provisions up with calls for greater administrative assistance on the part of Farmers Home officials in dealing with the case-load at Farmers Home.

As I indicated Mr. President, variations on many of these proposals are contained in several of the farm credit packages under discussion on the floor. It is my hope that those of us interested in farm credit issues will be able to work out a consensus approach to this problem in the hours ahead and I stand ready to lend my energy to this task. The time for action is now. If we fail to pass an effective farm credit bill, we will be turning our backs on thousands of honest, hard-working American farmers, and, in effect, we will be saying that we have no real need for the family farm. That is simply not responsible farm policy and I urge my colleagues to join with us in preventing this tragedy.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR EXON

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. EXON] is recognized.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, a matter of clarification. I was scheduled to speak at 10:30. I have been here for 20 minutes. I have listened with great interest to the excellent remarks of the Senator from Tennessee, before that the Senator from Arkansas, and before that, I believe, the Senator from Oklahoma.

There are two other Senators on the floor that wish to speak 10 minutes each and we have about 7 minutes remaining on the time, and I am referring to my colleague from Michigan and my colleague from Pennsylvania.

I could wax eloquent, in my opinion, for another 10 minutes and cut them out. I suspect, Mr. President, that I am going to have adequate time to talk later.

I am wondering if I might be able to accommodate my friend from Michigan and my friend from Pennsylvania by saying that I would be glad to give up my time if they could split the remaining 7 minutes between them or, in the opinion of the Chair, could we possibly extend for at least a period of time the end of morning business, which I understand is now scheduled for 20 minutes of 11 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the Chair, the time for morning business cannot be extended. The Senator is privileged to make any request for the use of his time which he chooses.

Mr. EXON. I request the balance of the time remaining be equally split between the Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Pennsylvania. I will make my fundamentally important remarks at some later time in the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator controls that time and has the right to divide it as he sees fit.

Mr. EXON. I then direct that half of my time be given to the Senator from Michigan and half of that time to the Senator from Pennsylvania and I will allow either one of them to go first as they see fit.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, my friend from Nebraska is always so generous. I wish to first of all thank him. I believe our colleague from Pennsylvania was here first, so I would let him proceed for the first half of the remaining time, if he so wishes.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Nebraska for yielding part of his time, and I thank the distinguished Senator from Michigan for recognizing my earlier arrival.

S. 478—SURFACE MINING CONTROL AND RECLAMATION

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I am introducing today a bill that amends the Surface Mining Control and Reclamation Act of 1977. A number of problems have developed since that act's adoption and I hope to eliminate with some simple and commonsense changes.

The Surface Mine Control and Reclamation Act of 1977 has been very useful in helping Pennsylvania correct dangerous conditions at abandoned mines. And as the State with the longest history of mining coal, Pennsylvania has more than its share of hazards caused by abandoned mines. In fact, Pennsylvania has approximately one-third of all abandoned coal mine problems in the Nation.

Our problems, like those of many other States, are caused by both surface and deep mines. Consequently, the reclamation fund is supported by contributions from both surface and deep mine operators.

However, it has been the experience in my State that a disproportionate share of money actually spent is for deep mine reclamations.

While I understand that deep mines can cause very severe problems, surface mines can also present serious dangers to the health and safety of nearby communities. The distribution of reclamation funds should be more equitable in order to reflect this fact.

At the time the Reclamation Act was enacted, surface mining problems were deemed to be predominate over those caused by deep mines. As a result, surface mine operators were assessed a 35 cents per ton of coal mined contribution to the fund while deep mine operators had a fee imposed of only 15 cents per ton. This fee schedule is uniform across the Nation. Since the act, has taken effect, a disproportionate share of the fund has been spent on deep mine reclamation.

In addition to the inequity between surface and deep mines, this spending pattern has resulted in regional disparities of expenditures.

In order to correct his problem, this bill establishes two trust funds. One will be fed by contributions from surface mine operators and the other from deep mine operators. Money from the trust account can be distributed by the State with approval from the Department of the Interior.

I am aware of the type and severity of abandoned mine problems associated with both surface and deep mines. My point is that both types of problems should be addressed simultaneously. The difficulties caused by abandoned mines have been accumulated over many decades. It will require many years to correct the situation. There is every reason to move along both fronts.

The bill also makes changes to the administration of the reclamation funds. For instance, the 50-percent State share for a particular project is made available once the general State program is approved without the time-consuming process of waiting for OSM scrutiny of each individual reclamation proposal.

Mr. President, taken together, these changes represent a vast improvement to the act as it is applied currently. I have worked very closely with the Pennsylvania Coal Mining Association in formulating this bill. They are to be commended for their leadership in suggesting needed improvements to the law. I believe that their ideas will appeal to a large and diverse coalition.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 478

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) section 401 of the Surface Mining Control and Reclamation Act of 1977 (30 U.S.C. 1231) is amended to read as follows:

"ABANDONED SURFACE MINE RECLAMATION FUND AND ABANDONED UNDERGROUND MINE RECLAMATION FUND

"SEC. 401. (a) There are created in the Treasury two trust funds to be known as—

"(1) the Abandoned Surface Mine Reclamation Fund (hereinafter in this Act referred to as the 'surface fund'); and

"(2) the Abandoned Underground Mine Reclamation Fund (hereinafter in this Act referred to as the 'underground fund'), which shall be administered by the Secretary of the Interior. State abandoned mine reclamation funds (State funds) generated pursuant to this title shall be established by each State pursuant to an approved State program.

"(b)(1) There shall be deposited in the surface fund—

"(A) the reclamation fees levied on surface coal mining operations under section 402 of this Act: Provided, That an amount not to exceed 10 per centum of such reclamation fees collected for any calendar quarter shall be reserved beginning in the first calendar year in which the fee is imposed and continuing for the remainder of that fiscal year and for the period in which such fee is imposed by law, for the purpose of section 507(c), subject to appropriation pursuant to authorization under section 712: Provided further, That not more than $10,000,000 shall be available for such purposes;

"(B) any user charge imposed on or for land subjected to surface coal mining operations reclaimed pursuant to this title, after expenditures for maintenance have been deducted;

"(C) donations by persons, corporations, associations, and foundations for the purposes of section (c); and

"(D) recovered moneys as provided for this title attributable to surface mining.

"(2) There shall be deposited in the underground fund—

"(A) the reclamation fees levied on underground coal mining operations under section 402 of this Act: Provided, That an amount not to exceed 10 per centum of such reclamation fees collected for any calendar quarter shall be reserved beginning in the first calendar year in which the fee is imposed and continuing for the remainder of that fiscal year and for the period in which such fee is imposed by law, for the purpose of section 507(c), subject to appropriation pursuant to authorization under section 712: Provided further, That not more than $10,000,000 shall be available for such purposes;

"(B) any user charge imposed on or for land affected by underground coal operations reclaimed pursuant to this title, after expenditures for maintenance have been deducted;

"(C) donations by persons, corporations, associations, and foundations for the purposes of subsection (d): and

"(D) recovered moneys as provided for this title attributable to underground mining.

"(c) Moneys in the surface fund may be used for—

"(1) reclamation and restoration of land and water resources adversely affected by past surface coal mining operations including reclamation and restoration of abandoned surface mining areas, abandoned coal processing areas, and abandoned coal refuse disposal areas;

"(2) planting of land adversely affected by past surface coal mining to prevent erosion and sedimentation;

"(3) prevention, abatement, treatment, and control of water pollution created by surface coal mine drainage including restoration of streambeds and construction and operation of water treatment plants;

"(4) prevention, abatement, and control of burning coal refuse disposal areas and burning coal in situ; and

"(5) the purposes of subsection (e).

"(d) Moneys in the underground fund may be used for—

"(1) reclamation and restoration of land and water resources adversely affected by past underground coal mining, abandoned coal processing areas, and abandoned coal refuse disposal areas;

"(2) sealing and filling abandoned deep mine entries and voids;

"(3) planting of land adversely affected by past underground coal mining to prevent erosion and sedimentation;

"(4) prevention, abatement, treatment, and control of water pollution created by coal mine drainage including restoration of streambeds, and construction and operation of water treatment plants;

"(5) prevention, abatement, and control of burning coal refuse disposal areas and burning coal in situ; and prevention, abatement, and control of coal mine subsidence; and

"(6) the purposes of subsection (e).

"(e) The Secretary of the Interior may use such sums as the Secretary determines to be appropriate from the surface fund or the underground fund for—

"(1) use under section 406, by the Secretary of Agriculture, of up to one-fifth of the money deposited in the funds annually for transfer by the Secretary of the Interior to the Secretary of Agriculture for such purposes;

"(2) acquisition of land as provided for in this title;

"(3) enforcement and collection of the reclamation fee provided for in section 402 of this title;

"(4) studies by the Department of the Interior by contract to such extent or in such amounts as are provided in appropriation Acts with public and private organizations to provide information, advice, and technical assistance, including research and demonstration projects, conducted for the purposes of this title;

"(5) restoration, reclamation, abatement, control, or prevention of adverse effects of coal mining which constitutes an emergency as provided for in this title;

"(6) grants to the States to accomplish the purposes of this title;

"(7) administrative expenses of the United States and each State to accomplish the purposes of this title; and

"(8) all other necessary expenses to accomplish the purposes of this title.".

"(f)(1) Subject to the provisions of paragraph (2), moneys from the surface fund and the underground fund shall be available for the purposes of this title, only when appropriated therefor, and such appropriations shall be made without fiscal year limitations.

"(2)(A) Moneys from the surface fund and the underground fund allocated to the States and Indian tribes pursuant to section 402(g) shall be paid directly to the States and Indian tribes by the Secretary of the Treasury not later than ninety days following the end of each calendar quarter, without prior appropriation by Congress, for use by the States and Indian tribes as approved by the Secretary pursuant to section 405.

"(B) Moneys from the surface fund and the underground fund not allocated to the States and Indian tribes pursuant to section 402(g) shall be available for the purpose of this title only when appropriated therefor, and such appropriations shall be made without fiscal year limitations.

"(C) The Secretary of the Treasury shall pay interest to the surface fund and the underground fund quarterly at the prevailing rates of Treasury bills on the balance of moneys in the fund.".

(b) The item for section 401 of title IV in the table of contents for the Act is amended to read as follows:

"Sec. 401. Abandoned Surface Mine Reclamation Fund and Abandoned Underground Reclamation Fund.".

SEC. 2. Section 711 of such Act (30 U.S.C. 1301) is amended to read as follows:

"EXPERIMENTAL PRACTICES

"SEC. 711. (a) In order to—

"(1) encourage advances in mining and reclamation practices,

"(2) allow postmining land use for industrial, commercial, residential, or public purposes (including recreational facilities), or

"(3) encourage reclamation of abandoned mine lands and areas not reclaimed to meet the performance standards of this title.

the regulatory authority with approval by the Secretary may, subject to the provisions of subsection (b), authorize departures in individual cases on an experimental basis or by regulation for remining of abandoned mine lands from the environmental protection performance standards promulgated under sections 515 and 516 of this Act.

"(b) Departures may be authorized under subsection (a) if—

"(1) the experimental or alternative remining practices are potentially more or at least as environmentally protective, during and after mining operations, as those required by promulgated standards;

"(2) the mining operations approved for particular land-use or other purposes are not larger or more numerous than necessary to determine the effectiveness and economic feasibility of the experimental practices; and

"(3) the experimental practices do not reduce the protection afforded public health and safety below that provided by promulgated standards.".

SEC. 3. (a) Paragraph (1) of subsection (g) of section 402 of such Act (30 U.S.C. 1232(g)) is amended by striking out "fund" and inserting in lieu thereof "surface fund and the underground fund".

(b) Section 403 of such Act (30 U.S.C. 1233) is amended by—

(1) striking out the heading for such section and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "Objectives of Funds"; and

(2) striking out "fund" and inserting in lieu thereof "surface fund and the underground fund".

(c)(1) The last sentence of subsection (e) of section 407 of such Act (30 U.S.C. 1237(e)) is amended by striking out "fund" and inserting in lieu thereof "surface fund if such land is reclaimed from land that was subject to surface mining and the underground fund if such land is reclaimed from land that was subject to underground mining.".

(2) The last sentence of subsection (f) of section 407 of such Act (30 U.S.C. 1237(f)) is amended by striking out "fund" and inserting in lieu thereof "surface fund if such land is reclaimed from land that was subject to surface mining and the underground fund if such land is reclaimed from land that was subject to underground mining.".

(3) The first sentence of subsection (g) of section 407 of such Act (30 U.S.C. 1237(e)) is amended by striking out "fund" and inserting in lieu thereof "surface fund or underground fund".

(d) Subsection (a) of section 410 of such Act (30 U.S.C. 1240(a)) is amended by striking out "fund" and inserting in lieu thereof "surface fund and the underground fund".

(e) Section 411 of such Act (30 U.S.C. 1241) is amended by striking out "fund" both places it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "surface fund and the underground fund".

THE CLOSING OF THE PHILADELPHIA NAVAL SHIPYARD AND THE MILITARY SUPPLY DEPOT

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, there appears in this morning's Philadelphia Inquirer a comment from the distinguished Congressman from Philadelphia, WILLIAM GRAY, the chairman of the House Budget Committee, concerning the possibility of the closing of the Philadelphia Naval Shipyard and the military supply depot, albeit with quite a number of provisos. But the headline says, "Gray: Could Back Closing of Shipyard."

I rise today so that the people of Philadelphia who are employed both by the Philadelphia Naval Shipyard and at the military supply depot will know of my total opposition to any consideration of closing those important facilities. I have this morning checked with Captain Barnes, the second in command at the Philadelphia Naval Shipyard, concerning activities which are now ongoing. There are major renovation projects and programs involving the U.S.S. Forrestal, the U.S.S. Lexington, the U.S.S. Coronado, the U.S.S. Guam, the U.S.S. Conyngham and they are making preparations for the arrival soon of the U.S.S. Inchon, and the Independence.

The Philadelphia Naval Yard employs some 11,000 individuals and has an annual gross of over $600 million. The retention and the continuation of operations at the Philadelphia Naval Yard is in no way related simply to providing jobs for the people in that area. It is being maintained because of its vital work for national defense and as a vital part of the defense budget.

With respect to the Defense Personnel Supply Center, which is located at South 20th Street in Philadelphia, that facility has the primary function for buying for the military and is responsible for purchasing all the clothing, medical supplies, and food used by all the military services, the Army, Navy, and Air Force, stationed all over the world. It is the only facility of its kind maintained by the military for that purpose.

The services that depend on this supply depot include those assigned to the Rapid Deployment Force and it is certainly a vital operation for the Department of Defense.

This morning we have checked with Mr. Gerald Flassete, Director of Congressional Affairs at the Defense Logistics Agency, and there are no plans to close that facility. That was confirmed by telephone this morning with Brigadier General Henry, Chief of Staff of the Defense Logistics Agency.

There ought to be this statement on the record, for everyone to know that these facilities are being maintained because of their vital importance to the defense of this country.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. SPECTER. I thank the Chair. I ask unanimous consent that the referenced article from the Philadelphia Inquirer, February 20, 1985, be reprinted at this point in the RECORD.

I thank the distinguished Senator from Michigan for yielding to me.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Philadelphia Inquirer, Feb. 20, 1985]

GRAY: COULD BACK CLOSING OF SHIPYARD

(By Joyce Gemperlein)

WASHINGTON.—Rep. William H. Gray 3d, chairman of the House Budget Committee, said yesterday that under certain conditions, he would support the closing of the Philadelphia Naval Shipyard and military supply depot as a way of reducing military spending.

The Philadelphia Naval Shipyard employes about 11,000 people. The depot employs about 4,000 more.

In a proviso-laden, gingerly worded answer to a question, Gray, a Democrat from the Second Congressional District in Philadelphia, said he would not oppose such an effort if the Philadelphia facilities and others around the country had been "clearly demonstrated to be outdated."

He also said he would support such closings only if President Reagan were to take the lead in cutting military spending as he cuts other major programs in fiscal 1986.

Gray, who has been in his post as chairman for six weeks, said that members of Congress were committed this year to cutting the federal deficit through spending cuts but that they wanted every program, including defense, on the table for consideration.

Gray said Reagan would have to cut Pentagon programs because congressmen from districts where defense contractors were major employers would not make that move themselves.

"Yes, I am willing to make that tough decision," Gray said yesterday during a National Press Club luncheon, where he was the featured speaker. "However, it must be made in the context of a fiscal policy that is going to understand the needs of the Philadelphia community and also with regard to other areas."

Gray said he believed that other members of Congress with such facilities in their districts would be willing to support the closing of outdated facilities if national policy and across-the-board budget cutting demanded it.

Gray said hearings held throughout the country by the House Budget Committee in the last few weeks had shown him that American taxpayers were willing to "bear a fair share" of reducing the national deficit, that they knew precisely which programs they could live without and that there was bipartisan support for budget-cutting measures.

But Gray said that the budget sent to Congress by the White House, which included a proposed increase of 12.6 percent in military spending, was a "continuation of the same fiscal policies of buy now and pay later."

Gray said that Congress knew that "we cannot continue to spend, spend, spend and borrow, borrow, borrow," but that the cuts must be made "equitably, fairly and with balance . . . with compassion . . . and with every spending item on the table.

"The deficits that we are saddled with are not the result of 50 years of uncontrolled congressional spending," he said. "The facts show otherwise.

"In 38 out of the last 42 years, congressional spending has been less than requested by the White House, including the last four years. Today's deficits cannot be laid at the feet of Congress," he said.

He said he sensed an opportunity for real cooperation and a consensus on all sides to reduce the deficit. "However, there are still some problems.

"How does the Congress make the tough choices and make the people accept the tough choices when the President has left the playing field?' he asked. "The Gipper has gone to the skyboxes to await the outcome," Gray said, charging that the Reagan administration had resorted to "game-playing" to obscure its unwillingness to cut military spending.

"If we are going to have a consensus, we need executive leadership to build that consensus," Gray told the luncheon audience.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR LEVIN

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan is recognized.

Mr. LEVIN. I thank the Chair.

EMERGENCY FARM LEGISLATION

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I happen to represent a predominantly industrial State, but not only am I going to be supporting the effort to get emergency farm legislation but I know that many other Senators from predominantly industrial States will do so also.

Our constituents, with their traditional high unemployment do understand the despair and the pain which results from the loss of work and the loss of income. This farm crisis is all of America's crisis. It is going to affect everyone of our constituents wherever we happen to live and Washington and this Congress will soon face a growing tide of humanity seeking survival arriving at our doorstep.

Michigan has a large farm economy. As a matter of fact, we have more farm families than many of the Farm Belt States. But we have a tragedy in agriculture. Cash income from farming was $820 million in 1980. In 1984, it is estimated that only $690 million will be the cash income of our farmers, and that will drop even further to $645 million.

Michigan's farm real estate averaged $1,230 an acre in value in 1981. By 1984, the value dropped to $1,109 per acre. The total farm assets in Michigan were $17.1 billion in 1981 and dropped to $16.1 billion in 1984.

My brother, Congressman SANDER LEVIN, and I visited a number of other States last weekend. We went to South Dakota and Nebraska and they are even worse off than Michigan. Their land values have dropped far more than land values in Michigan. Newspapers are full of notices of auctions of farms.

In many cases those farms have been in the same family three and four generations. The entire Legislature of South Dakota is coming to Washington. There are farm crisis rallies and stress hotlines, increases in spouse abuse, child abuse, suicides of farmers who believe there is no hope or who feel guilty for losing a family farm that has been in the family for generations.

What is the administration's response to a clear need to help our family farmers? It is proposing to drastically cut the amount of credit available to farmers from the Farmers Home Administration.

The administration proposes a loan level of $3.4 billion in the fiscal year 1986 budget compared to the $4.476 billion in fiscal year 1985. A drastic reduction in direct loans is proposed from $3.78 billion in fiscal year 1985 to $400 million in fiscal year 1986.

The administration proposes to reduce price support loan rates by taking the national average price of the commodity over a 5-year period and setting the loan rate at 75 percent of that price. For wheat farmers, it means about 56 cents less per bushel and for corn farmers it means nearly 43 cents less per bushel. Sorghum farmers would get approximately 47 cents less per bushel and barley farmers would get about 26 cents less per bushel. The administration's fiscal year 1986 budget is a prescription for disaster for agriculture in America.

In that prescribed disaster the FmHA would be little help. The Farmers Home Administration was designed to be the safety net—the lender of last resort. But the proposed cut in the FmHA direct loan level and the proposed cuts in price support loans would consequently result in tens of thousands of farmers perhaps hundreds of thousands of farmers, falling through that net and crashing to the ground, taking small businesses and banks with them in the process.

The Farmers Home Administration is being systematically strangled by funding cuts, slowdowns in processing of applications and staff reductions—there is a moratorium on hiring personnel for the Farmer's Home Administration with the result that loans take months and months to process.

The FmHA is failing in its statutory purpose of being a lender of last resort for American family farms because of a rigid, simplistic doctrine that less Government automatically, necessarily and instantly means the better off Americans are.

The most visible exponents of the administration doctrine are David Stockman and John Block. David Stockman has called the grinding into the ground of American farmers "the way a dynamic economy works." In fact, the bankruptcy of a large number of American farmers represents sickness in the agricultural economy, not proof of its health.

Even if you believe that the weak should perish as a beautiful byproduct of a pure, free economy, the weak and the less capable aren't the victims in the current agricultural crisis. It is chance and random luck that determines which farmers are going under to a large degree—such factors as when you bought your land, what the price of corn is in the world, and how much of it the United States is exporting.

The farm crisis is also the result of Government policies—big deficits which raised effective interest rates and produced over-valued dollars which reduces exports. So if you plant crops which are traditionally exported in large quantities, but aren't being exported at their usual capacity, you come up short.

The premise of Stockman's attack is wrong—random chance and Government policies are greater factors affecting farmers survival chances than efficiency or managerial skill in the current crises.

But the most lurid rhetoric of Stockman or Block cannot hide the fact that the policies are President's Reagan's. The proposed cut in our Agricultural Credit Program and FmHA lending authority are President Reagan's policies. The proposed cut in price support loan rates is President Reagan's proposal.

That is why the entire South Dakota Legislature and a good percentage of the Nebraska Legislature seek to meet with the President. They want to meet with the President and they are right.

The protective shield around the President must be pierced. He must confront the reality of 5 to 30 percent of our farmers not planting. He must fully and personally understand the threat to the values of family and independence which the growing farm upheaval represents.

Some legislation has been offered and more will be forthcoming.

Some is short-term—to get farmers help in time so they can plant this spring.

Some is long-term—successor legislation to the farm bill which expires at the end of this fiscal year. Both need the attention of this Congress on an urgent basis. If we fail to act in a prompt way, hundreds of thousands of Americans will be the immediate victims and all Americans who consume their products will be victimized in the marketplace in the not too distant future.

JOINT MEETING OF THE TWO HOUSES—ADDRESS BY THE PRIME MINISTER OF GREAT BRITAIN

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the hour of 10:40 a.m. having arrived, the Senate will stand in recess until 12 noon, and proceed as a body to the Chamber of the House of Representatives for the joint meeting.

Thereupon, the Senate, at 10:40 a.m., recessed until 12 noon; and the Senate, preceded by the Secretary of the Senate, Jo-Anne L. Coe; the Sergeant at Arms, Larry E. Smith; the Vice President of the United States; and the President pro tempore (STROM THURMOND), proceeded to the Hall of the House of Representatives to hear an address by the Prime Minister of Great Britain.

(At the joint meeting the following Senators were appointed by the Vice President to escort the Prime Minister of Great Britain into the House Chamber: The Senator from Kansas (Mr. DOLE), the Senator from Wyoming (Mr. SIMPSON), the Senator from Maryland (Mr. MATHIAS), the Senator from Wyoming (Mr. WALLOP), the Senator from Kansas (Mrs. KASSEBAUM), the Senator from West Virginia (Mr. BYRD), the Senator from California (Mr. CRANSTON), the Senator from New York (Mr. MOYNIHAN), the Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. PELL), the Senator from Illinois (Mr. SIMON), the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. GORE), the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. THURMOND), and the Senator from Indiana (Mr. LUGAR).)

(This address delivered by the Prime Minister of Great Britain, the Right Honorable Margaret Thatcher, to the joint session of the two Houses of Congress, is printed in the proceedings of the House of Representatives in today's RECORD.)

At 12 noon, the Senate having returned to its Chamber, reassembled, and was called to order by the Presiding Officer [Mr. HUMPHREY].

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the hour of 12 noon having arrived, there will now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business, not to extend beyond the hour of 1 p.m., with statements therein limited to 5 minutes each.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

TRUCKDRIVER HELPS FIND MISSING CHILDREN

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I rise to take notice of an Alabamian, Mr. Curtis Jones, who is a truckdriver and who has come up with an idea relative to missing children that I would like to bring to the attention of the Members of the Senate.

This trucker, a former prisoner of war in Vietnam, had come up with an idea of putting posters of missing children on his truck. Last August in Des Moines, IA, there were posters attached to his truck of two missing Iowa paperboys. Since then, he has put posters on the side of his truck of missing children. This is sort of a rolling billboard for missing children, a great idea.

Mr. Jones hopes to have 3,000 trucks carrying posters across America carrying pictures of missing children.

The Truckers Alliance and the American Trucking Association have adopted Mr. Curtis Jones' idea for their trucker image matters and Mr. Jones is proceeding to get a lot of attention on this.

Mr. Jones said most of the recruitment of truckers is done on his CB, "just talking on the radio" to get other truckers to join with him.

Mr. President, I commend Curtis Jones, of Cullman, AL, for his idea. I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD a UPI news release of yesterday pertaining to Curtis Jones and his efforts.

There being no objection, the news release was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TRUCKDRIVER HELPS FIND MISSING CHILDREN

CULLMAN, ALA.—A trucker who uses the trailer of his rig as a billboard to display poster-size pictures of missing children says his idea is being copied by other truck drivers and he hopes that leads to results.

Curtis Jones, a former Vietnam War POW, says he had no idea that the idea would catch on when he left Des Moines, Iowa last August with the posters of two missing Iowa paperboys strapped awkwardly to his truck.

But people noticed and many called the Missing Children's Help Center in Tampa, Fla., about Jones and his good deed. The center invited Jones to visit and now is sponsoring an effort to get other truckers involved.

"We hope to have 3,000 trucks running the posters by the end of the month," said Jones, who stopped in Cullman over the weekend while leading a convoy of trucks with children's pictures on their sides.

Tony DiNova, who cofounded the Children's Help Center with his wife, Ivana, said the two of them coundn't help but get involved with Jones' after they began receiving telephone calls about what the man was doing.

"We just heard about this trucker carrying posters of missing children around the country," DiNova said. "The number of calls that started coming into the office from the placards on the truck * * *. We were getting calls in from all over the country."

DiNova said many of the calls were from people who thought they had seen some of the children displayed on Jones' rig.

"A lot of truckers have called and said, 'I've seen this child.' There are several children we did locate through these calls," he said. "You can't argue with success. You just can't do it."

The Truckers Alliance and the American Trucking Association have adopted Jones' idea for their trucker image programs, but Jones said most of the recruitment of truckers is done on his CB, "just talkin' on the radios to get other guys to join in with us."

DiNova said he thought the "rolling billboard" idea was the greatest.

"In the past, we thought of renting billboards, but it was too expensive," he said. "This is better. There's more trucks than there are billboards."

Jones, 36, himself the father of four, said he can't wait to get back home. The Alabama native has been on the special convoy about a month. He said he was grateful that other truckers have been recruited to continue the program.

"I really had no idea it was going to get this far," he said. "But I'm going to keep on until we don't need to any more. Until the problem's solved."

ORDER TO PRINT TRIBUTES TO THE LATE SENATOR LISTER HILL AS A SENATE DOCUMENT

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that tributes to former U.S. Senator Lister Hill made on the floor of the Senate just before adjournment for the February recess—I believe on February 6—be printed as a Senate document in sufficient numbers so that copies may be sent to the family and distributed to libraries and other public depositories of documents.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SYMMS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho.

THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE AMENDMENT

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, America is the land where dreams can become reality.

I am sure that you were as thrilled as I was when President Reagan, during his State of the Union address, introduced two American heroes. Both Clara Hale and Jean Nguyen are people who deserve to be honored.

Cadet Jean Nguyen is an immigrant from Vietnam. She was only 11 years old when she and her family were evacuated by helicopter after the fall of Saigon. Her father, a colonel in the South Vietnamese Army, could not possibly have known that he would eventually become a factory clerk in Milton, PA.

Knowing no English, Jean struggled with her school subjects, but she remembered her father's admonition: "Just go to school and concentrate."

And concentrate she did. She eventually became a member of the national honor society at Milton Area Senior High School, and was involved in track, field hockey, and chorus.

Jean could not be where she is today without a good command of the English language. Unlike those of us born of English-speaking parents, Jean acquired English the "old-fashioned way," she earned it, so to speak. Had she been placed in a bilingual "maintenance" class at school, she would not have the command of English that she has now; and she certainly would not have the honor of becoming a West Point graduate and a commissioned officer in the U.S. Army this May 22.

I support the English language amendment—the ELA—because I believe we must encourage more Jean Nguyens to become part of the American dream. I also support the conclusion of the prestigious Twentieth Century Fund task force on education: "Anyone living in the United States who is unable to speak English cannot fully participate in our society, its culture, (and) its politics."

For Jean Nguyen, opportunity in America spoke English. And for the parents and grandparents of most of us in this body, opportunity also spoke English.

Supporters of the ELA are often labeled as racist or xenophobic. Nothing could be further from the truth.

The long-time champion of the English language amendment is a brilliant semanticist of Oriental origin, and an immigrant to the United States—our former colleague, Senator S.I. Hayakawa.

Heading Senator Hayakawa's U.S. English organization is Gerda Bikales, who, at age 16, arrived in the United States when her family fled Nazi-occupied Europe. She spoke German, Yiddish, Flemish, and French, but no English. Like Cadet Nguyen, Gerda learned our language quickly because she could see that in America, opportunity spoke English.

Of interest to me is the fact that most of us here today could not serve on the board of U.S. English. That invitation is extended only to people with a command of at least one foreign language.

It would appear that those who cry "racist" stand alone. They may feign spokesman status, but their flocks have deserted them.

For example, in November 1983, San Francisco, the Nation's most ethnically diverse and politically liberal city, passed a proposition opposing bilingual ballots. It passed with a resounding 63 percent of the vote, including 90 percent of the Hispanic districts and 95 percent of the Chinese districts.

Typical of the numerous ethnic groups supporting the ELA is one representing immigrants from Cambodia, Laos, and Vietnam. Let me share with you, Mr. President, part of a letter I received recently from them:

> The legal recognition of English will insure that all of America's ethnic groups are treated by the Government equally and with respect. And that the most crucial element which binds together this multi-ethnic republic, the English language, is protected and preserved.
> Such respect for our ethnic diversity and protection for our political unity is undermined by the language policy mistakenly being pursued by our Government. Instead of strengthening a common citizenship, this policy, which is unwarranted, unwise, and ethnically divisive, is creating linguistic ghettos. And ghettos are barriers between peoples; barriers, both physical and emotional, which nurture suspicion, fear, and intolerance.
> Because of our pride and commitment both to our ethnic languages and to the English language which we adopted as immigrants to the United States, the Indochinese Coalition officially endorses the English Language Amendment.

So who is really racist and xenophobic? The person striving to help the non-English speaker enter the American mainstream as quickly as possible? Or the so-called "leader" who seeks to maintain his influence with an ethnic group by insuring that they remain dependent on a minority language?

Just compare the motivations and you will quickly see who are the friends and who are the foes.

My motivation in sponsoring the ELA is to bring national recognition to the need our Nation has for fundamental internal order and security. To continue growing strong, we need a common language.

The ELA will establish English as the official language of our Federal, State, and local governments and all elections. Also, it will reestablish Congress' original intent in passing the Bilingual Education Act in 1968: To teach students English as rapidly as possible so that they may more fully enjoy the blessings America offers.

And most important, the ELA will give new meaning to the proposition that we are "one nation * * * indivisible * * *."

But lest anyone be misinformed, let me outline what the ELA will not do: It will not prohibit or discourage other languages in any private context—church, private school, commerce, or private organizations.

Neither will it prohibit foreign language instruction in our Nation's public schools, or interfere with foreign language requirements in academic institutions. And it will not forbid second languages for the purpose of public convenience and safety in limited circumstances.

To my colleagues in this body, I ask: What are your motivations and desires with respect to our immigrants and those among us who speak little or no English? I ask you to search your hearts as you ponder my message today, then join me in this move to rally this Nation around a common goal expressed through a common language—the English language.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

APPOINTMENTS BY THE VICE PRESIDENT

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair, on behalf of the Vice President, in accordance with title 22 of the United States Code, appoints the Senator from Maryland [Mr. MATHIAS] as chairman and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BIDEN] as vice chairman of the Senate delegation to the North Atlantic Assembly during the 99th Congress; the Senator from Texas [Mr. GRAMM] as chairman and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DODD] as vice chairman of the Senate delegation to the Mexico-United States Interparliamentary group during the 99th Congress; and the Senator from Alaska [Mr. STEVENS] as chairman and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ZORINSKY] as vice chairman of the Senate delegation to the Canada-United States interparliamentary group during the 99th Congress.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, there may not be any morning business to conduct, so I just announce, for the benefit of Members, that at 1 o'clock we will be back on the Meese nomination. As I understand it, there are still three, four, or five Members on both sides who wish to speak to the Meese nomination. It is still my hope that sometime before 3 o'clock we can vote on the Meese nomination.

Again I urge those who seem concerned about the farm credit crisis not to link the Meese nomination and whatever legislative proposals may be floating around—there are five or six—with that nomination.

I also say, without in any way indicating what may happen in the remainder of the week, that I assume that, depending on the will of Senators, we will stay on the Meese nomination until is is concluded—if not today, tomorrow; if not tomorrow, Friday; if not Friday, some other time.

That will be followed by the highway bill where several billions of dollars means employment for 200,000 to 300,000 Americans, and there is a bipartisan agreement on that bill. It has been reported out of the committee. We would like to dispose of that before we conclude business this week.

It is also fair to say that we have had a couple of meetings this morning concerning the farm credit matter. I urge those who may have not yet done so to take a look at the administration proposal, which has been rather sharply modified from their proposal of last September.

I also indicate, as I did yesterday, that I do not believe the $625 million figure is a ceiling. I think we need to see whether the program works, and it is my opinion that that figure could be raised substantailly if necessary. Many of the other proposals or ideas that Members on both sides of the aisle have brought to my attention can be done through administrative action rather than legislative action.

We are pricing out some of the proposals, including the one the distinguished Senator from Illinois, Senator DIXON, and others, that have been introduced or will be introduced, and we may have that information available later today.

Again, I urge my colleagues on both sides not to couple the Meese nomination or the highway bill with any proposed legislative relief for the American farmer.

One thing I have noted is that at least one of the proposed farm credit relief bills seemed to lack any protection to prevent money from going to farmers who are not in need. There is nothing to require that farmers must try to borrow money from the bank before they are eligible for advance payments or other relief. If we are not very careful in what we do, and do not analyze all these proposals objectively, I am concerned we may do something that may be regretted later on. For example, we may make it possible for farmers who are really not in need to participate in programs at lower interest rates and receive other benefits, which is one of the problems with all the farm programs now.

So, again, I urge my colleagues who are expressing concern for the American farmer, as they should in at least five States if not more, to give us an opportunity to try to work this problem out and see if we can agree on a package. If we can, the leader is certainly not unwilling to urge the chairman of the Agriculture Committee, Senator HELMS, to bring it up as quickly as possible. If not, we may bring up a bill and try to work it out on the Senate floor.

SOCIETY OF FORMER SPECIAL AGENTS OF THE F.B.I. SUPPORT AMENDMENTS TO THE FEDERAL TORT CLAIMS ACT

Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, 14 years have passed since the Supreme Court decided the case of Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents of the Federal Bureau of Narcotics. 403 U.S. 388 (1971). During those 14 years, we have watched Federal employees of the highest caliber undergo the anguish and turmoil of trivial and vindictive lawsuits brought by private citizens to redress alleged constitutional torts. Imaginative plaintiffs have found alleged torts in the most innocent conduct and decisions of Federal employees in the pursuit of their duties.

Even the most able and well-intentioned public servant cannot avoid the potential for harassment and intimidation that can be unleashed by a disgruntled, vindictive plaintiff. Time and again, in hearings before the Subcommittee on Security and Terrorism, which I chair, reference has been made to Federal employees who are too intimidated by threatened or actual litigation to carry out their designated duties effectively.

Mr. President, since 1973, Congress has heard many compelling reasons why the Federal Tort Claims Act must be amended to substitute the United States as a defendant in cases against Federal employees arising out of decisions made within the scope of their employment. We cannot sit back and let another Congress pass without enacting the legislation necessary to restore the morale of Federal Government employees, especially law enforcement personnel, by removing the stifling atmosphere that now exists because of the threat of personal liability for pursuing their normal duties.

Mr. President, the Society of Former Special Agents of the Fedeal Bureau of Investigation has adopted a resolution urging Congress to pass legislation to amend the Federal Tort Claims Act. The resolution underscores the urgent need for immediate action by Congress. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be printed in the RECORD immediately following my remarks. I urge my colleagues to read it and to support the legislation to correct the situation that it describes.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTION ON AMENDMENTS TO FEDERAL TORT CLAIMS ACT

Whereas the Federal Tort Claims Act, since the 1971 Supreme Court decision in Bivins vs. Six Unknown Narcotics Agents, now makes government employees personally liable instead of the government for actions taken in good faith within the scope of their authority and duty; and

Whereas the number of these suits pending has increased during the past two years from 2200 to 2600, involving an estimated 10,000 government employees; and

Whereas in publicly supporting proposed amendments to the Act the Department of Justice has declared the majority of these suits to be trivial and vindictive; and

Whereas the current legislation has a chilling and stifling effect on employees of the Congress, regulatory agencies, investigative agencies and other government bodies under its provisions; and

Whereas the proposed legislative amendments would not remove a citizen's legal recourse if wronged by the government but would curb harassing actions, increase legitimate plaintiffs' recoveries by encouraging settlements by the government, and reduce the government's litigation costs:

Now therefore be it resolved, That the Society of Former Special Agents of the FBI in convention at New Orleans, La., October 25, 1984, urges the Congress to pass legislation which will make the Federal Government the sole party defendant instead of the individual employee in such suits.

HUMAN RIGHTS ABUSES IN NICARAGUA

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, Rogelio Guevara Mena is a human rights attorney and a prominent member of the opposition to the Sandinista regime in Nicaragua. On February 5, Mr. Guevara was arrested by Sandinista Interior Ministry officials under decree 1074 and held incommunicado.

Decree 1074 allows the Sandinista government to arrest any individual for whatever offense is considered threatening to the public security of the Sandinista state. With decree 1074, any individual in Nicaragua can be charged with violation of public order and state security. Its existence and its use by officials of the Sandinista Interior and Justice Ministries points to the deterioration in the system of laws in Nicaragua. As a result of decree 1074, any person is subject to the whims of Sandinista officials and may be arbitrarily jailed for an indefinite period of time as the rule of habeas corpus does not exist in today's Nicaragua.

Mr. Guevara has been targeted by Sandinista officials for many months. Pressures on him increased as a result of his decision to serve as the attorney for Father Luis Amado Pena of the Catholic Church. Father Pena was imprisoned for 3 months in 1984, and was accused by Sandinista officials of collaborating with anti-Sandinista rebels to create an urban front. Father Pena was not tried and was pardoned, without explanation, by the Sandinista government. At that time, Mr. Guevara had stated that the evidence against Father Pena was "inconsistent" and that the priest was "a victim of the aggression of the state against the Catholic Church."

Sandinista officials delayed action on Mr. Guevara until the election period was completed, as they well recognized that negative publicity would result from public disclosure of Mr. Guevara's arrest. After Mr. Guevara's imprisonment on February 5, his attorney was told that Mr. Guevara was being held incommunicado, pending an investigation, and that he could not be visited for at least 8 days. It was subsequently determined that he was being detained at El Chipote maximum security political prison in central Managua. This action was in direct violation of various Nicaragua juridical statutes guaranteeing all prisoners legal rights. Sandinista officials refused to explain why Mr. Guevara had been arrested and denied his attorney the right to interview his client within 24 hours.

Several human rights organizations, including Americas Watch, Members of Congress, and the U.S. Government made inquiries on Mr. Guevara's behalf. As a result of these requests, Mr. Guevara was released on February 14. I am pleased that the Nicaraguan Government has responded in this manner to resolving Mr. Guevara's plight. It's my hope that the quick resolution of this situation is indicative of President Ortega's stated commitment to permitting democratic institutions and groups to function freely. I remain concerned, nevertheless, by the arbitrary and antidemocratic actions of some members of his government, such as Interior Minister Tomas Borge; and I hope that these actions do not reflect the policies of the Ortega government as a whole.

The conditions under which Mr. Guevara was confined lead one to wonder if individual rights matter in the slightest to certain members of the Sandinista directorate. Mr. Guevara was kept alone in a totally dark cell for his entire period of confinement. His cell lacked sanitary facilities other than a hole, his food consisted of an inedible gruel, and dirty drinking water was available for only 2 hours each day. While he was not physically tortured, he was continually subject to a range of psychological threats from his interrogators. Interestingly enough, these officials focused their questions on Mr. Guevara's contacts with foreigners, which are not a violation of Nicaraguan law, with the Catholic Church, with other democratic opposition leaders, with American journalists, and on his rather distant association with the case of Jose Urbina Lara, the young Nicaraguan who was kidnapped from the Costa Rican Embassy by Sandinista officials on Christmas Eve. The senior interrogator responsible for Mr. Guevara's treatment was a Martin Espinosa of the Sandinista Interior Ministry. Espinosa concluded his dealings with Mr. Guevara last Thursday on a rather ominous note. He indicated to Mr. Guevara that he hoped that, "this has been a useful experience for you."

I believe that Mr. Guevara's sacrifices for democracy and his personal courage should not go unrecognized. There are many such individuals in Nicaragua who have risked everything because they believe in the concepts and the practice of freedom.

Among the most courageous of Nicaraguans is a remarkable young woman named Marta Patricia Baltodano. Marta Baltodano is the coordinator of the Comision Permanente de Derechos Humanos de Nicaragua [CPDH]. The Permanent Commission on Human Rights is an independent human rights agency that was established in 1977, and it played a major role in exposing the Somoza regime's human rights violations. During that period, Miss Baltodano and other members of the CPDH were repeatedly threatened by Somoza officials.

After Somoza was overthrown in 1979, the CPDH continued to report on human rights conditions inside Nicaragua. The CPDH operates at the sufferance of the Sandinista government. In fact, the Sandinista government originally proposed that the CPDH be disbanded, as it argued that the CPDH would be unnecessary in a society where there would be no human rights abuses. Sadly, the actions of the Sandinista junta have managed to keep the CPDH extremely busy. Because of its independence, its members have been repeatedly threatened by Sandinista officials. Various sources, both Nicaraguan and foreign, indicate that the CPDH's access to courts, tribunals, jails, and other detention facilities is increasingly restricted by Sandinista officials. When I met Miss Baltodano last May, she gave a statement which made a strong impression on me. The case of Mr. Guevara makes it all the more relevant today:

> What does exist, however, is a system of psychological repression which is seen not only in the prison, but in everyday life as well, in a permanent checking or control of all of the citizens of my country—a system which tends to destroy values and where it is claimed that there are only two kinds of citizens—Sandinistas and Counterrevolutionaries.
> There is really a permanent state of tension in our country in terms of the rule of law because any person can be taken off to jail without any concrete accusation being formed against him. A person may remain incommunicado for an indefinite period without assistance of counsel. He can stay six months, a year in prison, and no judge has the opportunity of declaring this person's innocence or guilt.

The isolation of Mr. Guevara and the increased incidence of secret prisons inside Nicaragua points to the deterioration of the rule of law in Nicaragua.

I do not believe that people in free societies, such as our own, should remain silent to the abuses of autocratic regimes. We in the Congress should continue to report such abuses and to support the true democrats in Nicaragua, the Rogelio Guevaras and the Marta Baltodanos. In 1770, Edmund Burke wrote, in his "Thoughts on the Cause of the Present Discontents," some lines which have some relevance to the current situation in Nicaragua:

> When bad men combine, the good must associate; else they will fall one by one, an unpitied sacrifice in a contemptible struggle.

Mr. President, let us not permit these courageous individuals to struggle in vain; our collective commitment to democracy demands no less of us.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the monthly human rights reports of the CPDH for the period from June to November of 1984 be printed in the RECORD, as well as the CPDH's report on the Sandinista Defense Committees. I also request that the State Department's study of Nicaragua in its 1984 human rights report be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PERMANENT COMMISSION ON HUMAN RIGHTS OF NICARAGUA

The Sandinista Defense Committees

BACKGROUND

The Civil Defense Committees were organized by the Sandinista Front and leftist organizations of the United People's Movement in 1977, with the goal of organizing the different residential districts in order to support the armed insurrection and structure in them the civil defense of the population. In the early moments of existence they included all persons without ideological discrimination, aiming at a total popular participation. The Defense Committees should be restricted in principle to carrying out activities for social advancement; however, with the revolutionary victory, the leaders of the Sandinista Front decided to carry out substantial changes in these defense committees—from that moment they were transformed into Sandinista Defense Committees integrated into the mass organizations of the Sandinista Party. From that perspective they have the following fundamental objectives:

The propagation of the Sandinista ideology and the exercise of pressure on the citizens so that they will join in the political activities of the Sandinista Party.

The promotion of the loyalty of citizens to the FSLN.

Pressuring or forcing citizens in case that voluntary support does not come about.

Political and military control of the population.

ORGANIZATIONAL STRUCTURE

The basic structure of these Sandinista Defense Committees consists of a Coordinator, a Secretary, a person responsible for each of the subcommittees among which can be mentioned: political, health, culture, sports, supplies and finances. In turn these street, block or square block committees are part of what is called the Sandinista Barrio/residential district/Committee and these are part of a Zone Committee. Although in general terms it is hoped that the citizens who are part of the various committees will participate in the governmental efforts by discussing the problems of the community and contributing solutions, the process is the reverse and it is the Zone Committees which transmit to the Barrio Committees the guidelines or instructions coming from the high political command; in other words, the National Leadership of the Sandinista Front, and they in turn designate the block, street or sidewalk Defense Committee about what they have to do.

In order to help to maintain all of this structure the residents are obligated to pay a monthly or weekly quota to cover the expenses of the office, paper, secretaries and office articles. Without being state dependencies, their national and international activities are financed by the Reconstruction Board with the money that citizens contribute with their taxes.

GROUPS OF REPRESSION

The Sandinista Defense Committees act as instruments of control of the population, their nature being eminently partisan, their operations aimed at preserving the political interests of the Sandinista Front and not the interests of the community. Although participation should be voluntary, there exists a permanent coercion for persons to join in partisan activities, and those who do not participate in the tasks that the SDCs assign them are denied the letter of recommendation that is requested in state agencies for drivers' licenses, business registration, loan applications, employment applications, police records, and others.

(a) Control of citizens:

It is carried out through reports prepared by the coordinators of the barrio committees, where they record the participation of citizens in the various activities that should be carried out; some are of a social nature but the population is coerced to join in order to be used for propagandistic partisan ends.

The method of control par excellence is coming to be the carrying out of population censuses which in addition to obtaining economic information, they use to gather information and political data.

Each head of family is subject to political questions; we could quote these questions as examples: How many persons reside in this house? What do they do? Where do they work? What party do they belong to? How much do they earn? Where did they reside before living in this unit? What mass organization do they belong to?

(b) Rationing:

It is one of the main weapons of these groups for controlling and pressuring Nicaraguans. In this way the Sandinista Party uses hunger as a punishment for all those persons who refuse to participate in their political activities, withdrawing or refusing them a ration card for ½ kilo of rice, ½ kilo of sugar, 1 liter of milk, 1 liter of oil, a bar of soap and roll of toilet paper per person per week.

(c) Revolutionary vigilance:

The SDC contribution to the defense of the Sandinista revolutionary process consists of the brazen espionage of some neighbors against others and is carried out through house-to-house visits in which members of the community are pressured to oversee (in shifts) the block and to pass on daily reports to the police and State Security. The houses of those who refuse to collaborate are stained with slogans that say: "here lives a counterrevolutionary, watch over him" or "contra, we are watching you."

(d) Denial of letters:

On conceiving the structure of the Sandinista state apparatus, the defense committees together with the other mass organizations were included as management groups for the carrying out of projects and programs, and for this reason letters are required of the Sandinista Defense Committees as an indispensable requirement for the carrying out of paperwork in the state offices; the coordinators deny these letters to all those persons who for ideological discrepancies do not participate in the activities fostered by those in their districts. Thus, many persons find themselves hindered from obtaining licenses, registration in centers of study, work and loans of money in the financial institutions.

(e) As proselytizing organizations and shock forces:

The persons are obligated to make posters, announcements, wall paintings, visits to the houses of the neighborhood, transmitting information and obligatory invitations or to participate in political acts. These activities are utilized as the specific channel for the political mobilizations of the FSLN; they are also used as shock forces to subjugate all those persons or political sectors that do not share the Sandinista ideology whether with subterfuge or force, physically attacking persons, destroying their property or through arrest threats.

CONCLUSIONS

The Permanent Commission on Human Rights of Nicaragua in virtue of the denouncements of abuses committed by these partisan organizations feels it appropriate to point out:

1. That the SDCs constitute a repressive structure created by the Sandinista Front and implemented in all of the national territory in order to subjugate their political adversaries and control the citizenry in general.

2. That as partisan organizations included in the structuring of the state for the development of social programs and projects, the Sandinista Party has institutionalized the violation of the most basic rights of Nicaraguans.

3. That on exercising the permanent coercion of the citizenry so that they will join in the political activities of the Sandinista Party and on establishing differences among persons according to their political ideologies, they are violating the Statute on Rights and Guarantees of Nicaraguans.

(a) Art. 3. on equality before the law without distinctions of race, sex, economic positions or opinions.

(b) Art. 18 on the non-interference, arbitrary or illegal, in the private life of persons.

(c) Art. 19 on the non-application of coercive measures that can lessen freedom of thought or conscience.

(d) Art. 31, No. 1 on freedom of assembly and association of persons.

4. For us special attention is deserved by the blackmail that these groups carry out with the rationing of basic products with which they try to subjugate by hunger all citizens who do not share their political interests; this strategy constitutes a violation of Art. 38, No. 2, which says: "Eradication of chronic malnutrition, insuring sufficient availability of food and a fair distribution of the same."

PERMANENT COMMISSION ON HUMAN RIGHTS OF NICARAGUA (CPDH)—REPORT ON PRINCIPAL DENUNCIATIONS MADE IN JUNE 1984

MISSING

Gregorio Gonzalez Garcia, 42, farmer with domicile in the Buena Vista District, jurisdiction of San Juan Rio Coco, department of Madriz. Since April 29, 1983, his whereabouts has been unknown, his family inquired at the jails of La Barranca and La Chacara in Esteli, and in the latter were told by a soldier that the prisoner was on the list of prisoners, but that they could not see him because he had been transferred to Zona Franca, where his family went without obtaining any positive results. The CPDH made efforts before the Penal Prosecutor's Office and Zona Franca without succeeding in determining so far where he is to be found.

Jose Luis Huete Rivas, 24, businessman with domicile in Rio Blanco, department of Matagalpa. On April 20, 1984, he was apprehended on Km 22.5 of the highway to Masaya. According to information received by his family from Mr. Sixto Ulloa, official of CEPAD, at the moment of his apprehension he was taken to a jail of the city of Masaya and later transferred to Matagalpha, since he was a native of the region of the country. But in spite of efforts made by his family and the CPDH, it has not been possible to establish the place where he is being detained.

VIOLATION OF UNION RIGHTS

Benito Gomez Centeno, 33, in charge of the CTN for the northern region of the country. On June 2, 1984, he was apprehended in his house of residence by military soldiers of State Security, who informed his family that the apprehension was due to counterrevolutionary activities against the Law on the Maintenance of Law and Order and Public Safety.

In a visit that was granted to his brother on June 11, he was able to note: marks from intravenous injections on the left arm, incoherence in speaking, inability to remember known persons, difficulty in motor coordination as a result of maltreatment and the worsening of his old illness in the lumbar region of the spinal column. On June 20, 18 days after his arrest, he was presented by State Security together with the prisoner, Pedro Hernan Espinoza Sanchez (the fish), who involved him in his statements as a member of the Internal Front of the Counterrevolution. The Appeals Court of Managua declared inadmissible a writ of personal appearance filed in his behalf due to his health situation, adducing that no right of his is being violated and that under the state of emergency collective rights have priority over individual rights; in this way denying him the right to be attended by a physician.

Numan Calderon Arauz, 35, union leader of the CTN. On June 2 of this year, he was apprehended in his house of residence by members of State Security. Mr. Calderon Arauz since 1980 had been a victim of harassment by the military authorities of the Sandinista government and its related agencies. According to the official communique of the Ministry of the Interior his apprehension is due to "counterrevolutionary activities" against the Law on the Maintenance of Law and Order and Public Safety. On June 20 he was mentioned by a prisoner as a member of the Internal Front of the Counterrevolution. Since the date of his detention he has been in a state of no defense and without being remitted to a judge.

Humberto Ramon Lopez Lopez, adult, with domicile in Corinto, department of Chinandega and Secretary of Labor Affairs of the Union of Nicaraguan Seamen (SUMANIC), part of the CST /the Sandinista worker's union/, On June 15, 1984, he presented a formal denunciation of harassment that had been suffered by the members of Sumanic since May 10 of this year, the date on which they reported to State Security on the disappearance of Mr. Luis Ramirez Guevara, 60 years of age, work colleague, who they were providing with lodging in the union office. During the first week of June the military authorities apprehended as implicated in Mr. Ramiriz Guevara's disappearance union members Henston Garth Mitchel, Alonso Estrada Gomez and Armando Soza Palacio, their families not knowing the place of their detention. Due to efforts by CPDH it was possible to establish that the prisoners are in the jails of State Security in Leon, known as Quinta "YE" and they have obtained versions that Mr. Luis Ramirez Guevara showed up dead on a ship on which he was working. Although apparently the present case is of a common type, directors of the union have informed CPDH that their members have been pressured by elements of State Security so that they will withdraw from the International Transportation Federation, of which the union is a member.

VIOLATION OF POLITICAL RIGHTS

Oscar Antonio Flores Molina, adult, and of this domicile, member of Social Christian Revolutionary Youth. On May 22, 1984, he was apprehended by soldiers stationed at the Esquipulas Command in this department, when he was passing out propaganda flyers on the Social-Christian Party. While he was under detention he was tortured psychologically by the Sandinista policemen who put a revolver to his forehead, threatening him with the possibility of suffering an accidental death. He was released on May 24 on the condition that he report every week to the previously referred to headquarters.

On May 20, 1984, in the city of Boaco, military troops of State Security prevented the holding of an event of Social-Christian Revolutionary Youth.

On May 26 of this year, the mass organizations of the Sandinista Front Party of the Larreynaga barrio of this capital attacked the headquarters of the Social Christian Party, hindering through flames and with slogans the holding of a prayer vigil dedicated to Nicaraguan mothers; it was organized by the Association of Social Christian Mothers and Social Christian Revolutionary Youth.

On June 9, 1984, members of the mass organizations of the Sandinista Front Party, who were wearing military uniforms and carried regulation (M-16 and AK) weapons, broke into the central headquarters /Casa Central/ of the Social Democratic Party of Nicaragua, terrorizing and threatening those present, who were holding a seminar on political training.

The Nicaraguan Democratic Coordinator, denounced to the CPDH the anti-legal decision made by the National Council of Political Parties on June 12, 1984, which denied legal status to a faction of the Democratic Conservative Party, granting it only to the other. The decision of the CNPP constitutes a violation of the right to free political association of Nicaraguans and interference in the internal affairs of parties. It is in addition, a threat against the life of the democratic parties of Nicaragua, which could be victims of divisions brought about by the government.

VIOLATION OF RELIGIOUS RIGHTS

Luis Amado Pena, 45, priest of the diocese of this domicile, presented an explanation to the CPDH of Nicaragua in which he denounced the fact that on June 20 of this year an individual who offered to give him a ride asked him to hand over a suitcase to a man in the area of the Polideportivo Espana, it turning out that all of that was a trick by State Security and that the suitcase contained explosives which were filmed by television and that together with agents of that organization were hidden in said place, after the filming they simply ordered him to leave the place. That that same day the individual Pedro Hernan Espinoza was presented as a prisoner of State Security at a press conference, accusing himself of being the head of the internal front of the Nicaraguan Democratic Forces (FDN) and involving him and other members of the Political Parties of the Opposition and of the workers' organizations /independent ones/ of being involved in counterrevolutionary activities; although at said conference other prisoners were presented, only Pedro Hernan Espinoza was permitted to talk. In addition to that, at the same press conference a videotape was presented on which he appears participating in supposed counterrevolutionary activities.

Father Amado Pena states that he is being made a victim of a defamation campaign that at heart is attacking the Catholic Church in order to undermine the faith of the Catholic people and in addition an effort is being made to distract public attention from the serious problems facing the country, such as the persecution of youths who refuse to join the Patriotic Military Service (obligatory) and the problems in supplies in markets, in view of the new Consumer Protection Law. Father Pena currently has the seminary as a jail due to an order from the Ministry of the Interior, who accused him, found him guilty and sentenced the priest without a trial or defense.

Note: In the files of the CPDH of Nicaragua is a denunciation filed in March of 1983 by Carlos Huembes Trejos, National Leader of the CTN, in which he states that the individual Hernan Espinoza, a known State Security agent, of the zone of Las Mojarras of the department of Leon, was trying to involve him in counterrevolutionary activities.

SPECIAL CASES

Rolando Simon Membreno Gonzalez, 17 years old, domicile in the district El Bosque, jurisdiction of Posoltega, department of Leon. He was called to join the Patriotic Military Service, without the military authorities taking into consideration the strong nasal hemorrhage of a chronic nature from which he has suffered since he was nine years old. The youth Membreno Gonzalez asked permission to visit his mother who was ill, using this situation to take flight. Since then his family has been harassed by members of the Sandinista Popular Army, who once showed up at the house to carry out a search and who periodically show up to look for him, accusing his family of being reactionaries.

Lannie Eustes Flowers Kayla, Luis Padilla Hector, Steva Darlin Garth Wilson and Trino Paterson Albert, all adults, Nicaraguan citizens from Corn Island in the Department of Zelaya. On April 9, 1979, they set sail from Corn Island on the lobster boat "Lady Albina No. 1," towards the island of San Andres, their fate or location being unknown to this day.

Mr. Letio Own, who traveled to San Andres to carry out investigations aimed at establishing the whereabouts of the boat and crew, informed their family members that he had received a report that the crew had been the victim of a kidnapping perpetrated by two American drug traffickers; the reason why from that point on they were considered missing.

In December 1983 they were informed by Mr. Demry Dixon Carlos, who was studying in the Republic of Cuba, that all of them were being detained in one of the jails for foreigners located in the Province of Boyeros of the previously mentioned republic. Their families have made efforts before Commander Lumberto Cambell, who forwarded the documentation relating to the case to the Cuban Embassy in Nicaragua, where so far they have been given no report on those detained.

Maria Del Carmen Navarro de Herrera, adult, of this domicile. President of the Small Businessmen's Association of basic grains of Managua (ACOPROBAMA). On June 20 of this year she was apprehended in her house of residence by members of State Security, who carried out a search whose basic goal according to what they said was the search for weapons; they seized folders and documents of the Democratic Conservative Party.

State Security apprehended that same day Hugo Lau Arguello, Maria Jose Hernandez Mora, Lila Lopez and Elba Quintanilla. The apprehension of all these people was due to the invitation made by Eng. Dionisio Marenco, Minister of Commerce, to explain to the associations in ACOPROBAMA at the Mexico Theater, the scope and repercussions of the recent Consumer Protection Law, which was the object of ill-intentioned speculations by the mass organizations of the Sandinista Party.

Mrs. Blanco Rueda and others persons belonging to ACOPROBAMA were accused of carrying out ideological diversionism, being released by State Security on June 24, 1984.

Silvio Robelo Ortiz, adult and with this domicile. On January 10, 1983, he was apprehended by State Security, being transferred to the jails of El Chipote, where he spent 33 days under investigation.

During the first 12 days of his detention he was not given food in order to force him to sign a statement that they already had prepared, the reason why he had to be hospitalized in the Alejandro Davila Bolanos Hospital with a colitic ulcer being diagnosed. Again in El Chipote his food was suspended, and he was subjected to intense interrogations in which he heard simulated torturing applied to his wife and daughter, in this way agreeing to sign the previously-mentioned document.

On February 12 of the same year he was transferred to the Zona Franca and was put under the orders of the Anti-Somocist People's Courts on June 8, five months after his arrest. He was accused of organizing hunger strike in the jail in July 1983, which was controlled with excessive violence by the military, which led to his being put in a punishment cell. Later he was transferred to Cell No. 5, gallery No. 3, on the upper floor of the Model Jail of Tipitapa, where he was also placed in a punishment cell in April 1984; Mr. Robelo Ortiz is currently in bad health serving a 30-year prison sentence.

Roberto Jose Valle Gonzalez, 26, doctor, domicile in Masaya, who was providing professional services at the Health Center of Sumubila, a Miskito settlement in the department of Zalaya. On April 16, 1984, he was kidnapped together with other persons, by counterrevolutionary bands who attacked said village, supposedly taking them toward Honduras.

The CPDH has made efforts before the International Red Cross Committee in Honduras, the U.H. High Commissioner for Refugees, and before the Honduran Red Cross, trying to establish his whereabouts, without so far having obtained positive results.

PERMANENT COMMISSION ON HUMAN RIGHTS OF NICARAGUA [CPDH]—PRINCIPAL DENUNCIATIONS OF JULY 1984

1. Roger Antenor Espinoza, 17 years of age, of Miskito origin, reservist in the 70-11 Battalion, with domicile in Tuabe, Puerto Cabezas, department of Zalaya. On July 19, 1983 he was apprehended together with 30 comrades of the same battalion; since that time the place where he is to be found is unknown. According to what has been confirmed, 11 of those apprehended were sent to the Zona Franca at the orders of the Army Office of the Military Judge Advocacy and they were released in virtue of the Amnesty Decree of December of the same year. The CPDH has carried out efforts before the Ministry of Defense, the Army Office of the Military Judge Advocacy, the Reconstruction Junta of Puerto Cabezas the one in charge of the 70-11 Battalion in Bonanza, without being able to determine his whereabouts.

2. Pablo Jiron Jarquin, 33, watchman, with domicile in Managua. On July 21, 1984 he was apprehended by eight armed civilians at the house of a neighbor in the Georgino Andrade barrio of this capital, his whereabouts being unknown since that time. His family has made efforts at the substations No. 6 and No. 8 of the Sandinista Police, Palo Alto and State Security, where they have systematically denied to them that he is being detained. It is presumed that his captors were members of State Security since the vehicles in which Mr. Jiron was detained had a state license plate and a sign that said "State Property." Mr. Jiron Jarquin, at the time he was detained, was convalescing from surgery he had had as the result of a duodenal ulcer in May of this year. Therefore, and based on the circumstances surrounding his apprehension, the CPDH presumes that he is detained in El Chipote so that on July 25 it sent a telegram to Lt. Oscar Loza, Chief of State Security Operations, asking for his transfer to a hospital center in order to prevent irreparable damage to the prisoner.

DEAD

1. Silvia Ocamp Amador, 23 years old, her son Elder Jose Aguilar Ocampo, 7 years old, and her mother-in-law, Maria Auxiliadora Diaz Garcia, 60 years old, with domicile in Santo Tomas, department of Chontales, were seeking a ride at the junction of the highway to Boaco on July 18 when Mr. Jose Santos Hernandez passed by there, offering to take them. He was driving a red truck belonging to the Ministry of Health, which her mother and son got onto the back of. When they passed by the place known as Los Cocos, jurisdiction of San Lorenzo, in the department of Boaco, they heard a shot by two subjects who were dressed in Sandinista Police uniforms, the child, Elder Aguilar Ocampo, being wounded. For fear that they would kill all of them, they did not stop and headed toward the Health Center of Tecolostote, where they were unable to get medical attention because the child had already died since the bullet had struck him in the head. On July 23, his mother filed a formal denunciation in the Office of Police Prosecution of the city of Boaco, criminally accusing the soldier identified with the name of Enoc Rios Obando, being informed by the one in charge of the investigation that the case would be taken to the Office of the Military Judge Advocacy of the Army in the city of Juigalpa, department of Chontales. The soldier referred to also stated that the true guilty one was Mr. Hernandez Lopez, the driver of the vehicle in which they were traveling, and that he is currently being detained for not having heeded the call of the soldiers.

2. Mr. Domingo Gamali Salazar Fornos filed a complaint concerning the death of his brother, David Salazar Fornos, 20 years of age, electrical mechanic with domicile in Tipitapa, which occurred on July 13 of this year at the hands of members of State Security in the following circumstances: That day, Domingo Gamali Salazar Fornos and his uncle Leonardo Salazar Gonzalez, who lives in Tisma, in the department of Masaya, appeared at the school of that locality, where they were holding a meeting of parents with children in the Patriotic Military Service and local authorities; Mr. Leonardo Salazar Gonzalez used the opportunity to bring up the problem of his son who has been called on to serve military service even though he is ill, but by every reply he was accused by a member of the CDS of being a counterrevolutionary of the Conservative Party. Immediately after said meeting, Mr. Salazar Gonzalez was detained and Domingo Gamali Salazar Fornos managed to evade detention thanks to the support of the participants.

That same day at approximately midnight, six soldiers, two of which were dressed as civilians, showed up at the house of David Salazar Fornos, brother of Domingo Gamali, at the Tipitapa Mill, and forced him to show them the house where the latter was; once in said house David warned his brother that they were coming to look for him, so that he received a bullet in the stomach, later being taken to an unknown destination on a truck of the Nindiri Municipal Junta.

David Salazar Fornos was found by members of his family on Sunday, July 15 in the Manolo Morales Hospital and Managua and strangely enough showed another bullet wound in his chest. He died that day at approximately midnight. Domingo Gamali Salazar Fornos appeared to make a statement on the facts to the police command of Tipitapa and was threatened with death if he expounded the case to the CPDH or the press.

MALTREATMENT OF PRISONERS

1. Jorge Francisco Rios Lopez, 28 years of age, sergeant of the now defunct National Guard, currently a prisoner in the Model Jail of Tipitapa serving an 18-year-sentence which was imposed on him by the Special Courts of Justice. Together with five prisoners he is the object of unjustified transfers to jails of State Security known as El Chipote, where they are subjected to long interrogations, in order to make them waver in their demands for better treatment both for them and those who visit them.

On July 6 of this year, 2nd Lt. Jorge Rostran, in charge of the National Penitenciary System, sent a summons to the family members of those prisoners where he granted them a special visit, allowing them to take more food than what is stipulated in the regulations. During the meeting with the families, the prisoners said that they were being pressured and threatened for demanding their rights, refusing to receive the food supplies because with that an effort was being made to make them seem like privileged persons and expose them to possible physical attacks by the other prisoners.

2. Luz Marina Flores Rodriguez, 18 years of age, resident of the Jonathan Gonzalez District of this capital. According to testimony presented by father Florentino Herranz Ruiz, parish priest of the San Francisco Church of Managua, to the CPDH, on May 5 of this year, she was apprehended by two members of the Sandinista Police who took her to an abandoned house near the lagoon of Jiloa, where they abused her person; the reason why she was hospitalized at the Alejandro Davila Bolanos Hospital. Later, being under detention, she was transferred to a military base in Ciudad Sandino, where she remained for two days. She was released on May 13, 11 days after her apprehension since there were no charges against her.

VIOLATION OF RELIGIOUS RIGHTS

1. (84-7-042). Florentino Herranz Ruiz, adult, known as Rafael, Catholic priest of Spanish nationality, parish priest of the San Francisco de Asis Church of this capital. On Sunday, July 8, 1984, during his homily he denounced before his congregation the violation of the rights of two members of the community: Luz Marina Flores Rodriguez, a young resident of Jonathan Gonzalez Barrio and Tomas Gomez, organist of the parish, who, due to his religious activities was physically attacked by two persons unknown near Mi Preferida Radio. A police patrol that showed up took him together with his assailants to the substation of the Central America colony where he was released together with one of his attackers and without a statement on the events being taken.

At the end of the Eucharist celebration, Father Herranz was approached by a young girl who identified herself as the secretary of Commander Tomas Borge, accusing him of carrying out political activities by denouncing events such as the ones he had denounced without having enough proof. After this incident he was called on July 11 of this year, by Lt. Elear Rodriguez, Chief of the Police Prosecution Department, to appear before Commander Walter Ferreti, who repeated the accusation made by the secretary and sent him to the offices of Police Prosecution.

On July 17 he was again summoned, this time to House No. 50, where Lt. Oscar Loza, Chief of Operations of State Security, told him that he would be expelled from the country if he continued sticking his nose into politics and immediately after that he was photographed. Father Herranz fears that these events, added to the constant harassments that he has suffered since October 1983 from members of the so-called Popular/People's/Church, are manipulated by the authorities of the Sandinista Government in order to justify his eventual expulsion.

VIOLATION OF UNION RIGHTS

1. Sergio Antonio Castellon Gonzalez, adult, driver on Route 114, member of the union of Drivers of Urban Transportation (Simotur), member of the CTN. He was detained in the central office of the National Bus Company (ENABUS) on July 14, 1984, by two of his working companions who are militiamen. The event occurred while he was distributing flyers in which Cimotur was calling its members to a meeting to inform them of the state of the claim filed by labor back in March 1983 due to nonpayment of the seventh day. He was taken to the "Command Post" where he was interrogated by Mr. Guillermo Zapata, Director of Operations of the company, after which he was released.

2. Isidro Arbuzu Ocon, 40, and Daniel Leiva, 42, union members of the CTN, domicile in the region of Las Mojarras, department of Leon. On July 18, of this year, they were apprehended by military troops of State Security, being released the same day after having been threatened and intimidated to give up their union activities in the Mojarras zone.

3. Jose Altamirano Rojas, adult, domicile in Managua, Asst. Secretary General of the CTN. He was recently mentioned in public and televised statements of prisoners Luis Mora Sanchez and Pedro Hernan Espinoza, who implicated him in supposed counterrevolutionary activities. According to Altamirano Roas, those accusations constitute a virtual threat of apprehension with which an effort is being made to end his union activities and terrorize the political leaders of the opposition so that they will leave the country.

VIOLATION OF POLITICAL RIGHTS

1. Nicolas Ochos Gomez, Napoleon Tabora Garrido, Justo Mendoza Mendoza, Emilio Cabrales Novoa. All adults, members of the Social-Christian Revolutionary Youth with domicile in El Viejo, department of Chinandega. They were apprehended on Monday, June 25, 1984 by military troops and taken to the jails of State Security known as Quinta Ye in the department of Leon, where they are accused of painting political graffiti. They were released the next day.

PERSONS LOCATED

1. Estanislao Cano Castillo, 70, farmer, domicile in the Los Mojarras region, department of Leon. On June 29, 1984, he was apprehended by members of State Security at the San Pedro Hacienda. According to his family, his apprehension follows suspicions concerning his son Bonifacio Cano Mayorga, presumably involved in counterrevolutionary activities. On July 11 of this year he was found in the jails of Security in Managua, known as El Chipote, where he was visited by his wife, Isidra Mayorga Obando, who at the end of the visit was subjected to an intensive interrogation; she fears for the health of her husband, since he is a cardiac patient.

2. Ricardo Moreno Perez, 33 watchman, domicile in Managua. On June 11, 1984, he was reported missing by his family before the CPDH. The Public Relations Office of State Security on repeated occasions denied his apprehension both to his family as well as to officials of CPDH, who finally found him in El Chipote on June 14. He is currently a prisoner in Zona Franca.

3. Jose Luis Huete Rivas, 24, businessman, with domicile in Rio Blanco, department of Matagalpa. On April 20 of this year he was apprehended on KM 22.5 of the highway to Masaya. On July 11, 1984, officials of CPDH were informed that the previous day he had been transferred to Zona Franca under the order of the Anti-Somocist People's Courts.

KIDNAPPED BY COUNTERREVOLUTIONARY FORCES

1. Lombardo Jose Monge Marin, 22, student with domicile in Masaya. On April 28, 1983 he joined Battalion 19-66 of the Sandinista Popular /People's/ Militias, being mobilized to the Atlantic Coast in the department of Zelaya. His family members were informed by military authorities on June 18 of the same year that he had been kidnapped by counterrevolutionary bands after combat in the sector of Perlas Lagoon.

In March of 1984 he called his family from San Jose, Costa Rica, telling them that he had escaped his captors and that officials of the Embassy of Nicaragua had refused to give him refuge, using budgetary reasons. His family made efforts in the Ministry of Foreign Relations of Nicaragua, being attended by Dr. Luis Manuel Perez, who finally informed them that he had forwarded the case to the General Office of Migration and Aliens, where it is currently being followed up.

2. Ronald Benavente Corea, 33, watchman, domicile in La Concordia, department of Jinotega. When he was returning from El Cua Hill, on a truck in the company of 24 persons more, on December 23, 1983, he was kidnapped together with the driver and taken to Honduras.

The efforts made by officials of the CPDH with Juan Jose Ubeda, Delegate of the Ministry of the Interior for Jinotega and Matagalpa, as well as before the High Commissioner of the U.N. in Honduras and the Honduran Red Cross have been fruitless.

Note: The denunciations presented to this office are truthful according to our understanding and are supported by properly signed denunciations and testimonies.

CPDH does not seek to justify or defend persons who have committed crimes; however, it believes that all Nicaraguans have the right to the minimum legal guarantees so that true justice will be served.

PERMANENT COMMISSION ON HUMAN RIGHTS OF NICARAGUA [CPDH]—PRINCIPAL DENUNCIATIONS IN AUGUST 1984

DEAD

1. 84-07-050. Andres Mejia Jiron. 30 years old, single, farmer with domicile in Jinotega. On March 10, 1983, he was detained and taken to the jails of Jinotega, being transferred to the Central Command of Matagalpa and then to the construction of the Penitentiary System known as Waswali in Matagalpa; he was accused of robbery and would be released June 15 of this year. But on June 10 of this year, when his sister Flora Mejia arrived to visit him, she was informed that he had died in "an effort to escape," without more details being given.

She has asked the authorities of the penal center to at least tell her where the body was buried and for the few personal possessions of the prisoner to be returned to her, but so far she has not received any reply.

CPDH presented the case to the Legal Department of the Ministry of the Interior of Matagalpa, so that an investigation would be begun to determine the circumstances of his death and his family members would be notified of the place where the body was buried.

2. 84-08-065. Demetrio Benedicto Artola Sanchez, 40 years old, single, farmer, domicile in the region of La Ceiba, jurisdiction of Villa El Carmen, in this department of Managua.

On August 18 of this year, about 9 a.m. three members of the Voluntary Police Department of Villa El Carmen showed up at the house of his brother Jose Angel Artola Sanchez, of the same domicile, searching for him, and identified as Rafael Fonseca, Domingo Chavarria and Domingo Perez, and a civilian, who accused him of having participated in a robbery and they coerced him to accompany them; they also accused him of being a member of the Conservative Party; he argued that he had to work and that he didn't have anything to do with any robbery and turned around to head for work and when he had gone a distance of about 8 meters, the soldiers fired several bursts against him, several bullets hitting him, which caused his death three hours later.

The CPDH has addressed the Ministry of the Interior requesting an exhaustive investigation of that case.

MISSING

1. 84-8-056. Alejandro Sotelo Mora. 32 years of age, farmer, domicile in Boaco. He was apprehended by members of State Security on August 21 of this year, while he was working on a farm near Rio Blanco. He was supposedly taken to the Commando of Rio Blanco, department of Matagalpa, and since that date the place where he is has been unknown.

His family has had reports that he is in the jails of State Security of Matagalpa, but both in this and other jails of Region VI they have been refused.

CPDH placed before the Appeals Court of Matagalpa a formal writ for personal appearance in his favor and of other prisoners who are missing.

VIOLATION OF RELIGIOUS RIGHTS

1. 84-8-002. Allan Delgado Useda, adult, Catholic priest, parish priest of the Santa Ana Church of this capital. On Sunday, June 17 of this year, while he was celebrating Holy Mass, he was interrupted by subjects who made fun of his prayers and who, penetrating to the center of the temple, shouted Sandinista slogans, so that the parishioners proceeded to expell them. Later, a youth who particpated in the expulsion of said individuals was apprehended by a Sandinista Police patrol, which was near the church.

Father Allan Delgado, since July 9, 1984, has been the victim of anonymous calls in which he is threatened with the publication of a prefabricated video cassette in which he is involved in supposed immoral acts. Currently his mother's house, where prayer groups are held, is under surveillance by members of the Sandinista Defense Committee and they term the participants as counterrevolutionaries.

THREATS OF APPREHENSION—ARREST

1. 84-08-016. Pedro Martinez Loaisiga, 50 years of age, watchman of the Higher Council of Private Enterprise (COSEP), with domicile in the Acahualincas residential district of this capital. At the beginning of July of this year, he was called to the police station located on Quinta Isabel in Acahualinca, where he was interrogated about the Patriotic Military Service being fulfilled by his children, it being proposed that he collaborate with State Security by handing over the keys to the COSEP office. After this incident he was again summoned; however he did not show up for the appointment.

On Tuesday, July 26, when he was returning from work, he was apprehended by two agents who took him to the Police Substation No 2. where some soldiers with the last names of Benavides and Nunez, identified as members of State Security, threatened him with 15 years of prison if he did not collaborate with them by handing over the keys to the offices. The soldiers referred to above on repeated occasions have called him to various places of the capital, the last time to House No. 50 of State Security on August 2 of this year.

CPDH has presented the case before the Complaints Department of the Ministry of the Interior so that the rights of this citizen will be respected.

2. 84-08-832. Jose Manuel Urbina Lara, 23 years of age, student of Law at the Central American University and with this domicile. Together with six classmates he was apprehended by members of State Security on November 12, 1983, being kept in the jails of Chipote where he was investigated for supposed counterrevolutionary activities; later he was transferred to Zona, obtaining his release December 12 of the same year.

The youth Urbina Lara went back to his studies, telling his family that he was being harassed by the members of Sandinista Youth 19th of July at the University. On June 23, 1984, two persons from State Security showed up at his house of residence, carrying out a search and asking for him; since that time he has fled from fear of being recaptured.

His father, Luis Urbina Chavez, and his brother, Luis Coronado, and sister Maria Elena were stopped by members of State Security on July 27 while they were riding in their vehicle near the colony Central America, being taken to Chipote, where they were investigated separately for four consecutive hours. His brother, Dr. Luis Coronado Urbina, was subjected to humiliating treatment, being forced to do exercises completely nude while he was being interrogated.

VIOLATION OF UNION RIGHTS

1. 84-08-037. Juan Mercado Samuria, adult, Union Advisor of the CTN, domicile in Granada, is being harassed by members of the mass organizations of the Sandinista Front, headed by Justino Diaz, in charge of the zone and two leaders of the Association of Workers of the Country-side of the region of Mombacho in the Department of Granada. On July 25 and August 14 of this year, these individuals came to look for him at San Emilio Hacienda, located near the volcano Mombacho, scaring the workers with shots in the air and throwing insults at the CTN.

Military troops of the Sandinista Police have dedicated themselves to investigating their union activities in the community of Guanacaste, with the evident intention of terrorizing the workers who are members of CTN.

CPDH as sent a communication to the Delegate of the Ministry of the Interior in Region IV, requesting guarantees for the workers' leader and respect for his union activities.

MALTREATMENT OF PRISONERS

1. 84-08-057. Wilmer Nazario Castro Mendoza, 27 years of age, was apprehended on September 20, 1979, being sentenced by the Special Courts of Justice to a sentence of 30 years. Mr. Castro Mendoza suffers from cardiovascular disturbances, having been prescribed medical treatment by members of the Red Cross, but the military refused to give it to him, which led him to go on a hunger strike demanding said treatment.

The military authorities of the Model Prison where he is currently serving his sentence have him punished in a special cell for prisoners with tuberculosis.

On August 28 of this year CPDH filed writ of assistance in his favor demanding the cessation of the repressive measures taken against him.

VIOLATION OF POLITICAL RIGHTS

1. 84-08-018. Marlon Madriz Mayorga, 20 years of age, worker, with domicile in Managua, since October of last year has worked as a cloth cutter for the National Clothing Company (ENAVES). His political militancy in the Democratic Social Youth has earned him the adversion of the members of the battalion of Militias 50-19 of the company for which he works, and he is constantly accused of being a counterrevolutionary and ideological diversionist. The previously mentioned soldiers tried to attack him physically on July 17 of this year, the reason why he denounced the act before the authorities of the Democratic Social Party, who gave him coverage in the daily La Prensa the 31st of the same month. Since that date the harassment and threats against him have increased. He was recently called on to enter Patriotic Military Service.

Note: The denunciations presented to this office are truthful according to our understanding and are supported by properly signed denunciations and testimonies.

CPDH does not seek to justify or defend persons who have committed crimes; however, it believes that all Nicaraguans have the right to the minimum legal guarantees to see that true justice is served.

PERMANENT COMMISSION ON HUMAN RIGHTS OF NICARAGUA (CPDH)—REPORT OF SEPTEMBER 1984—PRINCIPAL DENUNCIATIONS IN SEPTEMBER 1984

TORTURING AND MALTREATMENT OF PRISONERS

1. Hugo Torres Llanes, Manuel Lopez Bravo, Francisco Pizzi Perez, Justo Molina Gomez, Enrique Munguia Berrios, Denis Espinoza, Domingo Alonso Rivas, Marcial Gonzalez Loaisiga, Jose Daniel Centeno Gutierrez and Alfredo Hernandez, all of them sentenced by the Special Courts of Justice, were carrying out a sentence in the Model jail of Tipitapa and in October 1983 were transferred to the jails of State Security in Managua, known as El Chipote, where they still remain. Recently they have been receiving threats that, in case the military situation were to become more acute, they would be killed. They have also been threatened with being sent to clandestine jails so that their family members would not be able to see them. In these centers they are being subjected to new interrogations.

The CPDH has sent a communication to the Dept. of Complaints of the Ministry of the Interior so that these prisoners will not continue to receive discriminatory treatment and will be returned to the facilities of the penitentiary system to serve their sentence, as is established by law and the minimum regulations for the treatment of prisoners.

2. Uriel Algaba Delgado, Carlos Vargas Solis, Gustavo Robleto Sequeira, Miguel Davila Largaespada, Angel Castro Soza, Silvio-Garcia, Pedro Pablo Huete Torrez, Panfilo Cruz, Victor Manuel-Carmona, Jose Chavarria and Jaime Suarez Macis, are serving a sentence imposed by the Special Courts of Justice in the Modelo Jail of Tipitapa. On July 20 of this year at night they were subjected to torture consisting of blows by hands and kicks by the authorities of that penal center and then they were locked up in "punishment" cells that the prisoners call "extermination" cells since they were originally built for one prisoner. There they put six prisoners for 21 days. According to reports received by CPDH, the officials who mistreated the prisoners are: Angel Suazo, Octavio Flores, Julio Orozco, Guillermo Rodriguez and others with the last names Palaviccini and Figueroa.

MISSING

1. Julian Palacios Rosales, 45 years of age, married, farmer, domicile in Las Banderitas, jurisdiction of Rio Blanco in the department of Matagalpa. He was detained on August 5, 1983, in his house of residence and in the same district they apprehended four other peasants. Those who carried out the apprehension were militiamen stationed at Rio Blanco, who accused them of being counterrevolutionaries. They were taken on foot to the road from Copalar, where they were put in an Army truck and taken to State Security of Rio Blanco. There other peasants were released but not Mr. Palacios. The military refuses to explain his whereabouts to his family. On September 28 this year, the Permanent Commission on Human Rights of Nicaragua introduced a writ for personal appearance in the Appeals Court of Matagalpa, but this court so far has not taken any action.

2. Manuel Agustin Espinoza Gonzalez, 21 years of age, single, student and of this domicile, disappeared from his house in the residential district of Gadala Maria, on May 9 of this year, and his family has not been able to learn his whereabouts. He had been an escort of Eden Pastora, when he was in the Ministry of Defense. Days before his disappearance he stated to his family that he was being pressured and threatened so he would collaborate with State Security.

CPDH filed a writ for personal appearance at the Appeals Court of Managua in order to try to establish whether he is a prisoner.

UNION MEMBERS

1. Alvaro de Jesus Jimenez Salgado, 40 years of age, worker, of the industrial company Aceitera Corona and affiliate of the Central de Trabajadores de Nicaragua (CTN)/confederation of Nicaraguan workers/ for 11 years.

On September 15 of this year he was summoned to the Public Relations Office of the Headquarters of State Security of Managua, known as House #50, where he was interrogated for two and a half hours. Although the supposed motive of the appointment was that he was demanding in his work that he be paid extra wages, for September 15 (a holiday); during the interrogation he was asked about his union activities and his relations with the CTN. He was also asked about the relations and activities of his wife, Marta de Jimenez, who works for the independent newspaper La Prensa. Finally, they threatened to jail him if he continued union activities and that to ensure that he would not they would keep him under permanent surveillance.

2. Denis Lopez Arias, 32 years of age, single, fisherman and domicile in Casares, jurisdiction of Diriamba in the department of Carazo. He is a member of the Confederation of Union Unification (CUS), and as a member of a cooperative of fishermen has promoted that union organization; he is also a member of the Social Democratic Party.

In the middle of June of this year, two members of State Security showed up at his house and asked him about his relations with the CUS and they accused him of carrying out counterrevolutionary activities and being and instrument of the CIA, so that they proposed that he collaborate with State Security passing information on everything that CUS planned or did and in exchange he would receive a lot of money. In order to formalize his collaboration they would take him to State Security the next day. In effect, the next day the same members from State Security returned the next day but he was hidden at the house of some neighbors, where he saw them leave and for several days he remained sleeping outside of the house in order to prevent them capturing him at night because he had not accepted such an unworthy commitment.

On August 19 of this year, when a group of supposed members of the CUS occupied the facilities of that union organization, three State Security agents arrived to search for him but at that time he was not at home.

Approximately three days later a fisherman from a nearby community who is also a member of CUS, Jose Agustin Tellez, showed up at his house, and asked him to come to Managua to support those who had taken the CUS office and that were against the leadership of this organization, telling him that in that way his problems with State Security would end, since he (Jose Agustin) had been detained three days before and they had freed him on the condition or under the threat that he go to Managua to support those who took the office of CUS. He refused to go to Managua, saying that he would show up the next day.

Later he has had reports that they plan to detain him so that he has chosen to stay as little time as possible in his house and sleep on the coast, as if he had committed some crime.

The CPDH has received other reports which so far are confidential in which different members of the CUS in different regions of the country have been pressured by State Security so that they will support supposed members of the CUS who are bringing about fictitious divisions in the organizations.

VIOLATIONS OF POLITICAL RIGHTS

1. On September 13 of this year, a delegation of the Nicaraguan Democratic Coordinator headed by Dr. Arturo Cruz and Lic. Adan Fletes returned to the country after having met with five presidents of Latin America.

A bus in which members of the Social Christian Revolutionary Youth (JRSC) and which was headed to the headquarters of the CTN where there was to be a ceremony to receive the delegation was detained by members of the Sandinista police and they were taken to the police headquarters Ajax Delgado. The occupants of the bus were taken to an abandoned street, next to the headquarters, where soldiers in a number exceeding 25 surrounded the bus and threatened the youths with their weapons. Finally, the bus driver had his driver's license taken as well as the vehicle's traffic card.

That same day in the city of Chinandega military authorities prevented the departure of a bus that carried sympathizers of the Nicaraguan Democratic Coordinator to said ceremony. The explanation that the soldiers gave is that they were "carrying out higher orders."

2. On September 19 the Nicaraguan Democratic Coordinator held a peaceful meeting inside in the city of Leon, which was interrupted by a large number of fanatics known as "disburbers" but who are evidently led by soldiers in civilian clothes. They arrived armed with clubs and chains trying to physically attack those who were gathered, among whom there were women and children. The police limited themselves to giving protection to those gathered, ignoring the crime being committed by those who threatened the members of the Coordinator with death.

Later it was learned that in the schools and some state enterprises a free day was given so that the employees would go to demonstrate against said political opposition coalition.

KIDNAPPINGS

1. In the first days of September of this year, two activists of the FSLN, Ray Hooker and Patricia Delgado, were kidnapped by troops of the armed movement Democratic Revolutionary Alliance (ARDE), when they were piloting a small boat in the Perlas lagoon in the department of Zelaya.

Ray Hooker is a candidate for the Legislative Assembly for the Sandinista Front and Patricia Delgado is zone secretary of said political organization. Their whereabouts and physical condition are unknown.

PATRIOTIC MILITARY SERVICE (OBLIGATORY)

1. Carlos Alberto Flores Matamoros, 19 years old, single, domicile in Chinandega. He was called upon to comply with Active Military Service on December 26, 1983, remaining without any problem for the first four months and then later he began to have hallucinations, being fired at times, by imaginary things or he would wake up in the middle of the night shouting, as a result of nightmares. Therefore, he was temporarily transferred to his house of residence, where he continued with the same health problems and was able to sleep only with pills.

To the surprise and concern of his parents he was again taken to the military base known as Cosiguina in Chinandega, where his situation has worsened, since he suffers from headaches and frequent fainting as well as pains in the chest and fatigue.

In said base they have told his father that they will not release him until the Military Hospital of Managua decides, which is where they have come for consultation, but in that hospital center they refuse to grant him absence on the basis of illness. Currently CPDH is carrying out efforts so that he will be granted his definitive release in view of his state of health.

FOUND

1. Isidro Fernandez Orteza, 29 years of age, married, farmer, domicile in Rio Siquia, jurisdiction of Rama in the department of Zelaya, was detained on August 21 of this year, when he was working. He was put into a helicopter with an unknown destination. After that day his family looked for him in the different jails of the Chontales region, but without any results.

CPDH intervened with a writ of habeus corpus with which he was found in the jails of Matagalpa on September 11, of this year, being transferred to the jails of Chontales on the 14th of the same month.

2. Isacio Artica Lopez, 39 years old, single, mason and with domicile in Nindiri, in the department of Masaya. He was detained by State Security on July 29 of this year in the city of Nindiri when he was going to carry out a job. He was put in a white car and taken to an unknown destination. In spite of multiple efforts made by his family it was impossible to locate him.

He was found on September 17 of this year through efforts of CPDH in the jails of State Security of Jinotepe, in the department of Carazo, being released that same day. The authorities told him before freeing him that they had mistaken him for another person, but they did not explain why they refused to tell his family his whereabouts.

Note: The denouncements presented to this office are truthful according to our understanding and are supported by properly signed denunciations and testimonies.

CPDH does not seek to justify or defend persons who have committed crimes; however, it believes that all Nicaraguans have the right to minimum legal guarantees so that true justice will be served.

PERMANENT COMMISSION ON HUMAN RIGHTS OF NICARAGUA [CPDH]—PRINCIPAL DENUNCIATIONS OF OCTOBER 1984—DEATHS AND APPREHENSIONS

1. Claudio Garcia Sequeira, 44 years of age, married, farmer and with domicile in the La Mantequilla region, jurisdiction, Dept. of Rio San Juan. The first day of September of this year, the district was surrounded by more than 300 soldiers belonging to the Army, the Sandinista Popular Militias and the Special Troops of the Ministry of the Interior, under the command of Lt. Jose Murillo. Upon his arrival shots had been heard so that it is presumed that they were pursuing counter revolutionary elements. During the siege they came firing their weapons, and several residents of the district were on the road on horseback and on the way to cutting corn. Most of them ended up wounded, and Mr. Claudio Garcia Sequeira died.

Later they proceeded to apprehend several inhabitants of the district, among whom is Antonio Lanzas Morales, Mario Hurtado Gonzales, Leopoldo Ortega Zepeda, Juan and Wilfredo Calero Medina. Most of the residences of the district were searched and later residents detained, so that the inhabitants have had to flee to the mountains.

UNION MEMBERS

1. Ramon Mendieta Parrales, 56 years of age, married, fisherman and with domicile in the resort of Casares, jurisdiction of Diriamba, in the Department of Carazo, members of the Cooperative of Fishermen La Union, affiliated with the Confederation of Union Unification (CUS).

On September 5 this year, a member of the Border Guard Troops (TGF) of the site appeared at his house of residence to leave him a citation to appear before the police of Diriamba; on showing up he was detained, being told only that he was under the orders of State Security.

In the jail a man in civilian clothing who identified himself as State Security of the State of Jinotepe told him that he had to collaborate with State Security in a secret manner and they forced him to sign an "oath" that he was promising to be an informer. Later they gave him a political talk and explained to him that his man role was to see that the CUS separated from the Democratic Coordinator and he had to support some new leaders of CUS in order to change the board of directors of that group. Finally, he was threatened with death if he told anyone about what was happened and then he was released.

Since that day he has been forced to visit other members of the Cooperative of fishermen to give them "talks" on the need to change the leadership of CUS and he has been given money to mobilize a member of State Security that he only identifies with the alias of "Dorian."

2. We have received denouncements from different peasants of the domicile of the community of Tepano, Diriamba jurisdiction in the Dept. of Carazo; they are members of the Union of Peasant Workers (STC) of Tepano, an affiliate of the CUS. The peasants report that since the founding of the union they have been pressured by members of State Security, who state to them that CUS is promoted by the CIA and that it carries out counter-revolutionary activity. These pressures and threats became more evident after August 19 of this year on the occasion of a congress that CUS was to hold in Managua. Their houses of residence were "visited" by members of State Security of Jinotepe, who threatened them, telling them that they had to come to Managua to ask CUS to leave the Nicaraguan Democratic Coordinator. In view of the number of soldiers who came and due to the intimidating manner in which they appeared, the peasants found themselves obligated to attend that congress and appear as a group backing the supposed leaders that had taken over CUS and they demanded the withdrawal from that union group from the Democratic Coordinator.

PATRIOTIC MILITARY SERVICE

1. Ramiro Jose Toruno Carvajal, 18 years of age, farmer, domicile in Malpaisillo, Dept. of Leon. In February of this year he was notified that he had to render active military service, for which purpose he appeared in compliance with the law. Due to the intense exercises to which he was subjected, he often fainted without receiving medical attention, so that he decided to return home to be treated medically, which he did in March of this year, being examined by a private cardiologist whose diagnosis was that he was suffering from a coronary disease, with a deficiency of irrigation of the myocardium, in addition to hypertension, and therefore he could not be subjected to fatigue or emotional stress.

This opinion was in agreement with the one from the "Perla Norori" Health Center of Leon and both opinions were presented to the Zone Delegation of Patriotic Military Service in Malpaisillo, where they received it without comments.

On September 10 of this year, at the home of the youth, some soldiers appeared to summon him to appear before the command of the locality, supposedly for having beaten a person. When he appeared, he found himself in the same situation as 4 youths of the Patriotic Military Service who were detained.

Family members protested but were suppressed by members of the Sandinista Youth 19th of July and the Association of Workers of the Countryside (ATC) (both groups partisans of the FSLN).

The youths were transferred in two vehicles supposedly to the city of Leon, but since that day their whereabouts has been unknown.

2. Francisco Javier Aragon Espinoza, 24 years old, single, bus assistant, with this domicile, was detained October 2 of this year, when he was at Migration offices getting his passport to leave the country. He is accused of having altered his birth certificate to evade Patriotic Military Service; he is under the orders of Captain Daniel Pozo, in charge of Patriotic Military Service.

MISSING

1. Alfonso Gomez Pena and Oscar Cruz Tenorio, adults, single, farmers with domicile in the region of Los Santos, jurisdiction of Nueva Guinea, in the Dept. of Zelaya. They were detained by militia traveling through the place on October 1, 1984 when they were going to work in the district El Nispero. Since that time the family has not known where they are or the concrete charges against them, although at the moment that they were apprehended they were threatened for being counterrevolutionaries.

2. Medardo Manuel Lopez Gutierrez, 53, married, farmer, with domicile on Km. 16½ on the road to Masaya, was detained September 24 of this year in his house of residence by agents dressed as military and civilians, a family member was able to see him in the jails of State Security of the State of Jinotepe, but later has been refused in said jails and they do not say where he was transferred.

MALTREATMENT OF PRISONERS

1. The CPDH has received different and agreeing denouncements on the bad treatment that is constantly applied to prisoners who are serving sentences in the prison center of Tipitapa, known as Model Jail, especially the prisoners who are in Gallery #3, both upstairs and downstairs.

According to the latest denouncements the prisoners of said Gallery #3 have not been allowed to receive sunlight, for more than four months, which causes their skin to dry and hair to fall out, the food is completely lacking since they are only given a tablespoon of boiled rice or beans twice a day and the family members are only permitted 20 pounds of provisions every two months, so that the prisoners are normally hungry.

On October 16 of this year, the prisoners protested this situation and in reply received a tear gas bombing. Later an official of the Ministry of the Interior told them that in case the military situation in the country sharpened, they had the order to kill all prisoners.

SPECIAL CASES

1. Reyna Isabel Olivas Araica, 24 years of age, single, businesswoman and with this domicile. On September 18, of this year, a youth 17 years of age named Oscar Danilo Molinares Mora hid in her house; he was fleeing from an Army official named Adolfo Meza Meza who in a state of drunkenness wanted to kill him. Since said soldier did not find the young man he fired at the denouncer without managing to wound her in order to force her to tell him where the young Molinares had hidden. Later the soldier fired several shots toward the bathroom of the room with the consequent danger for the children of the house and the neighbors.

When the soldier left the youth went to hide in the quarters of a battalion of militiamen (located one block to the south and one up from the Santa Ana Church), but he went to search for him there with a pistol in hand, so that he had to leave, fleeing through the back patio in view of the impotence of the militiamen who could do nothing. Later the soldier continued to search for him in a military jeep, No. 098, olive green.

The members of the Sandinista Police of substation #2 of the neighborhood (Mons. Lezcano) showed up at the house of Mrs. Olivas Araica, but they only took facts, without doing anything to detain the drunk soldier who apparently has the rank of captain.

The CPDH has presented the case to the Military Judge Advocate's Office demanding an investigation of the facts.

2. Ruben Lopez Marcia, 41, single, farmer and with domicile in Diriomo in the department of Granada. He was detained on July 3 of this year by members of State Security of Jinotepe, accused of undertaking supposed counterrevolutionary activities.

On September 15 of this year they offered him his release if he agreed to become a collaborator of State Security and his work would consist of visiting various persons, both civilian and military, to learn their opinion of the government and also to offer them possible participation in conspiratory activities.

Since his mother was gravely ill he accepted said propositions and was released.

His mother died three days after he had been released and now he is being pressured to comply by becoming an informer for State Security, which he does not agree with. He fears for his life and his freedom.

3. Manuel Salvador Sequeira Centeno, detained in pavillion #2, of the penal center Heroes y Martires of Nueva Guinea, known as Zona Franca, was recently subjected to surgery on the left eye and was returned to his cell where due to prison conditions he runs the risk of losing his sight. In the same unsanitary conditions are more than 10 internees who are sick in the same pavillion without being transferred to assistance centers, with the subsequent danger of suffering irreparable damage. The authorities of the National Penitentiary System turn a deaf ear to these demands and the CPDH every day finds it impossible to appeal to that body, whose persons in charge have given orders not to receive our attorneys or to accept any correspondence.

NOTE: The denunciations presented to this office are truthful according to our understanding and are supported by properly signed denunciations testimonies.

The CPDH does not seek to justify or defend the persons who have committed crimes; however, it believes that all Nicaraguans have the right to minimum legal guarantees so that true justice is served.

PERMANENT COMMISSION ON HUMAN RIGHTS OF NICARAGUA—REPORT OF NOVEMBER 1984—PRINCIPAL DENUNCIATIONS IN NOVEMBER 1984

MISSING

1. Angel Candido Gonzalez Munoz, 19 years of age, farmer and with domicile in El Sapote, Madriz jurisdiction. He was detained by members of the Headquarters of State Security on April 19, 1983. He was driven to the Somoto command and later transferred to the jail known as "La Chacara" of the Esteli penitentiary system. For about a year approximately, the authorities of the penal institution have refused to give information to his family on the prisoner's whereabouts. Writs of habeus corpus have been filed with the court of that city and the Court of Managua; in both reports the executing judges insist that after searching for him in vain they did not manage to find the prisoner.

2. Jose Javier Amador Salazar, 19 years of age, married, solderer and with domicile in El Coral, Nueva Guinea jurisdiction. He disappeared from his home of residence on May 5, 1984. Two youths who were accompanying him showed up to report that they had been kidnapped by the contras in the colony La Esperanza, that they had managed to flee but that they carried off Jose Javier. His mother did not hear anything more of him until November 10, the day on which some of his family residing in Camoapa reported to her that her son had been wounded in combat in which Sub-Commander Enrique Schmidt died and that some soldiers had taken him to the house of his uncle, Francisco Salazar, where they had him that night and part of the morning. The youth was wounded in a leg, which was becoming gangrenous and they took him away headed for Boaco.

On November 15, his mother inquired at the State Security of Boaco and there they told her that the youth had been transferred to Managua. The CPDH filed a writ of habeus corpus for him but so far there have been no results. Some reports insist that the prisoner is in the military hospital but nobody is allowed to visit him.

TORTURING AND MALTREATMENT IN JAILS

1. Manfredo Balmaceda Calero, 57 years of age, Jose Joaquin, 36 years of age, Edgar, 29, and Juan Carlos Balmaceda Sequeira, married, farmers, with domicile in La Ceiba, Rama jurisdiction. They were detained on October 8, 1984 in their respective houses of residence by members of State Security. They were taken to jail by that group in the city of Rama, and later to the jail of Juigalpa, where they remained incommunicado for 30 days. During the detention they were beaten and handcuffed. Jose Joaquin was beaten to such an extreme that he remained unconscious for two days in jail.

2. The prisoners of the Buenos Aires Jail in the city of Rivas denounced to the CPDH the poor jail conditions existing in that detention center. The prisoners whose names we keep back in order to prevent reprisals, reported the lack of medical care; they state that there are Sandinista soldiers detained, with war wounds without anyone offering them any care.

They explain that the fact of sleeping on the floor as well as the lack of hygiene in the center is causing them serious illnesses. To this they add the disinterest that exists among jail authorities to turn them over to a judge or to free them.

3. Gabriel Villalobos Reyes, 36 years of age, single, farmer and with domicile in the community of Bijagua, San Pedro del Norte, Chinandega. He was apprehended December 23, 1982, by members of State Security and taken to a jail known as "El Zacaton." Later he was transferred to Quinta Ye in Leon, where he remained incommunicado for several months. In that jail they had him for two weeks without food and without permitting him water. Currently he is in Modelo Jail serving a sentence of the Popular Tribunals.

4. Fernando Villalobos Reyes, 38 years of age, farmer with domicile in the Bijagua Community, San Pedro del Norte jurisdiction of Chinandega. He was detained July 17, 1983 by members of State Security, who searched his house of residence, taking his money and some personal belongings. He was detained at the "Cinco Pinos" jail and then transferred to "Quinta Ye" in Leon. In that Security jail he was beaten savagely. He is currently in the penal center of Chinandega.

5. Marciano Martinez Osorio, 25 years of age, married, farmer and with domicile in Esteli. He was detained in Palacaguina by members of State Security, and transferred to the jail of that group known as "La Barranca." There he remained three and a half months, and then he was taken to the jails of the Penetentiary System of that city. The prisoner reported that while he was under State Security he was tortured. He was kept without food for periods of five days alternately. In the interrogations he was beaten with rifles of his captors and other times they put the tip of a bayonet to his neck, threatening to kill him. On one occasion they took him out of jail to do a mock execution. He is currently in Zona Franca and a trial is being carried out in the People's Courts.

PRISONERS OF POLITICAL PARTIES

1. Julio Ramon Montes Martinez, 28 years of age, single, office worker with domicile in Leon and leader of the Social Christian Party of Nicaragua. He was apprehended [2] in Managua, when he was headed for the national headquarters of his party. He is in Chipote at the orders of the Headquarters of State Security. So far he has been incommunicado. On December 26, 1983, Julio Ramon had been exonerated by the Council of State, obtaining his release before serving an eight-year prison sentence, according to the government, for violating the law on law and order. This leader had been taken up by Amnesty International as one of the main cases of political prisoners in Nicaragua. Again Julio Ramon Montes is facing his same persecutors.

2. Eduardo Jose Paredes Martinez, 23 years of age, single and with domicile in El Viejo, jurisdiction of Chinandega. He was detained on October 8 of this year by members of State Security, he was taken to "Quinta Ye," in Leon and currently is being held in Zona Franca. The youth Paredes Martinez is a youth leader of the Social Christian Party of Nicaragua and is one of the youths who remained detained after State Security apprehended several members of that organization in the city of Chinandega.

VIOLATIONS OF LABOR UNION RIGHTS

1. Alfonso Vasquez Molina, Director of the Union of the Oso Bottling Co, affiliated with the CTN. Since February of this year he was being pursued by persons unknown in a FIAT car, orange color. On Thursday, November 29, while he was walking in the area of the Los Ranchos Restaurant to the offices of the CTN, he was pursued by two individuals dressed in military uniform who were on a motorcycle, one of them proceeding to threaten Mr. Vasquez Molina with a pistol. Then they fled, without the person affected being able to recognize the subjects, due to the fear of the moment.

2. Medaris Acuna Jarquin, 26 years of age, secretary of Actas y Acuerdos acts and agreements/of the Federation of Democratic Workers of Nueva Segovia (FETRANS), affiliated with CUS. In February of this year she was detained together with other members of the Federation, by State Security agents of the State of Ocotal, due—according to what her captors said—to the fact that her union activities were an attack on State Security. She was released but before that she was threatened, being warned that if she did not quit the organization they would detain her again and would sentence her to two years in prison. Since that date all members of the Federation have been being watched constantly and interrogated on their union activities.

In the middle of August—days before the office of CUS was taken—Mrs. Acuna Jarquin has been pressured by State Security agents to sign her resignation from the Federation and to authorize the creation of another parallel group ready to attack CUS and slander its leaders.

[1] Accused of participating in a fire of the PROAGRO warehouse.

[2] For the fifth time Nov. 20, 1984.

VIOLATION OF RELIGIOUS RIGHTS

1. Father Rafael Jarquin C., parish priest of the Waslala Church. The event that we are going to describe occurred two years ago in the northern zone of the country; because of difficulty in obtaining the information, we are just now presenting this case so that it will be registered as one of the many violations of religious rights.

On Friday, May 14, 1982, near 12:30 at night, a group of soldiers of the Ministry of the Interior violently broke into the house of priest Rafael Jarquin in Waslala in order to take him away as a prisoner. The soldiers had a strong smell of liquor and when the priest resisted the apprehension he was beaten in the mouth, threatened with a pistol and held on the floor while he was grabbed by the neck. That same night of the detention, the soldiers informed him that they had 600 signatures of peasants who denounced him as a counterrevolutionary. The priest replied to them that he knew the way in which they had obtained that document, since several of the signers had already informed him that they had been called to some supposed conversations and at the end of them were all told that they should sign a letter of denunciation against the priest, and those who did not would be detained. Even with those clarifications the soldiers continued accusing him and said that he was responsible for the disintegration of the militias in that zone and guilty of the fact that father Pedro Dupy had been removed from the parish. He was taken to Matagalpa and handed over to Mons. Julian Barni, to whom the soldiers said, "Here we hand him over to you; we do not want to see him in Waslala again."

VIOLATION OF THE FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION

1. On Thursday, November 8, Lt. Nelba Blandon, Director of the Communication Section, the agency that is part of the Ministry of the Interior, called in journalists, radio directors and the manager of the daily La Prensa, to tell them of the new measures that would go into effect as of that date in the mass media:

Absolute prohibition against referring to the elections in terms that suggested fraud, abstention, manipulation or lack of trust in the electoral authorities.

Absolute prohibition against military news, except for the obligatory communiques from the Ministry of Defense, of the Interior and the Government Junta.

Absolute prohibition against publishing news that contains attacks against the government, the FSLN and the Revolution, by foreign persons or governments, especially the United States, and Prohibition against publishing news on labor conflicts and strikes.

This arbitrary decision contradicts what is stipulated in Art. 21 of the Statute on Rights and Guarantees of Nicaraguans and violates what is provided in the Emergency Law, which limits censorship only to subjects of defense and national security.

VIOLATION OF THE RIGHT OF FREE MOVEMENT

1. Beginning in the month of November the persons: Alvin Guthrie Rivers, Jose Espinoza Navas, Omar Baca Castillo, Santos Tijerino Jimnez, Luis Rivas Leiva, Jaime Chamorro Cardenal, Roberto Cardenal Chamorro, Carlos Holmann Thompson, Miriam Arguello Morales, Mario Rappaccioli Marquis, Enrique Bolanos Geyer, Nicolas Bolanos Geyer, Carlos Noguera Pastora, Orestes Romero Rojas, Frank Ley Lau, Juan Carlos Morales, Angulo, Juan Lopez Zele-don, Juan Ramon Aviles Molina, Francisco Caldera Lopez, Roger Guevara Mena, Azucena Ferrey Echaverry, Erick Ramirez Benavente, Roberto Rivas Reyes, Alfredo Montealegre Callejas and Jose Altamirano Rojas, all of them leaders of democratic organizations, businessmen, union members, professionals; their right as provided by the principle in the Pact of San Jose to freely leave the country has been violated, through the Migration and Aliens office through dilatory steps such as the following: invalidity of visas already issued, alterations in passports, retention of passports in the Migration office, tearing of pages in the passports, impediments of requirements not provided in the Migratory law, return from the airport, with the claim that higher orders are not to let them leave.

In accordance with the laws in effect, there is no justification for the Ministry of the Interior to restrict the freedom of movement among these citizens and such an arbitrary and illegal measure can only be attributed to an escalation of repression, both of them and the organizations that they represent, the only and true motive being the critical attitude that they maintain against the government party.

Note: The denunciations presented to this office are valid according to our understanding and are supported by properly signed denouncements and testimonies.

The CPDH does not seek to justify or defend the persons who have committed crimes; however, it believes that all Nicaraguans have a right to the minimum legal guarantees so that true justice will be served.

FEBRUARY 1985—DEPARTMENT OF STATE COUNTRY REPORTS ON HUMAN RIGHTS PRACTICES FOR 1984

A three-man junta—composed of one member of the Sandinista National Directorate, another high-ranking Sandinista member, and one pro-Sandinista Democratic Conservative Party member—served as nominal head of the Government of National Reconstruction throughout 1984. The Junta was formally terminated following the January 1985 inauguration of President Daniel Ortega and Vice President Sergio Ramirez, both former Junta members. Real political power continued to be wielded by the National Directorate of the Sandinista National Liberation Front, a group of nine Marxist revolutionary leaders who took control in July 1979. This body—of which the President is a member—controls policymaking in the Government, and to a large degree, implementation of policy through a parallel party-government structure.

The Sandinistas seized power in 1979, forming a coalition Government with broad popular support and promising to replace the discredited Somoza dictatorship with new social, political and economic systems based on the principles of pluralism, free elections, a mixed economy, and observance of human rights. In the ensuing five years, however, the Government has not fulfilled these promises. It has used intimidation and the restriction of basic human rights to consolidate the power of the Sandinista Front. Though elections were held on November 4, 1984, important sectors of the political opposition declined to participate because of the Government's failure to ensure conditions for a fair and free campaign. Repression and intimidation by government forces against the opposition political parties that did participate in the brief campaign further underscored the unfair nature of the elections.

The Nicaraguan economy is heavily agricultural. Its industrial sector (food processing and some light manufacturing) suffered heavily during the 1978-79 overthrow of Somoza and has yet to recover. Basic foodstuffs widely available in the past are increasingly scarce and subject to rationing. The Government has carried out a number of expropriations which have had a purely political objective. The increasingly state-managed economy, with pervasive controls on prices, credit, imports and exports, and sales of foodstuffs, combined wtih heavy military expenditures and an often capricious implementation of agrarian reform through expropriation, has negatively affected the middle and upper income groups while producing a decrease in living standards for the poor.

Nicaraguan society is divided into a large working class, composed basically of urban laborers and rural peasants, a small but important middle class, and a minute upper class. The population is overwhelmingly Catholic and the Church is a vigorous institution which serves as one of the country's most influential advocates of human rights. The Government has sought to reduce widespead illiteracy and has improved preventive health care for many Nicaraguans, though curative medicine has deteriorated.

The Government continued in 1984 to support terrorist groups in other countries of the region, notably in El Salvador. Honduras and Costa Rica protested Nicaraguan Army incursions and shellings of their territory. Throughout 1984, the Sandinista Government increasingly found itself fighting a civil war against anti-Sandinista guerrillas, which the Government called "counter-revolutionaries" or "contras" (terms used loosely by the Government to refer to guerrillas and anyone else it chooses to consider "subversive"). Government security forces reportedly tortured and executed persons suspected of assisting the guerrillas, while the Government accused the guerrillas of killing and kidnaping civilians. The Sandinista Army continued arbitrary and sometimes forced military conscription, prompting widespread dissatisifaction and several public protests by Nicaraguan mothers.

During 1984 the Government continued to tighten Sandinista control over Nicaraguan society and to intimidate the remaining opposition. The State of Emergency declared in 1982 remained in effect throughout 1984, although some provisions were modified. The Government continued to use Special Tribunals established outside the judicial system to try cases of suspected subversives. This denies the accused the better, though still flawed, legal protection provided by the regular courts. The Sandinistas continued to rely on organizations controlled by the Sandinista National Liberation Front, such as the ubiquitous "block committees," to help implement their policies at the local level and to exert control, instill loyalty and to identify and implement sanctions against suspected opponents. Using both its own powers and intimidation by Sandinista organizations, the Government systematically harassed opposition political parties, independent labor confederations, the private sector, the Catholic Church, and the independent media. The Government continued prior censorship of the print and electronic media, and cracked down with new vigor in this area after some relaxation during the 1984 capaign period. Sandinista block committees and other organizations frequently disrupted capaign rallies held by opposition political parties, contravening guarantees in the electoral law. The police often did not intervene to prevent such harassment or violence. Through both legal and extra-legal means, the Government continued to seize private property. The 10,000 Miskito Indians forcibly resettled from their Rio Coco homelands in 1982 continued to be prohibited from returning there. About 2,000 more Miskitos fled en masse to Honduras in April and May. There are continuing credible reports that the security forces have tortured and killed Miskito Indians and have confiscated or destroyed their food supply and property.

Two domestic human rights organizations operate in Nicaragua. The Permanent Human Rights Commission (CPDH) is an independent agency established in 1977. It played a key role in exposing human rights violations committed under the Somoza regime. After the Sandinistas came to power in 1979, the CPDH also publicized human rights abuses committed under the new Government. Since 1981, the CPDH has been subject to constant harassment by the Sandinista National Liberation Front, impeding its work but not silencing its voice. The Government founded the National Commission for the Promotion and Protection of Human Rights in 1980. The National Commission claims to be independent, but the Government appoints its members and funds its budget. It is the only organization permitted by the Government to file applications for pardon or to request the review of cases on human rights grounds. It is also charged with reporting incidents of human rights abuses to the proper authorities and promoting the observance of human rights within the Government.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1.—Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political killing

There is credible evidence that the military and security forces were responsible for the deaths of a number of detained persons in 1984. The CPDH documented six such cases, and it estimated that many more went unreported. The Government responded to these accusations by claiming some were "killed while attempting to escape" or "killed while resisting arrest," while others were allegedly guerrillas killed in combat. The CPDH also reported that military and police officials arbitrarily shot a number of suspected subversives. In one case three officials reportedly shot a mentally handicapped farmer who they claimed was a dangerous suspect, though they had no warrant and did not present any charges to the family. Displaced persons reported that military and security forces operating in remote areas summarily executed local peasants whom they suspected were anti-government guerrillas or their sympathizers, sometimes after physically mutilating them. In the section on Nicaragua of its 1984 annual report, the Inter-American Human Rights Commission of the Organization of American States stated, "concerning the right to live, human rights organizations have continued to denounce violations, especially in the forms of forced disappearances and as a result of the abuse of power by members of the security forces. The Commission has been able to verify that a large number of the denunciations referred to events that took place in the zones of conflicts."

The Government claimed that guerrillas killed around 1,000 civilians in 1984. Some civilians have died in the fighting between the Government and the guerrillas, although no reliable information is available on their number. Some reportedly died in guerrilla ambushes of government military vehicles carrying civilian passengers. The Government has charged the guerrillas with torturing and summarily executing prisoners. The guerrillas have denied that they target civilians and have asserted that the security forces' indiscriminate use of heavy artillery near population centers has caused civilian casualties.

On January 11, 1984, a Nicaraguan Army patrol crossed into Honduras and killed eleven Nicaraguan Miskito Indians—including three children—at Kiwastara. Honduras protested this and other Nicaraguan Army violations of Honduran territory, as well as Nicaraguan involvement in the infiltration into Honduras of Cuban-trained guerrillas in July 1984. Costa Rica protested several Nicaraguan violations of its territory, including Nicaraguan Army mortar attacks. There is credible evidence that substantial Nicaraguan support for the guerrillas in El Salvador continued to flow during 1984. El Salvador protested continued Nicaraguan material support for the Salvadoran guerrillas, documenting its charges in an August 1984 brief filed with the International Court of Justice.

b. Disappearance

The security forces often hold suspected guerrillas and subversives incommunicado indefinitely without notifying family members. In 1984 the CPDH documented 60 cases of disappearances in which security forces were implicated, but in which the Government would not acknowledge involvement. In some to those cases, though reported in 1984, the individuals had actually disappeared in earlier years. The Government for its part claimed the guerrillas kidnapped many civilians. It is widely believed that many of these alleged kidnappings may have been voluntary desertions to the guerrillas. Anti-Sandinista guerrilla forces took captive three Sandinista Front members, including Sandinista National Assembly candidate Ray Hooker, on September 5. The guerrillas released all three on October 30 in exchange for three prisoners held by the Government. During 1984, one guerrilla group turned over 54 captured soldiers to the Costa Rican Red Cross.

c. Torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment

In 1984 the CPDH continued to collect evidence of systematic physical and psychological abuse and torture. Prisoners were reportedly kept in cramped, dark cells and fed meals at irregular intervals in order to disorient them, ordered to use only their prison numbers and not their names, and subjected to physical abuse and to threats against their family. One prisoner claimed that food and medical attention were almost nonexistent, and that whatever supplemental foodstuffs were brought in through relatives were stolen by the guards. Another reported that he was kept naked in a cold cell with a ceiling so low he could not stand upright. Other reports alleged prisoners were suspended from the ceiling by their hands during interrogation. Prisoners also reported being beaten with chains, fists and gun butts. It was alleged that, as a form of punishment, one prisoner was placed in a cell with several tuberculoid prisoners. Cases of psychological torture were also frequently reported. Prisoners were forced to listen to the screams of those being tortured, then were told by security officials that the screams came from members of their families. One prisoner was told, falsely, that his family had been arrested by security officials, who forced the spouse to don prison garb. She and her husband were then allowed to see each other but not to converse. Reportedly, security officials physically abused and threatened alleged "subversives" and political suspects. Nicaraguans who fled of Costa Rica reported incidents of rape, torture and murder of children by security and military forces. In the case of Prudencio Baltadano, soldiers tied him to a tree and cut off his ears. Interior Minister Thomas borge admitted that some cases of physical abuse and killings of detained persons by security forces had occurred, but claimed the Government was working to resolve the problem. The National Human Rights Commission also stated that occasional individual abuses of authority had occurred, but insisted that those guilty had been found and punished.

On May 30, 1984, Amnesty International reported in a press release that it had "confirmed that some prisoners have been tortured or ill-treated in Nicaragua." Protests of ill-treatment from individual prisoners or domestic and international organizations have been followed by internal military and police discriplinary hearings, as well as public hearings by criminal courts and courts-martial against police and military personnel alleged responsible. Recent cases include a civil court trial of police officers of the City of Leon, for mistreatment of prisoners. In March a public hearing was held to consider a range of charges against a local military commander and 41 subordinates in the northern department of Jinotega. Sentences of up to the maximum 30 years' imprisonment were handed down in the cases of the commander and 12 others after conviction on a series of charges for abuses, including torture and murder, carried out during counterinsurgency operations in the area in November and December 1983.

In general, Nicaraguan prisons suffer from severe overcrowding. The Government allows the prisoners one visitor every two months and recently announced that those prisoners serving sentences of longer than 10 years would be allowed one visitor every three months. The visitors are allowed to bring food to the prisoners, but no food may be left with the prisoner after the visit. Although conditions are reportedly better in a few prison farms in the Managua area, the CPDH says that these prison farms are used for propaganda purposes and that the only prisoners allowed in them are those whose sentences are almost completed or who have collaborated with the authorities. The CPDH believes that prison conditions in general deteriorated during 1984 and alleges that prisoners' families feared reprisals if they requested reviews of cases or conditions. The CPDH also said that in 1984 it became more difficult to pursue appeals and other legal recourses. The International Committee of the Red Cross made periodic visits to the prisons, providing medical and nutritional assistance and seeing all the prisoners at least once every three months. During 1983 these visits were interrupted, but they resumed in early 1984. However, the Red Cross has not been given access to those detained in special state security facilities separate from the regular prisons. According to Catholic Church officials, priests are denied access to most prison facilities.

d. Arbitrary arrest, detention or exile

According to the Government, there were approximately 5,000 persons in jail, including about 2,000 ex-National Guardsmen or persons accused of cooperation with former President Somoza. The CPDH estimated 900 prisoners had been convicted for "subversive" activities and an additional 500 were being held pending charges.

The 1982 State of Emergency suspended those provisions of the Fundamental Statute promulgated by the Government in 1979 which granted detained persons the right to be held for no more than seven days without arraignment. Habeas corpus was also suspended in security-related cases. Both of these rights were partially restored on August 6, 1984. As anti-government activities increased in 1984, the security forces arrested hundreds of suspects under the Law of Maintenance of Order and Public Security. Open expression of dissent on occasion resulted in harassment or detention. Suspected guerrillas and "subversives" continued to be held in special holding facilities with no access to legal counsel or to domestic or international humanitarian organizations. Some were released after the completion of an investigation lasting from three to six months on the average, others were remanded to the special tribunals, and many simply remained in detention. In 1983 the Government declared that because of the security situation, some former National Guard members had to remain in custody even though they had completed their sentences and this practice continued in 1984. Others held on security charges also remained incarcerated after they had been exonerated or had served their sentences. Former Minister of Defense Bernardino Larios, charged in 1981 with plotting the assassination of Sandinista leaders, was held for three years until the Supreme Court overturned his conviction and ordered his release. Larios was held an additional 40 days before the Government finally honored the release order, and after his release, he was refused permission to leave the country and was subjected to other government-inspired harassment. The Inter-American Human Rights Commission's 1984 annual report called attention to, "numerous detainees holding release orders issued by a competent judge, but who are kept in prison for prolonged periods, with no reason given for the detention. Situations such as the above represent a violation of the right to personal freedom and to due process, and they must be remedied promptly to lend substance to the Nicaraguan Government's statements concerning the independence and authority of the country's judiciary. The Commission repeats, with respect to the right to a trial and to due process, that the remedy of habeas corpus or amparo may not be suspended as it has been in Nicaragua."

In 1984 the Government extended indefinitely the amnesty originally granted in December 1983 to Miskito Indians from northern Nicaragua and certain exiles and "counterrevolutionaries." Nevertheless, the CPDH documented the cases of 60 Miskito Indians who remained jailed in 1984. Notwithstanding the CPDH's repeated inquiries, the Government gave it only partial responses in 17 of the cases. In one case the Government claimed the prisoner had been released, but prison officials told relatives the prisoner had merely been transferred to another facility. Moravian Church officials claimed to know of an additional 24 Atlantic Coast residents being held in Nicaraguan prisons on political charges. In late 1984, the Government began talks with leaders of one of the Miskito Indian guerrilla groups.

The Government does not specifically exile dissidents. Many opposition leaders and activists have fled on their own, however, and fear they would be imprisoned if they returned. In a May 30, 1984 press release, Amnesty International reiterated its longstanding concern about the "detention of prisoners of conscience, deficiencies in trial proceedings, and limitations on the right of appeal to sentences handed down by Special Tribunals created to try some categories of prisoners." In its 1984 annual report, Amnesty International stated that, "Many supporters of legal political parties, trade union organizations, and other bodies opposing government policies were detained for questioning for periods ranging from several hours to over one month of incommunicado detention, before being released without charge. Amnesty International believed that a pattern of harassment emerged from the detention of trade union members and other suspected opponents of the government for short periods of questioning. Many such detainees subsequently reported being threatened that they would be detained again for prolonged periods under the Public Order Law if they did not assist the security forces or resign from certain lawful organizations."

The CPDH believes that the disappearances, noted in section 1b in which security forces were implicated, involve "a deliberate policy of keeping prisoners incommunicado and at the mercy of their captors, undergoing all sorts of physical and psychological abuse."

e. Denial of a fair public trial

Under the 1979 Fundamental Statute, the judiciary was to be an autonomous branch of government, an independence generally exercised in ordinary criminal cases. In cases where the accused was charged with "counterrevolutionary" or "subversive" activity, however, judges have routinely decided in favor of the prosecution. Nevertheless, some judges have continued to exercise limited independence. For example, the Supreme Court ruled in January that the conviction of former Defense Minister Bernardino Larios was improper, due to an absence of convincing evidence, and ordered that the prisoner be freed.

In April 1983 the Government established special "Popular Anti-Somocista Tribunals" to handle the rapidly growing number of cases of accused guerillas and "subversives." These tribunals, which became increasingly active in 1984, operate outside the conventional judicial system, and their decisions cannot be appealed to the regular court system. The members of the tribunals are selected from the tanks of Sandinista organizations, and only the president of each tribunal is required to be a lawyer. Persons tried in these courts have the right to counsel and to introduce evidence, but the tribunals are granted great discretionary powers in determining whether evidence is admissible and whether it is sufficient for conviction. The proceedings of the tribunals are declared to be open to the public, but in some cases attendance is restricted. Trials have reportedly been scheduled with little advance notice, limiting opportunities for the accused to prepare his defense. Often the prisoners, even after "confessing" to state security officials, have been held under investigation for three to six months before being suddenly brought to trial. Since all Special Tribunal cases are tried in Managua, witnesses who live in other areas of the country are hard-pressed to attend trials on time. In its 1984 annual report, the Inter-American Human Rights Commission wrote that, "The procedures followed by the Anti-Somoza Courts give rise to serious doubts with respect to observance of the norms that guarantee due process." According to the CPDR, during the first ten months of 1984 the tribunals had adjudicated the cases of approximately 620 prisoners, of whom about 90 percent were found guilty and sentenced to up to the maximum penalty of 30 years in prison. In one case a prisoner was sentenced to seven years, and upon appealing to another tribunal was sentenced to an additional eight years, reportedly for having made recourse to the services of the CPDH.

In 1984, as in past years, the Government made use of national television and radio to accuse suspected "subversives." In April, state security officials used this method to accuse a priest, a doctor and several members of an independent union of arms trafficking and sabotage.

f. Arbitrary interference with privacy, family home, and correspondence

The Government has developed an elaborate and effective security and intelligence network employing both government agencies, such as the security forces, and Sandinista party organizations, particularly the "Sandinista Defense Committees," to ferret out dissidents and suspected "subversives." The Sandinista Defense Committees, organized in most neighborhoods throughout the country, serve as a network of informers and as an instrument of pervasive political control and intimidation—they are self-described as the "eyes and ears of the Revolution." Participation in the Defense Committees is supposed to be voluntary. However, the Sandinistas employ many methods to entice or pressure individuals into joining, including Committee control over the distribution of ration cards for the purchase of basic products such as rice, beans, and soap. While many who do not participate in Sandinista activities suffer no ill effects, others are arbitrarily branded as politically suspect or are denounced by Sandinista activists as subversives. People who criticize the "revolutionary process" or its leadership may be subjected to pressure ranging from public ridicule and defacement of their homes by Sandinista mobs to loss of employment and even detention. There have been reports that members of the Sandinista youth group have denounced teachers for their political views, whereupon the teachers have been fired.

As the November elections approached, the Government made it increasingly difficult for citizens to remain neutral. Mobs composed of scores of Sandinista Front supporters demonstrated at the homes and offices of opposition figures, chanting slogans and threats, and defacing buildings with pro-Government graffiti. The mobs sometimes resorted to violence, vandalizing nearby cars, beating people, and disrupting opposition political rallies during the electoral campaign. Such mobs heightened the climate of fear in which critics of the regime lived and worked. The Government took no responsibility for these actions. It stated that it regarded them as "legitimate expressions of the popular will" and did not interfere to protect the rights of those victimized by them. In September, government agents closed several technical schools in Leon, transported the students to Chinandega, where they were directed against high school students, mostly female, who were marching in protest against the draft. A number of the girls were badly beaten. The Government also showed on occasion that it could stop such activity when it wished to do so. When several days of intense mob activity in September aimed at disrupting political rallies by opposition candidate Arturo Cruz focused wide international attention on the Government's use of such techniques, a subsequent opposition party rally took place with no interference whatsoever.

There are credible reports that under-age Nicaraguan males have been impressed into military services, including, in some cases, boys younger than 15. The Inter-American Human Rights Commission concluded in its 1984 annual report that, "On many occasions, young people who are ineligible under the very terms of that law that created the service have been drafted into it. Furthermore, it has been pointed out that this recruitment takes place not only for reasons of national defense but also as a means of political indoctrination of those drafted onto the ranks of the army. In November in the town of Chinandega, an estimated 3,000 young men were forcibly taken from their homes in handcuffs, during a massive forced conscription effort.

On December 24, 1984, government agents forcibly entered the Costa Rican Embassy and removed a Nicaraguan youth who had sought asylum there. Costa Rica vigorously protested this action.

The State of Emergency suspended the legal requirement for a search warrant. Police and state security officials regularly enter and search private residences. The Government opens private mail and intercepts both incoming and outgoing international mail. Officials inspect the baggage and personal effects of both arriving and departing international travelers and confiscate items of literature, including newspapers from neighboring countries alleged to be subversive.

In late 1981 and early 1982 the Government forcibly relocated about 10,000 Miskito Indians from their homelands to distant resettlement camps. During 1984 the Government refrained from further relocations but refused to permit those Indians already displaced to return to their homelands. Relocation camp residents are allowed to fish and hunt but are prohibited from using firearms unless they belong to the Sandinista militia. They reportedly cannot go more than two kilometers from their camps without government permission. Even their canoes, upon which they rely for their livelihood and transportation, must be registered with the Government. Residents are paid for agricultural work with food rather than money. There continued to be credible reports of food shortages and malnutrition in the resettlement camps during 1984. In its July 1984 "Report on the Situation of Human Rights of a Segment of the Nicaraguan Population of Miskito Origin," the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights concluded that, "hundreds of Miskitos have been arbitrarily detained without any formalities and under vague accusations of carrying out 'counterrevolutionary activities;' many of these detentions have been followed by prolonged periods of incommunicado imprisonment and in some cases the Commission has verified that illegal torture and abuse took place." The Commission also stated that, "With respect to the destruction of the homes, crops, livestock and other belongings of the Miskitos at the time of the relocation, Government officials themselves have recognized that these acts took place."

Section 2. Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Government continued to maintain prior censorship of both the printed and electronic media throughout 1984. The only independent source of news in the country is the newspaper La Prensa. Since 1979, independent radio news programs have gone off the air as a result of government censorship. Currently, all radio news programs, the two television channels, and two of the three daily newspapers either support or are controlled by the Government. The Government expelled a correspondent from the Spanish news agency EFE in March 1984. While there is no censorship of domestic or imported books, few books from the West are on sale in Nicaraguan book stores, which are stocked almost entirely with publications from Communist countries. Censorship of La Prensa in 1984 continued to be capricious and increased sharply by the end of the year. Government censorship cut articles ranging from reports on democratic leaders, the expulsion of 10 foreign priests, a conversation with government guest Jesse Jackson and Costa Rican visas. Though a July 19 government decree proclaimed that censorship would continue only on matters of national security, censorship in fact continued on internal political matters, economic problems, human rights, and many other non-security related issues. Shortly after this decree was issued, the Government informed private radio station owners that all radio news remained subject to prior censorship.

La Prensa editors estimate that between January and October 1984 the Government censored 20 percent of their stories on current national and international events. The paper did not appear on at least 14 occasions in 1984 in response to heavy censorship. Following the elections, the Government doubled its censorship of La Prensa, with an average of ten censored articles per day in November. A La Prensa photographer and a journalist were detained for several months for alleged "subversive" acts. La Prensa charged that the Government also continued to harass its distributors outside Managua. The Government continued to insist that the sermons of Managua Archbishop Obando y Bravo be submitted to censors at the Ministry of Interior prior to live radio broadcast. The Church has refused to do this, and the Archbishop's sermons are no longer heard live on the radio, although they are printed in La Prensa and subsequently rebroadcast. In July the censors threatened to shut down Radio Catolica (the Catholic Church radio station) because it deviated from scheduled programming to play religious music as a tribute to 10 priests expelled by the Government.

The Government's imposition of "curriculum rationalization and coordination" on the two Nicaraguan universities has limited their autonomy in developing their curricula and has further circumscribed academic freedom. The Ministry of Education has imposed on primary and secondary schools as well curricula with a strong ideological content. The Sandinista youth organization is a pervasive influence in the public education system, and has reportedly paid for some members' tuition in private schools in order to have the organization represented there. Sandinista youth members allegedly have denounced teachers for not supporting the Government.

b. Freedom of peaceful assembly and association

The 1982 State of Emergency Decree suspended the right of assembly, but the Government allowed opposition groups to hold indoor meetngs. Small demonstrations, including one commemorating the anniversary of the death of former La Prensa editor Joaquin Chamorro, were also allowed. However, in July the Government reacted to a Catholic Church-organized march in support of a priest accused of "counterrevolutionary activities" by expelling ten foreign Catholic priests. On July 19, the fifth anniversary of the Nicaraguan Revolution, Junta Coordinator Daniel Ortega announced that the right of free assembly would be restored to those opposition political parties that registered for the November elections. Nevertheless, registered political party rallies and marches were subjected to frequent and often violent interruption by Sandinista mobs.

When students in Chinandega marched in August to protest against military conscription, the Government reportedly made teachers personally responsible to ensure their students did not participate in future demonstrations. At least one of the schools from which these students came has since been threatened with closure. Political meetings held indoors by non-registered political parties were also subjected to mob attacks. None of the restrictions applied to pro-government organizations, which held frequent open-air rallies throughout the year. Students in public schools were released from school early and obliged to participate in some Sandinista rallies, as were government workers and members of the armed forces.

The Government has attempted to weaken the independent labor movement while creating alternative labor bodies controlled by the Sandinista Front. It controls most of the 20 to 30 percent of the total workforce which is organized. The Sandinista Front's two principal confederations, the Sandinista Workers' Central (CST) and the Asociation of Rural Workers (ATC), have over 120,000 members and dwarf the non-Sandinista organizaitons, which have about 40,000. In theory, the Sandinista unions serve as a conduit for workers' desires and grievances to the Government. In fact, these confederations consistently support government policies such as strict labor discipline and worker participation in defense activities.

Approximately 60 members of the independent Nicaraguan Workers' Central (CTN) were detained during the year, some for as long as four months. At least six CTN members formerly convicted of "subversive" activity were pardoned by the Council of State in 1984. Twelve members remained in detention at year's end. Police entered and searched the Managua headquarters of the CTN on May 24, taking with them several documents, and returned later and arrested several members of the union. The independent Confederation for Labor Unification (CUS) was subject to similar government harassment. On May 1, a Sandinista mob entered a CUS school and damaged some of its equipment. In September, two CUS members who reportedly received logistical support from the Goverment occupied the CUS headquarters and called for its withdrawal from the Coordinadora, a coalition of groups opposing the Government. When Confederation leaders attempted to hold a meeting to discuss the isue, pro-government mobs interrupted the proceedings. In the resulting melee several injuries occurred. The police then occupied the headquarters briefly before returning the building to the CUS.

The Government requires that the Labor Ministry participate in collective bargaining and approve any labor-management contract; until August, strikes were illegal. On August 6 the Government restored the right to strike. Shortly thereafter, a Sandinista union called a strike. Further labor unrest was cut short by government warnings—supported by the Sandinista Workers' Central—that strikes or work stoppages were threats to national security and would not be tolerated. In a September 8 speech, Sandinista Front National Directorate member Victor Tirado declared that, "The strike as a weapon, as a political instrument of the working class, has already passed into history."

The major labor confederations maintained ties with recognized international labor bodies. The CST is a member of the Soviet-aligned World Federation of Trade Unions. The Christian Democrat-oriented CTN is affiliated with the Latin American Confederation of Workers. The CUS is a member of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions as well as a member of several regional organizations. The Government designated the ATC to represent Nicaraguan labor at the 1984 International Labor Organization Conference in Geneva.

c. Freedom of religion

Catholicism is practiced by about 80 percent of the population. Although a number of other faiths are legal and operate freely, the Government has harassed and expropriated property from certain faiths, such as the Seventh-Day Adventists, Mennonites, Jehovah's Witnesses, Mormons, Jews, and the Moravian Church.

Initially highly supportive of Sandinista, the Catholic Church has become increasingly disenchanted with Sandinista policies. Most of the clergy, led by Managua Archbishop Miguel Obando y Bravo, wish to remain independent of the Government and are increasingly critical of it. At the same time, a minority faction which terms itself the "Popular Church" is strongly pro-Sandinista. The division between this faction and the rest of the Church is based partly on theological issues, but also reflects the ongoing struggle between the Church and the Sandinista Government over the direction of post-Somoza Nicaragua. The Government has harassed the Church repeatedly, and the bishops are regularly attacked in the government and pro-government press. The Church has resisted government efforts to assert greater control over Catholic schools. The Government, which had banned Obando Y Bravo's televised masses in 1981, continued to prohibit the live broadcast over radio of his Sunday sermons during 1984. In April the Government delayed the publication or a pastoral letter of the Catholic Church's Espiscopal Conference calling for national reconciliation, and conducted a bitter campaign against the Church hierarchy in the government media. Sandinista mobs harassed persons attending some Catholic Church events, and on one occasion set fire to weeds surrounding a church and hung a Sandinista union flag from the steeple. In late June the Government accused a priest of subversive activity and restricted him to a local seminary. When priests in Managua undertook a brief protest march in support of the accused priest, Interior Ministry officials responded by expelling ten foreign priests—including some who had not taken part in the march—and canceling their residence permits. The Government also refused to grant residence permits to some foreign priests and nuns working in Nicaragua. On several occasions, the Government refused to honor visas issued to priests and denied them entrance into the country. The Government has also on at least two occasions attempted to place priests in sexually embarassing situations which could be manipulated to discredit the church hierarchy. In 1982 such an attempt was made against Church spokesman Monsignor Bismarck Carballo, and in 1984 against a visiting Venezuelan bishop and two other priests. The Inter-American Human Rights Commission fund that, "Although it is true that much of the friction between the Government and the churches arise from positions that are directly or indirectly linked to the political situation of the country, it is also true that statements by high government officials, official press statements, and the actions of groups under the control of the Government have gone beyond the limits within which political discussion should take place and have become obstacles to certain specifically religious activities."

Some smaller denominations continued to be persecuted for spreading allegedly subversive ideas and for collaborating with "counterrevolutionaries." Several properties that Sandinista mobs had seized in 1982 from the Seventh Day Adventists, the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, the Mennonites and Jehovah's Witnesses remained under government control throughout 1984. Two members of the Jehovah's Witnesses were detained in August, and others requested protection from the courts because of harassment by Interior Ministry officials.

The 1978–79 insurrection and government policies since 1979 led virtually all of the approximately 50 members of the Jewish community to leave the country. In 1984 the Government maintained its 1983 offer to restore the Managua synagogue—which the Government had earlier confiscated—to the Jewish community, in response to repeated efforts by the Anti-Defamation League of the B'nai B'rith. The Government also agreed in principle to review one case of a member of the Jewish community whose property had been confiscated, but thus far has refused to restore the property or to offer compensation. The Government continues to maintain close ties with the Palestine Liberation Organization and maintains strong anti-Israel and anti-Zionist positions in international organizations.

d. Freedom of movement within the country, foreign travel, immigration and repatriation

On July 19, 1984, the Government announced it would guarantee freedom of travel throughout the country as part of its electoral campaign program. However, military and security forces in 1984 continued to operate numerous checkpoints, particularly in the northwestern areas of the country, and access to some areas was often temporarily restricted because of military activity. For example, the entire Atlantic Coast region remained a restricted military area, and individuals continue to require Interior Ministry permission to travel there.

The Government requires exit visas for all Nicaraguan citizens and residents who desire to leave the country. After the elections in late 1984, it blocked the departure from the country of at least 22 opposition leaders and members. Following intense international criticism, it subsequently authorized some of these people to travel abroad. In January 1985, the Government announced that tickets for foreign travel must be purchased in U.S. dollars. Since the sale of foreign currency is strictly controlled by the Government—and is usually unavailable to the general public—the result may be to curtail opposition travel abroad.

The Government continued in 1984 to confiscate the property of Nicaraguans who remained out of the country for periods of six months or more. It has not, however, permanently blocked the return of Nicaraguan citizens, nor has it taken action against non-Nicaraguans returning to Nicaragua from other countries. Neither has it revoked the citizenship of opposition leaders in exile, though it did begin criminal proceedings against a number of leaders of the armed opposition. The Government has, however, denied entry to several foreign priests, notwithstanding their possession of valid Nicaraguan visas. It also canceled the residence permits of 10 foreign priests in June and has refused to grant resident status to other foreign priests working in Nicaragua.

During 1984 thousands of Nicaraguans left the country, joining the tens of thousands who have abandoned the country since 1979. Between January and May 1984 an estimated 1,500 youths between 17 and 25 fled Nicaragua to avoid military conscription. Several thousand Miskitos crossed into Honduras during the year, including 2,000 who fled en masse in April and May. The flow of displaced persons from the north central departments continued due to heavy fighting. Many also left for Costa Rica as fighting continued in the south.

Nicaragua has received over 20,000 displaced persons since 1979, nearly all from El Salvador. The Government works closely with the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees to provide food, clothing, and shelter for these people and attempts to integrate them into society. It does not forcibly repatriate displaced persons.

Section 3. Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government.

The Sandinista Front declares that it is a "vanguard party" with a historic right to rule. Its nine-man National Directorate has ruled Nicaragua through the Junta of Government, the cabinet ministries, and the Council of State, a quasi-legislative body. In all three bodies the Sandinistas have a decisive majority. For example, the Junta was composed of Sandinista Directorate member Daniel Ortega (the new President), Sandinista member Sergio Ramirez (the new Vice-President), and Democratic Conservative Party member Rafael Cordova Rivas. Daniel Ortega's brother Humberto, a fellow member of the Sandinista National Directorate, is Minister of Defense and Commander-in-Chief of the Sandinista Popular Army. Of the other seven Sandinista National Directorate members, three head the Ministries of Interior (including the security forces), Planning, and Agriculture. Another is President of the Council of State; yet another is Vice-Minister of Interior. All major appointments in the Government are made by the Sandinista National Directorate, acting through the Junta of Government. The National Directorate has also determined the allocation of seats in the Council of State, ensuring unchallenged Sandinista Front domination of that body. The Sandinista Front's victory in the November 1984 elections will continue its control through the Presidency and the new National Assembly, which replaced the Junta and the Council of State in January 1985.

Thirteen political parties exist in Nicaragua. The Government routinely harasses the opposition parties through the detention of party members and activists, mob action against party headquarters, threats, prohibition of large rallies, denial of exit visas, and censorship. A number of activists from opposition parties were detained during 1984 on politically motivated grounds. The Democratic Conservative Party obtained the release of approximately 60 imprisoned members, but claims another 140 remain in jail. Several members of the Social Christian Party were also detained and harassed.

The Government sought to improve its international image through the process culminating in the November 1984 presidential and National Assembly elections. Parties that registered for the elections were allowed to share 30 minutes per week on national television and 45 minutes per week of radio time during the three-month campaign. Each registered political party was also given nine million cordobas (approximately $320,000) to finance its campaign. In theory parties were allowed freedom of assembly and expression; in practice the Government frequently violated these rights. The Government specifically excluded the armed opposition from participating in the elections. Despite the Government's guarantees, pro-government forces repeatedly harassed the opposition parties throughout the campaign. Press censorship continued, including coverage of opposition rallies and statements. Opposition party youth activists were detained by the police, and in some cases were even drafted into the Armed Forces. Pro-government demonstrations repeatedly and sometimes violently disrupted opposition rallies without punishment or sanction of any kind. On one occasion a member of the Militia fired into an opposition meeting, injuring two persons. The Supreme Electoral Council, required by law to supervise the campaign process, did little to correct the situation.

Deeply skeptical of government objectives, and disturbed by government violations of the existing campaign rules, the principal democratic opposition group—known as the Coordinadora—conditioned its participation on the existence of adequate electoral conditions, including full freedom of assembly and of the press, access to the voter registration process, and the postponement of the elections to allow all parties to have at least 90 days in which to campaign. During Socialist International-sponsored negotiations in October 1984 between the Government and the Coordinadora, the Government initially accepted but then rejected these conditions. Consequently, the Coordinadora, led by presidential candidate Arturo Cruz, maintained its boycott of the elections.

The Independent Liberal Party also voted to withdraw from the elections, but the Government refused to take it off the ballot. In addition, Sandinista Front members interrupted a meeting of the Democratic Conservative Party to prevent a decision to join the election boycott. Of the remaining four non-Sandinista parties that were on the electoral ballot, three were small Marxist parties with little popular support. Consequently, the Nicaraguan people were denied a broad range of opposition parties for whom to vote. The 1984 report of the Inter-American Human Rights Commission stated that, "The Commission has been able to verify that during the current electoral process, the Sandinista National Liberation Front has intensively used all of the resources made available to it by its holding of state power, which places it in an advantageous position with respect to other contenders. In this regard, the denounced harassment of political and union leaders is unacceptable. Furthermore, the IACHR considers that some candidates have been excluded, which could have been avoided if there had been greater flexibility, both on the part of the candidates and the Government."

With these serious shortcomings in the process, the Government party—the Sandinista Front—won the flawed elections with 62 percent of the vote. Many foreign observers reported that the balloting appeared to be orderly and honest, although some observers claimed that voter participation was lower than official figures indicated. In about two-thirds of the polling places there were poll watchers only from the Sandinista Front. About 25 percent of the registered voters failed to vote, and about 7 percent of the votes were declared improperly marked. Notwithstanding the Government professed interest in allowing opposition participation in political life, following the elections it increased press censorship and restricted foreign travel by opposition leaders.

Section 4. Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation Of Alleged Violations of Human Rights:

The Government undertook a commitment to the Organization of American States in July 1979 to observe human rights, as well as to respect pluralism and to hold free elections. The Government professes to be proud of its human rights record and says it officially welcomes the scrutiny of the international community. During 1983 a team from the Inter-American Human Rights Commission of the OAS visited Nicaragua to conduct a follow-up investigation on the treatment of Miskito Indians in the Atlantic Coast region. In a report and resolution released in June 1984, the Commission provided further documentation of government violations of the Indians' human rights and terminated its role as a friendly mediator between the Miskitos and the Government.

The government-sponsored National Commission for the Promotion and Protection of Human Rights (established in 1980) continues to be the only organization recognized by the Government as competent to file applications for pardons or to request the review of cases on human rights grounds. During 1984 it brought about the release of approximately one hundred political prisoners, most in the week preceding the November 4 elections. The independent CPDH suffered continued harassment from the Government in 1984, including the detention of its workers and interference with the distribution of its reports. The Government refuses to deal directly with the CPDH or to acknowledge complaints submitted through it. Although lawyers acting on behalf of the CPDH frequently are denied access to prisoners, it nevertheless continues to collect data and to publish detailed reports.

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Nicaragua had a population of roughly 3,400,000 in 1984. According to the World Bank, its per capita gross national product in 1981 was $860 and its population growth rate was 3.9 percent (1970-81), although the Government reports a population growth rate of 3.3 percent. Nicaraguans have a life expectancy at birth of 59.8 years. Zero or negative economic growth is expected in 1984. In 1983, exports were about $430 million compared to the pre-1979 level of $650 million. Imports were $803 million in 1984. Foreign assistance decreased sharply in 1984, most of it coming from the Soviet bloc. Inflation for 1984 was about 60-80 percent. About 20 percent of the work force was unemployed.

Serious economic mismanagement, declining exports and guerrilla activity contributed to Nicaragua's economic problems in 1984. The lack of political stability and investor confidence contributed to the stagnation of the economy. The Nicaraguan private sector, which accounts for approximately 60 percent of gross domestic product, is very closely controlled by the Government, which has, inter alia, a monopoly on foreign trade and on bank credit. Although government leaders have reiterated their intention to foster a mixed economy, arbitrary property confiscations and the government's Marxist rhetoric have discouraged private investment. There were numerous instances during the year of arbitrary confiscation of land for political reasons.

The Government made efforts during the year to improve health services. Campaigns in 1984 provided vaccinations for several common diseases, reportedly resulting in the elimination of polio and a decrease in malaria cases. Medicine provided in hospitals and health centers is free, although a lack of foreign exchange shortages has resulted in extreme shortages of medicines. New health centers and regional hospitals were constructed. The infant mortality rate reportedly was reduced to 65.2 deaths per 1,000 live births in 1984. According to government figures, about 95 percent of the urban population and 12 percent of the rural population have access to safe water. World Bank statistics from 1976 stated that 70 percent of the population had access to safe water. The Government claimed to have 10 percent of the population on social security rolls in 1984, and to have raised literacy to 88 percent. The adjusted primary school enrollment ratio in 1983 was 73 percent. According to 1978 World Bank figures, 85 percent of school-age children were enrolled in primary schools.

Women are active at all levels of society and at all but the highest levels of the Government and the Sandinista Front. There is one woman on the Supreme Court and one woman Cabinet Minister. Women have served as national coordinators of one of the opposition parties as well as of the Permanent Human Rights Commission. A large number of seats on the Council of State are filled by women. Participation of women in the military is voluntary.

CORPORATE MERGERS

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, there is a lot of interest today in the question of corporate mergers, including so-called hostile takeovers. This is a very important matter that concerns a lot of companies. A great many of them are under threats today. There are several right now that have their backs to the wall on this question.

I have issued this press release today:

WASHINGTON, February 20.—The Senate Judiciary Committee will hold hearings in the near future on the current state of corporate mergers, including so-called hostile takeovers, Committee Chairman Strom Thurmond announced today.

THURMOND announced the hearings, saying he has been contacted about the issue of corporate mergers by Senators, Members of Congress, and business and industry officials, who have expressed interest in the issue.

"Since a great deal of interest and concern has been expressed on this issue, I think it best for the Judiciary Committee to pursue some hearings so that all the relevant information can be brought out," THURMOND said.

An exact date for the hearings will be announced later.

Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, I wish to commend the chairman of the Judiciary Committee for his willingness to participate and call for hearings on the issue of mergers, particularly as they pertain in hostile takeover situations. It is a very timely subject and a very important subject. Certainly, in our State of Oklahoma, we have seen a couple of mergers take place in hostile situations that have been very detrimental to our State. We have one now in process.

So I congratulate the Senator and look forward to working with him on this issue, and look forward to being an active participant in the hearings, as well.

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, I, too, would like to congratulate the distinguished Senator from South Carolina for holding these hearings. This is a major concern of this Senator. I appreciate very much the Senator from South Carolina making that announcement today that these hearings will be held.

Mr. THURMOND. I thank the Senator.

SENATOR GARN'S SHUTTLE MISSION 51-E

Mr. GARN. Mr. President, today would have been a particularly interesting day for me, since I had been originally scheduled to fly into space as a member of the crew of the space shuttle Challenger on flight 51-E.

Instead, I have been chairing a hearing of my Banking Committee speculating about our economic horizons, rather than observing the Earth's horizons from that unique vantage point.

The flight of 51-E has been delayed until early next month, and that delay has given me the opportunity to be here and to say a few words about this experience, and especially about the crew that I have been privileged to join.

The past 6 weeks have been perhaps the most interesting, educational, and exciting of my life, beginning on January 10, when I arrived in Houston, TX, at the Johnson Space Center for my initial training in preparation for the flight. I have been poked, prodded, examined, spun, evaluated, and tested in the most thorough medical and physical examination imaginable. I have been exposed to a universe of technical detail that boggles the mind, and observed an array of medical, technical, and logistical personnel at work in training and preparing the crew of the shuttle for the flight that is more impressive than you could imagine.

Much of what I have learned and observed I will be sharing with my colleagues over the next month and years in connection with my oversight responsibilities as chairman of the HUD and Independent Agencies Subcommittee. I have had a view of this Nation's Space Program that would not have been even remotely possible from the podium of my subcommittee, or from briefings by staff. Although not part of the NASA Administration's Space Program community, I have been trained and treated as though I were. I am not Senator JAKE GARN when I'm in Houston or Cape Canaveral; I am Payload Specialist GARN. That's the way I wanted it to be and that's the way it has been, and the result has been a real world view of how it all works—the good and the bad.

Certainly the best of all the good I've seen has been the crew of 51-E. I want to acknowledge here, and publicly state for the record, my respect and appreciation for as fine a group of professionals as I have ever met. They have accepted my last minute inclusion among them, not only with true professionalism, but with a warmth and friendliness that I find personally very gratifying.

I want my colleagues to know of these people and be proud, as I am, that they represent the essence of the best resource our Nation's space program has—the skilled professionals that make it all work.

Air Force Col. Karol J. "Bo" Bobko is the mission commander. Bo is the space veteran of the group, having flown as the pilot of the Challenger on STS-6 in April 1983. Bo has the overall responsibility for the mission activities.

Navy Capt. Donald E. Williams is the pilot for 51-E, who will be responsible for the shuttle's operating systems during the mission and for in-flight maneuvers related to the launching of the two satellites from the shuttle's payload bay.

Jeffery A. Hoffman, doctor of physics, is a mission specialist whose principal responsibility will be to deploy the TDRS-B and Anik C-1 satellites during the mission.

S. David Griggs is a pilot astronaut acting as a mission specialist on 51-E, who will assist in the deployment of the satellites and will also handle in-flight maintenance requirements of the shuttle's systems.

Dr. Rhea Seddon, a medical doctor, is a mission specialist with a broad range of duties assisting the crew in ascent and descent and satellite deployment. She will also be assisting in the medical experiments to be performed during the mission.

Lt. Col. Patrick Baudry is the French Cosmonaut who will be conducting equilibrium and vertigo experiments and various heart and blood vessel measurements with an echograph during the mission. Patrick has had the unique experience with training with both the U.S. and Soviet space programs, as he was the back-up to French Jean-loup Chretien, who flew with the Soviets on the Soyuz T-6/Salut-7 mission in June 1982.

In order to give my colleagues a better understanding of what this mission will involve, and what the crew members and myself will be doing, I ask unanimous consent that two articles from the recent issue of Aviation Week & Space Technology be included in the RECORD at the conclusion of my statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GARN. These six individuals have been a delight to get to know. I consider them to be friends, whom I enjoy personally and respect professionally. I have gone through hour upon hour of training simulation with them and watch their skill, imagination, and ability as they met the challenge of simulated problems in the shuttle mockup. I have absolutely no doubts or qualms about flying with this crew after seeing their response in those situations. I have spent a lot of time over the years as a member of countless flight crews and I have never felt any more comfortable than with this one.

Another aspect of this experience, Mr. President, has been the opportunity to get to know many of the support and training personnel, both at the Johnson Space Center and, this past weekend, at the Kennedy Space Center. Once again, I must acknowledge and praise the professionalism and expertise of those individuals involved in the training and preparation of the flight crews for the shuttle program. Shuttles have almost become so seemingly routine that we don't think what must go into the preparation for a launch. I know that I, for one, even with my exposure to the program through the appropriations process, never had any true idea of the depth and breadth of the preparations necessary for all aspects of a shuttle mission. I will have a lot more to say about this in the future but I want to at least acknowledge their role on this occasion. I especially want to express my appreciation to Lynne Collins and Erlinda Stevenson, in the Payload Specialist Office, for their cheerful and efficient support throughout my training program. Mike Smith, of the Astronaut Office, and Dr. Tom Moore, of the medical staff, have been magnificent in coordinating my training and helping me to learn the techniques and theories of the medical experiments I will be performing. And I can't forget the work of Astronaut/Doctor Bill Thornton, whose medical genius has served as the basis for many of the experiments I will conduct.

I could name many, many more individuals who have helped already to make this a rich, meaningful, educational, and unforgettable experience. One of my primary concerns from all of this is that those people will be recognized for their commitment, dedication, and hard work, for without all of them, this Nation would not have a successful space transportation system.

Mr. President, I will be returning to Houston this evening for the final preparations for the flight of Challenger and STS 51-E. I thank you and my colleagues for your support of this undertaking, and I look forward to my return to this body with a full report on the most exciting and fascinating experience I can imagine.

EXHIBIT 1

SHUTTLE MISSION 51-E WILL CARRY HEAVIEST PAYLOAD YET IN PROGRAM

(By Craig Covault)

WASHINGTON.—Space shuttle Mission 51-E set for launch Mar. 3 will carry the heaviest payload yet flown in the shuttle program on a five-day flight on which its seven crewmembers will conduct extensive medical tests to study space adaptation.

The mission will deploy the second TRW tracking and data relay satellite on a Boeing Inertial Upper Stage (IUS) and a $65-million Telesat Canada communications spacecraft that Telesat has no use for and is trying to sell through the Paine Webber brokerage firm.

The Mission 51-E crew also will conduct a variety of zero-g medical investigations with French cosmonaut Lt. Col. Patrick Baudry and U.S. Sen. Jake Garn (R.-Utah) as test subjects.

The flight's cargo weight of more than 50,000 lb. exceeds by more than a ton the heaviest previous payload weight carried into orbit by the space shuttle and approaches the 65,000-lb. maximum payload of the shuttle vehicle.

Primary elements of the five-day mission are:

Astronaut crew—Mission commander USAF Col. Karol J. Bobko and his crew originally were assigned to a mission that NASA canceled to combine two payloads on the first flight of the orbiter Discovery. The other Mission 51-E astronauts are pilot Navy Capt. Donald E. Williams and mission specialists Dr. Rhea Seddon, Jeffrey A. Hoffman and S. David Griggs, who is a pilot astronaut acting as a mission specialist on this flight.

Payload specialists—French cosmonaut Baudry is flying on the mission to conduct two detailed medical experiments and was focal point for the first joint U.S./French manned space exercise. Garn is flying the mission only as an observer but has been given a payload specialist designation. Garn has been assigned the minimal crew activity that will be expected from any flight observer—cooking, medical tests and photography. NASA physicians are using him as a subject for several simple tests that could be important in helping to understand the human body's adaptation to zero-g conditions. Garn is chairman of the Senate Appropriations subcommittee that oversees the NASA budget, and he pressed NASA repeatedly for permission to fly on a shuttle mission as part of his oversight responsibility.

Deployments—The second $100-million TRW/Spacecom relay satellite and its Boeing Inertial Upper Stage, weighing 18.5 tons, will be pushed off their cradle 10 hr. into the mission at a rate of only 0.4 fps. Bobko will be ready to maneuver Challenger out of the way if a malfunction should occur in the IUS spring ejection system as the 36-ft.-long stack moves out of the bay at a forward angle taking it directly over the cockpit. The Canadian Telesat I/Anik C-1 spacecraft and its McDonnell Douglas payload assist module (PAM) upper stage will be mounted forward of the IUS, directly outside of the crew's payload bay windows. The Anik spacecraft will be deployed on the second mission day at the 32-hr. point in the flight.

TDRS-B mission—The spacecraft is to be parked in geosynchronous orbit at 171 deg. W. Long. above the equator over the central Pacific Ocean. Once at that location, TDRS-B will operate in conjunction with the first TDRS to provide the shuttle and other U.S. spacecraft with communications contact for 85% of an orbit, compared with much more limited coverage with ground stations or only one TDRS satellite.

Anik's mission—Telesat Canada is trying to sell the spacecraft because its business has not developed enough for use of a third K_u-band spacecraft. Telesat already has two other Hughes HS-376 spacecraft in orbit. If no buyer is found before launch, Anik C-1 will be placed at 107.5 deg. W. Long. in a storage orbit. Telesat Canada has developed an innovative technique that will use the combined gravitational effects of the Earth. Moon and Sun to move the satellite gradually over a three-year period into exact position over the equator without expenditure of fuel, which must be saved for any buyer of the satellite. The company is launching the satellite instead of storing it on the ground because by doing so it has the advantage of a much cheaper shuttle launch cost—and therefore can offer a cheaper selling price—than would be charged if Telesat withdrew the satellite from the shuttle manifest and then scheduled launch later.

Halley's Comet preparations—Mission specialist Hoffman, an astronomer, will use a camera with an image intensifier, earlier used for shuttle glow experimentation, to assess how photography of Halley's Comet could be achieved with the same system on shuttle flights in late 1985 and early 1986. Hoffman's objective will be to see if the capabilities of the system will allow photography of Halley's Comet when it is closest to the Sun. This will be when the comet is most active, but also the most difficult to view.

Toys in space—The Houston Museum of Natural Science, in conjunction with the astronaut crew, has developed an educational flight project that will demonstrate physical laws and how they are affected by zero-g using simple toys as the demonstration tools. These exercises will be videotaped on board Challenger for distribution to school systems throughout the U.S. Studies show that when toys familiar to children are used in science demonstrations, young students can relate more easily to what is being demonstrated.

Space processing—One of Garn's duties will be to observe a new processing technique called two-phase acqveous polymer extraction. Two unmixed polymer materials will be dissolved in water and Garn will observe how they react to form a solution with two immiscible phases.

LAUNCH TIME

The Mar. 3 launch from Kennedy Space Center is set for 8:31 a.m. EST. Griggs will perform the center-seat flight engineer role, assisting Bobko and Williams for both ascent and reentry. Seddon will fly the ascent on the top deck and switch with Hoffman, who will fly the reentry on the top deck in the fourth flight deck seat. Garn and Baudry will ride in the middeck for both ascent and reentry.

The flight's second orbital maneuvering system burn [45 min. into the flight] will place Challenger in a 153-naut.-mi. circular orbit for the TDRS satellite deployment to follow later on launch day.

Preparations for the deployment will be simplified compared with deployment of the first TDRS on shuttle Mission 6. This is because on Mission 6 no communications relay was available and multiple checkout milestones for the IUS and satellite had to be achieved during short ground station passes.

For TDRS-B's deployment, the relay satellite already in geosynchronous orbit will be used to provide continuous coverage for much of the checkout. The U.S. Air Force Satellite Control Facility, Sunnyvale, Calif., however, will do some direct checkout of the IUS through USAF ground stations, according to lead mission flight director Randy Stone.

The IUS tilt table and mid-payload-bay support brace for the stage brings the total TDRS/IUS vehicle weight to more than 44,800 lb. Of this total, the deployed IUS/TDRS weighs 37,000 lb., with the satellite 2.5 tons of this total.

ANTENNA EXPOSURE

The payload's tilt table will first be raised to a 29-deg. elevated position where the spacecraft's antennas will be exposed for transmissions to Earth while it is still attached to the orbiter.

The formal countdown for payload deployment will begin 20 min. prior to the planned separation at 10 hr. into the flight on launch day.

Key events in the minutes leading to deployment will include the crew transferring the IUS to internal power from orbiter power and transfer of the TDRS from orbiter power to IUS batteries. These events will allow release of two umbilicals that connect the orbiter to the payload, followed by elevation of the payload's tilt table to the 59-deg. deployment position about 6 min. prior to release. Hoffman and Seddon will be primarily responsible for the TDRS deployment.

Orbiter attitude leading up to the deployment will be belly pointed to the Sun to shield the IUS/TDRS from excess heat.

The deployment is timed to occur as Challenger passes over the equator on orbit seven at 34 deg. E. Long. over western Kenya with Challenger in darkness. The IUS/TDRS will be illuminated by the payload bay flood lights. The deployment will be commanded manually.

Within 1 min. of the deployment, Bobko will perform about a 2.2-fps. reaction control system maneuver to nose Challenger down and away from the payload, which at that point will be over the orbiter's nose. A few minutes later he will perform an orbital maneuvering system burn to separate farther from the payload. This burn will place Challenger in about a 177 × 153-naut.-mi. orbit that early on Day 2 will be trimmed to 177 × 157 naut. mi. for the Anik deployment.

About 12 min. after separation, the IUS hydrazine attitude control jets will begin the first of a series of maneuvers to roll the payload for thermal control.

As the IUS/TDRA stack crosses the equator again about 55 min. after deployment, the IUS will fire its first-stage motor automatically, providing up to 62,000 lb. of thrust for 2 min. 33 sec.

This will place the IUS/TDRS stack in a climb toward 22,300 mi. altitude. As the stack climbs, the IUS will perform both a series of rolls for thermal control and five "dip-out" maneuvers during which the entire stack will pitch down sharply so the TDRS S-band antenna can be pointed at the ground and the spacecraft's health assessed. Six hours after separation from the shuttle and 5 hr. after the first-stage burn, the vehicle will be nearing geosynchronous altitude. The first-stage motor will then be separated and the second-stage motor fired. The second-stage motor will provide about 25,000 lb. of thrust for about 1 min. 45 sec. to place the stack in geosynchronous orbit, where it will be moved to the 171 deg. W. Long. parking position.

SPACECRAFT ATTITUDE

The TDRS will not be separated from the IUS for another 40 min. This is to allow the IUS to maintain the spacecraft's attitude while the TDRS White Sands, N.M., ground station commands deployment of the spacecraft's solar arrays, spanning 57 ft. from tip to tip.

The spacecraft then will be commanded onto internal power, and the K-band antenna that provides the primary link to White Sands will be deployed. The spacecraft then will be separated from the Inertial Upper Stage.

Immediately after separation, White Sands will command deployment of the satellite's two 15.7-ft.-dia. S- and K-band antennas that will span 46 ft. from tip to tip once deployed. This will bring the spacecraft to a point 7 hr. after shuttle deployment when its detailed checkout sequence will begin.

Following several weeks of checkout on TDRS-B, the twin-spacecraft, $2.8 billion TDRS system should be ready to provide communications coverage to spacecraft through 85% of their orbits—the maximum available considering the ground location of the White Sands facility.

The third TDRS, set for launch later this year, will replace the No. 1 TDRS, which will be relegated to backup status. TDRS-1 has had several communications system malfunctions, and TRW modified the newer satellites to prevent a recurrence. NASA is discussing with the Defense Dept. whether the launch planned in late November should swap places with a Defense launch planned in September.

BACKUP DEPLOYMENT

Shuttle Mission 51-E will have a backup TDRS deployment schedule on the second flight day should problems affect the planned first-day deployment. The primary activity scheduled for the second day is deployment of the Anik C-1 spacecraft for Telesat Canada. The deployment is scheduled when Challenger crosses the equator at 121 deg. W. Long. over the Pacific 32 hr. into the flight.

Paine Webber is trying to sell the satellite for Telesat Canada. A minimum price of $65 million has been set. A buyer for the spacecraft will have the advantage of having a launched and checked-out vehicle for K_u-band communications.

Forty-five minutes after deployment from the orbiter, the Anik's PAM motor will be fired automatically, placing the satellite in a highly elliptical geosynchronous transfer orbit. Telesat Canada will use its new ground station in Perth, Australia, for transfer orbit communications with the satellite. It later will fire the spacecraft's own solid-propellant motor to place the satellite in geosynchronous orbit, where it will be moved to 107.5 deg. W. Long. While at that position, the spacecraft will be positioned so that its latitude will daily move between both 3 deg. north and south of the equator.

The spacecraft will be set up so that at the end of three years in this storage orbit it will be halted essentially on the equator. Telesat developed the software to place the spacecraft in this mode so it could conserve positioning fuel in the event it takes up to three years to sell it. If the spacecraft is sold, it will be maneuvered by Telesat Canada to the geosynchronous location desired by the purchaser.

During the entire mission, several crewmembers will be involved in the French medical tests and those specifically assigned to Garn. The French tests follow similar experimentation done by French cosmonaut Jean-Loup Chretien on the Soyuz T-6/Salyut 7 mission. On Mission 51-E Baudry will operate:

Echography experiment—The experiment uses sound waves to measure the flow rate of blood in the body in zero-g. The hardware is the same flown on Salyut 7, except for modifications to accommodate shuttle locker stowage and the lower-frequency vibrations the shuttle has on launch compared with the Soviet Soyuz SL-4 booster on which it was launched earlier. Baudry will operate the experiment and use himself, Seddon and Garn as subjects. A particular advantage of the shuttle mission will be the ability of Baudry to unstow and use the hardware for bodily measurements immediately after launch so the body's earliest reaction to zero-g can augment the data acquired on the Soviet mission starting about 40 hr. after launch when Chretien's Soyuz had docked with the Salyut. The Soviets also continued to use the French hardware in space for additional measurements.

Equilibrium and vertigo experiment—A variety of vestibular-oriented zero-g tests will be conducted by Baudry as follow-up to the Salyut and Spacelab 1 vestibular tests. Previous space tests have shown that visual data from the eyes to the brain are extremely important in how the body adapts to zero-g, and this will be one area explored with the French equipment.

The ultrasonic waves created by the echograph instrument are applied to the body with a pen-like device and will be used to record cardiac wall and valve movements, imagery of the heart and abdominal organs, and blood flow through the blood vessels.

On Salyut, the blood flow at its exit from the heart was found to be somewhat faster than on Earth, but this velocity increase was not noted elsewhere. It is possible the increased flow rate could be found in connection with the kidneys. Specific points where the sensor will be used to acquire data will be over the heart, over the liver and abdominal blood vessels, the radial artery in the wrist, the renal artery in the upper abdomen, femoral artery and vein in the groin, the jugular vein in the neck and tibial artery in the ankle.

FRENCH MEASUREMENTS

The French equilibrium and vertigo measurements will involve:

Vision studies—Baudry will assume predetermined positions in the middeck during which visual perception will be modified using a visor. He will perform tests with both normal and occulted vision and those where a scene is projected on the visor.

Adaptation timing—Baudry will perform arm movements and correlate these with space adaptation symptoms.

Vestibulo-ocular reflex—Head movements in connection with how the eyes track will be performed—a measurement that could bring on motion sickness symptoms.

Eye reflex measurements—The rate at which Baudry's eyes follow a moving scene will be recorded.

Both sets of French experiments will be conducted throughout the mission to obtain a history on how data changes with time from immediate onset of zero-g through adaptation. Garn's experiment routine will be less involved but also conducted throughout the flight starting immediately with orbital insertion.

On the third mission day the crew will continue the medical tests, and Hoffman will use the image intensifier system for his tests associated with later Halley's Comet observations. A backup Anik deployment opportunity exists for this day.

On the fourth day, the pilots will conduct the standard flight control system checkout that verifies the orbiter's readiness for reentry. Landing at the Kennedy Space Center is scheduled early on Day 5, with the reentry burn performed on orbit 64 and the landing occurring early on orbit 65. Mission duration is planned to be just over 97 hr.

SENATOR GARN WILL HELP FILL MEDICAL DATA GAPS

WASHINGTON.—U.S. Sen. Jake Garn (R.-Utah) will conduct a number of simple medical tests in orbit that will help fill in data gaps created when many previous shuttle crewmen were unable to devote full attention to space adaptation testing because of their other flightcrew duties.

A primary objective will be to obtain test data immediately after orbital insertion when the body undergoes several changes as soon as it senses zero-g. Astronaut Dr. William Thornton developed many of these tests in connection with other Johnson Space Center physicians. Thornton also performed several of them while in space on shuttle Mission 8, and he plans to expand upon them during his upcoming Spacelab 3 flight in late April.

Garn also will cook, photograph and be responsible for a simple Marshall Space Flight Center fluids mixing test that could be an important precursor to a new fluid separation technique different from electrophoresis. Garn will shake the Marshall unit, then photograph the results at specific times afterward.

Garn has several medical science tests to perform including:

Gastric motility—The senator will wear microphones around his lower abdomen to record the sounds of solids and gas moving through his bowels as an indication of digestive activity. Previous studies show that digestive processes slow in zero-g, a phenomenon of medical interest. Garn also will wear sensors on his stomach to record its electrical potential. The electrical potential can change with the onset of motion sickness symptoms.

Space motion sickness—Garn has five tests to perform in the event he experiences motion sickness—as do about 50% of all space crew members. If he turns pale, he will measure the degree of color change with a chart—data useful in understanding fluid shift to the head. He will be able to measure the size of the pupils in his eyes as an indication of nervous system response. He will record heart and brain electrical waves with EEG and EKG equipment and take his temperature if he has motion sickness symptoms.

Fluid shifts—Immediately upon entry into zero-g, bodily fluids move toward the upper torso. Garn will wear a stocking around one leg that has bands he will tighten to mark the degree of leg shrinkage immediately upon entering orbit. This would be a fluid shift indicator. He will measure total body water outflow by swallowing 5 cc. of "heavy water" containing oxygen 18, a nonradioactive tracer that can help determine water levels through saliva tests. He also will conduct blood pressure tests as the orbiter flies back into the gravity field during reentry.

Performance—Garn will use a bar with sequenced lights and a hand calculator to conduct hand/eye coordination and mental coordination tests in zero-g.

Drug monitoring—Physicians believe it is possible that the same medications prescribed for persons on the ground may react differently with persons in orbit because of bodily changes. To document the progress of medication through the body in zero-g, Garn will take a single Tylenol tablet during the flight followed by periodic saliva samples for analysis on Earth. The history of the medication in the samples will indicate how the medication was carried through the bloodstream in space.

Parallel swing tests—This test will be conducted before and after flight to document how the inner ear and brain's interpretation of acceleration messages change during a lengthy exposure to zero-g.

The idea with these tests is to assess all of the body's systems.

TOYS ON SHUTTLE TO AID PHYSICS TEACHING

WASHINGTON.—The space shuttle Mission 51-E astronauts each selected toys for use in orbit. The astronauts will be videotaped demonstrating the toys and the footage then shown to grade school and junior high school students to illustrate various physical laws already familiar to them.

The project is managed by Dr. Carolyn Sumners, a Johnson Space Center engineer. Dr. Sumners is also director of astronomy and physics at the Houston Museum of Natural Science. The project is a follow-up to an earlier National Science Foundation study on science curriculum aids and how they affect the ability to learn scientific principles.

The crew examined about 30 candidate toys and then chose one or more to demonstrate in space. They have devoted brief practice periods in the orbiter 1-g mockup to ensure they can get good photographic coverage of the short demonstrations that will be done when no critical mission activities are under way.

The toys elected by each crewman are:

USAF Col. Karol J. Bobko, a former Defense Dept. manned orbital laboratory astronaut who trained to obtain intelligence from above the Soviet Union, elected to use a Snoopy top and gyroscope.

Navy Capt. Donald E. Williams, a mechanical engineer and Navy fighter pilot, chose to demonstrate a pink mechanical mouse and a paddle ball.

S. David Griggs, a former Navy fighter pilot, will have a yo-yo.

Dr. Rhea Seddon, a physician, will be filmed demonstrating a Slinky toy and jacks.

Jeffrey Hoffman, a astronomer, chose magnetic marbles, a wheel that rolls on a track and a mechanical car.

MINNESOTA SALUTE TO ERWIN HILLESHEIM

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, at no time in the past 50 years has the family farm been under greater strain and threat of extinction than it is today. Faced with declining equity positions and high interest rates, many farmers are in real danger of not obtaining the credit they need to put in a crop this spring. And, all farmers are struggling under market conditions which have cut both exports and prices to levels below which even the most efficient farmers have difficulty surviving.

Nowhere is the current farm financial crisis more evident than on the main streets of the farming communities of the Midwest. It is there that the economic interdependence of town and country is played out daily in transactions between farmers and the business owners with which they deal.

Recognition of this interdependence was made a number of years ago in New Ulm, MI, with establishment of the Farm-City Hub Club. Each year, this organization of farmers and business owners gives an Outstanding Service to Agriculture Award to one individual who has made a substantial contribution to promoting cooperation between agriculture and agribusiness.

This year's recipient of this prestigious award is Erwin Hillesheim, who, with his wife, Elaine, farmed in the New Ulm area for 40 years before retiring last fall.

Erwin, in addition to being a successful farmer, has a long record of varied community service. He has been a member of the local school board, has been active on regional boards of the American Dairy Association, Midwest Breeders, and AMPI, and has been active in promoting recreational opportunities for young people in his community.

Because of the outstanding achievements represented in Erwin Hillesheim, I ask that the text of a recent article on him from the New Ulm Journal be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New Ulm (MN) Journal]

HILLESHEIM RECEIVES HUB CLUB AWARD

(By Donna Weber)

Erwin Hillesheim is the 1985 recipient of the Outstanding Service to Agriculture Award of the Farm-City Hub Club.

The award was presented to Hillesheim at the club's annual banquet Saturday night. It recognizes Hillesheim's contributions in promoting cooperation between rural and city residents.

Hillesheim grew up in Sigel Township and farmed there for 40 years. He and his wife Elaine moved to New Ulm in November, and they're "getting adjusted" to town life.

His reaction to receiving the award was astonishment. "They really surprised me," he said. "It's an honor."

Hillesheim owns two farms in Sigel Township and resided near Clear Lake. He characterized his farming operations as "diversified" with alfalfa, corn, soybeans, hogs, dairy cows and chickens. Approximately 40 to 45 cows made up the dairy herd, and the majority of the crops were fed to the livestock. "Those cows take a lot of hay," he said.

Because Hillesheim believes in the philosophy of the Farm-City Hub Club in promoting cooperation between agriculture and agribusiness, he's proud to be a member of the club. "It's good to let the city people know about farming," he said. "And it really has worked, by gosh!"

The concept of family farming is important to Erwin and Elaine, "There aren't many families that are as close as we are," Erwin said. Six of the nine Hillesheim children are farming at the present time.

Moving to town has not kept Hillesheim away from the farm. He frequently visits his sons' farms and helps with the work. "We work together . . . haying, planting, harvesting," he said.

Hillesheim started farming with four horses, a gift from his father. "We had seven cows, a few brood sows," he said, "We made a living then."

Hard work didn't bother the Hillesheims either. "It was worth it," Elaine said.

They acknowledged that farming currently is experiencing hard times. "It's tough right now," Hillesheim said. "We'll just have to hold back until it gets better. There's been lulls before. We'll weather this one too."

In addition to belonging to the Farm-City Hub Club, Hillesheim has a record of community involvement that includes membership on the District 179 school board, AMPI divisional board, American Dairy Association regional board, Midwest Breeders Association board and the Sigel Baseball Association board.

Hillesheim was one of the organizers for construction of the township baseball field. "I had a whole lot of kids who played baseball, he said. "I'd sooner have them on the baseball field than on the road."

Milking cows kept Hillesheim busy every morning and evening for nearly four decades. When his sons started to take over the milking, he found time to join the Farm-City Hub Club. He serves on the membership committee of the organization. He has worked at Hub Club Heritagefest and Farm Fest foodstands. "I've fried so many brats already," he said adding that the job was enjoyable because he liked visiting with people.

Don Potter, 1984 recipient of the award and chairman of the Hub Club legislative committee, said that Hillesheim is "always willing to share his time for betterment of the community."

THE FARM FINANCIAL CRISIS

Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, there is no question about the financial crisis facing many thousands of farmers. They need immediate help. Let's not forget that it wasn't the farmer who caused high inflation or high interest rates. It wasn't the farmer who caused the value of the dollar to work against him outside the United States.

We have to remember that the Federal Government is largely responsible for the farmers' plight. And we have a responsibility to do everything possible to save the family farm.

That is why I joined the distinguished majority leader and 10 other concerned Senators January 31 in sending an urgent letter to the administration seeking changes in farm debt and credit policies.

The administration responded about 1 week later with a proposal, the main tenents of which are:

Banks may write down interest rates of farm loans in exchange for Federal guarantees of the principal;

Loan guarantees will be available to meet demand;

Additional field personnel will be provided to reduce the Farmers Home Administration backlog of cases;

A task force has been established within the administration to expedite the debt/credit issue; and

The administration agreed to make sure farmers have access to operating loans even if their local lending institutions fail.

That is how the administration's response was explained to me. It seems to me that those are steps in the right direction. And I very likely would support additional steps that have been proposed by my good friend and colleague DAVID BOREN, as well as ideas expressed by other farm State Senators.

I spent all of last week in my State, and participated in several agricultural meetings. And I must tell you that while Oklahoma may not be the State you hear about the most on the evening network news, its problems are just as severe as those of any other State.

The family farm must be saved. It is the backbone of my State's economy and a way of life for thousands of Oklahomans.

Of course, emergency aid will not solve all the farmers' problems, but it will allow many of them to continue their businesses. The answer to their longer term problems are first, a sensible farm bill and second, a Federal Government that lives within its means. We have got to get overall Federal spending under control.

I have a farm bill proposal which I outlined to Oklahoma farmers last week and would like to discuss with other Senators. But beyond this, the word I got from farmers across my State was "cut Government spending." The farmers do not mind taking their fair share of reductions, but they do not want the budget balanced on their backs either. I know there are other Senators who will join me in ensuring farmers are not singled out unfairly.

If Congress has the will to make the necessary spending cuts and reduce the deficit, I believe we will see interest rates fall significantly. Lower interest rates will take a lot of the pressure off the farm debt problem and ease the financial crunch farmers are facing today.

CANADA AND UNITED STATES BEER EXPORTS

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, today I would like to bring to the attention of the American public the unfair, unreasonable and unlawful barriers that have been erected by the Canadian Government to the sale of U.S. brewed beer in Canada. Both governmental and private restraints in Canada differ sharply with the open access to the U.S. market enjoyed by Canadian brewers.

The barriers in the United States to Canadian beer are minimal. Import tariffs are low and no discriminatory taxes or markups are imposed. Canadian imports are stocked and sold throughout the United States in the same outlets and under the same conditions as our domestic beer.

By contrast, American beers in Canada are confronted by restrictive, discriminatory, and artificial barriers erected by the Canadian brewers and the Canadian Federal and Provincial Governments. These barriers make meaningful competition by non-Canadian brands impossible.

Unacceptable Canadian restrictions include: first, a Federal import duty on beer and containers that greatly exceeds the duties imposed on Canadian beer by the United States; second, arbitrary and exclusionary Provincial "listing" requirements; third, exorbitant markups by Provincial alcoholic beverage sales outlets in all or most Provinces; fourth, the complete exclusion of U.S. beer from retail outlets accounting for 95 percent of beer sales in Ontario, Canada's largest Province; and fifth, a similar exclusion in Quebec of U.S. beer from grocery and convenience stores, which account for the vast majority of beer sales in that Province.

So massive are the barriers to U.S. beers that the two largest U.S. brewers, Anheuser-Busch and Miller—which is headquartered in Wisconsin—have been forced to license production of their most important brands, Budweiser and High Life, to Canadian brewers. Without this licensing agreement Budweiser and Miller High Life could not have any significant presence in the Canadian market.

Now is the time to remedy these inequities, Mr. President. The new Canadian Government is committed both to improved U.S. relations and to reduced trade barriers. I find this an encouraging note in an otherwise intolerable situation. The overall U.S. trade balance with Canada has worsened, a result, I believe, of restrictive Canadian practices such as those applied to beer.

Mr. Allan A. Rubin, Government Affairs Counsel for the G. Heileman Brewing Co., forcefully outlined the case for reduced Canadian trade barriers in recent testimony before the Trade Policy Staff Committee of the U.S. Trade Representative. I ask that the complete text of his testimony be included in the RECORD at this point, and commend it to the attention of all my colleagues.

There being no objection, the testimony was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TESTIMONY OF ALLAN A. RUBIN

Heileman is presently the 4th largest brewer in the U.S. and, if its agreement to acquire the No. 6 brewer Pabst is successful, it will leapfrog into third place. This past year over 18 million barrels of beer were produced by Heileman-owned plants located in 11 cities, accounting for 1984 sales in excess of a billion dollars, and for payment of over $200 million in federal and state malt beverage excise taxes.

Ever since the early 1970's the United States Brewers Association, which until the early 1980's represented brewers who produced over 75% of domestic beer, vigorously supported the principle of free trade and, if that broad goal proved unattainable, trade at least free of tariffs and other duties, however designated. To achieve that objective, the USBA on various occasions publicly advocated reciprocity as an appropriate response designed to end unfair and discriminatory foreign trade barriers. Presentations to that effect were made by the USBA to the U.S. Tariff Commission (Investigation No. 332-66), in 1972; to the Subcommittee on Trade of the House Ways and Means Committee in 1980; and to the ITC and to this Committee in 1980.

Similarly, representatives of other important U.S. brewers, such as Stroh-Schlitz, Pabst, Genesee and Christian Schmidt have all indicated a willingness to be recorded in favor of establishing free trade with Canada.

There can be no doubt that free trade with Canada would constitute an economic plus for the U.S. brewing industry which presently finds itself in the doldrums of flat sales and intense domestic competition (179,500,000 barrels sold in 1982, only 176 million in 1984). Few U.S. brewers have been able to maintain their barrellage sales of past years and projections for the immediate future are still less encouraging. Even were it possible to reverse the recent decline in barrellage, the history of the industry indicates that sales of all but the largest of the brewers, would suffer.

Moreover, that history reveals a very substantial attrition in both the number of brewing companies and of plants; and present circumstances indicate an immediate further decline in the number of independent brewers. The severity of the attrition in U.S. breweries from 197 in 1965 to 51 in 1984 was moderated only by the formation of half dozen specialty or micro breweries during that period. In the recent past, previously strong local, regional and even national brewers have either closed or sold out. To illustrate, national brewer Schlitz; regional brewers Schaeffer, Rainier, Lone Star, Olympia, Carling-National, and Blitz-Weinhard; and local brewers Falls City, Koch and Duncan, have all either been absorbed by another brewer or terminated operations.

The present economic difficulties being experienced by the U.S. brewing industry will be further exacerbated if the massive $150 billion U.S. trade deficits projected by reputable economists for each of the next several years are accurate. U.S. trade with Canada alone contributes approximately. $20 billion of that trade deficit, which is to some extent being perpetuated by a comparatively weak Canadian dollar, now valued at about 75¢ U.S.

A document recently filed by the USBA with the International Trade Commission discloses that 1983 Canadian beer exports to the U.S. totaled over 57 million gallons, with a CIF value of slightly under $130 million. 1983 U.S. beer exports to Canada, by comparison, totaled about 9% of that, only slightly over 5 million gallons with a value of under $10 million. The USBA document also reveals that the comparative situation worsened last year. During the first ten months of 1984, Canadian beer exports to the U.S. totaled almost 52 million gallons valued at over $119 million against U.S. beer exports to Canada of a mere 3,350,000 gallons valued at a little over 6½ million dollars.

This gross imbalance in U.S. malt beverage trade with Canada is clearly attributable to the easy access to U.S. markets and to the non-discriminatory fair trade in the U.S. accorded Canadian beer in contrast to a plethora of Canadian barriers, both federal and provincial, and both tariff and nontariff, which initially operate to deny access and, if entry is obtained, to prevent meaningful competition by imports in Canada.

The first, and only significant federal barrier encountered by an American brewer attempting to export to Canada is an excessive federal tariff of approximately 20¢ per gallon, based on 15¢ per imperial gallon of beer plus 15% on the container in which the beer is packaged, compared to an extremely modest 6¢ per gallon total U.S. tariff. Although the Canadian tariff, at over 3 times that of the U.S., is unreasonably high, at least it does not discriminate any more than any other tariff. Incidentally, additional Canadian federal provisions impose dual language and metric net content labeling.

The mort difficult situation confronting those desiring to export beer to Canada results from the multiplicity of discriminatory provincial listing requirements, mark-ups, marketing practices and distribution constraints, all of which combine to establish an extremely difficult set of standards to be met by imports and different, much more lenient, standards for provincial beer.

Although each province maintains a slightly different system for controlling the marketing of malt beverages, the one similarity that runs through all is discrimination of a magnitude that precludes either free or fair trade for imports. These restrictive and discriminatory provincial barriers generally include a listing requirement which is interpreted and applied to protect provincial products from import competition; harshly discriminatory mark-ups, or disguised duties, which significantly favor the local product (the Canadian required "round-up" to the nearest 5¢ exaggerates the discrepancy); and a distribution system which denies import beer the opportunity to be marketed in retail outlets where most malt beverages are sold, relegating imported beer only to liquor and wine outlets. The precise impediments existing in each province against beer imports are detailed, province by province, in documents already filed by Heileman and further amplification now should be unnecessary. I would, however, like to suggest that the documents itemizing specific discrimination by provinces against imports in favor of domestic beer, under the categories of (1) listing practices; (2) quotas; (3) mark-ups; (4) distribution limitations; and (5) number of listings granted, warrant consideration for a better understanding of the extent and variety of these impediments to fair trade.

These discriminatory provincial barriers have been nurtured and sustained by the conventional wisdom that the provinces are absolutely autonomous and therefore not subject, in this area, to federal government constraints or dictates. Additionally, it has been the prevailing Canadian view that provincial barriers are beyond the reach of the GATT or other treaty obligations of Canada to the United States. We think that both these opinions are, at best, questionable and are probably erroneous.

To support this conjecture, I refer you to the Brief recently presented to the USTR by the Washington law offices of Wald, Harkrader & Ross which concludes that, under Section 91(2) of the British North American Act, the importation of foreign goods, including beer, into Canada is within the jurisdiction of the federal government, and any powers exercised by the provincial governments or their agencies would have to be derived from the federal government.

That same Brief also concludes that Section 301 of the Trade Act of 1974, as amended, properly extends to unreasonable and discriminatory acts by the provincial "political subdivision" authorities.

The G. Heileman Brewing Company is firmly convinced that diplomatic negotiations with Canada to establish free trade in the malt beverage sector would be appropriate at this time and should be undertaken immediately.

Adoption of free trade would benefit the brewing industries by eliminating all federal, state and provincial tariff and nontariff barriers. It would also advance the goal of "harmonization" without raising adverse elements inherent in "reciprocity" or "equity" proposals and would help moderate the U.S. balance of trade deficits.

Establishment of free trade with Canada would make the Canadian malt beverage market and the U.S. malt beverage market fully accessible to each other and obviate the need to address and correct, on an item by item basis, each individual barrier, tariff or non-tariff, imposed by either the national government or any political subdivision of either. Malt beverage production in one country would be permitted to compete head-on with the imports from the other on the realistic basis of quality and taste rather than of protectionism. Free trade between the two countries would promote efficiency in the distribution and marketing of the malt beverages of both nations by expanding marketing areas and eliminating distortions based solely on artificial boundaries.

Accordingly, the G. Heileman Brewing Company recommends that both governments enter into negotiations to establish free trade in the malt beverage sector (TSUS 167.05) between Canada and the U.S. This can be accomplished by removing all tariff and non-tariff trade barriers presently effective in either country.

THE WESTERN HEMISPHERE CONFERENCE ON NARCOTICS CONTROL

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, on January 31, and February 1, 1985, I was proud to sponsor the first Western Hemisphere Conference on Narcotics Control.

This gathering, the first of its kind in Washington, consisted of representatives of almost every major nation in the Western Hemisphere. The justice ministers of some nations, the drug czars of others, came to Washington to share experiences, views, and recommendations on a devastating problem affecting each and every one of our nations: narcotics abuse.

On the first day of the conference, the top drug control officials of the United States addressed the delegates on just about every aspect of the drug abuse situation. They included Caspar Weinberger, Secretary of Defense; Dr. Carlton Turner, Special Assistant to the President for Drug Abuse Policy; Lt. Gen. R. Dean Tice, Director of the Department of Defense Task Force on Drug Abuse; Adm. James Gracey, Commandant of the U.S. Coast Guard; Dr. D.I. Macdonald, Director of ADAMHA; Jon Thomas, Assistant Secretary of State for International Narcotics Matters; William Webster, Director of the FBI; Francis Mullen, Director of the DEA; William von Raab, Commissioner of the U.S. Customs Service; Dr. William Pollin, Director of NIDA; and Dr. Robert Niven, Director of NIAAA. With these deliveries, every branch of government was accounted for, and every speaker delineated plans for future direction of their agency's antidrug abuse efforts.

On the second day, the delegates, representing the nations of Argentina, Bahamas, Belize, Brazil, Bolivia, Canada, Chile, Colombia, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Jamaica, Mexico, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Uruguay, and Venezuela participated in panel discussions. The aspects of the drug abuse situation given special emphasis were drug abuse prevention and treatment; drug law enforcement; and narcoterrorism.

Mr. President, every single one of the conference participants made an invaluable contribution to the Western Hemisphere Conference on Narcotics Control. The realization of the impact of drug abuse on society is a new one for some of these nations, but the concern and the determination to find solutions were universal among the countries represented.

Belize, for example, a tiny but troubled nation, was represented by their Deputy Prime Minister and their commissioner of police. Both gentlemen spoke eloquently of their government's awareness of their growing drug production, and consumption, problems, and of their recent efforts to curb drug cultivation and use. Another example is the brave nation of Colombia, represented at the conference by their Vice Minister of Justice. This courageous woman, with whom I had worked on previous occasions, presented in detail the numerous efforts being made by Columbia in its celebrated, and continuously successful, war against drugs.

These were some of the nations making efforts to stop the problem of illicit narcotics internally; there were also nations represented at this conference who have made no effort. While their participation was encouraging, this conference provided an opportunity for nations like Bolivia to be warned that the United States would unequivocally cut off foreign aid funds if they did not take the necessary steps to curb their drug production. I think everyone at the conference will agree that the time has come for serious measures to be taken to stem the tide of drug abuse in our nations.

This mutual sharing of information regarding drug abuse prevention, and treatment, drug law enforcement, and narcoterrorism, and many other aspects of drug abuse, demonstrated how this forum, and others to follow, could be if immeasurable benefit to each of us. And I think that view was generally shared by the conference participants, as just about every delegate expressed the desire for an annual gathering of this kind. I am happy to oblige, and invite my colleagues to share in the benefits of this dialog, and the others to follow.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I would like to take this moment to reflect on the struggles and hardships endured by Soviet Jews.

Each year thousands of Soviet Jews express their desire to emigrate.

Over 20,000 Refuseniks have had their requests denied and have further suffered harassment, job dismissal, school expulsion, and public denouncement as traitors.

It is clear that the Soviet Government has chosen to ignore the Helsinki accords of 1975, and other international human rights agreements, wherein they agreed to respect individual rights to the freedom of religion, cultural practices, and emigration.

As a nation founded on the cause of freedom, we must join together to express our concern for the abuse and mistreatment of Soviet Jews and urge the leaders of the Soviet Union to honor their commitments to human rights.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Saunders, one of his secretaries.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session, the Acting President pro tempore laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(The nominations received today are printed at the end of the Senate proceedings.)

PROPOSED LEGISLATION TO APPROVE THE COMPACT OF FREE ASSOCIATION—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—PM 22

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, together with accompanying papers; which was referred to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources:

To the Congress of the United States:

There is attached a draft of a Joint Resolution to approve the "Compact of Free Association," the negotiated instrument setting forth the future political relationship between the United States and two political jurisdictions of the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands.

The Compact of Free Association is the result of more than fourteen years of continuous and comprehensive negotiations, spanning the administrations of four Presidents. The transmission of the proposed Joint Resolution today, and Congressional enactment of it, marks the last step in the Compact approval process.

The full text of the Compact is part of the draft Joint Resolution, which I request be introduced, referred to the appropriate committees, and enacted. I also request that the Congress note the agreements subsidiary to the Compact. Also attached is a section-by-section analysis to facilitate your consideration of the Compact.

I originally submitted this same draft Joint Resolution to the 98th Congress on March 30, 1984. Before their adjournment, both Houses held extensive hearings on the Joint Resolution. The Administration stands by the policies it outlined during these hearings and hopes that they will serve to expedite consideration and approval of the Compact in this new Congress.

The defense and land use provisions of the Compact extend indefinitely the right of the United States to foreclose access to the area to third countries for military purposes. These provisions are of great importance to our strategic position in the Pacific and enable us to continue preserving regional security and peace.

Since 1947, the islands of the Trust Territory have been administered by the United States under a Trusteeship Agreement with the United Nations Security Council. This Compact of Free Association with the governments of the Marshall Islands and the Federated States of Micronesia would fulfill our commitment under that Agreement to bring about self-government in accordance with the freely expressed wishes of the peoples concerned. Upon termination of the Trusteeship Agreement, another political jurisdiction of Trust Territory—the Northern Mariana Islands—will become a commonwealth of the United States.

The Compact was signed for the United States by Ambassador Fred M. Zeder, II, on October 1, 1982, with the Federated States of Micronesia, and on June 25, 1983, with the Republic of the Marshall Islands. It is the result of negotiations between the United States and broadly representative groups of delegates from the prospective freely associated states.

In 1983, United Nations-observed plebiscites produced high voter participation, and the Compact was approved by impressive majorities. In addition to approval in the plebiscites, the Compact has been approved by the governments of the Marshall Islands and the Federated States of Micronesia in accordance with their constitutional processes.

Enactment of the draft Joint Resolution approving the Compact of Free Association would be a major step leading to the termination of the Trusteeship Agreement with the United Nations Security Council, which the United States entered into by Joint Resolution on July 18, 1947. Therefore, I urge the Congress to approve the Compact of Free Association.

RONALD REAGAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 20, 1985.

MESSAGES FROM THE HOUSE

At 12:39 p.m., a message from the House of Representatives, delivered by Ms. Goetz, one of its reading clerks, announced that pursuant to the provisions of Title 19, United States Code, section 2211, and upon recommendation of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, the Speaker appoints the following members of that committee to be accredited by the President as official advisers to the U.S. delegations to international conferences, meetings, and negotiation sessions relating to trade agreements during the first session of the 99th Congress on the part of the House: Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI, Mr. GIBBONS, Mr. JENKINS, Mr. CRANE, and Mr. FRENZEL.

The message also announced that pursuant to section 8002 of the Internal Revenue Code, the following members of the Committee on Ways and Means have been designated to serve on the Joint Committee on Taxation during the 99th Congress: Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI, Mr. GIBBONS, Mr. PICKLE, Mr. DUNCAN, and Mr. ARCHER.

By Mr. MELCHER (for himself, Mr. GRASSLEY, and Mr. ZORINSKY):

S. Con. Res. 17. A concurrent resolution relating to discount interest rates for distressed agricultural lenders; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. BOREN (for himself and Mr. NICKLES):

S. 476. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to impose a 50 percent nondeductible tax on certain profits realized in connection with corporate takeover attempts, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

TAX ON PROFITS REALIZED IN CONNECTION WITH CORPORATE TAKEOVER ATTEMPTS

● Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to impose a 50-percent nondeductible tax on what are commonly called greenmail profits, realized in connection with two-tier corporate takeover attempts and to make the interest expenses attributable to the indebtedness undertaken in certain hostile attempts nondeductible.

Senator DON NICKLES joins me as an original cosponsor and Congressman JIM JONES has introduced the same legislation in the House of Representatives.

I am concerned that the tax code now confers tax benefits upon those who use precious credit resources in hostile takeover attempts which do not always treat all stockholders alike and which have no apparent benefits to economic productivity. This bill is aimed at stopping the misuse of the current tax code in those situations.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 476

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. EXCISE TAX ON GREENMAIL PROFITS.

(a) GENERAL RULE.—Chapter 46 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to golden parachute payments) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 4999A. GREENMAIL PROFITS.

"(a) IMPOSITION OF TAX.—There is hereby imposed on any person who realizes any greenmail profits a tax equal to 50 percent of the amount of such profits.

"(b) GREENMAIL PROFITS.—For purposes of this section—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—The term 'greenmail profits' means any gain realized by a 4-percent shareholder on the sale or exchange of any stock in the corporation—

"(A) if such shareholder held such stock (as determined under section 1223) for a period of less than 2 years, and

"(B) if, at some time during the 2-year period ending on the date of such sale or exchange, there was a public tender offer for stock in such corporation or a 4-percent shareholder submitted a written proposal to such corporation which suggests or sets forth a plan involving a public tender offer.

"(2) 4-PERCENT SHAREHOLDER.—The term '4-percent shareholder' means any person who owns (directly or through the application of section 318) stock possessing 4 percent or more of the total combined voting power of all classes of stock entitled to vote.

"(3) PUBLIC TENDER OFFER.—The term 'public tender offer' means any offer to purchase (or otherwise acquire) stock in the corporation if such offer was required to be filed or registered with any Federal or State agency regulating securities.

"(c) EXCEPTION FOR CERTAIN SHAREHOLDERS AND EMPLOYEES.—The tax imposed by subsection (a) shall not apply to any gain realized by any person on the sale or exchange of stock in any corporation if, throughout the 1-year period ending on the date of such sale or exchange, such person was—

"(1) an officer, director, or employee of such corporation, or

"(2) a 4-percent shareholder.

"(d) ADMINISTRATIVE PROVISION.—For purposes of subtitle F, any tax imposed by this section shall be treated as a tax imposed by subtitle A."

(b) CLERICAL AMENDMENT.—

(1) Chapter 46 of such Code is amended by striking out the chapter heading and the table of sections and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"CHAPTER 46—GOLDEN PARACHUTE PAYMENTS; GREENMAIL PROFITS

"Sec. 4999. Golden parachute payments.
"Sec. 4999A. Greenmail profits.

(2) The table of chapters for subtitle D of such Code is amended by striking out the item relating to chapter 46 and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"Chapter 46. Golden parachute payments; greenmail profits.

(c) EFFECTIVE DATE.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—The amendments made by this section shall apply to sales and exchanges after February 6, 1985, in taxable years ending after such date.

(2) EXCEPTION FOR CERTAIN AGREEMENTS.—The amendments made by this section shall not apply to any sale or exchange pursuant to a written agreement in existence on February 5, 1985.

SEC. 2. INTEREST ON HOSTILE ACQUISITION INDEBTEDNESS.

(a) GENERAL RULE.—Part IX of subchapter B of chapter 1 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to certain items not deductible) is amended by inserting after section 279 the following new section:

"SEC. 279A. INTEREST ON HOSTILE ACQUISITION INDEBTEDNESS.

"(a) GENERAL RULE.—No deduction shall be allowed for any interest paid or accured during the taxable year with respect to hostile acquisition indebtedness.

"(b) HOSTILE ACQUISITION INDEBTEDNESS.—For purposes of this section—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—The term 'hostile acquisition indebtedness' means any junior obligation issued after February 18, 1985, in connection with a hostile acquisition.

"(2) HOSTILE ACQUISITION.—The term 'hostile acquisition' means any merger, consolidation, acquisition of property or stock, separation, reorganization, distribution of property (whether or not in liquidation), or any similar transaction involving any corporation, and any other person or group of persons acting in concert who acquired during the 12-month period preceding the transaction stock of such corporation representing at least 20 percent of the total combined voting power of all classes of stock entitled to vote, or at least 20 percent of the total fair market value of the shares of all classes of stock (other than nonvoting stock which is limited and preferred as to dividends), of such corporation, but only if the transaction, before consummation, was not formally approved by a majority (consisting of at least 2 members) of the independent members of the board of directors of such corporation. For purposes of the preceding sentence, no member of the board shall be treated as independent if such member is an officer or employee of the corporation or was nominated by the person or group of persons referred in the preceding sentence.

"(3) JUNIOR OBLIGATION.—The term 'junior obligation' means any obligation evidenced by a bond, debenture, note or certificate, or other evidence of indebtedness issued by any person which, upon issuance—

"(A) is expressly subordinated in right of payment to the payment of any substantial amount of unsecured indebtedness, whether outstanding or subsequently issued, of the issuer or the corporation referred to in paragraph (2);

"(B) is indebtedness of a person more than 50 percent of the value of the gross assets of which is (or following the hostile acquisition would be) represented, directly or indirectly, by the stock of the corporation referred to in paragraph (2), cash, and cash equivalents; or

"(C) bears a rating from any nationally recognized rating agency which is at least two ratings inferior to the rating from such agency in respect of any other substantial class of indebtedness of the issuer or the corporation referred to in paragraph (2).

"(c) SPECIAL RULES.—For purposes of paragraph (1) of subsection (b)—

"(1) any extension, renewal, or refinancing of an obligation evidencing a pre-existing obligation shall not be deemed to be the issuance of a new obligation, and

"(2) any obligation which is hostile acquisition indebtedness of the issuer is also hostile acquisition indebtedness of any other person which becomes liable for such obligation as guarantor, endorser, or indemnitor or which assumes liability for such obligation in any transaction."

(b) CLERICAL AMENDMENT.—The table of sections for part IX of subchapter B of chapter 1 of such Code is amended by inserting after the item relating to section 279 the following new item:

"Sec. 279A. Interest on hostile acquisition indebtedness."

(c) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by this section shall apply to interest paid or accrued with respect to obligations issued after February 18, 1985.●

By Mr. ANDREWS (for himself, Mr. LONG, Mr. STEVENS, Mr. FORD, Mr. DECONCINI, Mr. JOHNSTON, Mr. MELCHER, Mr. GORE, and Mr. BENTSEN):

S. 477. A bill to enhance rail competition and to ensure reasonable rail rates where there is an absence of effective competition; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

CONSUMER RAIL EQUITY ACT

● Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, the legislation my colleagues and I are introducing today, the Consumer Rail Equity Act of 1985, represents a broad-based attempt to rectify a gross inequity that is affecting the well-being of industry in every part of the country.

From the coal fields of Appalachia, to the golden plains of the Midwest, to the bounty of the imperial valley, thousands of American business enterprises are feeling the economic pinch of uncontrolled railroad monopoly power.

When Congress approved the landmark Staggers Rail Act in 1980, our intent was to deregulate the American railroad industry, with one very important exception.

Congress recognized that railroad deregulation would leave some shippers and consumers at the mercy of a single carrier for transportation of their goods and services. In short, some consumers and shippers would find themselves captive to that particular railroad's monopoly power. In those situations, Congress directed the Interstate Commerce Commission [ICC] to protect consumers and shippers against the rate abuses of railroad monopoly power. Despite this clear mandate, the ICC has adopted policies which have left monopolized shoppers and consumers virtually unprotected.

The bottom line in this scenario is twofold. The ICC has blatantly ignored the intent of Congress with regard to monopoly rail rates. And in the process, American railroads have reaped wholesale financial benefits at the expense of American consumers.

ICC rulings have caused concern not only for consumers and shippers, but for the Federal courts as well. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia stated in 1981, "The legislation (meaning the Staggers Act) did not strip the Commission of its power and duty to protect shippers from the unreasonable high rates of carriers with market dominance." Burlington Northern Inc. v. U.S., 661 F2d 964, 973 (D.C. Cir. 1981).

As time passed, the indignation of the courts increased. In Arizona Public Service v. U.S., 724 F2d 644 (1984), the same court took exception to an ICC finding of no market dominance. The court, in overturning the ICC decision, found "nothing in the record that might reasonably be viewed as factual support for the position that intramodel competition constrains prices in this case." The court concluded by stating, "the ICC review and dismissal of this challenge bears the earmarks of a hasty route, not the measured passage from the old regime to the new, for which Congress provided." 744 F2d 644 at 655.

Clearly Staggers is not operating as we intended in 1980. Thanks to the ICC's laisses faire approach to its role in implementing the Staggers Act, the railroads have been free to charge excessive rates which have adversely affected farmers and agricultural shippers, mining, and manufacturing companies, small businesses, coal producers, and American consumers in general.

Whatever the form, it is always American consumers who will, in the end, feel the adverse economic impact of monopoly rail rates. When a railroad arbitrarily increases the rate it charges to an electric utility to haul coal to a generating facility, that increase is passed directly onto consumers in the form of a higher electric bill. And many times, that increased transportation cost will show up as a line item on a utility bill under the heading "fuel cost adjustments." And the numbers we are talking about here are substantial indeed.

Consider, that in Texas the total electric utility for the railroad transportation of coal was $16 million in 1976. In 1983, the same bill was a staggering $713 million. During the same period, the per ton rate for the transportation of utility coal went from $11.50 a ton to $24.50 a ton.

Another example, Florida. In 1976, the total electric utility bill for the transportation of coal was $5 million. In 1983, it was $102 million.

It is extremely important to understand that the serious problems associated with monopoly rail power are not restricted to the coal and electric utility industries. The problem is broad in scope and affects a diverse slice of American society.

It affects the phosphate industry in Florida, the potash manufacturer in New Mexico, the huge fruit and vegetable growers in California and thousands of farmers in America's heartland.

Representing an agricultural State such as North Dakota, I know firsthand of the ways in which railroad monopoly power is adversely affecting the livelihoods of American farmers. And I need not tell you that many of these farmers are presently engaged in what amounts to a struggle for economic survival.

Railroads utilizing the free market philosophy of Staggers, are, through anticompetitive practices able to force agricultural shippers out of a competitive environment into situations where they are just as captive to the pricing power of railroads as the coal and utility groups.

A railroad is currently able, merely by failing to renew a switching agreement with another line, to effectively eliminate a form of potential competition for the first carrier. Even the railroads themselves admit the current railroad actions are designed to monopolize traffic. A CEO of a large railroad was quoted as saying "deregulation makes it imperative that you serve markets with your own line, and not through connecting railroads * * * other railroads, are able to freeze you out of the market."

The problem agricultural shippers face is that anticompetitive actions by the railroad also freeze grain and other commodity shippers out of markets.

Railroad monopoly power has the ability to dramatically increase a farmer's cost of doing business. When the price of fertilizer, seeds and other bulk commodities that are essential to a farmer's operations increase as a result of excessive rail rates, the obvious result is increased operating expenses for the farmers.

Excessive rail rates hit America's farmers in another critical way. Farmers are generally at the mercy of large-scale buyers as to the price they get for their products. What many people do not understand is that farmers have very little control with regard to pricing. When large-scale grain buyers are faced with excessive rail transportation rates, it does not take an economist to figure out who suffers the consequences. For the American farmer, the result is a smaller slice of pie. For the American consumer, the result is higher prices for an assortment of grain-related products. Excessive rail rates are also inhibiting our ability to export agricultural products. And in so doing, we are further contributing to the crisis facing American farmers, we are adding to our recordbreaking trade imbalance and we are simultaneously fueling the Federal budget deficit.

I am also concerned with the probability of future rate increases and how unrestrained increases will affect the rail movement of agricultural commodities.

At the present time, much of the grain moved by rail, is being moved at very competitive prices. The ICC, however, has given the impression that they might be willing to apply the coal rate guidelines to the movement of grain.

In the coal rate guidelines the ICC suggested that the upper limit for rail rates should be the stand alone cost, which is the cost that would be incurred if the shipper was forced to build its own railroad.

In the pending ICC proceeding McCarty Farms, Inc. v. BN Inc. (Docket Nos. 37809 and 37809 (DUB.-NO.1)). The ICC asked for comments on whether it should apply the coal rate guidelines to captive grain. On November 10, 1983, in its answer, Burlington Northern stated:

> There is no conceptual or legal justification for regulating market dominant coal traffic differently than other market dominant traffic under the statutory scheme of the Interstate Commerce Act. The Congress has chosen to make no distinction between maximum rate regulation on coal as compared with grain, as it has done, for example with recyclables. Thus, the defendant sees no economic or legal justification for finding these grain rates unreasonable.

The numerous problems associated with monopoly rail rates, and the increasing court concern with ICC implementation of the Staggers Act, mandate the serious attention of this Congress. The Consumer Rail Equity Act of 1985 has been developed to deal with these problems in a manner that reflects the will and intent of Congress as stipulated in the Staggers Rail Act.

This legislative package is not an attempt to reregulate the railroads. Rather, this bill merely reaffirms the responsibility of the ICC in its implementation of the Staggers Act—a deregulation improvement act.

The matter of excessive rail rates brought on by monopoly rail power is a pervasive problem that affects millions of American consumers. Our response to this very real problem, in the form of the Consumer Rail Equity Act of 1985, comes not a moment too soon.

I strongly urge my colleagues to join me in supporting this essential legislation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill, a section-by-section analysis, a list of supporters of this legislation, and material from the National Governers' Association be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 477

Be it enacted by the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act be cited as the "Consumer Rail Equity Act".

SEC. 2. PURPOSE.

The purpose of this Act is to clarify and reaffirm the intent of the Congress that the Railroad Revitalization and Regulatory Reform Act of 1976 and the Staggers Rail Act of 1980 be interpreted and implemented in a manner which will—

(1) revitalize the national railroad system,

(2) ensure adequate service to the public,

(3) provide an opportunity for the nation's railroads to earn adequate revenues under honest, economical and efficient management, and

(4) enhance the availability of competitive alternatives, under a balanced approach that encourages and promotes intramodal competition while providing adequate protection for persons served by market dominant rail carriers.

SEC. 3. MARKET DOMINANCE.

(a) DEFINITION OF MARKET DOMINANCE.—Section 10709(a) of title 49, United States Code, is amended by inserting "(1)" after "(a)" and by adding at the end thereof the following: "In determining the existence or absence of effective competition, the Commission shall consider only transportation competition for movement of the same commodity from the same point of origin to the same destination.

"(2) If a person challenging a rate demonstrates, with respect to the transportation to which the rate applies, that alternative non-circuitous rail service is not available from the same point of origin to the same destination (excluding transportation by or over the lines of any rail carrier that participates in the transportation to which the rate applies), the rail carrier(s) charging or proposing such rate shall be presumed to have market dominance over the transportation to which the challenged rate applies unless the rail carrier(s) charging or proposing the rate show(s) and the Commission finds that effective competition exists from other carriers or modes of transportation for the transportation to which the rate applies."

(b) PROCEDURE.—(1) Section 10709(b) of such title is amended by striking out "under section 10707 of this title to investigate" and inserting in lieu thereof "initiated to consider".

(2) The first sentence of section 10709(c) is amended by striking out "may then determine" and inserting in lieu thereof "shall determine".

SEC. 4. RATE REASONABLENESS.

(a) BURDEN OF PROOF.—Section 10701a(b)(2) is amended to read as follows:

"(2) In any proceeding to determine the reasonableness of a rate described in paragraph (1) of this subsection, the rail carrier establishing the challenge rate shall have the burden of proving that such rate is reasonable."

(b) DIFFERENTIAL RATES.—Section 10701a(b) is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(4) The Commission may not determine a rate to be reasonable for purposes of this section if such rate exceeds the fully-allocated cost of the transportation to which the rate applies, unless the Commission finds, with respect to the challenged rate, that the differential in excess of fully-allocated cost is not greater than that which would result were the rail carrier, to the extent practicable, to equitably allocate the burden of producting revenues required to achieve or maintain revenue adequacy—

"(A) to the challenged rate, and

"(B) to all other rates which yield a revenue-variable cost percentage in excess of 180 percent (or such lower percentage as may be in effect under section 10709(d)(2)).".

(c) DETERMINATION PROCESS.—(1) Section 10701a(b)(3) is amended by inserting ", including the policy" after "title" and by inserting "be allowed to" before "earn".

(2) Section 10701a(b) (as amended by subsection (b)) is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(5) In determining whether a rate described in paragraph (1) is reasonable, the Commission shall make specific findings with respect to—

"(A) the consistency of such rate (and such determination) with (i) each element of the rail transportation policy in section 10101a at issue in the proceeding, and (ii) the factors described in section 10707a(e)(2)(C); and

"(B) where applicable, the factors described in paragraph (4)."

(d) AMENDMENTS TO RAIL TRANSPORTATION POLICY.—(1) Section 10101a of such title is amended by striking out "and the demand for services" in paragraph (1); by inserting ", consistent with paragraph (6)," after "minimize" in paragraph (2); and by amending paragraph (6) to read as follows:

"(6) to maintain reasonable rates where there is an absence of effective competition;".

(2) Paragraph (15) of such section is amended to read as follows:

"(15) to encourage and promote competitive transportation rates for both domestic energy supplies and domestically produced agricultural commodities in order to increase their competitive position in both import and export markets."

(e) ACCOUNTING; INFLATION ADJUSTMENTS.—(1) Section 10707a(a)(2)(B) of such title is amended by inserting "actual cost experience and" after "reflect"; by inserting "and changes in railroad productivity, volume, and product mix" after "labor,"; and by inserting " , or for the fourth quarter of 1984," after "1982".

(2) Section 10707a(b) is amended by adding at the end of such subsection the following new paragraph:

"(4) If, and to the extent that, a rail rate has been changed under this subsection, or pursuant to section 10706 or 10712 of this title, such rate shall be reduced to the extent of any subsequent decreases in the rail cost adjustment factor. The Commission shall take such actions as may be necessary to ensure compliance with this paragraph. Such Commission actions shall not be deemed to constitute the prescription of maximum rates, and shall be without prejudice to the implementation of individual rate increases under any other provision of this title."

(3) Section 10709(d)(3) of such title is amended to read as follows:

"(3) For purposes of this subtitle, in determining the revenue-variable cost percentage for a particular rail carrier transportation, variable costs shall be determined using the Commission's Rail Form A cost-finding methodology in effect as of February 20, 1985, until changed in accordance with cost accounting principles established by the Railroad Accounting Principles Board under section 11162 which have been implemented, in accordance with section 11163, by Commission order which is final and no longer subject to judicial review."

(4) Section 10712(a) of such title is amended by inserting before the period at the end thereof the following: "and shall take into account changes in railroad productivity, volume, and output mix, and actual cost experience".

(f) TIME LIMITS.—(1) Section 10327(a) of such title is amended by inserting "(1)" after "(a)" and by inserting after the first sentence of subsection (a) the following new sentence: "Paragraph (2) of this subsection applies to any such matter involving rail rates."

(2) Such subsection is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(2) Except to the extent that a shorter period is applicable under section 10707(b), the Commission shall complete any rail rate proceeding and make its final decision therein by the end of the 12th month after the proceeding is commenced."

SEC. 5. STANDARDS AND PROCEDURES FOR DETERMINING REVENUE ADEQUACY.

(a) STANDARDS AND PROCEDURES FOR DETERMINATION.—Section 10704(a) of such title is amended in the first sentence of paragraph (2) thereof by striking out "and economic profit or return (or both)" and inserting in lieu thereof "return"; and by striking out paragraphs (3) and (4) thereof and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(3) The standards and procedures respecting revenue adequacy and any action of the Commission pursuant to this subsection to determine the revenue levels that are adequate for a rail carrier within the meaning of this paragraph, shall provide—

"(A) for identification of revenues, expenses and investment base reasonably related to providing rail transportation service;

"(B) for including in the investment base of a rail carrier only those assets reasonably related to providing rail transportation service valued at original cost depreciated using straight-line depreciation over the economic life of the assets, less the amount of the deferred tax reserves of the rail carrier resulting from the use of accelerated depreciation; and

"(C) that in establishing return on investment base, the cost of capital of such carrier shall be determined using the actual cost of debt capital, and reasonable estimates of the current cost of equity capital to such rail carrier.

"(4) In any action by the Commission to determine revenue levels that are adequate for a rail carrier, the Commission shall inquire into, consider, and specifically comment on the validity of its determination with respect to—

"(A) the factors described in section 10707a(e)(2)(C), and

"(B) indicators of financial health, including but not limited to—

"(i) bond ratings, fixed charge coverage, operating ratios, debt to equity ratios, return on investment base, return on shareholders' equity, and return on total capitalization; and

"(ii) actions taken with respect to any merger or other acquisition of other business interests, and the source and cost of capital employed in any such acquisition.

"(5)(A) The Commission shall on an annual basis determine which rail carriers are earning adequate revenues and which carriers are earning inadequate revenues. The Commission shall also determine for each rail carrier the revenues required to achieve or maintain revenue adequacy within the meaning of this subsection.

"(B) Before making a determination under subparagraph (A) with respect to a rail carrier, the Commission shall—

"(i) require such carrier to submit information in a form consistent with and appropriate to the discharge of the Commission's responsibilities under this paragraph and paragraphs (3) and (4), and

"(ii) provide notice and an opportunity for public comment on such information and on the revenue adequacy of such carrier."

(b) CONFORMING AMENDMENTS.—Section 10701a(b)(3), Section 10707a(d)(3) (A) and (B) and section 10707a(e)(1) are each amended by inserting "through (5)" after "10704(a)(2)".

SEC. 6. EXEMPTIVE AUTHORITY.

Section 10505 of such title is amended by striking out "shall exempt" and inserting in lieu thereof "may exempt" in subsection (a); by inserting "or other persons" after "shippers" in subsection (a)(2)(B); by striking out "or" before "(2)" in subsection (g); and by inserting before the period at the end of subsection (g) the following: ", or (3) to issue any exemption with respect to any transportation unless the Commission has specifically determined that the rail carrier does not have market dominance over such transportation (within the meaning of section 10709(a)), except that the Commission may issue an exemption without making such determination if adequate public and other appropriate notice has been given and no interested person has objected to such exemption within such reasonable period as may be specified in the notice".

SEC. 7. ENHANCEMENT OF COMPETITION.

(a) JOINT RATES.—Section 10705 of such title is amended by redesignating subsections (g) and (h) as subsections (h) and (i), respectively, and by inserting after subsection (f) the following new subsection:

"(g) Notwithstanding any other provision of this section, in order to achieve the objective of greater intramodal railroad competition, any rail carrier providing service under a single line rate, or a joint line rate, on a particular category of traffic, between an origin and destination, upon request of a rail carrier having an actual or practicable interchange connection with such rail carrier between such origin and destination (or upon request of a shipper or receiver), shall either participate in at least one competitive joint rail rate via such interchange on such traffic with such connecting rail carrier between such points or shall publish a competitive proportional rate on such traffic to or from such interchange point. Such joint rate or proportional rate shall be conclusively deemed competitive if the ratio of revenue to variable costs realized from the division of the joint rate or from the proportional rate is no higher than that realized from the rail carrier's single line rate, or its division of such existing joint rate, between such origin and destination.

(b) TERMINAL FACILITIES AND RECIPROCAL SWITCHING.—

(1) Section 11103(a) of such title is amended to read as follows:

"(a) Notwithstanding any other provision of this subtitle, upon petition of any interested rail carrier, shipper, receiver, or other party directly impacted, the Commission shall require terminal facilities, including main-line tracks, for a reasonable distance outside of a terminal, owned by a rail carrier providing transportation in interstate or foreign commerce, to be used by another rail carrier, if the Commission finds that use to be practicable and necessary for the provision of alternative competitive rail service by the latter carrier, or otherwise in the public interest, without substantially impairing the ability of the rail carrier owning the facilities or entitled to use the facilities to handle its own business. The Commission shall take final action upon any petition requesting the Commission to require such use no later than 180 days after the filing of such petition with the Commission. The carriers are responsible for establishing the conditions and compensation for use of the facilities. However, if the carriers cannot agree, the Commission shall establish conditions and compensation for use of the facilities. Such compensation shall not exceed the costs incurred by the owning carrier in making its facilities available for use by the other carrier (including both variable costs and an allocated share of the fixed costs and a reasonable return, associated with the facilities actually being used by the other carrier). The Commission shall take final action to fix such conditions and compensation within 90 days after any party requests it to do so. The compensation shall be paid or adequately secured before a carrier may begin to use the facilities of another carrier under this section."

(2) Section 11103 of such title is further amended by striking out subsection (c)(1) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(c)(1) Upon petition of any interested rail carrier, shipper, receiver, or other party directly impacted, the Commission shall establish the compensation for reciprocal switching performed by a rail carrier at a level not to exceed the percentage then in effect under section 10709(d)(2) of the system average variable costs for such service, unless that carrier demonstrates that a higher level of compensation is reasonable and necessary for such switching service.

"(2) No rail carrier may cancel a reciprocal switching agreement except upon a minimum of 45 days' notice to the general public through appropriate tariff publications, unless the carrier can demonstrate that the continuation of reciprocal switching is not practicable or is unnecessary to provide alternative competitive rail service. The Commission shall suspend for investigation a proposed cancellation of a reciprocal switching agreement if it determines that a shipper has utilized or would utilize such reciprocal switching for a significant portion of its current or future rail transportation needs at the facility or facilities affected by the proposed cancellation.

"(3) Upon petition of any interested rail carrier, shipper, receiver, or any other party directly impacted, the Commission shall require rail carriers to enter into reciprocal switching agreements where it finds such agreements to be practicable and in the public interest, or where such agreements are necessary to provide alternative competitive rail service. The Commission shall take final action upon any petition requesting the Commission to require rail carriers to enter into reciprocal switching agreements no later than 180 days after the filing of such petition with the Commission.

(d)(1) In determining whether use of terminal facilities or reciprocal switching shall be provided or maintained under this section, the Commission shall not consider the adequacy of any rail carrier's revenues, or the alleged existence of competition other than direct rail competition between the origin and destination of the traffic involved."

SEC. 8. ABANDONMENT PROCEDURE.

(a) ONE YEAR MORATORIUM AFTER DENIAL OF ABANDONMENT.—Section 10904(a)(1) of such title is amended by inserting "(A)" after "(a)(1)" and by adding at the end thereof the following new subparagraph:

"(B) A rail carrier may not file an application under subparagraph (A) with respect to any railroad line or rail transportation included in any prior application denied under this section until one year has elapsed after such denial has become final, unless such carrier shows a substantial change in circumstances that is material to abandonment of such line or transportation."

(b) LOCAL HEARING.—Section 10904(c) of such title is amended in paragraph (1) by striking out "45" and inserting "60" and by inserting "conduct a hearing under paragraph (4), and" before "determine"; in paragraph (2), by striking out "75" and inserting "90"; by redesignating paragraph (4) as paragraph (5); and by adding after paragraph (3) the following new paragraph:

"(4) On request of protestants who are located in any community affected by the abandonment, the Commission shall provide in one or more of such communities an opportunity for hearing on the proposed abandonment, unless the Commission for good cause finds that such a hearing is impracticable or unnecessary. The Commission may employ or contract with persons who are not regular, fulltime officers or employees of the United States for purposes of presiding at hearings under this paragraph. The rail carrier proposing the abandonment shall reimburse the Commission for the cost incurred in conducting such hearing."

(c) LINE SPECIFIC FINANCIAL DATA.—Section 10904(d)(1) of such title is amended by inserting "(A)" after "(d)(1)" and by adding at the end thereof the following new subparagraph:

"(B) In any proceeding under this section, the Commission shall base its determination upon financial data respecting the facility proposed to be abandoned rather than system-wide or industry-wide averages. The rail carrier proposing the abandonment shall file such data as may be necessary to permit the Commission to make such determination."

SEC. 9. STATE AUTHORITY.

(a) REQUIREMENT OF CONSISTENCY.—Section 11501(b) of such title is amended to read as follows:

"(b)(1) A State authority exercising jurisdiction over intrastate transportation provided by a rail carrier which also provides transportation subject to the jurisdiction of the Commission under subchapter I of chapter 105 of this title shall do so consistently with the provisions of this subtitle.

"(2) Any decision of a State authority exercising jurisdiction over intrastate rates, classifications, rules, and practices for intrastate transportation described in paragraph (1) of this subsection, upon petition of a party to its proceeding, shall be reviewed by the Commission to determine whether the State authority has entered a decision inconsistent with the provisions of this subtitle."

(b) SCOPE OF ICC REVIEW.—Section 11501(c) is amended to read as follows:

"(c) Within 120 days after the receipt of a petition under paragraph (b)(2) of this section, the Commission shall take action on any such petition, applying the same scope of review as that of a reviewing court as set forth in section 706 of title 5 for review of a decision of an administrative agency. If the Commission determines that the State authority's decision is inconsistent with the provisions of this subtitle, it may vacate the decision of the State authority and shall remand the matter for further proceedings."

SEC. 10. TRANSITIONAL PROVISIONS.

(a) GENERAL RULE.—Except as provided in subsection (b), the amendments made by this Act shall apply to any rail rate in effect on or after February 20, 1985, including any rail rate which is subject to a proceeding pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission or any court on such date.

(b) SECTION 229 RATES.—The amendments made by this Act shall not apply to a rate in effect on the effective date of the Staggers Rail Act of 1980 and not challenged during the 180 day period beginning on such effective date in accordance with section 229 of such Act, except that a party to a contract entered into during such 180 day period, or in effect on the last day of such 180 day period, may challenge a rate that would apply at the expiration of such contract.

(c) LIMITATIONS ON REPARATIONS.—The Commission shall have no authority to award reparations under section 11705 of title 49, United States Code, for any period prior to the date of enactment of this Act unless reparations could have been ordered by the Commission for any such prior period pursuant to its authority in effect prior to the enactment of this Act.

CONSUMER RAIL EQUITY ACT: SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS

INTRODUCTION AND OVERVIEW

The Consumer Rail Equity Act is a midcourse adjustment in the operation and implementation of the Staggers Rail Act of 1980. The purpose of this legislation is to reaffirm the balance that was carefully struck in the Staggers Rail Act of 1980 between the needs of large and small railroads, shippers, receivers and consumers, while preserving the fundamental structure and premises of the current law. The legislation's goal is to continue and enhance the Staggers Act's emphasis on permitting competitive market forces to govern the terms and conditions of rail freight service wherever possible, while providing a measure of practical protection for those shippers who remain subject to railroad monopoly power—as Congress also intended in enacting the Staggers Act.

The bill does not change the present statutory threshold for Interstate Commerce Commission jurisdiction over maximum rail rates, and thus does not seek to extend regulatory authority to any rates that are not subject to Commission review under present law. This legislation does not extend regulation to rates that are below the Commission's present jurisdictional threshold and continues the deregulation of contract rates that was established by the Staggers Act.

The most significant changes from present Commission practice and law that are proposed in the bill include a more realistic and market-based test of railroad revenue adequacy than the test being employed by the Commission, a simplification of the Commission's interpretation of the market dominance test to eliminate consideration of product and geographic competition, a shifting of the burden of proof with respect to rate reasonableness from the captive shipper to the railroad, and standard for maximum rate reasonableness to assure that those shippers, receivers and consumers who must bear most of the burden of helping the railroads achieve revenue adequacy are treated equitably.

The bill also enhances the availability of competitive rail opportunities for shippers and receivers and assists in the current transition to more accurate and cost-based railroad accounting. Several procedural improvements are proposed, including improvements in abandonment proceedings and the standard for ICC review of State commission rulings on intrastate rail rates. Finally, the bill assures that the national rail transportation policy which is embodied in the Staggers Act is consistent with other national goals of assuring competitive transportation rates for domestic energy supplies and domestically produced agricultural commodities.

SECTION 1—SHORT TITIE

This section provides that the bill may be cited as "The Consumer Rail Equity Act."

SECTION 2—PURPOSE

This section reaffirms the goals of the Railroad Revitalization and Regulatory Reform Act of 1976 [the 4R Act] and the Staggers Rail Act of 1980, and declares the intent of Congress that this bill shall assure that the previous two Acts are administered in a balanced manner that both provides adequate protection for those subject to railroad monopoly power and maximizes the opportunities for intramodal competition.

SECTION 3—MARKET DOMINANCE

This section is intended to simplify and streamline the procedure by which the Commission determines whether a rail carrier has market dominance over the transportation to which a rate applies. Under both present and proposed law, the Commission has jurisdiction over only those rates where the shipper is paying above a specified amount and the ICC finds the shipper is paying above a specified amount and the ICC finds the shipper to be subject to railroad market dominance. There is no change proposed to the provision of present law (49 USC 10701a(b)(1)) that a rate may not be challenged as exceeding a reasonable maximum unless the Commission first finds market dominance. There is also no change proposed to the conclusive presumption in 49 USC 10709(d) that market dominance is presumed not to exist if the rate yields a revenue-variable cost ratio below an annually calculated figure known as the cost recovery percentage, which is currently 180 percent, the maximum allowed under the Staggers Rail Act.

This section would eliminate, however, the current Commission practice of allowing a railroad to challenge the presence of market dominance by alleging that the shipper can use a different product (such as fuel oil instead of coal) or purchase the same product from a different geographic region (such as grain from the midwest rather than grain from the northern tier states). Under the present ICC practice, the shipper must prove the absence of product and geographic competition when the railroad has made the allegation. In effect, the shipper must prove all the elements of an antitrust case, which is costly, time consuming and intimidating, particularly to smaller shippers. Perhaps for that reason, the Commission that implemented the 4R Act, which first introduced the concept of "market dominance", determined to consider only competition in transportation.

The bill directs the Commission to confine its market dominance inquiry to the assessment of whether the rail transportation is subject to competition from other rail carriers or other modes of transportation such as trucks or barges. Under the "market dominance" test provided in the legislation, there will be a rebuttable presumption of market dominance when the shipper or receiver challenging the rate demonstrates that its shipment is captive to a single rail facility for at least part of the movement. The rail carrier or carriers can then rebut the presumption by demonstrating that economically viable alternatives exist for rail transportation from other rail carriers or other modes of transportation.

This section also requires that the Commission make its market dominance determination within ninety days of the initiation of all proceedings challenging the reasonableness of a rate that is charged to a captive shipper. Under current law and practice, the Commission must complete its determination within ninety days only if it institutes an investigation of the rate after a complaint is received.

SECTION 4—RATE REASONABLENESS

A persistent complaint about the present administration and interpretation of the law has been the Interstate Commerce Comissions standard for determining the reasonableness of a rate that is being charged a captive shipper. The Commission has embraced a philosophy of maximum rate reasonableness based almost entirely on demand for rail freight service, rendering the cost to the railroad of providing the transportation nearly irrelevant as a rate-making consideration. No other regulated industry enjoys such freedom from cost scrutiny. In almost all other instances in which a company possesses monopoly power—and Congress recognized in Staggers that railroads continue to possess monopoly power with regard to captive shippers—cost-based regulation has been employed to discipline abuses of that monopoly power.

The intent of this bill is not to impose utility-type rate of return-based regulation upon market dominant carriers. The conclusive presumption that no market dominance can be found for a rate yielding revenues between 170 and 180 percent of variable cost, which precludes the Commission from even entertaining a complaint about a rate below that level, represents a fundamental policy judgment of the Staggers Rail Act that some shippers and receivers will be required to pay a greater share of the revenues needed to develop and sustain a sound national rail transportation system.

This bill does not revisit that policy decision of the Congress. This legislation does not quarrel with the jurisdictional threshold of the Staggers Act or with the judgment that some shippers and receivers, and by extension some consumers, should pay more than others for rail transportation. Section 4 of the bill does, however, alter the method by which the Commission has been reviewing the reasonableness of rates of carriers possessing monopoly power. The Consumer Rail Equity Act requires the Commission to give careful attention to the railroads' costs and revenue needs and to the manner in which the burden of producing needed revenues is allocated among captive shippers.

To assure that captive shippers are provided the protections intended by Congress in the Staggers Rail Act, the Consumer Rail Equity Act proposes several changes to present Commission practice. First, section 4 shifts the burden of proving the reasonableness of a challenged rate in all instances to the rail carrier, which is in a better position to supply the necessary information, including the cost of providing the service and the amount of traffic that is captive. This section also directs the Commission to make affirmative findings in support of its rate reasonableness decision, on the consistency of the rate with any of the fifteen elements of the national rail transportation policy (49 USC 10101a) that have been put in issue, and on the consistency of the rate with the "Long-Cannon factors." (The Long-Cannon factors were the result of a careful compromise during the Senate debate on the Staggers Rail Act. These provisions direct the Commission, in determining maximum rate reasonableness, to consider the amount of a railroad's traffic that is inefficiently priced and whether one commodity is bearing a disproportionate share of the carrier's revenue burden.)

If the challenged rate is above the railroad's fully allocated cost of providing the service (as well as above the jurisdictional threshold provided in the Staggers Act) the Commission must make certain findings in order to approve the rate as reasonable. It must find that the carrier needs to charge rates above its fully allocated cost to achieve or maintain revenue adequacy, and if so, it must also find that the rate being charged is no greater than it would be if the railroad's revenue adequacy burden were equitably distributed, to the maximum extent practicable, across all of its captive traffic, including the traffic in question. This standard, together with conforming changes to the national rail transportation policy, is designed to end the current regulatory focus on demand-based rate reasonableness to the exclusion of cost considerations, and, in particular, to end the use of any "stand-alone cost" standard of maximum rate reasonableness.

To assure accurate and expeditious proceedings, the Commission is directed (1) to continue to use its existing Rail Form A costing methodology until it has implemented the standards that shall be promulgated by the Railroad Accounting Principles Board which is authorized under 49 USC 11163, and (2) to complete any rate reasonableness proceeding within twelve months. The current time limits for completing an investigation would continue to apply to those proceedings. The Railroad Accounting Principles Board was constituted in November, 1984 and should complete its work in approximately two years.

Finally, this legislation expands one of the fifteen national goals to be achieved in the implementation of the Staggers Rail Act of 1980. This legislation provides that the fifteenth stated goal is expanded to include "competitive transportation rates for both domestic energy supplies and domestically produced agricultural products." When making a rate reasonableness determination, the ICC must make an affirmative finding that the rate is consistent with the achievement of these goals.

SECTION 5—STANDARDS AND PROCEDURES FOR DETERMINING REVENUE ADEQUACY

A critical goal of both the Railroad Revitalization and Regulatory Reform Act of 1976 and the Staggers Rail Act of 1980 was the attainment, by our nation's railroads, of "revenue adequacy." Section 10704 thus directs the Interstate Commerce Commission to determine regularly which carriers are receiving adequate revenues, that is, revenues that are sufficient "under honest, economical, and efficient management," to recover operating expenses, including depreciation and the replacement of obsolete assets, together with a "reasonable and economic profit or return (or both) on capital employed in the business."

The administrative standard now used to determine whether a railroad is revenue adequate—the current cost of capital measured against the railroad's investment base—does not realistically measure the true financial condition of a railroad, and tends to materially understate the "adequacy" of the railroad's revenues. The perhaps inevitable result is that the Commission currently finds all major railroads to be revenue inadequate, including some railroads which by other, more realistic measures and by the recent acquisition history of their holding companies appear to be financially secure. This is a matter of substantial concern to captive shippers since a judgment of the Congress in the Staggers Act was that a railroad's captive traffic must make the total contribution to the attainment of revenue adequacy that a railroad's competitive traffic cannot make.

Accordingly, section 5 of the bill seeks to assure that revenue adequacy determinations are based upon realistic measurements of a railroad's financial health. This very well may be the most important element in the Consumer Rail Equity Act because this analysis will determine the extra burden that must be carried by captive shippers. The revenue adequacy determination is to be made annually and shall allow for adequate public comment on the non-proprietary information submitted by the railroads. In making revenue adequacy determinations and applying them in administering the law, the Commission shall identify revenues, expenses and the investment base reasonably related to providing rail service, and place railroads on the same footing as any other industry by valuing assets at original cost reduced by straight line depreciation. In determining the cost of capital, the Commission shall use actual or embedded cost of debt (rather than the present practice of using current cost of debt, which gives a railroad a windfall for all of its debt for which it is paying less than the current rate) and reasonable estimates of the cost of equity.

This section would also expand the present scope of the Commission's examination of a railroad by requiring it to inquire into and consider several indicators of financial health routinely used in financial analysis, such as operating ratios, fixed charge coverage, debt/equity ratios, bond ratings and merger and acquisition activity. The Long-Cannon factors are to be applied in making revenue adequacy determinations. If a railroad is pricing an excess of its traffic inefficiently, the revenue shortfall attributable to that practice should not be considered in deciding whether the carrier is otherwise revenue adequate.

These broader inquiries do not dictate any particular outcome, but they should assist in producing more complete assessments of revenue adequacy.

Finally, to assist the Commission in its rate reasonableness proceedings, which under section 4 of the bill will not include a specific assessment of whether a challenged rate that is above fully allocated cost is bearing more than an equitable share of the railroad's revenue burden, the revenue adequacy determination is to include a specific Commission finding on the extent of revenues required to achieve or maintain revenue adequacy.

SECTION 6—EXEMPTIVE AUTHORITY

The Commission is directed in 49 USC 10505 to pursue exemptions from regulation where the regulation is not necessary to carry out the transportation policy set out in section 10101a, and is either (a) of limited scope or (b) no longer needed to protect shippers from abuse of railroad market power. This section would provide that an exemption "may" be issued if the Commission finds there is no market dominance (within the meaning of section 10709, as amended by section 3 of the bill) over the transportation involved in the exemption. This section also provides that the Commission should consider whether persons other than shippers (including receivers and consumers) require protection from abuse of railroad market power sufficiently to deny issuance of an exemption.

These changes are intended to prevent the use of the exemption power in circumstances where competitive forces do not exist to discipline railroad monopoly power effectively.

SECTION 7—ENHANCEMENT OF COMPETITION

A sound national rail transportation system involves a great amount of interdependence among carriers. The majority of rail freight shipments travel over the lines of at least two carriers, and thus require some interchange or switching arrangement between the participating carriers. The carriers also have a variety of methods of quoting one single rate—called a joint rate, with individual rates for each carrier's share of the movement.

In many major metropolitan areas or terminal areas, two (or more) carriers with long haul lines into the area can serve shippers on each other's lines if they agree to allow one another access to each other's lines in the area or if one carrier otherwise agrees to act as a switching agent for the other carrier. Thus, the carriers can enter into a reciprocal switching agreement, allowing mutual access to each other's shippers, or a terminal facilities agreement, where one carrier is paid a reasonable price for switching the other carrier's traffic to reach shippers located a short distance away on its lines.

The widest possible use of these various inter-railroad practices is essential to providing shippers and receivers with competitive alternatives and is essential to the maintenance of efficiency. Current law contains several provisions to assure that rail carriers do not cancel or refuse to enter into these arrangements for anticompetitive reasons. This section of the Consumer Rail Equity Act would strengthen these provisions.

This section would amend 49 USC 10705 to provide that, on request of a connecting railroad or a shipper or receiver, a railroad shall quote a competitive joint rate or proportional rate if interchange of the traffic is practicable. The quoted rate will be deemed conclusively to meet the "competitive" standard if the carrier's revenue-variable cost ratio for the quoted rate is no greater than the ratio for the carrier's existing joint rate or single line rate. Neither the intention nor the effect will be to force any carrier to carry traffic at noncompensatory rates, because section 10705a permits a carrier to unilaterally cancel or surcharge any noncompensatory joint rate. Rather, the intent and effect will be to assure that carriers do not use pricing techniques such as cancelling a joint rate or refusing to quote a joint rate to close off a competitive alternative to the shipper or receiver.

This section would also modify existing law regarding reciprocal switching and use of terminal facilities. The Commission's current discretion to order such arrangements is changed to a mandatory direction that the Commission shall order such arrangements when it finds they would be either practicable and in the public interest, or necessary to provide competitive rail service. The effect on competition should be salutary, giving a shipper or receiver in a major metropolitan or terminal area the option of choosing between two or more carriers providing line haul service.

SECTION 8—ABANDONMENT PROCEDURE

A railroad line (or other facility) that is proposed to be abandoned is typically a line that is of little interest to the abandoning carrier, perhaps because the line is not profitable. However, the facility to be abandoned is often of great importance to the shippers and communities served by the line. Because the impact on a community and its economy can be devastating, an abandonment decision deserves the most careful consideration.

The changes in this section make no change in substantive law. The railroad must continue to carry the burden of proving that the line to be abandoned is (1) uneconomic and (2) that the abandonment is in the public interest. This section is intended to give the Interstate Commerce Commission the most accurate record on which to base its abandonment decision, consistent with the obvious need to permit railroads to discontinue service expeditiously on truly money-losing facilities that lack commitment from the affected communities.

Three procedural changes are made. First, in order to clarify that abandonment proceedings are not to be instruments in a war of attrition, a railroad must wait one year after denial of an abandonment application before refiling to abandon the same facility, unless it can show that circumstances have materially changed since the unsuccessful application was denied. Second, if the abandonment is contested, the Commission must allow a hearing on the impact of the proposed abandonment on community or rural development (the standard set by current law) in one or more of the communities affected. The Commission may contract with outside parties to preside at the hearing, and the railroad proposing the abandonment must pay the expenses of the hearing. Third, the financial data used in deciding whether to permit the abandonment must be based on the revenues from and cost of operating the facility at issue, rather than system-wide or industry/wide averages.

SECTION 9—STATE AUTHORITY

This section will streamline procedures respecting State jurisdiction over intrastate rail transportation. The fundamental goal of present law is unchanged: a state commission exercising regulatory jurisdiction over intrastate rail transportation pursuant to state law must do so consistently with the provisions of federal law governing interstate rail transportation. This section would simplify the achievement of this goal by eliminating the time-consuming process of Interstate Commerce Commission certification that a state's law, rules and practice are consistent with the federal law. Instead, this section eliminates bureaucratic delays and protects the dignity of the state process by relying upon ICC review of state decisions to assure uniformity of implementation. The ICC's review is limited to an appellate function analogous to that of a court reviewing an administrative agency decision under the Administrative Procedure Act, including a provision for remand of any inconsistent decision to the state agency. The ICC is given 120 days to dispose of any appeal from a state agency decision, thus assuring prompt and effective review.

SECTION 10—TRANSITIONAL PROVISIONS

This section provides for a straightforward transition from current law to the changes made by the bill. The new law is to be applied to any rate in effect on or after February 20, 1985, the date of the bill's introduction, including a rate at issue in a case pending at the Commission (and by extension, pending before a state agency) or on appeal to the courts.

This section addresses one other transitional issue. Section 229 of the Staggers Rail Act provides that any rate not challenged within 180 days after enactment of the Act, or any rate so challenged and found by the Commission to be either reasonable or not subject to market dominance, would be deemed forever lawful and not subject to challenge. Over 800 so-called "Section 229" challenges were filed, very few if any of them successfully, and some rates were not challenged because they were covered by a contract entered into or in effect during the 180 day period.

This section will not affect any railroad contract covering the tariff in question. However, many of these contracts are expiring and, under present law, many of these tariffs would become operative again. This section would correct the inequity of shielding from review those rates that were unsuccessfully challenged under the current standards or not challenged because of the presence of a contract, while allowing any other rate to be judged by the revised standards of this bill. Any rate which was included in a section 229 complaint can be reviewed under the changes made by this bill. Any rate not challenged under section 229 because of a contract can also be reviewed under this bill's standards. The contract itself and the rates under the contract are to remain in full force and effect; only the underlying rate which will apply on expiration of the contract is subject to challenge.

National Governors' Association Resolution

Coal Transportation

One of the most significant constraints of the expansion of coal production, distribution, and use is the capacity and reliability of the coal transportation system throughout the country. An estimated 75 percent of this country's annual coal production is trucked on public roads for at least part of its journey. By 1985, this tonnage is expected to increase significantly. In addition to direct coal haulage, state and county road systems must bear increased traffic due to increased employment and the movement of equipment and other supplies. In regions where coal is carried exclusively by rail, the increased volume of shipments threatens to disrupt the highway system by blocking rail crossings for intolerable periods of time each day. Furthermore, the nation's waterways and port facilities are not adequate to meet the increased demands for the transportation of coal. These problems directly concern all states between the point of production and the point of use. The NGA Coal Transportation Task Force has worked closely with the Federal Highway Administration to develop an accurate assessment of coal transportation needs.

To maintain and expand production, distribution, and use of coal to meet the nation's critical energy needs, the President and Congress should formulate and implement as soon as possible a federal-state coal transportation assistance program. Revenue-generating mechanisms to fund a new coal transportation assistance program should be enacted. The program should be designed to provide for the rehabilitation, improvement, expansion, and maintenance of transportation facilities for moving coal by rail, highway, and waterway, in order to meet present and future coal transportation needs and to minimize adverse transportation impacts that result from expanded coal production, distribution, and use.

The nation's rail freight system continues to be of key importance to the transportation of coal. In the Staggers Rail Act of 1980, Congress recognized the unique dependence of coal shippers on rail transportation and the importance of balancing the needs of rail carriers, coal shippers and the public. However, the governors are extremely concerned that the way in which the Interstate Commerce Commission (ICC) has been implementing provisions of the law placing an unfair burden on captive coal shippers, consumers of electricity and consumers of coal. Areas of specific concern are:

Product and Geographic Substitution or Competition: Under the Staggers Act, rates for shipments are deregulated unless the ICC determines that a particular shipment is captive or a carrier has market dominance in transportation goods. The ICC in its regulations does not consider a shipment as captive or a rail carrier as having market dominance if geographic, modal or product substitutions are available. The Governors are troubled by this overly restrictive interpretation of the law and believe that the application of this theoretical standard to coal suppliers is unfair and inappropriate. With regard to product substitution, the negative effect on shippers and consumers of coal is particularly severe because an electric utility plant could be required to convert to other energy sources at prohibitive costs. The Governors urge the Congress to amend the Staggers Act to ensure that when no economical alternative means of transportation exists for a particular rail movement, such movement will be afforded full protection as a captive shipment.

Rate Guidelines: The proposed rate guidelines for coal and agricultural shipments subject to ICC review do not give equitable consideration to all parties involved. The Governors urge Congress in amending the Staggers Act to create an adequate balance between the needs of shippers and the railroads' need for an adequate rate of return.

The Governors believe the failure of the ICC to properly implement the Staggers Act has prevented the act from balancing the needs of shippers, carriers, and the public, and necessitates prompt congressional action to revise the statute accordingly.

The Governors would oppose changes to the Staggers Act in areas other than those addressed in this policy.

Resolution Adopted by the National Association of Regulatory Utility Commissioners

To Provide Reasonable Rates for Captive Railroad Traffic Under Standards Consistent With and Similar to Those Generally Applied by State Regulatory Commissions and to Provide Shippers Access and Use of a Railroad's Facilities

Whereas, the Staggers Rail Act of 1980 provided for the deregulation of competitive rail traffic and directed the Interstate Commerce Commission to continue to maintain reasonable rates where there is an absence of effective competition for rail traffic within the Commission's jurisdiction; and

Whereas, over half of the electric energy in the United States is generated using coal, the majority of which is transported to electric utilities under non-competitive conditions by one railroad and subject to the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission; and

Whereas, the Interstate Commerce Commission has issued a series of decisions effectively withdrawing regulation over the pricing of this captive rail traffic, including decisions which: (1) define "market dominance" so as to place ICC regulatory protection beyond the reach of many captive coal shippers; (2) set standards for "reasonable" rates which have no relation to the cost of providing service and which will allow coal transportation rates to double in real terms in five years; (3) exempt export coal from regulation although United States coal is already fifteen to twenty percent more costly than world market prices due in large part to transportation costs; (4) define "revenue adequacy," on which several pricing freedoms for railroads under the Staggers Act are based, unrealistically, so that no Class I railroads, no matter how profitable, are considered to have adequate revenues, and highly profitable railroads will be allowed billions of dollars in extra rate increases; and

Whereas, customers of electric utilities will, unnecessarily, incur such higher electricity rates as a result of these ICC determinations;

Whereas, over the repeated objectives of NARUC and individual state commissions, the Interstate Commerce Commission has usurped state authority to regulate intrastate railroad movements consistent with the Staggers Act; and

Whereas, the railroad industry, consumers and the captive shippers that serve them would benefit from (1) the restoration of competition to rail service areas now served by only one railroad and (2) the assurance that fair and reasonable freight rates are charged;

Now, therefore, be it resolved that the National Association of Regulatory Utility Commissioners assembled at Washington, D.C. on March 1, 1984 urges Congress to enact legislation,

First, to ensure reasonable rail rates for captive rail traffic, including provisions which:

1. Define "market dominance" in the context of effective competition for the transportation to which the rate applies, so that all captive shippers may drain off ICC regulatory review;

2. Require consideration, in determining "adequate revenues" for railroads, of several realistic indicators of financial health, and require:

a. the use of embedded cost of debt,

b. standard original cost depreciation accountiung,

c. other measures commonly applied by regulators in calculating the railroad's return on investment, and

d. when appropriate, consider equity and debt costs to the holding company and look at the reasonableness of the transfer price between affiliates;

3. Require ICC consideration, in setting maximum reasonable rates, of the following standards:

a. the cost to the railroad of providing the service involved;

b. whether the traffic involved is paying an unreasonable share of the railroad's fixed costs;

c. the impact of the rate on national energy goals;

d. the extent to which railroad revenue shortfalls are attributable to hauling traffic at noncompensatory rate levels or failing to maximize earnings on competitive traffic; and

e. price stability and impact on shippers;

4. Require the ICC to calculate the inflation index (as set forth in the Interstate Commerce Act) upon which automatic rate increases are based on the basis of actual, not imputed, increases in costs; as well as allowances for productivity gains; and to require rail rates which have increased automatically with that inflation index to decrease when decreases in railroad costs lower that index;

5. Reauthorize and fund the Railroad Accounting Principles Board;

6. Require adoption of fair and reasonable procedures for ICC review of state regulatory decisons on intrastate rail rates;

7. Prevent anticompetitive or predatory cancellations of joint rates;

8. Prohibit the Interstate Commerce Commission from exempting market dominant traffic from regulation; and

9. Prohibit the use of confidential pricing in shipping contracts, but in contrast make available all information necessary to ensure enforcement of (Long-Cannon) Congressional intent against cross subsidy; and

Second, to require:

a. rail carriers to permit, with reasonable compensation, access and usage of facilities to shippers for whom the sole means of connecting with the trackage of another rail carrier or of reaching the destination of a shipment is over the railroad's facility; and

b. a review of line abandonment procedures to ensure against abandonment of rail service due to the operational preferences and/or strategic planning of the rail companies;

Be it further resolved that the National Association of Regulatory Utility Commissioners supports legislative initiatives to address these critical issues, and urges the Congress to enact legislation to obtain for captive rail shippers

1. protection from the practices outlined above, and

2. access to competitive rail service and to obtain for consumers fair and reasonable regulation which protects them from exploitation.

U.S. CONFERENCE OF MAYORS—RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED

AMENDMENTS TO THE STAGGERS RAIL ACT OF 1980

Whereas, fifty-two percent of electric generation in the United States today is fueled by coal, sixty-five percent of all coal produced is moved by rail, and eighty-five percent of all coal shipped by rail is captive to one railroad, so that the price of electricity in much of the country depends upon the rail transportation rates charged to captive shippers; and

Whereas, the Staggers Rail Act of 1980 provided for deregulation of competitive rail traffic while continuing regulation of rail rates where railroads exercise monopoly power; and

Whereas, under the Staggers Rail Act, the Interstate Commerce Commission was charged with impartial balancing of the revenue needs of railroads with the needs of captive shippers and American consumers for protection from monopolistic pricing practices, and the ICC has issued a series of decisions granting to railroads virtually unlimited pricing freedom on captive rail traffic, including decisions which (1) define "market dominance" so as to place ICC regulatory protection beyond the reach of many captive coal shippers; (2) set standards for "reasonable" rates which will allow coal transportation rates to double in real terms in five years; (3) exempt export coal from regulation although United States coal is already fifteen to twenty percent more costly than world market prices due in large part to transportation costs: (4) define "revenue adequacy," on which several pricing freedoms for railroads under the Staggers Act are based, unrealistically, so that no Class I railroads, no matter how profitable, are considered to have adequate revenues, and highly profitable railroads will be allowed billions of dollars in extra rate increases; and

Whereas, the aforementioned Interstate Commerce decisions impose an enormous cost burden on captive shippers and their electricity consumers; and

Whereas, legislation has been introduced to the Congress which constructively addresses many of the needs outlined herein,

Now, therefore, be resolved that the U.S. Conference of Mayors urges Congress to enact legislation to ensure reasonable rates for captive rail traffic, including provisions which:

Define "market dominance" realistically, so that all captive shippers may obtain ICC regulatory review;

Require ICC consideration, in setting maximum reasonable rates, of not only the revenue needs of carriers, but also such standards as the cost to the railroad of providing service; whether the traffic involved is paying an unreasonable share of the carrier's fixed costs; the impact of the rate on national energy goals; and the extent to which carrier revenue shortfalls are attributable to hauling traffic at noncompensatory rate levels or failing to maximize earnings on competitive traffic;

Require consideration, in determining "adequate revenues" for railroads, of realistic indicators of financial health, and require the use of standard depreciation accounting and exclusion of deferred tax reserves in calculating the railroad's return on investment;

Require the ICC, in calculating the inflation index upon which automatic rate increases are based, to adjust for changes in railroad productivity;

Reauthorize and fund the Railroad Accounting Principles Board;

Allow for rail rate decreases when railroad costs decrease;

Require adoption of fair and reasonable procedures for ICC review of state regulatory decisions on intrastate rail rates;

Prevent anticompetitive or predatory cancellations of joint rates;

Prohibit the Interstate Commerce Commission from exempting market dominant traffic from regulation; and

Be it further resolved that the U.S. Conference of Mayors supports legislative initiatives to address these critical issues, and urges the Congress to enact legislation to obtain for captive rail shippers protection from monopolistic pricing practices outlined above.

RESOLUTION OF THE NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF STATE UTILITY CONSUMER ADVOCATES (NASUCA)

Whereas, the Staggers Rail Act of 1980 provided for deregulation of competitive rail traffic and directed the Interstate Commerce Commission (ICC) to continue to protect rail traffic subject to the monopoly power or railroads;

Whereas, Congress directed the ICC to balance the national interest in a healthy railroad system with the national interest of protecting "captive" rail shippers from monopoly abuses;

Whereas, the ICC has weakened the Staggers Rail Act by ignoring the plight of shippers subject to railroad monopolies;

Whereas, over fifty percent of the Nation's electricity is generated using coal and 90% of utility plants dependent on rail are served by only one line and have no other means of delivering coal;

Whereas, the major victims of the ICC's failure to implement the Staggers Rail Act in a balanced manner are the Nation's electric utility consumers;

Whereas, the Interstate Commerce Commission has issued a number of decisions which effectively withdraw regulation over the pricing of this captive rail traffic, including decisions which: (1) define "market dominance" so as to place ICC regulatory protection beyond the reach of many captive coal shippers; (2) set standards for "reasonable" rates that are not cost based and which will allow coal transportation rates to double in real terms in five years; (3) exempt export coal from ICC regulation although United States coal is already fifteen to twenty percent more costly than world market prices due largely to transportation costs; (4) define "revenue adequacy," on which several pricing mechanisms for railroads under the Staggers Act are based, unrealistically, so that no Class I railroads, no matter how profitable, are deemed to have adequate revenues, and highly profitable railroads will receive billions of excess dollars as a result;

Whereas, customers of electric utilities will, unnecessarily, incur much higher electricity rates as a result of these ICC actions;

Whereas, the railroad industry, consumers, and the captive shippers that serve them would benefit from (1) the restoration of competition to rail service areas now served by only one railroad and (2) the assurance that fair and reasonable freight rates are charged;

Therefore, be it resolved that the National Association of State Utility Consumer Advocates assembled at Williamstown, Massachusetts on August 14, 1984 urges Congress to enact legislation, to ensure reasonable rail rates for captive rail traffic, to provide them access to competitive rail service, and to thereby obtain for residential electric utility consumers fair and reasonable utility rates.

● Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I am pleased to join as an original sponsor of the Consumer Rail Equity Act. This legislation is intended to promote competition within the rail industry and to restore a proper balance between the interests of consumers and the revenue needs of railroads.

In the Staggers Rail Act of 1980, Congress chose to deregulate the rail industry where competition exists. Congress also directed the Interstate Commerce Commission to protect shippers and consumers where effective competition does not exist, where railroads have monopoly pricing power.

Many believe the ICC has misinterpreted the Staggers Act, giving excessive deference to the revenue adequacy of railroads at the expense of shippers and consumers. The legislation introduced today is designed to correct this imbalance. The benefits of this legislation will be experienced by consumers throughout this country, without endangering the stability of our Nation's railroads.

High rail rates impact every aspect of our society, affecting everything from the price of the food we place on our tables to the cost of energy used in our homes. Prices for the transportation of coal used in the generation of electricity provide a good example.

Over one-half of the electricity used in the United States is generated by coal-fired plants. More than 60 percent of this coal is moved by railroad. Of this traffic, 85 percent is captive, meaning that there are no effective transportation alternatives and the coal movement depends on one railroad.

In my own State, $2 of every $3 Louisiana utilities pay for delivered coal has been for transportation. Similar situations exist throughout the country. If rail rates are too high because railroads have monopoly pricing power over captive traffic, consumers pay the price.

In passing the Staggers Act, which included the Long-Cannon amendment, it was not the intention of Congress to permit the railroads to charge captive customers "all the traffic will bear."

Yet, the case history of the complaints presented to the ICC clearly shows the act has been administered with little or no concern for the captive customer. It is clear to me that captive customers and those whom they serve could be victimized from now to eternity without any assurance of a change of heart by the majority of the ICC.

When I proposed the Long-Cannon amendment to the Staggers bill, I was fearful of precisely the kind of thing that has transpired even in spite of my amendment. I am now satisfied that the only way that captive shippers and those they serve can be assured of fair treatment is to amend the act. That is why I am joining with Senator ANDREWS and others in proposing a reasonable modification of the Staggers Act in order to protect the public interest.

I strongly urge my colleagues to join me in supporting this essential legislation.●

S. 478. A bill to amend the Surface Mining Control and Reclamation Act of 1977 to create a trust fund for the reclamation of underground mines and a trust fund for surface mines and for other purposes; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

(The remarks of Mr. SPECTER and the text of this legislation appear earlier in today's RECORD.)

By Mr. DENTON:

S. 479. A bill to prohibit any act of violence or threat of violence in a labor dispute and any conspiracy to accomplish such act or threat and to impose criminal and civil penalties therefor; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CRIMES IN LABOR DISPUTES ACT

Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce the Crimes in Labor Disputes Act of 1985. The bill would make it a crime to use or threaten violence in a labor dispute. The bill would also provide a civil remedy for victims of union violence. Legislation is necessary to curb the nationwide flow of violence and threats of violence in the name of pursuing "legitimate" union goals.

Mr. President, the growth of union violence has reached dramatic proportions. According to Armand J. Thieblot, Jr., of the University of Maryland, and Thomas R. Haggard, of the University of South Carolina, "Labor violence is substantial, systematically applied, not diminishing, and the law tacitly allows unions wide latitude to use coercive techniques."

Statistics published by the Industrial Research Unit of the Wharton School of Business of the University of Pennsylvania reveal that there were at least 4,350 documented acts of violence committed by union members from 1975 to 1984. Those acts of violence were not isolated to any one area of the country.

In fact, every State represented in this body has experienced incidents of union violence. Since 1975 there have been: 36 documented incidents in Alaska, 21 documented incidents in Arkansas, 88 documented incidents in Arizona, 454 documented incidents in California, 44 documented incidents in Colorado, 108 documented incidents in Connecticut, 16 documented incidents in the District of Columbia, 13 documented incidents in Delaware, 79 documented incidents in Florida, 38 documented incidents in Georgia, 22 documented incidents in Hawaii, 44 documented incidents in Iowa, 31 documented incidents in Idaho, 125 documented incidents in Illinois, 115 documented incidents in Indiana, 16 documented incidents in Kansas, 225 documented incidents in Kentucky, 62 documented incidents in Louisiana, 87 documented incidents in Massachusetts, 34 documented incidents in Maryland, 20 documented incidents in Maine, 174 documented incidents in Michigan, 68 documented incidents in Minnesota, 199 documented incidents in Missouri, 25 documented incidents in Mississippi, 62 documented incidents in Montana, 40 documented incidents in North Carolina, 4 documented incidents in North Dakota, 11 documented incidents in New Hampshire, 186 documented incidents in New Jersey, 11 documented incidents in New Mexico, 38 documented incidents in Nevada, 249 documented incidents in New York, 227 documented incidents in Ohio, 115 documented incidents in Oklahoma, 66 documented incidents in Oregon, 390 documented incidents in Pennsylvania, 54 documented incidents in Rhode Island, 10 documented incidents in South Carolina, 5 documented incidents in South Dakota, 179 documented incidents in Tennessee, 99 documented incidents in Texas, 8 documented incidents in Utah, 11 documented incidents in Vermont, 91 documented incidents in Virginia, 90 documented incidents in Washington, 75 documented incidents in West Virginia, 115 documented incidents in Wisconsin, 2 documented incidents in Wyoming, and in my home State of Alabama there were 68 documented incidents of union violence.

I will not describe all of the 68 incidents in Alabama, but I must mention one incident, which involved the injury of two young men in a dispute on a picket line at the Birmingham Manufacturing Co. in Springville, AL. One individual, Russell Ray Gillian of Pell City, AL, was shot in the face with a gun of an unknown caliber when he reportedly confronted pickets at the plant, while another individual, Roger Lee Patterson, a worker from Springville, AL, was shot in the arm. There were other examples of union violence at the Birmingham Manufacturing Co. plant during that strike, involving harrassment of company workers, property vandalism in the form of smashed windows, damaged cars, tacks thrown in driveways, puncturing of tires, fires, and the like. The remaining incidents in Alabama demonstrate a similar lack of respect for the law.

Mr. President, the Crimes in Labor Disputes Act would help to curtail the spread of union violence by allowing for criminal prosecution of and the recovery of civil damages from individuals involved in violent, extortionate labor union tactics.

The bill would not interfere with the right of workers to strike for higher wages. Its provisions would come into effect only if a strike goes beyond the mere withholding of labor to include activities such as shooting, dynamiting, or arson directed against employers and nonstriking workers.

Mr. President, I believe that the Crimes in Labor Disputes Act is of paramount importance. We need the peacefulness that the bill would engender. We need teamwork, cooperation, and productivity in the workplace, not violence and threats of violences.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Crimes in Labor Disputes Act of 1985".

SEC. 2. Any act of violence or threat of violence in a labor dispute by any person or organization or any conspiracy to accomplish such act is hereby declared to be a crime, including violence to person or property.

SEC. 3. Any person or organization found guilty of the crime defined in section 2 hereof shall receive a penalty of $10,000 or less and/or a prison sentence of up to five years duration.

SEC. 4. Any loss from personal or property damage resulting from the offenses outlined in section 2 may be recovered in a civil action at law.

By Mr. HATCH (for himself, Mrs. HAWKINS, Mr. EAST, and Mr. DODD):

S. 480. A bill to authorize the Secretary of Education to make grants to strengthen the capacity of postsecondary institutions to respond to the continuing education needs of adults, to link postsecondary resources more closely to the preparation and performance of the American workforce, and to enhance Federal policies affecting the development of the Nation's human resources; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

POSTSECONDARY CONTINUING EDUCATION ACT

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, last fall, in introducing a measure to revitalize and reauthorize title I of the Higher Education Act of 1980, I called your attention to the need to develop creative programs to link postsecondary institutions with the employing community in order to assist about 23 million functionally illiterate adult Americans develop employability skills and to help others who are in dead-end jobs upgrade their skills and thus enhance their potential for continued employment.

You may recall, Mr. President, that I also mentioned that almost an equal number, about 23 million adults, are enrolled in some form of continuing education and that the median age for adult enrollments is about 30 and increasing.

The bill I introduced last fall took into account these facts, as well as the fact that the majority of adults who participate in continuing education are doing so for one primary reason—to get or keep their jobs or to improve their job status and employment opportunities in a dynamically changing labor force.

Since introducing S. 2919 in the last Congress, I have had numerous meetings with both educators the others interested in this legislation. Moreover, my staff has had countless meetings with such groups as the American Council of Education, the State higher education executive officers, the National Association of State Universities and Land Grant Colleges, and others on ways my bill could be made to better serve the needs of the schools, the employers, but more importantly the individuals who would profit from such legislation.

We have received many constructive suggestions, most of which have been incorporated into the bill I am introducing today.

Mr. President, on the matter of education and training for adults—especially adults who are working or seeking work—the logic of colleges, universities, and others working closely together with employers is just good common sense. Many of the employers who will benefit from this bill are too small to have training divisions of their own, and they must rely upon our postsecondary institutions to assist them. My bill will provide an incentive for employers to share in the cost of training, and will encourage cooperation between employers and institutions. It will establish a pattern for extending help to those millions of others who may wish or need to participate, but for financial or other reasons, cannot.

It is a tragedy, Mr. President, that we have people in this country who cannot read, write or compute effectively enough to either hold a job, or if employed, advance in their job. It is a shame that people who want to continue to learn—for whatever reason—are not encouraged to do so, but who must work against odd and incomprehensible barriers.

It is the central purpose of my bill, Mr. President, to assist colleges and universities, and particularly 2-year institutions, in reaching out to these adults who are not now adequately served.

As I mentioned last year, my home State of Utah has several outstanding 2-year institutions, which, along with the continuing education divisions of 4-year postsecondary institutions, are doing a creditable job with meager resources to accommodate the needs of people who are enrolled in their regular adult of vocational education programs. But, like countless other institutions across the country, they need assistance in providing programs tailored to the needs of people neither of these fine programs was designed to serve. My bill will fill that void.

In summary, Mr. President, there are several critical issues addressed by my bill:

It would help postsecondary institutions improve and expand outreach services to communities;

It recognizes the relationship between continuing education and the workplace and encourages broader involvement of employers and employee representatives in the planning and implementation of postsecondary continuing education for adults;

It stands as a type of challenge grant program to encourage all institutions to reexamine their commitments to adult learning and to express these commitments through beneficial institutional policies and specific application of their resources to respond to the learning needs of adults; and,

The bill helps point the Secretary of Education in the direction of that portion of postsecondary education establishment where the greatest enrollment increases are and where innovative and nontraditional curricula and delivery systems are most needed.

Finally, Mr. President, with this legislation, I want to give a clear signal to institutional leaders, to corporate executives, and to others, that lifetime learning opportunities for all our citizens involves us all, including the Federal Government, which through this legislation can demonstrate its readiness to cooperate in this partnership.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of S. 480, the continuing Education Act of 1985, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 480

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Postsecondary Continuing Education Act of 1985".

SEC. 2. Title I of the Higher Education Act of 1965 is amended to read as follows:

"TITLE I—POSTSECONDARY CONTINUING EDUCATION

"PART A—POSTSECONDARY CONTINUING EDUCATION INNOVATION AND OUTREACH GRANTS

"FINDINGS AND PURPOSE

"SEC. 101. (a) The Congress finds that—

"(1) enrollments by adult and non-traditional learners are changing the demography of American postsecondary education;

"(2) adult learners frequently encounter barriers which make them unable to participate fully in postsecondary education opportunities;

"(3) postsecondary institutions need to examine their policies and course offerings to integrate continuing education programs that serve the needs of adults into their general missions and to make a more substantial commitment to serve all learners on an equitable basis, regardless of age;

"(4) modern telecommunications technology is an effective tool that can be used to help make the resources of institutions of higher education more available to adult learners;

"(5) changes in the economy, in technology, and in communications, and the relocation and dislocation of industries and workers, demonstrate the need to improve the availability and delivery of postsecondary education to adults;

"(6) the majority of adults who continue their education do so for job and career-related reasons;

"(7) institutional linkages with the private sector can further enhance the efficiency and effectiveness of educational services for adults seeking work;

"(8) it is in the national interest to enhance and expand cooperation among providers of postsecondary continuing education and other providers of adult education and training and adult basic education, including State and local education agencies;

"(9) Federal assistance to institutions of higher education or combinations of such institutions can encourage the development of programs that more effectively and efficiently meet the needs of adult learners; and

"(10) it is in the interest of the Federal Government to support postsecondary education for adults that will help reduce unemployment and underemployment, enhance job opportunities, promote a skilled, flexible, and internationally competitive workforce, and ensure an educated citizenry.

"(b) It is the purpose of this part—

"(1) to assist institutions of higher education and combinations of such institutions to establish pilot projects and demonstration programs worthy of replication that respond to the learning needs of adults;

"(2) to establish or significantly expand cooperative arrangements between institutions of higher education and private sector employers that improve the delivery of postsecondary education to the American workforce; and

"(3) to demonstrate the effectiveness of postsecondary education outreach programs, particularly programs that adapt telecommunications and other technologies to reach new or isolated adult learners.

"INDIVIDUALS FOR WHOM PROGRAM IS DESIGNED

"SEC. 102. To promote the purposes of this part, individuals who are in need of postsecondary education and who would benefit from programs and services established by this Act may include—

"(1) potential new entrants to the workforce who have completed their secondary education but who have not found employment or who are underemployed, especially economically or educationally disadvantaged and minority individuals;

"(2) individuals who seek reentry to the workforce after prolonged absences, with particular attention to the needs of women;

"(3) workers who have been dislocated by plant closures, technological change, and new products and processes;

"(4) individuals who need guidance, counselling, and remedial instruction to enable them to benefit from postsecondary education;

"(5) individuals isolated from educational resources because of geographic location or impaired or restricted mobility;

"(6) employees of small- and medium-sized businesses that do not have the capacity to undertake education and training activities on their own; and,

"(7) individuals in fields of special concern to the national interest, such as teaching and nursing, health care, guidance and counseling, and library and learning center administration.

"ESTABLISHMENT OF PROGRAM

"SEC. 103. The Secretary shall carry out a program, in accordance with this part, to assist eligible institutions of higher education to establish programs to enhance the educational opportunities available to adult learners.

"APPLICATIONS FOR ASSISTANCE

"SEC. 104. (a) Any eligible institution of higher education, or combination of such institutions, which is eligible for assistance under section 105 may submit an application under this part to the Secretary at such time, in such form, and containing such information, as may be necessary to enable the Secretary to evaluate the need for assistance. The Secretary shall make awards on a competitive basis taking into consideration—

"(1) the effectiveness of the program proposed in the application;

"(2) the demonstrated need and demand for such a program; and

"(3) reasonable geographic distribution, including ensuring equitable treatment of urban and rural populations.

"(b) Each such application shall—

"(1) describe the current academic program offered by the institution of higher education, or the combination of such institutions;

"(2) set forth a plan for the duration of the requested Federal support describing the activities proposed to be assisted under this part to enhance the educational opportunities and to meet the educational needs of adult learners;

"(3) provide evidence that the institution of higher education, or the combination of such institutions, meets the eligibility requirements of section 105;

"(4) provide evidence that the institution of higher education or combination of such institutions has sought to identify the educational needs of potential adult learners in the area served by the applicant;

"(5) describe a proposal for a program designed to enhance the educational opportunities available to adult students by (A) encouraging enrollment; (B) addressing specific educational needs of adult learners; (C) structuring programs and services designed to facilitate the attendance of working students, parents caring for dependent children, and persons seeking to reenter the educational system; (D) implementing guidance, counseling and other services designed to enhance career decisions and course selections; and (E) coordinating with existing institutional programs designed to serve the adult learner;

"(6) provide for such fiscal control and fund accounting procedures as may be necessary to ensure proper disbursement and accounting for funds made available to the applicant under this part;

"(7) include a statement by the applicant describing how it intends to achieve the institutionalization of the activities to be supported under the grant so that they will be continued after Federal support provided under this part has concluded;

"(8) set forth policies and procedures to ensure that Federal funds made available under this part for any fiscal year will be used to supplement and, to the extent practical, increase the funds that would otherwise be made available for the purpose of this part and in no case supplant such funds;

"(9) set forth policies and procedures for evaluating the effectiveness in accomplishing the purpose of the activities for which a grant is awarded under this part and the manner by which the applicant will disseminate information regarding such effectiveness to other agencies and organizations for purposes of replication; and

"(10) include such other information as the Secretary may reasonably require to carry out the provisions of this part.

"INSTITUTIONAL ELIGIBILITY

"SEC. 105. Each institution of higher education or each combination of such institutions shall be eligible if the Secretary determines that—

"(1) the institution or the combimation has demonstrated a willingness and commitment to work with professional and technical associations and agencies, employers, and employee representatives in planning and implementing effective adult postsecondary continuing education programs;

"(2) the institution or combination is willing to conduct and integrate into the curriculum effective adult postsecondary continuing education programs;

"(3) the institution or combination has the capacity to elicit contributions of staff, equipment, and resources from noninstitutional sources, particularly employers, on behalf of such programs; and

"(4) the proposed program is consistent with such State plans for postsecondary education as may have been issued by the State higher education agency.

"USE OF FUNDS

"SEC. 106. (a) Grants under this part to any eligible institution of higher education or combination of such institutions may be used for planning, developing, or operating the program designed by the institution of higher education to carry out the purposes of this part and may include—

"(1) making educational opportunities available to adult learners at convenient times and locations, including at home and at the workplace;

"(2) assessisng the learning needs of adults and, developing programs responsive to the postsecondary continuing education needs and objectives of adults in the service area;

"(3) identifying and eliminating institutional and other barriers which confront adults who wish to commence or continue their postsecondary education;

"(4) developing or expanding institutional outreach activities to improve educational and occupational information and counseling services to meet the special needs of adults, including information concerning available forms of student financial assistance;

"(5) training of administrators, faculty, and staff to improve their ability to teach and serve adult learners;

"(6) developing and expanding innovative delivery systems and curricula to facilitate career development and transitions;

"(7) promoting collaborative efforts between the institution of higher education, or combination of such institutions, and private sector employers and employee representatives to develop postsecondary continuing education curricula and services responsive to current and projected local, regional, or national employment and economic conditions, including joint planning and implementation of appropriate educational services and the sharing of personnel, facilities, and resources to ensure the efficient and effective delivery of services; and

"(8) implementing technology-based delivery systems including the use of computers, audio or visual telecommunications, or any combination thereof, or such other technologies, as may enhance access by adults to postsecondary education opportunities.

"(b) Funds paid pursuant to this part may not be used—

"(1) to purchase land or facilities; or

"(2) to pay stipends or provide student financial assistance to any individual participating in the programs established under this part.

"SIZE AND DURATION OF GRANT

"SEC. 107. (a)(1) Grants may be made for a period not to exceed five years. The maximum award that may be made to a recipient under this part shall not exceed $250,000 in the first year, $200,000 in the second year, $150,000 in the third year, $100,000 in the fourth year, and $100,000 in the fifth year.

"(2) Each institution awarded an initial grant under this part shall be eligible for noncompeting continuation grants if the institution receiving the grant under this part meets standards of performance established by the Secretary. Institutions or combinations of institutions receiving multiyear awards under this part shall not be eligible for further awards under this part until a period of five years has elapsed from the completion of a grant period.

"(b) Funds appropriated in any fiscal year shall remain available until expended.

'FEDERAL SHARE; COST SHARING

"SEC. 108. (a) The Federal share of each such grant shall not exceed 80 percent of the cost of carrying out the application approved under this part in the first year, 65 percent of such costs in the second year, 50 percent of such costs in the third year, 35 percent of such costs in the fourth year, and 20 percent of such costs in the fifth year.

"(b) The non-Federal share required under this part may be provided by the applicant institution or combination, or through it from any source, including but not limited to employers, employee representatives, State or local governments, community organizations, or private donors. The non-Federal share may be provided in cash or through the provision of services, facilities or other tangible assistance, and shall be documented in such fashion as the Secretary may require.

"(c) Any institution which is an eligible institution or an institution with special needs under title III may apply to the Secretary for a waiver of the matching requirements established by subsection (a) of this section.

"STATE PROGRAMS

"SEC. 109. (a) The Secretary may, in accordance with this section, carry out a program to assist State higher education agencies to enhance educational opportunities available to adult learners, and to provide for regional or statewide adult postsecondary continuing education information and guidance services.

"(b) Grants made under this section to any State higher education agency may be used for the planning, development, and operation of the program intended to carry out the purpose of this section and may include—

"(1) development and implementation of one or more regional or a statewide adult postsecondary continuing education information and counseling services; or

"(2) contracting with one or more institutions of higher education or any other organization or entity to provide such a system and services.

"PART B—POSTSECONDARY CONTINUING EDUCATION RESEARCH AND DEMONSTRATION GRANTS

"FINDINGS AND PURPOSE

"SEC. 121. (a) The Congress finds that—

"(1) research on the learning interests and needs of adults who are continuing their education or who would like to continue their education at postsecondary institutions and elsewhere has not kept pace with the rapid growth of adult learning throughout the Nation;

"(2) research that is available, particularly data and other information relating to postsecondary education for adults, labor market needs, employment opportunities, and appropriate educational opportunities, is not being disseminated in a timely and useful fashion to postsecondary education planners and others;

"(3) long-term planning and allocation of institutional resources for postsecondary continuing education needs a sound research and scholarly base;

"(4) development of trained professional personnel to serve adult learners, whether in preservice or inservice training, requires access to recognized academic centers of training, scholarship, research, and demonstration specifically focused on postsecondary continuing education; and

"(5) national, regional, and State research and demonstration activities can provide direction and momentum to postsecondary institutions willing to develop or expand their services to adult learners.

"(b) It is the purpose of this part to ensure that institutions of higher education have the sustained capacity—

"(1) to undertake substantial ongoing research and demonstration activities in postsecondary continuing education, and

"(2) to provide leadership, advice, and technical assistance to other institutions of higher education and to public agencies and private organizations on the use and allocation of resources to serve national, regional, State, and local adult learning priorities.

"ESTABLISHMENT OF PROGRAM

"SEC. 122. The Secretary is authorized to make grants to, and to enter into contracts with, institutions of higher education, or any combination thereof, to carry out the purposes of this part by providing assistance to such institutions.

"USE OF FUNDS

"SEC. 123. Funds paid pursuant to this part to any institution of higher education, or combination of such institutions, may be used for planning, developing, or operating the program designed to carry out the purposes of this part, and may include—

"(1) identifying and analyzing special problems and needs of adult learners of national or regional significance;

"(2) training faculty and staff professionals engaged in adult learning in the latest techniques and approaches to postsecondary continuing education;

"(3) collecting, analyzing, and disseminating pertinent data affecting adult learners and their educational and employment objectives, with particular focus on analyzing and disseminating information on the current and projected postsecondary continuing education needs of the labor market;

"(4) research on the use and application of postsecondary resources for programs which may be replicated and projects appropriate to the postsecondary continuing education needs of adults;

"(5) examination and application of appropriate technologies to reach new and isolated learners, and promoting resource sharing to encourage the innovative uses of such technologies, including telecommunications, to overcome barriers to postsecondary continuing education opportunities;

"(6) advisory and technical assistance services to institutional and State policymakers on strategies to develop or expand postsecondary education programs and services for adults;

"(7) developing, demonstrating, and disseminating innovative outreach methods designed to attract and serve adult learners who are inadequately prepared to effectively participate in postsecondary educations;

"(8) collecting and disseminating relevant data generated by Federal agencies and other national, regional, and State sources applicable to institutional planning for postsecondary continuing education, including information on Federal and other sources of student financial assistance;

"(9) assisting State postsecondary education officials to develop interstate and interregional educational delivery systems, including cooperative and consortial arrangements, and programs (including those which use telecommunications) to more effectively address regional postsecondary continuing education needs;

"(10) examining appropriate State roles in continuing education and adult learning;

"(11) assessing alternative methods of financing adult learning activities and providing support for needy adult learners;

"(12) reviewing the effectiveness of programs and activities funded under this part for purposes of dissemination to user groups and of replication; and

"(13) such other research and demonstration activities as may be authorized by the Secretary.

"APPLICATION FOR ASSISTANCE

"SEC. 124. A grant or contract authorized by this part may be awarded by the Secretary on a competitive basis upon an application, which is submitted to the Secretary at such time and which contains such information as the Secretary may prescribe. Each such application shall—

"(1) contain provisions that demonstrate the sufficiency of existing resources and the academic capacity of the institution of higher education in the field of postsecondary continuing education relative to its ability to carry out such activities;

"(2) provide for such fiscal control and fund accounting procedures as may be necessary to assure proper disbursement of and accounting for Federal funds paid to the applicant under this part;

"(3) provide for making such reports, in such form and containing such information as the Secretary may require to carry out the functions under this part, and for keeping such records and affording such access thereto as the Secretary may find necessary to assure the correctness and verification of such reports; and

"(4) provide assurances that the applicant intends to continue the activities to be supported under the grant after the grant has been expended, including a detailed plan for obtaining funds to continue such activities.

"SIZE AND DURATION OF GRANT OR CONTRACT

"SEC. 125. (a) Grants may be made for a period of not to exceed five years. The maximum award that may be made to a recipient under this part shall not exceed $500,000 in the first year, $400,000 in the second year, $300,000 in the third year, $200,000 in the fourth year, and $100,000 in the fifth year.

"(b) Each institution awarded an initial grant under this part shall be eligible for noncompeting continuation grants if the institution receiving the grant under this part meets standards of performance established by the Secretary.

"FEDERAL SHARE; COST SHARING

"SEC. 126. (a) The Federal share of each such grants shall not exceed 80 percent of the cost of carrying out the application approved under this part in the first year, 65 percent of such costs in the second year, 50 percent of such costs in the third year, 35 percent of such costs in the fourth year, and 20 percent of such costs in the fifth year.

"(b) The non-Federal share required under this part may be provided by the applicant institution or combination, or through it from any source, including but not limited to employers, employee representatives, State or local governments, community organizations, or private donors. The non-Federal share may be provided in cash or through the provision of services, facilities, or other tangible assistance, and shall be documented in such fashion as the Secretary may require.

"PART C—THE NATIONAL ADVISORY COUNCIL ON CONTINUING EDUCATION

"ESTABLISHMENT OF NATIONAL ADVISORY COUNCIL

"SEC. 131. (a) The President shall appoint a National Advisory Council on Continuing Education consisting of eight representatives of Federal agencies having postsecondary continuing education and training responsibilities, including but not limited to, one representative each from—

"(1) the Department of Education,

"(2) the Department of Agriculture,

"(3) the Department of Defense,

"(4) the Department of Labor, and

"(5) the Veterans' Administration; and 12 members appointed for three-year staggered terms, who are not full-time employees of the Federal Government. The 12 members appointed from the general public shall, to the extent possible, include individuals—

"(A) who are knowledgeable and experienced in the field of continuing education,

"(B) who are State and local government officials, and

"(C) who are representative of postsecondary education institutions, business, labor, and community groups.

"(b) The Advisory Council shall elect its own Chairman annually from among members of the Council who are not employees of the Federal Government. The Advisory Council shall meet at the call of the Chairman but not less often than four times a year.

"(c) The Advisory Council shall advise the Secretary in the preparation of general regulations and with respect to policies and procedures arising in the administration of this title.

"(d) The Advisory Council shall examine all federally supported continuing education and training programs and make recommendations with regard to policies to eliminate duplication and to effectuate the coordination of all federally-funded continuing education programs.

"(e) In carrying out its responsibilities under this part, the Advisory Council may conduct studies, hearings, and other activities in order to—

"(1) identify the continuing education and training needs and goals of the Nation, and to report to the President, the Congress, and the Secretary, about the needs and goals; and

"(2) collect, analyze, and disseminate information regarding programs conducted under this title and other Federal continuing education and training programs.

"(f) Commencing on September 30, 1986, the Advisory Council shall prepare and submit annual reports to the President, the Congress, and the Secretary, of its findings and recommendations, including recommendations for changes in the provisions of this title and other Federal laws relating to continuing education and training activities. The President shall transmit each such report to the Congress with his comments and recommendations. The Advisory Council shall make such other reports or recommendations to the President, the Congress, the Secretary, or the head of any other Federal department or agency as may be appropriate.

"(g) The Advisory Council may utilize the services and facilities of any agency of the Federal Government as may be necessary. The Advisory Council may accept, employ, and dispose of gifts or bequests to carry out its responsibilities under this title.

"PART D—GENERAL PROVISIONS

"DEFINITIONS

"SEC. 141. (a) For the purpose of this title, the term 'adult learner' means an individual—

"(1) who, by reason of his or her personal circumstance including age, marital or familial status, dependent children, lack of or need for new skills desires to pursue a new career; and

"(2) who engages or seeks to engage in a program of study to improve his or her knowledge, information, skills, or postsecondary education program offered by an institution of higher education.

"(b) For the purpose of part A of this title, an 'institution of higher education' includes all institutions of higher education described in section 481 of this Act.

"AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

"SEC. 142. There are authorized to be appropriated $50,000,000 for the fiscal year 1986 and such sums for each succeeding fiscal year ending prior to October 1, 1991, as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act. Not less than 15 percent nor more than 20 percent of the sum appropriated in any fiscal year may be used to carry out the provisions of part B of this title. The Secretary may reserve not to exceed 5 percent of the funds appropriated in any fiscal year for part A of this title for carrying out section 109.".

● Mr. DODD. Mr. President, today the Senator from Utah [Mr. HATCH], the Senator from Florida [Mrs. HAWKINS], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. EAST] and I are introducing much-needed legislation to help address the educational and training needs of adults.

This proposed legislation would expand title I of the Higher Education Act of 1980 to emphasize congressional commitment to the educational and training needs of the Nation's adult working population.

Many recent reports and surveys have cataloged the needs and deficiencies of elementary and secondary school systems. Little focus, however, has been placed on postsecondary and adult education despite changes in the economy, in technology, and in communications that have caused the relocation or dislocation of industries and workers, greatly increasing the need for adult training programs.

Statistics show that approximately 23 million American adults, people who have 10, 20, 30 or more professionally productive years to contribute to society, are functionally illiterate.

This does not mean these Americans do not possess intelligence and a rudimentary education. Neither does it mean they are incapable of advanced learning or of acquiring those specialized occupational skills demanded by today's businesses and industries.

It does mean, nevertheless, that they are currently not qualified to fill many available career-advancing positions despite their willingness and eagerness to work.

The problem this bill is designed to address, Mr. President, is a reflection of our changing economy as well. The Bureau of Labor Statistics [BLS] recently published a report on the number of displaced workers in this country. The Bureau discovered 5.1 million displaced workers due to industrial plant closings, business failures, and so forth, over the last 5 years. Of this number 700,000 had left the labor force, 1.3 million were still unemployed, and 3.1 million had found new jobs as of January 1984. Of the 3.1 million who found new jobs, however, 900,000 had taken positions that paid them a smaller salary and, in many cases, no longer utilized the skills of their old job.

Only a few years ago, Mr. President, shipping, textiles, mining, shoes, farming and heavy manufacturing industries were the mainstay of the economy in many sections of the country. Rapid implementation of sophisticated technologies, however, has drastically altered the workplace. It has been said that the new sophisticated technologies are becoming to many States what oil is to Texas. It is not surprising, therefore, that the education and training needs of today's workers and would be workers has advanced far beyond the traditional 3R's to include specific technical knowledge and skills.

The Continuing Education Act of 1985 is, in my opinion, a first step toward recognizing these changes and equalizing employment opportunities in the workplace for all adults.

This proposed legislation requires cooperation between the Federal Government, institutions of higher education, employers and employees in all stages of implementing adult continuing education programs.

The Secretary of Education would make competitive challenge grant awards to institutions of higher education to meet continuing education and training needs of adult learners.

These institutions, with cooperation and support from the private sector, must integrate into the academic curriculum work-oriented professional and technical continuing education programs.

Maximum grant awards to a single applicant under this section for any 3-year period is $150,000.

In addition, this bill provides funds for research, application, and dissemination of data on the learning needs of adults as well as for the development of trained professional personnel to serve adult students.

Mr. President, this legislation, in my judgment, is a timely, cost-effective method of helping adult Americans help themselves. Federal leadership and cooperation between postsecondary education institutions and the private sector can provide for the development of this Nation's most valuable resource, its human capital. I urge my colleagues' support of this important legislation.●

By Mr. DECONCINI:

S. 482. A bill to provide for the designation on income tax forms of contributions to retire the public debt; to the Committee on Finance.

NATIONAL DEBT CONTRIBUTION ACT

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, since I last spoke on behalf of this bill on October 19, 1983, our national debt has climbed dramatically. While it has been only slightly over a year since that day, our national debt has increased by approximately $263.719 billion. This represents an increase of $1,111 for every man, woman, and child in the United States. In addition to this alarming news, the Office of Management and Budget's proposed budget for the coming year will apparently not fulfill its deficit reduction goals. Without question, a comprehensive program must be developed to counteract these economic dangers; however, there are also intermediate steps that can and should be initiated immediately.

Toward that goal, I am reintroducing the National Debt Reduction Act, which will provide a clearly defined means for voluntary taxpayer contributions to reduce the public debt. Under my bill, taxpayers may designate $1, or any amount beyond that figure, from their Federal tax refund to go toward financing the reduction of the national debt. Taxpayers desiring to contribute toward this goal would merely check off a box on their tax return. Those who would not receive refunds would be able to make an outright contribution.

A program such as this would result in impressive returns when compared with its minimal startup costs. According to the Internal Revenue Service, of the 96 million tax returns filed in 1984, 76 million received refunds. This group represents a large number of potential contributions. I believe that with the American taxpayer's heightened awareness of the national debt and deficit problems over the past few years, they would be willing to make a contribution to resolve the problem.

There can be no single solution to the staggering national debt problem. But it is obvious that any and all programs which feature low costs and high yields are desirable and prudent. I believe my bill should be one of a series of such programs which we in Congress can utilize to help diminish the bloated national debt and gain a balanced budget.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that my bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 482

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) any taxpayer may designate on the form for the return of the tax imposed by chapter 1 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 for any taxable year, either—

(1) $1 of—

(A) any overpayment of such tax for such taxable year, or

(B) any contribution which the taxpayer forwards in money with such return, or

(2) an amount of such overpayment or contribution which is in excess of $1, as a gift to the United States Government for the purpose of retiring the Federal public debt.

(b) In the case of a joint return of husband and wife, each spouse may make a separate designation of $1 or more under subsection (a) as a gift to the United States government for the purpose of retiring the Federal public debt.

(c) Space shall be made available for the designations referred to in subsection (a) on the first page of the tax return forms for such tax.

(d) For purposes of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, any overpayment of tax designated under subsection (a) shall be treated as being refunded to the taxpayer as of the date prescribed for filing the return of such tax (disregarding any extension) or, if later, the date the return is filed.

(e) There is hereby appropriated to the special account described in section 3113(d) of title 31, United States Code, out of amounts in the general fund of the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated, an amount equal to the amount of overpayments of tax designated under subsection (a). The amounts appropriated by this subsection shall be transferred quarterly to such special account by the Secretary of the Treasury.

(f) This section shall apply to taxable years ending after the date of enactment of this Act.

By Mr. DURENBERGER (for himself and Mr. WILSON):

S. 483. A bill entitled the "Intergovernmental Regulatory Relief Act of 1985"; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

INTERGOVERNMENTAL REGULATORY RELIEF ACT

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, today I am introducing the Intergovernmental Regulatory Relief Act of 1985. Its premise is quite simple. If Congress enacts legislation pursuing a national purpose or mandate, it should face up to its responsibility to pay for it's implementation.

Under our current system, the Federal Government doesn't always shoulder the full cost of implementing legislation enacted here in Washington. Often, a considerable amount of these costs is shifted onto State and local governments through the regulatory process.

Not only is this practice fiscally irresponsible, in effect making benefits loom large because costs are only partially projected when the State and local burden is ignored, it encourages vague and ambiguous legislation. All too often we give extraordinary discretion to the Federal bureaucracy and courts in perceiving legislative intent and issuing or enforcing appropriate regulations. In the end, State and local governments usually end up paying when the cost of implementation exceeds the expectations of congressional sponsors.

Mr. President, the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations found in its study of regulatory federalism that "although the specific programs imposing major fiscal and administrative costs vary greatly from one jurisdiction to another, most States, cities, and counties have been strained by the combined weight of the new Federal intergovernmental regulations taken as a whole." The Intergovernmental Regulatory Relief Act is based on this study, its findings and its recommendations.

As an example of cost shifting, consider a recent Urban Institute study of six Federal regulatory programs in a sample of seven cities and counties. It concluded that the annual federally mandated costs of just these particular six programs ranged from a total of $6 to over $50 per capita. For a State like Minnesota, this means the cost burden would run between $25 and $209 million annually for merely six programs.

This, I suspect, is only the tip of the regulatory iceberg. ACIR identified more than 35 major Federal regulatory statutes constituting thousands of pages of rules in the Federal Register aimed at or implemented by State and local governments.

In its recent tax reform and budget proposals, the Reagan administration seeks curtailment or outright elimination of many Federal financing tools which in the past have helped offset growing cost burdens imposed by enactment of Federal mandates. Eliminating general revenue sharing, economic development programs, and access to tax exempt financing, will make it even more difficult for State and local governments to comply with Federal regulations and implement important national objectives. By proposing the elimination of the Federal deductibility of State and local tax payments, the administration will restrict the ability of State and local governments to raise revenue on their own. The mere fact that we seemingly expect State and local governments to incur the cost of implementing Federal mandates is pernicious enough without then denying them almost any assistance from the Federal Government.

Mr. President, the Intergovernmental Regulatory Relief Act grants State and local governments some needed relief from the burden of costly Federal regulations by preventing future cost to them when Congress legislates to achieve a national goal, purpose, or mandate and by reducing their current regulatory cost burden.

Quite simply, the act requires Federal reimbursement for all additional costs incurred by State and local governments in complying with new Federal rule or regulations. In addition, it establishes a 10-year schedule of relief to reduce the existing regulatory burden. This schedule requires the Federal Government to reduce the existing regulatory burden on State and local governments by either a phased-in reimbursement for additional direct costs of existing regulations, a phase-in reduction of the regulatory requirements themselves, or a combination of each. If such relief is not forthcoming, the bill provides that no Federal agency or court shall enforce the unreimbursed regulation.

Furthermore, the President is required to prepare an annual report estimating the total additional direct costs incurred by State and local governments in complying with major Federal regulations. This report will contain detailed cost estimates upon which reimbursements are based. It will also allow Congress to more responsibly evaluate the total costs involved in achieving Federal goals when State and local governments are required to act in concert with the Federal Government under Federal law.

My purpose is not to make it more difficult to regulate, I seek to ensure that the Federal Government assumes the full cost of legislating and regulating Federal purposes and mandates. Hopefully, the byproduct of this process just might be a more efficient Federal regulatory system.

I ask unanimous consent that the Intergovernmental Regulatory Relief Act and a fact sheet discussing its contents be printed in the RECORD in their entirety.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 483

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Intergovernmental Regulatory Relief Act of 1985."

FINDINGS AND PURPOSE

SEC. 2. (a) The Congress finds and declares that—

(1) Federal regulation of State and local governments has become increasingly extensive and intrusive in recent years;

(2) such regulation has, in many instances, adversely affected State and local governments by placing excessive fiscal burdens on such governments;

(3) such excessive fiscal burdens have weakened the foundation of the federal system of government; and

(4) a lack of adequate fiscal resources to carry out necessary Federal regulation of

State and local governments in complying with any intergovernmental regulation which takes effect on or after the date of enactment of this Act.

(b) Therefore it is the purpose of this Act to establish procedures to—

(1) assure that the Federal Government pays the total amount of additional direct costs incurred by State and local governments in complying with any intergovernmental regulation which effect on or takes after enactment of this Act.

(2) assure that the burden on State and local governments resulting from compliance with intergovernmental regulations in effect before the date of enactment of this Act is reduced to the minimum level consistent with achieving major national objectives; and

(3) assure that the Federal Government ultimately pays the total amount of additional direct costs incurred by State and local governments in complying with intergovernmental regulations.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 3. For purposes of this Act, the term—

(1) "additional direct costs" means the amount of costs incurred by a State or local government solely in complying with an intergovernmental regulation promulgated pursuant to a Federal law concerning with a particular activity which is in excess of the amount that such State or local government would be required to expand in carrying out such activity in the absence of such law, except that such term does not include any amount which a State or local government is required by law to contribute as a non-Federal share under a Federal assistance program;

(2) "compliance reforms" means market oriented procedures to replace or supplement strict governmental monitoring and enforcement activities, including the establishment and enforcement of penalties for noncompliance with Federal regulations that reflect the degree of such noncompliance, and the establishment of procedures to permit compliance with State or local regulations in lieu of compliance with Federal regulations;

(3) "Director" means the Director of the Office of Management and Budget;

(4) "economic incentives" means the process of making price corrections in the marketplace through governmental fees or subsidies that encourage or discourage activities in accordance with public policies;

(5) "Federal agency" has the meaning given to the term "executive agency" in section 6501(3) of title 31, United States Code;

(6) "Federal assistance" means any assistance provided by a Federal agency in the form of grants, loans, loan guarantees, property, cooperative agreements, or technical assistance to State and local governments or other recipients, except that such term does not include direct cash assistance to individuals, contracts for the procurement of goods or services for the United States or insurance;

(7) "intergovernmental regulation" means a regulation promulgated by a Federal agency that requires a State or local government to take certain actions or requires State or local governments to comply with certain specified conditions in order to receive or continue to receive Federal assistance and which requires the termination or reduction of such assistance if such government fails to comply with such conditions;

(8) "local government" has the same meaning as in section 6501(6) of title 31, United States Code;

(9) "marketable rights" means the process for allocating scarce resources through the establishment of rights that can be traded or sold among bidders, rather than through the distribution of resources through the issuance of permits by a Federal agency;

(10) "performance standards" means the criteria or goals that must be attained to comply with a Federal regulation, and does not include a detailed specification of the means of compliance;

(11) "significant law" means any Federal law which is likely, in the judgment of the Director of the Congressional Budget Office, to result in total additional direct costs to all State and local governments of $100,000,000 or more in any fiscal year, or is likely to have exceptional fiscal consequences for a geographic region or a particular level of government;

(12) "small government" means a government of a city, county, town, village, school district, or other special district established under State law which has a population of less than fifty thousand;

(13) "special provisions for small governments" means requirements for small governments contained in an intergovernmental regulation which are different from the requirements included in such regulation for other governments, and includes simplified compliance methods designed to reduce administrative burdens on small governments and reduced standards and modified compliance mechanisms which are proportional to the capabilities of small governments to comply with such regulations; and

(14) "State" means each of the several States, the District of Columbia, Guam, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands, the Virgin Islands, American Samoa, and the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands.

TITLE I—REVIEW OF INTERGOVERNMENTAL REGULATIONS

REPORT REQUIRED

SEC. 101. (a) Not later than thirty days after the date on which the President transmits a budget for a fiscal year to the Congress pursuant to section 1105 of title 31, United States Code, the President shall submit to the Congress a report specifying and evaluating the economic costs, noneconomic costs, and additional direct costs which have been incurred or which will be incurred by State governments and local governments in complying with intergovernmental regulations during the most recently completed fiscal year, the fiscal year in progress, and the first two fiscal years immediately succeeding the fiscal year in progress.

(b) Each report required under subsection (a) shall include—

(1) a list of each intergovernmental regulation in effect during each fiscal year for which the report is made and a citation of statutory and administrative authority for each such intergovenmental regulation;

(2) an estimate, for each such intergovernmental regulation, of—

(A) the total amount of economic costs, noneconomic costs, and additional direct costs that have been incurred or will be incurred in each such fiscal year by the government of each State and all local governments in such State in complying with such regulation in each such fiscal year; and

(B) the ratio (stated as a percentage) which the total amount of additional direct costs that have been incurred or will be incurred by all local governments in a State in complying with such regulation in each such fiscal year bears to the total amount of additional direct costs that have been incurred or will be incurred by the government of such State and all local governments in such State in complying with such regulation in such fiscal year;

(3) an estimate, for each such intergovernmental regulation, of the economic and noneconomic benefits that will be provided in each such fiscal year to each State government and all local governments in such State as a result of compliance with such regulation during such fiscal year;

(4) recommendations for changes in laws and regulations that will reduce the costs specified pursuant to paragraph (2), or that will achieve a more favorable balance between the benefits specified pursuant to paragraph (3) and the costs specified pursuant to paragraph (2); and

(5) proposals for legislation, and a statement of planned administrative actions, to implement the recommendations specified pursuant to paragraph (4).

(c) In preparing the report required by subsection (a), the President shall consider the potential for reducing costs incurred by State and local governments in complying with intergovernmental regulations through the promulgation of intergovernmental regulations which utilize means such as performance standards, special provisions for small governments, marketable rights, economic incentives, compliance reforms, and simplified procedures to certify the compliance of Federal assistance recipients with Federal requirements.

PROCEDURES FOR PREPARATION OF REPORT

SEC. 102. (a) The President may delegate to the Director or to the head of any other Federal agency the responsibility for preparing the annual report required by section 101.

(b) In carrying out the provisions of this title, the President, the Director, or the head of a Federal agency to which a delegation is made under subsection (a), shall, after providing public notice and an opportunity for comment in accordance with section 553 of title 5, United States Code, prescribe standards to be used by Federal agencies in estimating the costs of compliance with, and the benefits provided by, intergovernmental regulations administered by such agencies. Such standards may be revised from time to time to reflect changes in relevant economic and social circumstances and advances in pertinent branches of knowledge.

(c) The standards prescribed under subsection (b) shall provide, to the extent possible, for—

(1) uniform categories of costs of compliance with, and benefits provided by, intergovernmental regulations;

(2) methods to be used by Federal agencies in compiling the information required to be submitted under subsection (d) which shall be designed to—

(A) minimize the costs that will be incurred by the State and local governments and the Federal assistance recipients from which such information will be collected; and

(B) ensure the collection of reasonably accurate information in a form that will be useful to States in complying with section 204(c);

(3) methods for preventing disclosure of information about individuals or businesses the confidentiality of which is protected under Federal law;

(4) procedures to be followed by Federal agencies in reporting the information required to be submitted under subsection (d); and

(5) such other procedures and guidelines as may be necessary for the implementation of this title.

(d) Each year, at a time prescribed by the President, the Director, or the head of the Federal agency to which a delegation is made under subsection (a), the head of each Federal agency which administered any intergovernmental regulation during a fiscal year for which a report is required under section 101, shall prepare and submit to the President, the Director, or such agency head, a report setting forth, for each such regulation, the information required to be included for such regulation in the report required under section 101.

TITLE II—COMPENSATION OF STATE AND LOCAL GOVERNMENTS FOR ADDITIONAL DIRECT COSTS

COMPENSATION REQUIRED

SEC. 201. (a) A Federal agency or a court of the United States shall not require State governments or local govenments to comply with, in any fiscal year, any intergovernmental regulation which takes effect on or after the date of enactment and which is promulgated pursuant to a significant law unless provisions of law have been enacted which provide a sufficient amount of funds for such fiscal year to reimburse such governments for the total amount of additional direct costs that will be incurred by such governments in complying with such regulation during such fiscal year.

(b)(1) For the fiscal year ending on September 30, 1987, and each of the succeeding fiscal years, a Federal agency or a court of the United States shall not require State governments or local governments to comply with, in any fiscal year any governmental regulation which took effect prior to the date of enactment of this Act and which was promulgated pursuant to a significant law unless—

(A) provisions of law have been enacted which provide an amount of funds to reimburse such governments for the additional direct costs that will be increased by such governments in complying with such regulation in such fiscal year which is equal to or in excess of the amount described in paragraph (2) for such fiscal year;

(B) provisions of law have been enacted revising the significant law under which such regulation was promulgated, and such revisions will result in the reduction of such fiscal year by an amount equal to or in excess of the amount described in paragraph (2) for such fiscal year; or

(C) administrative actions have been taken which will result in the reduction of such additional direct costs for such fiscal year by an amount equal to or in excess of the amount described in paragraph (2) for such fiscal year; or

(D)(i)(I) provisions of law have been enacted which provide an amount of funds to reimburse State and local governments for such additional direct costs for such fiscal year which is less than the amount described in paragraph (2) for such fiscal year;

(II) provisions of law have been enacted revising the significant law under which such regulation was promulgated, and such revisions will result in the reduction of such additional direct costs for such fiscal year by an amount which is less than the amount described in paragraph (2) for such fiscal year; and

(ii) the sum of the amounts described in divisions (I), (II), and (III) of clause (i) with respect to a fiscal year is equal to or in excess of the amount described in paragraph (2) for such fiscal year.

(2) The amounts referred to in paragraph (1) for the fiscal years are as follows:

(A) FISCAL YEAR 1988.—An amount equal to the product of the total amount of additional direct costs that will be incurred by State governments and local governments in complying with an intergovernmental regulation in such fiscal year multiplied by 10 percent.

(B) FISCAL YEAR 1989.—An amount equal to the product of the total amount of additional direct costs that will be incurred by State governments and local governments in complying with an intergovernmental regulation in such fiscal year multiplied by 20 percent.

(C) FISCAL YEAR 1990.—An amount equal to the product of the total amount of additional direct costs that will be incurred by State governments and local governments in complying with an intergovernmental regulation in such fiscal year multiplied by 30 percent.

(D) FISCAL YEAR 1991.—An amount equal to the product of the total amount of additional direct costs that will be incurred by State governments and local governments in complying with an intergovernmental regulation in such fiscal year multiplied by 40 percent.

(E) FISCAL YEAR 1992.—An amount equal to the product of the total amount of additional direct costs that will be incurred by State governments and local governments in complying with an intergovernmental regulation in such fiscal year multiplied by 50 percent.

(F) FISCAL YEAR 1993.—An amount equal to the product of the total amount of additional direct costs that will be incurred by State governments and local governments in complying with an intergovernmental regulation in such fiscal year multiplied by 60 percent.

(G) FISCAL YEAR 1994.—An amount equal to the product of the total amount of additional direct costs that will be incurred by State governments and local governments in complying with an intergovernmental regulation in such fiscal year multiplied by 70 percent.

(H) FISCAL YEAR 1995.—An amount equal to the product of the total amount of additional direct costs that will be incurred by State governments and local governments in complying with an intergovernmental regulation in such fiscal year multiplied by 80 percent.

(I) FISCAL YEAR 1996.—An amount equal to the product of the total amount of additional direct costs that will be incurred by State governments and local governments in complying with an intergovernmental regulation in such fiscal year multiplied by 90 percent.

(J) FISCAL YEAR 1997 AND SUCCEEDING FISCAL YEARS.—An amount equal to the product of the total amount of additional direct costs that will be incurred by State governments and local governments in complying with an intergovernmental regulation in such fiscal year multiplied by 100 percent.

(c) For purposes of this section, the total amount of additional direct costs that will be incurred by State governments and local governments in complying with an intergovernmental regulation in any fiscal year shall be the total amount of such costs for such regulation estimated by the Director of the Congressional Budget Office in the report required under section 202 for such fiscal year.

REPORT BY THE DIRECTOR OF THE CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET OFFICE

SEC. 202. (a) For each fiscal year in which an intergovernmental regulation promulgated pursuant to a significant law will be in effect, the Director of the Congressional Budget Office shall prepare and transmit to the President and the Congress a report specifying, for such fiscal year and each of the two fiscal years succeeding such fiscal year, and estimate of the total amount of additional direct costs that will be incurred by State governments and local governments in complying with such regulation in each such fiscal year.

(b) In preparing each report required by subsection (a), the Director of the Congressional Budget Office shall transmit each report required by subsection (a) for a fiscal year to the President and the Congress by September 1 of the fiscal year preceding such fiscal year.

IMPLEMENTATION

SEC. 203. For each fiscal year in which an intergovernmental regulation promulgated pursuant to a significant law will be in effect, the Chairman of the committees of the Senate and the House of Representatives having legislative jurisdiction over such significant law shall propose, to an appropriate bill or resolution providing funds for such fiscal year, an amendment containing provisions to appropriate funds to reimburse State governments and local governments for the additional direct costs incurred in complying with such regulation. The amount of funds proposed to be appropriated by such amendment shall be equal to or in excess of the amounts described in subsection (a), subsection (b)(1)(A), or subsection (b)(1)(D) of section 201, as the case may be.

PROCEDURES FOR REIMBURSEMENTS TO STATE AND LOCAL GOVERNMENTS

SEC. 204. (a)(1) The head of each Federal agency which administers an intergovernmental regulation promulgated pursuant to a significant law shall pay to each State government in each fiscal year the amount determined pursuant to this section to reimburse the State government and local governments in the State for the additional direct costs incurred by such governments in complying with such regulation in such fiscal year.

(2) A State government which receives payments under this section for reimbursement for additional direct costs incurred in complying with an intergovernmental regulation in any fiscal year shall pay to each local government in the State the amount determined pursuant to this section to reimburse such local government for the additional direct costs incurred by such local government in complying with such regulation in such fiscal year.

(b) The total amount to be paid to a State to reimburse the government of the State and local governments in the State for additional direct costs incurred by such governments in complying with an intergovernmental regulation in any fiscal year shall equal an amount for reimbursement of additional direct costs for all State governments and local governments described in subsection (a), subsection (b)(1)(A), or subsection (b)(1)(D)(I) of section 201, as the case may be, with respect to such regulation for such fiscal year, as the total amount of additional direct costs with respect to such regulation which are specified in such report for all State governments and all local governments for such fiscal year.

(c)(1) The total amount to be paid by a State government to local governments in such State to reimburse such governments for additional direct costs incurred by such governments in complying with an intergovernmental regulation in any fiscal year shall be equal to the product of the amount paid under subsection (b) to such fiscal year multiplied by the ratio determined by the President for such State with respect to such regulation for such fiscal year pursuant to section 101(b)(2)(B).

(2)(A) A State government which receives payments under this section to reimburse local in the State for the additional direct costs incurred by such regulation in any fiscal year shall pay to each such local government an amount equal to the product of—

(i) the total amount determined under paragraph (1) with respect to such regulation for such fiscal year, multiplied by;

(ii) the ratio (stated as a percentage and estimated by the State in accordance with subparagraph (b)) that the total amount of additional direct costs incurred by such local government in complying with such regulation in such fiscal year bears to the total amount of additional direct costs incurred by all local governments in such State in complying with such regulation in such fiscal year.

(B) Each State government which receives payments under this section for any fiscal year shall provide by law for the estimation of the amount of additional direct costs incurred by each local government in such State in complying with an intergovernmental regulation for which such payments are received. In providing for the estimation of such costs which are reasonably related to the actual additional direct costs incurred by such governments in complying with such regulation in such fiscal year.

EFFECT OF SUBSEQUENT ENACTMENTS

SEC. 205. No law enacted after the date of enactment of this title shall supersede the provisions of this title unless such law does so in specific terms, referring to this title, and declares that such law supersedes the provision of this title.

TITLE III—MISCELLANEOUS

COST ESTIMATES

SEC. 301. Section 403(c) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 is amended by striking out "$200,000,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$100,000,000".

INTERGOVERNMENTAL REGULATORY RELIEF ACT OF 1985—SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS

Sec. 1. Contains enactment language.

Sec. 2. Findings and Purpose. This section expresses Congress' view that federal regulation of state and local governments has become too extensive and too burdensome, and that steps need to be taken to provide relief to the state and local governments. The purpose of the Act is stated in two parts: (1) to require a systematic approach to reducing intergovernmental regulatory burdens through an annual process of review involving both the Congress and the President in establishing priorities and taking appropriate action to this end, and (2) to provide for a more effective and efficient means of administering generally applicable federal assistance requirements.

TITLE I—REVIEW OF INTERGOVERNMENTAL REGULATIONS

Sec. 101. Definitions. This section defines "Director" to be the Director of the Office of Management and Budget, and "federal agencies" to be any department, agency, or other unit of the United States Government that imposes regulations upon the nation's state and local governments. The term "state and local governments" is defined in a very inclusive manner. In addition, the section defines "intergovernmental regulations" to include four relatively recently devised types, in addition to other regulations in federal aid programs. These types are crossover sanctions, direct ordered, partial preemptions, and generally applicable requirements. Finally, this section defines several alternative means of regulation, including compliance reforms, economic incentives, marketable rights, performance standards, and special provisions for small governments.

Sec. 102. Annual Report. This section requires the President to prepare and transmit to the Congress, 30 days following his budget message, a report evaluating the economic and noneconomic compliance costs incurred or expected to be incurred by state and local governments as a result of intergovernmental regulations imposed by the federal government. The contents of this report are specified to include an inventory of all federally imposed intergovernmental regulations, estimates of the compliance costs and benefits associated with each such regulation, planned actions of the executive branch designed to reduce intergovernmental regulatory burdens or to achieve a more favorable balance between benefits and costs, and recommended legislation, where needed, to enable such goals to be met more fully than is possible under existing laws.

Sec. 103. Alternative Means of Regulation. This section requires the President to consider alternative means of regulation in preparing his recommendations and plans for reducing burdens on state and local governments.

Sec. 104. Authority of the President. This section sets forth a procedure by which the President may delegate the preparation of his annual report to Congress to the Director of the Office of Management and Budget or another appropriate agency head. The section also provides authority for prescribing standards, methods, and criteria to be employed by relevant federal agencies in evaluating regulatory costs and benefits and reporting them for inclusion in the President's report to Congress.

Sec. 105. Submission of Information. This section requires all federal agencies imposing intergovernmental regulations to provide required information at the times specified by the President or his designee for inclusion in the report to Congress.

TITLE II—ADMINISTRATION OF GENERALLY APPLICABLE FEDERAL ASSISTANCE REQUIREMENTS

Sec. 201 amends the Intergovernmental Cooperation Act of 1968 to add a new section.

Sec. 6509—Administration of Generally Applicable Federal Assistance Requirements.

Subsection (a). Statement of Purpose. This subsection expresses Congress' intent to simplify, standardize, and coordinate the administration of all national policy requirements having general applicability to federal assistance programs by improving the procedures used in developing implementing regulations so as to reduce overall costs and burdens incurred by assistance recipients, including the elimination of any such requirements that are found to be unnecessary, infeasible, or inappropriate.

Subsection (b). Definitions. This subsection defines the term "Federal assistance" in a broadly inclusive manner, along with the terms "assistance agency," and "assistance recipient." It also defines the term "generally applicable requirement" as one which applies to programs administered by two or more assistance agencies, and the term "designated agency" as a federal agency designated by the President for the purpose of developing, adopting, and monitoring the implementation of coordinated requirements to be used by the two or more assistance agencies. In addition, this subsection defines the term "national policy assistance standards" as the guidelines, standards, and other substantially uniform requirements issued to achieve uniform implementation of generally applicable requirements throughout the federal establishment.

Subsection (c). Assignment of Designated Agencies. This subsection requires the President to designate a single federal agency to develop uniform regulations for each type of generally applicable requirement. Initial designations are to occur within 120 days after enactment of this legislation and would apply to such subject areas as labor practices requirements, public employee standards, equal services requirements, equal employment requirements, access to government information, procurement standards, planning requirements, financial and administrative requirements, citizen participation requirements, and environmental protection requirements. This subsectiopn requires the President to make agency designations only after considering the agency's program responsibilities in relation to the generally applicable requirement, the agency's capacity to effectively carry out its responsibilities under this legislation, and the need to keep the number of designated agencies small. Finally, this subsection provides for possible additional agency designations in cases where new generally applicable requirements are enacted.

Subsection (d). Issuance of National Policy Assistance Standards. This subsection requires each designated agency to develop national policy assistance standards in its field of designated responsibility within one year after receiving its designation from the President. The subsection also requires the designated agency to consult widely with affected federal agencies, assistance recipients, and other interested parties in carrying out this task. Any future legislation or administrative rules affecting a generally applicable requirement are expected to be incorporated into the national policy assistance standards by the designated agency within one year after they become effective. The national policy assistance standards adopted by a designated agency are to be simple and clear; to minimize reporting requirements, compliance costs, and other burdens on assistance recipients; to make use of standard compliance procedures; to provide for technical assistance and other facilitative procedures; and to cite all federal assistance programs to which such standards apply, including block grant programs as appropriate. Within 120 days after adoption of national policy assistance standards by the designated agency, all affected assistance agencies are required to implement such standards. In order to reduce the burdens imposed by frequently changing federal regulations, revisions or additions to such standards may become effective only on the first day of each fiscal year.

Subsection (e). Implementation and Enforcement Roles of Federal Agencies. Each of the federal assistance agencies to which a generally applicable requirement applies is required to designate a senior official of the agency to cooperate with the designated agency and coordinate his agency's compliance activities with the standards adopted by the designated agency. This subsection also authorizes the head of any federal assistance agency to certify and accept state or local government laws, regulations, directives, standards, reporting requirements, and compliance monitoring and enforcement procedures in substitution for national policy assistance standards when they are at least equally stringent and are being faithfully enforced. Such certifications may be rescinded for cause after due notice and opportunity for the assistance recipient to demonstrate why the assistance agency should not do so. Finally, this subsection requires federal assistance agencies to assist affected assistance recipients in their efforts to comply with applicable national policy assistance standards.

Subsection (f). Legislation To Remove Impediments to Implementation. This subsection provides a procedure for a designated agency that is unable to develop uniform national policy assistance standards because of inconsistent provisions of law, to report that fact to the President and to develop proposed legislative remedies which the President may submit to the Congress. This procedure also may be followed to exempt federal assistance programs from a generally applicable requirement if such requirement is found to be inappropriate, inefficient, or poorly suited to effective management of the program.

Subsection (g). General Oversight. This subsection provides that the President may delegate his responsibilities under this Act to the Director of the Office of Management and Budget, or the head of another federal agency, except the authority to name designated agencies. Such delegated tasks may include establishment of procedures for developing, implementing, and evaluating national policy assistance standards; reviewing the administration of generally applicable requirements to improve their effectiveness; establishing procedures for resolving disputes and conflicts between designated agencies, assistance agencies, and assistance recipients; evaluating and developing techniques for certification of state and local requirements substituted for national ones; providing an annual catalog of all generally applicable requirements and national policy assistance standards; and keeping Congress fully informed about the administration of generally applicable requirements.

Sec. 202. Legal Authority Not Limited. This section provided that the new section added to the Intergovernmental Cooperation Act of 1968 does not in any way limit the authority of the President, or the Office of Management and Budget, or the Director of the Office of Management and Budget that may otherwise exist under the laws of the United States with respect to the administration of federal assistance requirements.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I wish to join the distinguished Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DURENBERGER], in the introduction of the "Intergovernmental Regulatory Relief Act of 1985."

This legislation is designed to bring a greater measure of fairness to the entire process by which this Congress seeks to impose its will and its judgment upon the States and the local governments of this Nation.

Specifically, the intent here is to require Federal reimbursement for any additional costs incurred by State and local governments in complying with new Federal regulations.

Mr. President, this legislation, I am sure, will make great sense to any of my colleagues who have, in their experience, spent some time in State or local government. Many times in my capacity as a State legislator, and even more as mayor of a large city, I have questioned the judgment of legislators at the Federal level. Many times I must confess to having expressed deep resentment at their having imposed not only their judgment but the cost of their judgments upon local taxpayers.

The principle involved here, simply stated, is that the National Government bears some responsibility to fund duties and requirements it chooses to impose upon State and local governments. This position has been strongly endorsed by many State and local government officials.

Unfortunately, I must add in all honesty that even State governments have been guilty of imitating the Federal level by imposing upon local governments regulatory requirements without the benefit of adequate funding.

Some years ago this finally became intolerable in California, and the State legislature, to cure its own sin, enacted what was then called Senate bill 90, which said very simply that the State shall no longer impose new duties upon local governments without providing the funds for the performance of those duties.

Mr. President, I realize that this idea of full reimbursement to State and local governments could present a series of difficult fiscal and administrative problems for the Federal Government. I understand why at first blush many of my colleagues might find this approach a bitter pill to swallow, particularly now when we are almost obsessed with a discussion as to how we shall go about reducing deficits. That consideration is one we all share. It is a concern from which we cannot escape until, in fact, we have adequately reduced the existing Federal deficits.

Let me say it simply: If, in our judgment, a particular responsibility to be discharged at the State and local level is important enough for us to enact Federal legislation so as to require it, then it seems to this Senator that such mandates should be accompanied by appropriate Federal funding.

Mr. President, it may be that this type of legislation will, in the long run, actually help reduce Federal fiscal problems.

In recent years, Congress has often responded to problems without providing adequate funding to carry them out. If we now require Federal reimbursement of Federal mandates it may be that we will reform our own lack of realism by working to slow further regulatory proliferation as well as bringing relief, much deserved relief, to those who labor at the State and Federal level.

In a period of Federal deficits, such a requirement would impose an obstacle to new enactments by those of us in Congress.

Mr. President, the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations issued a report entitled "Regulatory Federalism: Policy, Process, Impact, and Reform." I agree with much of the report. It cites in some detail, with many examples, precisely the kind of abuses which the Federal Government has been guilty with the best of good intentions. I do not agree entirely with the recommendations of the report on the issue of reimbursement. Nevertheless, it may be helpful to close by quoting what the Commission had to say about its recommendations for full Federal reimbursement. I read from the report of the Commission on Intergovernmental Relations:

> The Commission strongly affirms the principle of Federal resonsibility for mandated costs, but it has carefully tailored its recommendation to current budgetary realities and to the administrative difficulties posed by full reimbursement of all existing mandates. This recommendation is limited to costs imposed on State and local governments by future intergovernmental regulations. This restriction avoids excessive immediate demands on the deficit-ridden Federal budget while simultaneously establishing an effective fiscal deterrent to future regulatory proliferation. The recommendation is also limited to additional direct costs of regulations, e.g., those expenses that are clearly attributable to implementing the regulation, above and beyond any related activity that would have been carried out in the absence of the Federal mandate. Although the Commission recognizes that such additional costs are difficult to measure and define, it expects that appropriate methodologies will be perfected by the Congressional Budget Office in implementing existing "fiscal notes" legislation. The exclusion of ambiguous "indirect" costs, like losses of efficiency and externalities, also simplifies this task. Finally, to strengthen implementation of this recommendation by potentially reluctant federal administrators, it contains an action-forcing provision: holding State and local governments free from regulatory compliance for any future Federal mandates that are unreimbursed. This provision provides justifiable grounds for challenging any future unfunded mandates.

For these reasons, Mr. President, I am joining my colleague and friend, Mr. DURENBERGER, in sponsoring this legislation.

By Mr. HATCH (for himself, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. D'AMATO, Mrs. HAWKINS, Mr. STAFFORD, Mr. QUAYLE, Mr. PELL, and Mr. EAGLETON):

S. 484. A bill to amend the Saccharin Study and Labeling Act; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

EXTENSION OF THE MORATORIUM ON BANNING SACCHARIN

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I am introducing a bill to extend the Saccharin Study and Labeling Act, which expires in April of this year. I am very pleased to be joined by Senator KENNEDY, ranking minority member, of the committee, and by Senators D'AMATO, HAWKINS, STAFFORD, QUAYLE, PELL, and EAGLETON.

Corresponding legislation has been introduced in the House by Representative FOLEY.

Saccharin is one of the oldest synthetic food additives and has been used by generations of Americans. There is as yet no sign that the use of saccharin has had an adverse impact on the health of our people. It is true that some studies indicate that it is a very weak carcinogen in extremely high concentrations used in laboratory tests. However, other studies have found no such link, and even the studies commissioned by the Food and Drug Administration itself are ambiguous in their results. Further, studies reinterpreting prior data indicated that any risk from use of saccharin in man is so slight as to be insignificant.

These matters are currently under review by the FDA, and I certainly encourage continuing study to clear up the ambiguities. However, under these circumstances, I believe it is just as appropriate to sound a note of caution now through this extension as it was the previous three times we have extended the moratorium. The moratorium would prohibit FDA action against saccharin solely on the basis of data available through 1978, the date fixed in the initial act.

It should be remembered that saccharin is not just an ordinary food additive. For the millions of Americans, including diabetics, who need to reduce their calorie intake or avoid sugar, there is no complete substitute for saccharin. While aspartame has taken over a sizable share of the artificial sweetener market, there are many applications for which it is unsuitable, such as those requiring cooking or heat processing, or where a long shelf life is desirable.

For these applications, the only alternative is saccharin. Other sweeteners are being developed, and previously marketed substances—cyclamates—are being reviewed by FDA for possible relicensing, but final actions on these substitutes will take years.

I feel that the American people should not be deprived of this widely used and currently irreplaceable sweetener without solid research demonstrating some public health threat. This bill would extend the current moratorium's expiration date 3 years, until May 1, 1988. During that time I am confident that sufficient knowledge can be marshaled to resolve conclusively the continuing questions about saccharin.

I ask my colleagues to join with me in cosponsoring this legislation and in assuring its timely passage.

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I am cosponsoring this bill to extend the Saccharin Study and Labeling Act.

Saccharin is an important part of the diets of many Americans who need to avoid sugar intake. It is particularly important for diabetics.

While some things have changed in the artificial sweetener field since the last extension of this legislation—including the development of aspartame and new studies suggesting cyclamates may not be carcinogenic—there does not appear to be a fully satisfactory substitute for saccharin currently available.

In response to concerns expressed by Senator METZENBAUM, our committee will be holding a hearing shortly to review the issues surrounding artificial sweeteners. I am hopeful that this hearing will provide helpful information on appropriate Federal policy in this area and I appreciate Senator METZENBAUM's role in assuring that a hearing will be held. After the hearing, I believe we will be in a position to proceed with necessary legislation.●

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to cosponsor legislation introduced by my good friend, the chairman of the Labor and Human Resources Committee, that would extend for 3 years the moratorium on the ban of the artificial sweetener saccharin. Specifically, this bill will amend the Saccharin Study and Labeling Act of 1977 (Public Law 95-203). This legislation was introduced near the end of the last session of Congress, but time ran out before we could act on it.

The conflict over saccharin has had a long history. Since it was discovered in 1879, its carcinogenicity has been suspect. From 1912 to 1925, it was banned from use in foods. In 1977, the Food and Drug Administration [FDA] announced its intention to ban saccharin once again. They had found that large quantities of the artificial sweetener caused malignant bladder tumors in some laboratory animals. Although the FDA noted that the sweetener has been in use for over 80 years and was never known to be harmful, it issued guidelines for ending the use of saccharin as a substitute for sugar.

This ban, of course, never occurred because the Saccharin Study and Labeling Act put a moratorium on the saccharin ban for 18 months. Since then, Congress has extended the moratorium three times. The current moratorium will end this April. This legislation would extend the moratorium for 3 years, or until May 1988.

This legislation, however, is not a congressional approval of saccharin as a safe substitute for sugar. But it does allow more time for safer substitutes to be produced and more conclusive studies on the danger, if any, of saccharin to be conducted. When we in Congress are periodically faced with a decision to extend the moratorium on the ban of saccharin, we are not acting because we have medical expertise; rather, we are merely representing our concerned constituents. We do not know if saccharin causes cancer in humans. What we do know, however, is that a large segment of our population depends on saccharin as a sugar substitute. For many, the small possible risk of cancer is necessary so that they may avoid immediate medical problems associated with diabetes or being overweight.

Unfortunately, the introduction of aspartame, another low-calorie sugar substitute, has not made the situation much better. Although it has been thoroughly tested, doubts still remain about its effects on human health. Also, aspartame's ability to replace saccharin is limited since it does not have a long shelf life and it cannot be used as a cooking ingredient. As a result, saccharin and aspartame now complement each other. In fact, a combination of these sweeteners can be found in many diet soft drinks. For these reasons, it is much more important that saccharin is allowed to remain available as an artificial sweetener until a more complete substitute can be found.

Cyclamates, which were banned in 1979, are being reconsidered as an artificial sweetener. Action to allow cyclamates on the market most likely would not be completed until early next year. Even so, cyclamates alone are not a complete sugar substitute. The necessity for saccharin would become more important.

Millions of Americans who depend on saccharin for their restricted diets are periodically faced with a possible ban of the low-calorie product. I support the legislation and ask for its prompt consideration so that people such as diabetics will know that they will be able to use saccharin until May 1988 or until a safer substitute can be found. During this time, I strongly urge the Food and Drug Administration to continue its investigations into the safety of saccharin and I strongly urge the industry to continue its effort to produce a safer sugar substitute. I do not state that saccharin is totally safe, but until a safer, all-purpose artificial sweetener is found or until saccharin is proven unsafe, people should continue to have the option to use saccharin as a food additive.●

By Mr. MURKOWSKI (for himself and Mr. STEVENS):

S. 485. A bill to amend the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act of 1980 to clarify the treatment of submerged lands and ownership by the Alaskan Native Corporation; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

OWNERSHIP OF SUBMERGED LANDS

● Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, today Senator STEVENS and I are introducing legislation which would rectify a serious problem in our State involving navigability determinations, conveyance acreage chargeability, and the ownership of submerged lands.

This is a complex problem that can only be corrected with legislation. The legislation we are introducing today reflects a consensus of the Alaska Congressional Delegation, the State of Alaska, the Alaska Native Community, the Department of the Interior.

Our bill, if enacted, would repeal section 901 of the Alaska National Interest Lands and Conservation Act [ANILCA]. The enactment of this bill will also ensure that the BLM will continue to apply the same survey and chargeability guidelines in Alaska that are applied in other States.

Mr. President, at the outset I want to stress a few major points. First of all, this bill is a limited, specific amendment to ANILCA which does not affect any of the fundamental conservation purposes of that act. I feel that it is highly unlikely that this bill will provoke the kind of heated debate that previously transpired during ANILCA's consideration. Second, I'd like to underscore what will occur if we fail to enact this legislation. If this bill is not enacted this year, the enormous, counterproductive and unnecessary burden of litigating hundreds of individual navigability decisions will fall on the State of Alaska and a number of Native village corporations. Frankly, Mr. President, many of these small Native corporations cannot afford complex, expensive litigation. We have the opportunity, and the responsibility, to eliminate their exposure while providing for a more rational method of addressing navigability disputes in Alaska.

Under the constitutional doctrine of the equal footing of States, the beds of navigable rivers and lakes in Alaska is vested in the State of Alaska on the date of statehood. Because of disputes over the proper criteria for determining navigability, the Department of the Interior has conveyed hundreds of rivers and lakes claimed by the State of Alaska to Native corporations, and has charged the submerged lands against their 44 million acre land entitlement granted by the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act [ANCSA]. If these submerged lands are later determined to be navigable, the Native corporation receiving the conveyance containing the water body will be entitled to select upland acres to replace it.

However, the slow judicial progress of these navigability determinations means that the land status situation for Native corporations will remain uncertain for an indefinite period. At the time the navigability of a particular water body is finally settled, the affected Native corporation may be unable to select alternative lands.

Section 901 of ANILCA was an attempt to guarantee that Native corporations would not lose a portion of their acreage entitlement under ANCSA as a result of judicial findings of navigability. It established a time period after which the State could no longer assert title to river beds and lake bottoms conveyed to Native corporations.

Since the passage of ANILCA, both the State and the Natives have realized that the solution set out in section 901 will result in an excessive administrative workload and much needless navigability litigation. The statute of limitations found in section 901 will come into effect in December 1985, and the State of Alaska must begin to file lawsuits asserting its claims to navigable water bodies at that time if Congress has not acted to correct the law. That litigation will exacerbate the uncertainties regarding acreage chargeability and ownership of submerged lands in Alaska. The problem is made more acute by the relatively slow development of judicial criteria for navigability determinations in Alaska. In addition, the State has challenged the constitutionality of the statue of limitations in section 901.

The extensive disputes over navigability, and the related issue of chargeability for submerged lands, stem from the failure of the Department of the Interior to use the rules contained in the Manual of Instructions for the Survey of the Public Lands of the United States when surveying and conveying public lands in Alaska. These standard rules of survey require that only uplands be surveyed. Lakes 50 acres or larger and rivers and streams 198 feet in width or wider are segregated from the public lands. The recipients of conveyances from the Federal Government are charged only for the amount of public land identified by the properly conducted survey. River beds and lake bottoms are not included in that figure. Except for rivers and lakes smaller than the administrative criteria, navigability determinations do not affect the amount of land conveyed in fulfillment of acreage entitlements. These rules have always been applied to conveyances in other public land States, except Alaska. No evidence exists that Congress intended that a different survey and conveyance procedure apply to State and Native lands.

Beginning in 1981, the State, the Natives, and the Department of the Interior began discussions on alternative ways of solving the problems resulting from section 901. In 1983, the three parties agreed to a solution: The statute of limitations would be repealed and replaced with the traditional procedures for segregating water bodies set out in the survey manual.

On December 5, 1983, the Department of the Interior published a notice in the Federal Register announcing their decision to use the standard survey manual rules in Alaska. However, the statute of limitations contained in ANILCA remains in force and can only be repealed by Congress. Until it is repealed, the Federal Government, Alaska Native corporations, and the State of Alaska will be forced to engage in unnecessary and counterproductive litigation over the navigability of public water bodies.

The legislation we are introducing contains both of these important components—recognition of the 1983 DOI administrative decision to follow the rules found in the survey manual, and repeal of the statute of limitations. Use of the standard survey rules means that determinations of navigability or nonnavigability will no longer significantly affect the Native corporations' acreage entitlement. This change in practice also means that the statute of limitations may now be repealed without harm to Native interests.

The proposed solution is conceptually similar to section 918 of H.R. 39 as it passed the U.S. House in 1979. That provision was replaced in the Senate in favor of section 901. Experience and further legal research have shown that section 901 is not the best solution to this problem.

The State of Alaska, the Bureau of Land Management, and the Natives have worked for the past year to arrive at an accurate estimate of the amount of acreage which would be affected by the DOI decision to follow the standard rules of survey. That estimate indicates that a maximum of about 460,000 additional acres of uplands would be conveyed into State ownership, and 270,000 acres into Native ownership. These figures are based on a detailed analysis of the various physiographic regions of Alaska. A number of interested parties have been presented with the opportunity to examine and comment on the basis for these figures and no alternative figures or methodologies have been presented. The additional State conveyances will not affect any conservation system units.

Although additional Native in-holdings within conservation system units would occur, many of these would be created in any event as a result of successful assertions of navigability by the State.

The Sierra Club and the Wilderness Society have recently filed litigation in U.S. District Court challenging the validity of the Department of the Interior's revised procedure for surveying public lands in Alaska. That litigation is based on the conclusion that Congress intended, without directly stating so in law, to establish special rules for Alaska conveyances. This conclusion is contradicted by the review conducted by the DOI Solicitor. The issue is one that is appropriate for Congress, and not the courts, to resolve. The pursuit of this litigation will result in burdensome costs to all the interested parties and only delay resolution of the ultimate problem. This policy issue has, on several previous occasions, been dealt with by Congress, and should again be addressed by us.

If the statute of limitations is not repealed, an enormous, and unnecessary, burden for litigating hundreds of individual navigability decisions will fall on the State and the Natives. To prevent that result, the proposed legislation would establish a situation comparable to that found in other States. There, litigation occurs in response to specific conflicts, and over a period of many years, without the artificial stimulation of a statute of limitations and the necessity of challenging individual land conveyances and navigability decisions.

Some have suggested a simple extension of the statute of limitations as an alternative to the proposed legislation. However, such an extension would not resolve the constitutional issues raised by the section 901 and would only postpone the deleterious impacts of that provision.

In closing, Mr. President, I believe it is important to point out that the Conference of Western Attorney Generals unanimously approved a resolution in August 1984, calling for the repeal of the statute of limitations found in section 901(a) of ANILCA. That resolution also called for a congressional confirmation of the use of the standard survey and acreage accountability procedures for Federal land conveyances in Alaska. Their resolution was based on the principle that no statute of limitations should run against a sovereign State, and that the use of the standard survey manual procedures was proper and would protect all affected interests.

Mr. President, it is clear that we must act on this matter this year. As a member of the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee, I will be seeking hearings and action on this legislation at the committee's earliest opportunity.

I urge my colleagues to join with me in ensuring that this bill receive the attention it deserves.●

By Mr. DENTON:

S.J. Res. 53. Joint resolution to authorize and request the President to designate the month of June 1985 as "Youth Suicide Prevention Month"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

YOUTH SUICIDE PREVENTION MONTH

Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, I rise to introduce a joint resolution to designate the month of June 1985 as "Youth Suicide Prevention Month."

American children, adolescents, and young adults are killing themselves in ever-increasing numbers. The rate of suicide has increased more than threefold in the last 20 years and is still continuing to rise. This year, more than 5,000 young Americans can be expected to take their own lives.

Suicide now trails only accidents and homicides as the leading cause of death for those between the ages of 15 and 24. Even younger children experience problems which lead them to commit suicide. According to a report prepared by the National Center for Health Statistics, during a 13-year period ending in 1978, there were almost 2,000 documented cases of suicide among children under the age of 14.

The statistics represent only the tip of the iceberg. Some experts estimate that the actual number of suicides among young people is at least four times greater than is reported. Recent studies indicate that more than 2 million high school students attempted suicide last year.

Mr. President, youth suicide is a phenomenon which is so perplexing, contradictory, frightening, and troubling that our society avoids addressing it. As individuals and as a nation, we refuse to believe that young people emerging from childhood can feel the degree of sadness, hopelessness, and despair that leads to suicide.

Inaction and walls of silence serve only as barriers to solving the problem. As a caring nation concerned about the future of our youth, we must help. The children who we have already lost to suicide included some of the best and brightest of their generations and the hope for our future. Youth suicide is a problem of nationwide scope. It can only be solved through the combined efforts of individuals, families, communities, organizations, and government to educate our society about what can be done.

Mr. President, I hope by calling attention to the problem by designating the month of June 1985 as "Youth Suicide Prevention Month" we can help end the tragedy.

I urge my colleagues to support the joint resolution and pass it expeditiously.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the joint resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 53

Whereas the youth of society represent the hope for the future;

Whereas the rate of youth suicide has increased more than threefold in the last two decades;

Whereas over five thousand young Americans took their lives last year, many more attempted suicide, and countless families were affected;

Whereas youth suicide is a phenomenon which must be addressed by a concerned society; and

Whereas youth suicide is a national problem which can only be solved through the combined efforts of individuals, families, communities, organizations, and government to educate society: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the month of June 1985 is designated as "Youth Suicide Prevention Month" and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the Governors of the several States, the Chief officials of local governments, and the people of the United States to observe such month with appropriate programs and activities.

By Mr. McCLURE (for himself and Mr. SYMMS):

S.J. Res. 54. Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution relating to Federal spending responsibility; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT RELATING TO FEDERAL SPENDING RESPONSIBILITY

● Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, in 1982 this body passed the proposed constitutional amendment to balance the budget. I strongly supported that measure and felt it would go a long way in restoring fiscal responsibility to our Government. However, as with any compromise, there were imperfections. We can all agree that it is imperative that the Federal Government adopt and stick to a policy of spending no more than it takes in as revenue. The means of accomplishing this goal is under constant scrutiny. I feel as many of my colleagues do, that the temptation to raise taxes is too great in the balanced budget amendment. There is no doubt that the best way to go about balancing the budget is to focus on decreasing the role of the Federal Government in our economy.

That is what this amendment is all about, to try to get spending back down to the limits where Americans begin to see that the rewards of labor are more important to them than the rewards of leisure. We will never attain that in our system as long as the burden of taxation continues to rise. As important as the proposed constitutional amendment to balance the budget was, it did not do all of the job that needs to be done because spending can continue to rise under the amendment. I warned this body of this fact but at the time felt that altering it then would have gone further to guarantee its defeat than its passage.

At that time, I vowed to raise the issue again. My views have not changed on this subject. Government spending is bleeding our Nation dry. Those on both sides of the aisle see this and should address it. The American poeple have delivered a message on two different occasions. They are tired of wasted dollars and they are tired of shouldering an increased burden as a means to satisfy uncontrollable spending.

If we look back to the 1950's and 1960's, when Federal spending took a smaller share of our economy, we were much more productive. In the 1960's, Federal spending was about 18 percent of our gross national product. During this period our economy, as it is measured by GNP, grew 6.72 percent. In the 1970's, during Congress' freewheeling spending spree, Federal spending as a percentage of GNP was 21 percent, and at the same time our inflation rate was above 7 percent and the growth of the economy was only 3 percent. There is no doubt that as Federal spending consumes more and more of our economy we are less productive and we turn to inflationary policies to make up the differences.

During the 1980's, we have seen double-digit inflation, drastically high interest rates, and a stagnant economy. We made some attempts to control spending and reduce the tax burden. We are experiencing the beginning of a strong recovery which should continue for the rest of the decade if we will impose the necessary restraints on spending. If we fail to impose such restraints, we will abort our recovery and find ourselves in the worst financial crisis we have seen for decades. We are now faced with the hard reality that we must look down the road and establish a policy which is in the best interest of all Americans. This policy must provide stability to our economy. We must tell the American public that Government will spend only a predetermined amount of productive capacity and will not continue to compete with citizens for their hard-earned dollars.

This amendment is the answer to our prevailing problem and will allow us to solve our crisis over time. It is very close to the administration's latest figures of deficit reduction.

The balanced budget amendment is one solution, but it creates an overwhelming temptation to levy additional taxes. My amendment will require Federal spending to be capped at 19 percent of GNP. It will be phased in it at the rate of 1 percent per year.

We must realize that expenditures are not the cure for all our problems. More often than not, increased expenditures have been the cause of our sickness. This body has conducted the world's longest experiment to prove that our fiscal problems can be solved with additional outlays. We have failed miserably. More money spent on a bad idea will not make that idea good.

The proposal we have today will go a long way to reaffirm valid financial standards. By reducing the Federal Government's share of GNP by 1 percent a year, until it is back down to a productive level of 19 percent, we will go a long way to restore responsibility to Government.

This was a promise President Reagan made to the American people. I intend to do everything I can to see this promise fulfilled. The time is now to give the American people what they want and what the economy needs. We will be faced with the deficit question for many years to come. The budget continues to grow with more and more items being placed off limits. We must make a decision at some time when this will end. Now is the time to end the game and place a limit on expenditures.

I ask all of my colleagues to join me in support of this important measure, and I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 54

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article is hereby proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within seven years after its submission to the States for ratification:

"ARTICLE —

"SECTION 1. In exercising its powers under article 1 of the Constitution, and in particular its powers to lay and collect taxes, duties imposts, and excises and to enact laws making appropriations, the Congress shall assure that the total outlays of the Government during any fiscal year (except for repayment of debt) do not exceed an amount equal to the greater of—

"(a) the difference between—

"(1) an amount which bears the same relationship to the gross national product of the United States at the close of such fiscal year as outlays for the preceding fiscal year bear to the gross national product of the United States at the close of such preceeding fiscal year, and

"(2) an amount which is equal to 1 per centum of gross national product for such fiscal year, and

"(b) 19 per centum of the gross national product for such fiscal year.

"SECTION 2. In case of national emergency or war, the limit may be exceeded but all expenditures in excess of the greater of the limitations listed in section 1 of this Act must be approved by a concurrent resolution agreed to by a rollcall vote of three-fourths of all the Members of each House of Congress. The limitation may be exceeded only in that fiscal year in which such a vote was taken.".●

S.J. Res. 55. Joint resolution to designate May 24, 1985, as "National Self-Help Housing Day"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL SELF-HELP HOUSING DAY

● Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, this year marks the 20th anniversary of the Self-Help Housing Program. This program is a unique partnership between the Federal Government and the people of rural America. Under the program, rural families help build their own houses under supervisory and mortgage assistance provided by local, private, nonprofit sponsors, and the Farmers Home Administration.

Over 16,000 families in 43 States have benefited from this program. Their hard work has made home ownership a possibility for them. Furthermore, the pride engendered by their participation in the process of construction and the reality of home ownership have led to improved family life and civic responsibility in our rural communities.

To honor the accomplishments of all those involved in the Self-Help Housing Program, I am pleased to introduce today a joint resolution proclaiming May 24, 1985, as "National Self-Help Housing Day."

Home ownership and self-reliance have become the embodiment of the American dream and spirit. I hope my colleagues will join me in honoring this spirit by cosponsoring this joint resolution.●

S.J. Res. 56. Joint resolution to designate April 1985 as "National Child Abuse Prevention Month"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL CHILD ABUSE PREVENTION MONTH

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I am introducing today a joint resolution to declare the month of April 1985 as "National Child Abuse Prevention Month." I am pleased to be joined by a number of my distinguished colleagues in this effort.

Mr. President, child abuse is not a new phenomenon of the 20th century. Children of the world have been physically and mentally mistreated, molested, and deprived of life itself by adults since the first hours of human history. What is new, is the fact that the phenomenon has been formally identified and its pathologies examined. However, it was not until the early 1960's that any significant public and professional attention was focused on the problem of child abuse.

This problem is currently one of the Nation's greatest child-welfare risks. It accounts for an estimated 2 million abused children each year, with at least 5,000 children dying as a direct result of some form of child abuse.

During the past two decades, research has demonstrated that the problem of child abuse crosses social, racial, economic, cultural, and occupational boundaries. It does not allow us to point to one set of data, statistics, or demographics and conclude that it happens to one particular group or class. The underlying causes of child abuse remain largely hidden, but they are deep seated and very complex. What is known is that it is a problem of epidemic proportions which demands national attention.

We, in Congress, have an opportunity to assist the many individuals, agencies, organizations and research institutions that are striving to rid our Nation of this problem and to assist the victims as well. We must help to focus public attention on the goals and objectives of organizations such as the National Committee for Prevention of Child Abuse, the National Child Abuse Coalition and Parents Anonymous.

The NCPCA was established in the early 1970's in response to the increasing incidence of infant deaths due to purposely inflicted injuries. One of its goals was to prevent child abuse by involving concerned citizens in a public education process.

The declaration of April 1985 as "National Child Abuse Prevention Month" is one way in which we can emphasize the importance of the goals or organizations such as, NCPCA. Their work—to stimulate greater public awareness and education—should be our work, too.

We must encourage research, advocate policies to prevent child abuse, and support the efforts of our States in the development of their prevention programs and activities.

Child abuse is an ugly, extensive and expensive problem that is wearing and tearing our social fabric. The personal and social costs of the child abuse problem are beyond measure. Recent reports state that child abuse can be linked to juvenile delinquency and adult criminal behavior.

Approximately 80 to 90 percent of all incarcerated felons were victims of child abuse. The average cost of retaining a juvenile delinquent in a public detention facility is nearly $17,000 per year, and $14,000 for an adult criminal in a State facility. These crime statistics and cost figures are reason enough for us to move quickly toward a solution to the problem of child abuse. But it is not the most important.

We in public office have an obligation to take whatever steps are necessary to protect the life and health of our Nation's most valuable resource—its children.

One strategy to offer hope in the prevention of child abuse is to encourage and support increased public awareness through the proclamation of April 1985 as "National Child Abuse Prevention Month." I urge all my colleagues to join us in this effort.

S.J. Res. 57. Joint resolution to designate the week of October 20, 1985, through October 26, 1985, as "Lupus Awareness Week"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

LUPUS AWARENESS WEEK

● Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, today I am introducing a joint resolution to designate October 20–26, 1985, as "Lupus Awareness Week."

Lupus erythematosus is a chronic, inflammatory disease of the connective tissue. Translated, its name means "red wolf" which describes the red, bite-shaped rash characteristic of the disease. Skin rashes are just one of many symptoms common to lupus. Others include fever, joint pains, weight loss, fatigue, heart problems, anemia, kidney malfunction, Sun sensitivity, pleurisy, hair loss, nausea, and mental or emotional problems. Tragically, the cause(s) of lupus are still unknown. Current research suggests that in some lupus inflammation, the body seems to become allergic to normal components of body cells, and forms antibodies against its own tissues. In short, the body of a lupus victim is trying to destroy itself.

Nearly 500,000 people in the United States are afflicted with lupus; many of these are women in their childbearing years; 50,000 new cases are reported each year. Lupus affects more people than does muscular dystrophy, multiple sclerosis, or leukemia. This is not a rare disease, yet many Americans have never heard of lupus or its debilitating effects. Even some physicians are unfamiliar with lupus, and as a result the disease may be misdiagnosed or be diagnosed too late.

There is no known cure for lupus erythematosus. However, thanks to important research and improved diagnostic methods, 80 to 90 percent of all lupus victims can look forward to a normal life-span. Moreover, beneficial therapy and treatment is enabling lupus patients to lead productive lives. Unfortunately, though, some people still die from lupus and many others continue to suffer from its painful symptoms. Clearly, more needs to be done.

The purpose of this joint resolution is to encourage research to find a cure for lupus erythematosus through heightened public awareness. A more knowledgeable public can also insure the early diagnosis so essential to effective treatment of the disease. Progress has been made because of our efforts in recent years, but we must continue until a cure is found. Lupus Awareness Week can and will make a difference in the lives of lupus victims and their families. I urge my colleagues to join me in this continued effort to help them.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. Res. 57

Whereas lupus erythematosus is a disease of unknown cause that affects over five-hundred thousand people in the United States, 90 percent of whom are women in their childbearing years;

Whereas lupus erythematosus, though not a rare disease, is unfamiliar even to some physicians which may result in the disease being misdiagnosed or diagnosed too late;

Whereas lupus erythematosus in the most severe form can be fatal;

Whereas the Lupus Foundation of America, Inc., its constituent chapters, and other voluntary health organizations are established throughout the United States to serve and support victims of lupus and their families, encourage funding for research, and increase public awareness;

Whereas the public and the Federal Government are not sufficiently aware of the incidence of lupus erythematosus: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the week of October 20, 1985, through October 26, 1985, is designated as "Lupus Awareness Week" and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe the week with appropriate programs, ceremonies, and activities.●

S.J. Res. 58. Joint resolution to designate the week of April 21, 1985, through April 27, 1985, as "National Drug Abuse Education and Prevention Week"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL DRUG ABUSE EDUCATION AND PREVENTION WEEK

● Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, today, I am introducing legislation to designate April 21-27, 1985, as "National Drug Abuse Education and Prevention Week."

Many years have passed and countless drug-related deaths have occurred since drug abuse began to approach epidemic proportions in the United States. We have gone far in enacting stringent laws to thwart the proliferation of narcotics. We have gone far in strengthening our border patrols, Coast Guard, and other police forces to curb the influx of illegal drugs into our cities and towns. In the last Congress, we passed the Comprehensive Crime Control Act which, among other purposes, strengthened drug law enforcement. But today, drug abuse remains a national tragedy.

Each of us has been exposed to the statistics on drug abuse. We must not forget the deaths, the broken lives, and the distressed families which these figures represent. Moreover, we must always be aware of the less noticeable results of drug abuse: The promotion of criminal behavior among those addicted to drugs, the wasted potential of drug abusers to America's work force, and the fear which strikes every American touched, even remotely, by the effects of drug abuse.

To reverse this trend that is personally and economically detrimental to our society, we must intensify our efforts to educate ourselves and our children on the dangers of drug abuse. By trying to halt the demand for illicit drugs through intelligent and responsible publicity of the effects of drug use, we can do a great deal to eradicate this problem. This joint resolution to establish a "National Drug Abuse Education and Prevention Week" is aimed at reducing demand through education.

For several years such a week has been designated to coincide with pertinent conferences or broadcasts. This year, the dates chosen coincide with three major occurrences: the Pharmacists Against Drug Abuse [PADA] Foundation is celebrating its first anniversary in its efforts to educate parents on drug abuse; Parents' Research Institute for Drug Education [PRIDE] is hosting an international conference in Atlanta, GA, which will focus on current research findings and the outlook for prevention in the future; and Mrs. Nancy Reagan will host a meeting in Washington with first ladies from 17 other nations to discuss the problems of drug abuse among adolescents.

It is my hope that efforts such as these will help curb the problem of drug abuse in our Nation. The more we talk with our children about the inherent dangers associated with drugs, the better we prepare them to resist any temptations to experiment with drugs. If we try, we can show our young people that illegal drugs are the problem, and not the answer to the problem.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the joint resolution I am introducing be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 58

Whereas the illegal drug trade consists of over $80,000,000,000 in retail business per year;

Whereas removing the demand for drugs would reduce the illegal drug trade;

Whereas drug abuse destroys the future of many of the young people and adults in the Nation;

Whereas the eradication of drug abuse requires a united mobilization of natural resources, including law enforcement and educational efforts; and

Whereas the most effective deterrent to drug abuse is education of parents and children in the home, classroom, and community: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the week of April 21, 1985, through April 27, 1985, is designated as "National Drug Abuse Education and Prevention Week" and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to participate in drug abuse education and prevention programs in their communities and encouraging parents and children to investigate and discuss drug abuse problems and possible solutions.●

ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS

S. 11

At the request of Mr. HEINZ, the names of the Senator from Montana [Mr. MELCHER], and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BIDEN] were added as cosponsors of S. 11, a bill to amend the Steel Import Stabilization Act.

At the request of Mr. D'AMATO, the name of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. BOREN] was added as a cosponsor of S. 434, a bill to extend the authorization of the Robert A. Taft Institute Assistance Act.

S. 437

At the request of Mr. QUAYLE, the name of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. LUGAR] was added as a cosponsor of S. 437, a bill to designate the Veterans' Administration Outpatient Clinic to be located in Crown Point, IN, as the "Adam Benjamin, Jr. Veterans' Administration Outpatient Clinic".

S. 447

At the request of Mr. DECONCINI, the name of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. SIMPSON] was added as a cosponsor of S. 447, a bill to amend the Sherman Act to prohibit a rail carrier from denying to shippers of certain commodities, with intent to monopolize, use of its track which affords the sole access by rail to such shippers to reach the track fo a competing railroad or the destination of shipment and to apply Clayton Act penalties to monopolizing by rail carriers.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 19

At the request of Mr. GARN, the name of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. EAGLETON], the Senator from Texas [Mr. GRAMM), the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. KASTEN], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STENNIS], and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ZORINSKY] were added as cosponsors of Senate Joint Resolution 19, a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States for the protection of unborn children and other persons.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 20

At the request of Mr. SYMMS, the name of the Senator from Utah [Mr. GARN], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. HELMS], and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. MATTINGLY] were added as cosponsors of Senate Joint Resolution 20, a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States with respect to the English language.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 23

At the request of Mr. MOYNIHAN, the name of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. NUNN], and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DURENBERGER] were added as cosponsors of Senate Joint Resolution 23, a joint resolution designating 1985 as the "Year of Social Security."

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 26

At the request of Mr. PRESSLER, the names of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. ANDREWS], the Senator from Montana [Mr. BAUCUS], and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HOLLINGS] were added as cosponsors of Senate Joint Resolution 26, a joint resolution to designate "National Farm Crisis Week."

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 27

At the request of Mr. HATCH, the names of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. BOSCHWITZ], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. DECONCINI], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. EXON], the Senator from Florida [Mr. HAWKINS], the Senator from Hawaii [Mr. INOUYE], the Senator from Kansas [Mrs. KASSEBAUM], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. MATHIAS], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. METZENBAUM], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SARBANES], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. SYMMS], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. WARNER], and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ZORINSKY] were added as cosponsors of Senate Joint Resolution 27, a joint resolution to designate the week containing March 8, 1985, as "Women's History Week."

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 28

At the request of Mr. BOSCHWITZ, the names of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. LEAHY] were added as cosponsors of Senate Joint Resolution 28, a joint resolution to designate the week of September 8-14, 1985, as "National Independent Retail Grocer Week."

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 29

At the request of Mr. GLENN, the names of the Senator from California [Mr. CRANSTON], and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. WARNER] were added as cosponsors of Senate Joint Resolution 29, a joint resolution to designate the week of November 11, 1985, through November 17, 1985, as "National Reye's Syndrome Week."

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 31

At the request of Mr. BURDICK, the names of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. DOLE], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRASSLEY], the Senator from Hawaii [Mr. MATSUNAGA], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. LUGAR], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STENNIS], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ARMSTRONG], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. NUNN], the Senator from Idahc [Mr. SYMMS], the Senator from California [Mr. CRANSTON], and the Senator from Utah [Mr. GARN] were added as cosponsorss of Senate Joint Resolution 31, a joint resolution to designate the week of November 24 through November 30, 1985, as "National Family Week."

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 32

At the request of Mr. PRESSLER, the names of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRASSLEY], and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. ABDNOR] were added as cosponsors of Senate Joint Resolution 32, a joint resolution to authorize and request the President to designate September 15, 1985, as "Ethnic American Day."

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 52

At the request of Mr. MOYNIHAN, the name of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] was added as a cosponsor of Senate Joint Resolution 52, a joint resolution to designate the month of April 1985 as "National School Library Month."

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 14

At the request of Mr. MOYNIHAN, the names of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SARBANES], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. EXON], and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] were added as cosponsors of Senate Concurrent Resolution 14, a concurrent resolution to express the sense of the Congress that Josef Mengele should be brought to justice.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 15—RELATING TO UNITED STATES-JAPAN TRADE

Mr. DANFORTH (for himself, Mr. BOREN, Mr. ABDNOR, Mr. ANDREWS, Mr. BAUCUS, Mr. BIDEN, Mr. BINGAMAN, Mr. BURDICK, Mr. BYRD, Mr. CHILES, Mr. DIXON, Mr. DODD, Mr. EAGLETON, Mr. EXON, Mr. FORD, Mr. GARN, Mr. GLENN, Mr. HEFLIN, Mr. HEINZ, Mr. HOLLINGS, Mrs. KASSEBAUM, Mr. KASTEN, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. LAUTENBERG, Mr. LEVIN, Mr. METZENBAUM, Mr. MITCHELL, Mr. PRESSLER, Mr. PROXMIRE, Mr. QUAYLE, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Mr. SARBANES, Mr. SIMON, Mr. SPECTER, Mr. THURMOND, and Mr. WARNER) submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

S. CON. RES. 15

Whereas the United States merchandise trade deficit with Japan reached the unprecedented level of $37 billion in 1984—accounting for almost one-third of the entire United States deficit with the world;

Whereas this unprecedented bilateral deficit was accumulated in spite of significant growth in the Japanese economy;

Whereas the principles of free trade provide for trade flows between nations on the basis of each nation's comparative advantage;

Whereas Japan has extensive access to the United States market for products where Japan has comparative advantage;

Whereas United States exporters lack access to the Japanese market for manufactured goods, forest products, key agricultural commodities and certain services where the United States has comparative advantage;

Whereas the bilateral trade imbalance is costing the United States hundreds of thousands of jobs every year,

Whereas the high value of the dollar relative to the yen effectively subsidizes Japanese exports to the United States and taxes United States exports to Japan;

Whereas despite the voluntary restraint Japanese autos continue to account for approximately 2 million cars imported into the United States market—contributing over $20 billion to the bilateral trade deficit;

Whereas years of negotiating with Japan to secure meaningful improvements in market access for competitive United States exports have been largely unsuccessful;

Whereas many other countries experience comparable difficulty in obtaining access to the Japanese market;

Whereas an end to the voluntary restraint on autos without a comparable improvement in access for competitive United States exports to the Japanese market will severely exacerbate the bilateral trade deficit;

Whereas this deficit has the potential of undermining the entire range of bilateral relations between the United States and Japan: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the voluntary restraint on Japanese autos not be ended until United States exports to Japan are substantially increased and the United States trade deficit with Japan is substantially reduced.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, the foreign trade of the United States is in a state of emergency. In medical terms, we are a Code Blue. The patient is sinking, and sinking fast. Extraordinary measures are in order.

Consider the trade figures announced on January 30 by the Commerce Department: a deficit of $123 billion. I find such a deficit intolerable. I believe that my outrage is shared by a rapidly growing body of opinion in Congress.

The largest single contributor to this trade deficit is our commerce with Japan—in 1984, we ran a deficit with Japan of $37 billion. As recently as 1981, Mr. President, our worldwide deficit was $40 billion. Now, our deficit with a single nation, Japan, is at par with our worldwide deficit a mere 4 years ago.

The United States has invested a great deal of time and energy in efforts to secure a fair shot at making sales in Japan's domestic market. We have discussed, conferred, consulted, and negotiated in dozens of forums. We have secured commitments, pledges, assurances, understandings, agreements both preliminary and final, and communiques.

We have secured everything except meaningful results. We have seen literally everything the Japanese have to offer in trade negotiations—everything, except significantly increased sales of American goods and services.

To be sure, there have been marginal improvements in our trade relationship with Japan. But they have been few, far between, and meaningless when set beside this large bilateral deficit. What has been accomplished with business as usual? Mr. President, I am sad to say that what has been accomplished with business as usual is insignificant when balanced against $37 billion in red ink.

Today, I join with Senator BOREN and one-third of our colleagues, along with House Republican Leader BOB MICHEL, to suggest that conventional, business-as-usual approaches simply aren't working. We propose that limits on shipments of Japanese automobiles to the United States remain in place until we see significant increases in our sales of goods and services to Japan and significant increases in our balance of trade.

We will press for the strongest possible expression of congressional opinion on this point. America's international trade is very sick. The monitors are flashing red and the bells are ringing. I am one Senator who believes the situation could scarcely be more serious—and yet, by way of treatment, I hear prescriptions that amount to a new coat of paint for the hospital room.

In addition to pressing for linkage between auto limits and market access, I intend to conduct hearings before the International Trade Subcommittee to examine the effects of the trade deficits and to consider unconventional means to save the patient.

There are many reasons for the magnitude of our deficit—key among them is the value of the dollar. But while protection of foreign markets isn't the sole reason we are in trouble, it is an important reason for the size of the deficits we are posting.

Take a look at the results of the incremental, business-as-usual approach to improving our relationship with Japan. For all the negotiations, for all the promises, for all the packages, we have to show the following results:

An increase of 39 percent in Japan's exports to the United States, to a record $60 billion; and, on the other side of the ledger, an anemic gain of 8 percent in our exports sales to Japan.

Worldwide, our trade balance in manufactured goods deteriorated in 1984, from a deficit of $38 billion in 1983 to a shortfall of nearly $86 billion. Nearly two-thirds of this total can be found in our accounts with Japan.

In electronic products, where we are clearly competitive in such key areas as telecommunications, computers and semiconductors, the bilateral trade deficit with Japan is quickly approaching $20 billion.

It would seem that Japan is willing to do virtually everything except what the situation demands—open its markets and increase its purchases from the United States.

Earlier this year the President met with Prime Minister Nakasone. The President expressed concern about trade. The two heads of government agreed to hold bilateral talks in sectors including telecommunications and lumber.

But before the first American negotiator could set foot in Japan, the national telecommunications company, Nippon Telephone and Telegraph [NTT), reiterated its decision not to buy U.S. satellites. Before we could deplane for the newest talks, a high-level Japanese official is said to have assured a domestic television audience that lumber imports wouldn't be affected by the new talks with the United States.

Clearly, it is time to stop measuring progress in words. We must measure progress in sales. Hence, our, concurrent resolution.

To take a fresh look at our approach to bilateral relations shouldn't be understood as countenancing protectionism. I am convinced that protectionism would be disastrous to the United States. We must not close ourselves off from the world economy. For example, I have opposed domestic content legislation for automobiles with every means at my command. I continue to oppose such measures, and I have been, until recently, on record as not supporting extension of the restraints on Japanese auto shipments.

The choice cannot be between the status quo and protectionism. We cannot afford such a choice. We are bleeding to death under the status quo. Protectionism would savage agriculture, high-tech industries, and other exporting sectors; it would destroy the long-term vitality of our economy.

A good beginning can be made, I suggest, by extracting concessions from Japan in return for an end to the limits on auto exports. Given the seriousness of our circumstances, it seems to me that it would be irresponsible to give up the limits on Japanese automobile shipments to the United States and get absolutely nothing in return. An uncompensated concession by the United States would be consistent with our past behavior, perhaps. But I believe it would be irresponsible, particularly in terms of the signal it sends to the Japanese.

In 1981, I offered legislation to establish temporary limits on Japanese auto shipments for a period of 3 years. The result of that legislation was the so-called Voluntary Restraint Agreement [VRA] for Japanese auto shipments that is now at issue in our relations with Japan.

With the VRA in place, the American market is still the most open in the world. Japan is selling almost 2 million cars annually in the United States, at a value of $20 billion. This is scarcely a closed market.

We should make use of leverage where we find it. The issue is not whether extension would be justified by the condition of the U.S. auto industry. I don't believe a case for extension can be made on this narrow basis.

More than any other nation, America is committed to a liberal trading system. But it is a cold, cruel world out there. Our custom has been to meet this world armed with an economics textbook and a willingness to negotiate any issue, any time, anywhere, for virtually any result—no matter how microscopic the gain. A primary cause of our difficulties, I suggest, is that others aren't necessarily playing by our rules.

The result is that we get taken to the cleaners time after time. Our competitors don't view trade as theoretical issues of comparative advantage economics. Instead, they approach trade as competition for commercial advantage.

With today's concurrent resolution and with the prospective work of the subcommittee, I am sending a signal. The signal is that I am fed up.

I have no further patience with assurances and negotiations. I am weary of protestations that American exporters aren't trying hard enough to establish themselves in foreign markets. I have had it with a trade deficit that goes further off the charts every year.

We must be open to unconventional answers to a terrible situation. I am here to begin the search for ways to cope with a trade imbalance which, left unattended, will destroy America's manifold opportunities for expanded exports; keep crucial industries on life support for years to come; and rob our economy of the ability to create jobs and opportunities for ourselves, our children and grandchildren.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, I am today joining with my colleague from Missouri, Senator DANFORTH, in introducing a resolution calling for the extension of the Voluntary Restraint Arrangement [VRA] on Japanese automobile imports into the United States. The VRA currently in effect is due to expire on March 31, 1985.

The broad, bipartisan support this resolution has already attracted shows a deep concern among Members of the Senate about the state of United States-Japan trade. The United States has for some time suffered a serious trade deficit with Japan. Last year alone, that deficit reached a staggering $37 billion. Unless something is done soon, it will continue to worsen.

It is estimated that if the VRA on Japanese autos is allowed to expire, the trade deficit with Japan will grow by an additional $10 billion over a 3-year period. Unless Japan reciprocates by relaxing import restrictions on U.S. goods and services, the effect will be a net increase in the deficit we suffer with the Japanese.

I believe it is high time for the United States to act, as well as talk, so that the Government of Japan will clearly see the strength of our determination to restore our trading relationship to a fair basis. The resolution we offer today makes it clear that the continuation of the VRA on Japanese autos will be linked to an overall improvement in U.S. access to Japanese markets.

We are not seeking protection for the U.S. auto industry, but rather the opening of Japanese markets to all U.S. products. Adoption of this resolution will send a much-needed signal to the Japanese Government that it must take significant action, not just in relation to the auto industry, but across the entire spectrum of our trade relations.

I have, for example, continually expressed my concern over certain aspects of our agricultural trade with Japan. When Japanese beef-import restrictions were renewed last year, it was only after last-minute negotiations that a modest improvement was achieved. Even that hard-won improvement, however, amounted to less than an additional 2 ounces of U.S. beef imports per Japanese citizen.

Mr. President, I have always considered myself an advocate of free trade and I continue to do so. I consider trade to be a two-way street, however. It is simply not possible for one nation to have a free trade policy all by itself. The United States must have trading partners who are equally committed to the principles of free trade. For that reason, I call upon the Senate to act quickly and decisively in adopting the resolution being offered today.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I support the concurrent resolution proposed by Senators DANFORTH and BOREN urging continuation of the voluntary restraint agreement on auto imports from Japan.

I believe this is a good resolution. The resolution would continue the voluntary restraint agreement on auto imports from Japan until Japan increases its purchases of U.S. goods and services, and our current trade deficit with Japan decreases substantially. This resolution is a statement cf our commitment toward that end. We need the VRA as a means of continuing pressure on Japan to open their markets to all U.S. goods and services—not just a few specific goods and services under certain conditions after long negotiations.

But we also need the VRA for the continued economic health of the auto industry, and the workers and communities dependent on that industry. Without the VRA, Japanese auto imports could capture upwards of 40 percent of the domestic market according to some estimates, resulting in increased unemployment and government spending for unemployment assistance, and a decreased capacity for the industry to make further progress toward improving its competitive position.

This concurrent resolution does not go as far as I would like, but it is probably the best that can be obtained at this time. Absent from this resolution is the need to remove restrictions by all other auto producing countries on auto imports from Japan. The major European nations have imposed restraints on Japanese autos far below the approximately 20 percent of the U.S. market captured by the Japanese last year. Allowing the VRA to lapse without a simultaneous lifting of restraints by the other auto producing countries would result in Japanese auto producers focusing solely on increasing their U.S. market share to our detriment.

Despite the absence from this resolution of any reference to trade restrictions on auto imports by other auto producing nations, I intend to support this concurrent resolution, and want to thank Senator DANFORTH and BOREN for taking the lead on this important issue.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the "Dear Colleague" letter circulated by Senators DANFORTH and BOREN be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE, COMMITTEE ON FINANCE,
Washington, DC, February 4, 1985.

DEAR COLLEAGUE: We are writing to invite you to join us as an original cosponsor of a resolution linking extension of the Japanese export restraint on autos to increased Japanese imports from the United States and a reduction of the bilateral trade deficit. We intend to introduce the resolution on Thursday, February 7.

While it can be argued that the voluntary restraint arrangement (VRA) on autos has served its purpose, we believe that its termination at this time is virtually impossible to justify in view of the enormous bilateral trade deficit between the United States and Japan. Indeed, it is estimated that the removal of the VRA alone could increase the ballooning deficit by $6-13 billion over last year's intolerable $37 billion—without offering the slightest improvement in access for U.S. exports to Japan.

This prospect must be disturbing to proponents and opponents of the VRA alike—particularly in view of the many barriers faced by competitive U.S. exporters in the Japanese market and in view of the failure of past negotiations with the Japanese to secure improved access. Whether the issue is high technology, wood products, beef, tobacco, or other key industrial or agricultural products, it is hard to imagine Japan taking seriously U.S. efforts to secure improved access if the United States accepts an additional $6-13 billion in manufactured imports from Japan without so much as a whimper.

Last year, despite the VRA, 2 million Japanese automobiles were sold in this country. Taking into account shipments of parts, this represented over $20 billion of the bilateral trade deficit between the United States and Japan. We believe that until Japan demonstrates tangible evidence of increased purchases from the United States, we should not encourage the further deterioration of the bilateral trade balance.

If you have any further questions about the resolution of wish to be an original cosponsor, please have your staff contact Susan Schwab (x41415) or David Cox (x44721) by close of business on Wednesday.

Sincerely,

DAVID L. BOREN.
JOHN C. DANFORTH.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I would like to briefly explain why I am cosponsoring the Danforth-Boren resolution to link termination of the automobile voluntary restraint agreement to increased U.S. exports to Japan.

The Commerce Department recently announced that America's 1984 trade deficit was $123 billion; our trade deficit with Japan was the largest component of this deficit: $37 billion.

To put it another way, for every $1 worth of products Americans sell to Japan, the Japanese sell $2.62 worth of products to us.

This huge imbalance is partly caused by macroeconomic factors like the Federal budget deficit, which inflates the international value of the dollar to make imports cheap and exports expensive.

But it is also caused by Japan's stubborn refusal to open its markets wider to the products of other countries, especially the United States.

Japan maintains a bewildering array of nontariff barriers. What's more, although Japan's overall tariff level is low, it maintains prohibitively high tariffs on products that might displace the products of inefficient existing Japanese producers.

For example, a large portion of the income of Western Montana comes from forest products, such as plywood, laminated lumber, and kraft linerboard. Japan is an attractive market for these products. In fact, in some recent years there have been more housing starts in Japan than in the United States.

U.S. companies have been working hard to sell in Japan. They've opened Tokyo offices. They've learned the language. And they've changed some of the manufacturing standards, by doing things like adding a special tint to the color of kraft linerboard, which has been done by a company in Missoula, MT.

U.S. forest products companies are selling more than $1 billion worth of forest products in Japan each year. They should be selling even more. But they're blocked by Japan's two-tier tariff system. Japan permits logs to be imported freely, but subjects processed products to tariffs as high as 20 percent. As a result, many processing jobs that could be in Missoula, MT, are protected in Sapporo or Osaka, Japan.

This two-tier system reduces potential U.S. sales by more than $1 billion a year. Granted, that's only a small part of our bilateral trade deficit. But, to the forest products industry and to the workers in Montana and elsewhere whose livelihood depends on that industry, it's a very significant amount.

This is only one example. You've all heard many more.

Up until now, we've tried to reduce these barriers through slow, painstaking negotiations. Unfortunately, the concessions we've eventually extracted from these negotiations haven't always resulted in increased imports, because new barriers have replaced old.

So we may need to use new tactics.

For example, we could use our assets—such as a huge market—more aggressively, and selectively deny market access to countries that refuse to dismantle their trade barriers. For another example, we could begin measuring success not on the basis of whether particular barriers are reduced, but on actual results—that is, on the basis of whether particular categories of exports are increased.

Mr. President, the resolution we are introducing today is a step in this direction. As an independent policy matter, I have grave reservations about the wisdom of extending the VRA now. But, at the same time, I'm unwilling to make a unilateral concession to Japan. If the VRA is to be terminated, Japan's trade barriers must fall and U.S. exports must rise.

I hope we can have the best of both worlds. If the pending "market oriented, sector specific" negotiations over Japan's barriers to processed forest products, telecommunications equipment, pharmaceuticals, and medical equipment succeed, and result in significantly increased U.S. sales in all product sectors, that may make extension of the VRA unnecessary.

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, I rise today in support of the principles behind Senate Concurrent Resolution 15, a resolution urging that the voluntary restraint on Japanese autos not be ended until our exports to Japan are substantially increased and our trade deficit with Japan is significantly reduced. I commend my esteemed colleagues from Missouri, Senator DANFORTH, and from Oklahoma, Senator BOREN for their many efforts to recapture for U.S. exporters access to an international marketplace based on free and fair trade.

Let me begin by saying that I believe this resolution to be of historical importance as it represents a clear signal of a fundamental change in the attitudes and beliefs of those who have long supported the idea of free trade. Many of the cosponsors of Senate Concurrent Resolution 15 have won reputations as guardians of the principles of international free trade. Many of us have walked a difficult path as we have sought to avoid protectionist solutions to our trade problems. Rather, we have struggled to devise, formulate, and implement positive approaches to address this country's growing trade imbalance—an imbalance that reached over $123 billion last year. The causes of the U.S. trade deficit are as varied as the colors of the rainbow and there are many that can be addressed as we prepare to deal with the overall U.S. budget deficit or as we work to restructure the multilateral frameworks that govern the international trade system, but one trouble spot has remained—indeed has grown—despite promises to effectively deal with the problem. I am referring to United States-Japan trade or maybe I should say Japan-to-the-United States trade since our trade deficit with Japan alone exceeded $36 billion in 1984.

Now, I have remained consistent in my opposition to any continuation of the voluntary restraints on Japanese auto exports to the United States. I have agreed with those who have pointed out that voluntary restrain agreements distort trade and, in the long run, may harm U.S. industry. I have agreed with those who have said that the U.S. auto industry has recovered and is ready to compete again in a free market environment. The point I am trying to make is that the issue of whether or not to extend the VRA is secondary. Rather, my statement today is the result of my frustration over the unwillingness of the Japanese to open their markets to U.S. goods and services, even to the degree that their goods and services are accorded free access to our markets. Negotiations have not worked. From my own point of view I know that less than spectacular gains have been made for exporters of Georgia lumber, tobacco, and telecommunications products to Japan. Ladies and gentleman, we have seen few if any positive steps that have had enough impact to help our trade deficit with Japan even one iota. Still the trade barriers exist; still the imports pour into the United States. I, for one, feel I have given negotiating in good faith a more than fair chance. It is time, once again, to send the Japanese a signal that we are prepared to take whatever steps are necessary to gain fair access to the Japanese market for U.S. goods and services.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I rise to support this resolution calling for an extension of voluntary restraints on Japanese auto imports until U.S. exports to Japan are substantially increased and the U.S. trade deficit with Japan is substantially reduced.

For several years now, we in Congress and Presidents in both Democratic and Republican administrations have been struggling unsuccessfully to convince the Japanese to open their markets to American goods and services. It is now clear that conventional approaches to this problem are not taken seriously by the Japanese Government and that more forceful action is required.

Our trade imbalance with Japan continues to rise. This trend heightens economic tensions between our two nations and deepens feelings of bitterness among our citizens. I can tell you that when I travel around the State of Ohio, businessmen and workers are no longer expressing frustration with Japan's trade policies, they are voicing anger. They feel victimized by the targeting of U.S. markets and by barriers to entry into Japan's market. Moreover, they are deeply disappointed with those of us in Washington who complain about our trade problems with Japan but fail to do anything about them.

And make no mistake about it, our trade problems with Japan are not confined to any one sector of our economy nor are they the result of failure to maintain our comparative advantage. In telecommunications, for example, American manufacturers sold only $110 million worth of equipment in Japan last year, while their exports of telecommunications equipment to the United States totaled $1.5 billion. The Japanese refuse to buy American communications satellites so that they can protect their own infant industry that they will later unleash on the world market. Japanese bureaucrats create controls on computer communications systems that blunt the competitive edge that American manufacturers enjoy. Japanese trade negotiators drag their feet on lowering their trade barriers to such diverse industries as electronics, lumber, pharmaceuticals, and medical equipment. In all of these areas—where we hold a comparative advantage—the Japanese continue to act as though free trade is a one-way street.

The results of these actions have been devastating for our balance of trade. Between 1980 and 1983, U.S. exports to Japan rose from $8.1 billion to $9.7 billion, while imports from Japan increased from $31.7 billion to $42.3 billion. In 1984, the trade imbalance between Japan and the United States reached an all-time high of $37 billion. More than half of this bilateral deficit is in one product category: automotive trade.

Even with import restraints, America remains the most open auto market in the world. And even with a voluntary restraint agreement, Japanese import sales have continued to grow. I see no reason why we should lift these restraints—especially when it is clear that we will not get any liberalization of Japanese trade policy in return. What we will get, if we end voluntary restraints, is a larger trade deficit and a crippled auto industry.

Notwithstanding the need for reciprocity in trade, some argue that the auto industry's recent profits justify the termination of voluntary restraints. Others, including the Reagan administration, express an attitude of benign neglect toward them. These views neglect the original purpose of these restraints, overlook the considerable efforts made by the auto industry and its workers to become competitive, and ignore the dangers that lifting restraints would pose to large segments of our economy.

The original purpose of voluntary restraints was to allow U.S. auto producers time to reduce the substantial cost advantage of Japanese manufacturers in small car production and to recover their financial strength to meet future investment needs. Neither of these goals has been accomplished. Although domestic manufacturers have made dramatic improvements in their productivity, this progress has been offset by adverse exchange rate movements. While U.S. auto producers have enjoyed a year of strong sales and profit recovery, the industry's financial recovery is not yet complete. Continued profitability over the next few years is necessary to restore their financial strength to historic levels and enable them to fund future investments.

To become competitive, U.S. auto producers have closed inefficient plants, reduced work forces by more than 25 percent, negotiated concessions in labor costs with the United Auto Workers, reduced inventories, obtained price and credit concessions from suppliers and mounted the most ambitious investment program in history. From 1979 to 1983, domestic auto producers invested over $51 billion to build more fuel efficient and higher quality cars and trucks. To meet the challenge of foreign competition, they must invest at least $50 billion more over the next 5 years. They will not be able to finance these investments if we lift voluntary restraints and allow Japanese auto producers to seize the small car market from them.

The long-term success of the American auto industry depends on its short-term success in the small car market. U.S. auto producers face critical decisions to either modernize their small car production in the United States or to move design and production overseas. If import restraints are lifted, the combination of Japanese excess production capacity, manufacturing cost advantage and adverse exchange rates would result in such large market share losses for American companies that small car domestic production would no longer be economically feasible.

With subcompacts alone accounting for more than 40 percent of U.S. car sales, migration of U.S. small car production to offshore locations would diminish an industrial market critical to the development of new technologies such as computer-aided design, industrial robots, and laser applications. It would seriously weaken supplier industries in such areas as electronics, plastics, and high strength metals. It would cast hundreds of thousands of workers out of jobs and bring economic ruin to States and communities in our industrial heartland.

Mr. President, our competitive position in the international economy has deteriorated because we have failed to develop policies responsive to the changing context of international trade. Whereas private, multinational firms seeking the most efficient production and distribution of goods and services once dominated world markets, economic nationalism now prevails. In the critical areas of oil, steel, and autos, government owned or directed, vertically integrated corporations shape the flow of trade. They do so as instruments of national governments and their actions are directed by political, rather than economic considerations. Although I do not advocate adoption of such policies here in the United States, neither do I believe we can shape a coherent, effective foreign economic policy without responding to them.

Adoption of this resolution is a step in that direction. It tells our trading partners that our markets will not be fair game until the game is fair. Just as our Federal Government has a commitment to ensure that competition among firms in our domestic market is fair, so does it have a responsibility to ensure that American firms are not unfairly disadvantaged in world markets as a result of their commitment to free enterprise. Just as we can no longer afford to be the world's policeman, neither can we afford to be its only willing customer for goods and services.

The successful modernization of our basic industries, the employment of skilled American workers, and the full expression of our service sector's creativity cannot await the cessation of unfair trade practices and the realization of fair and equal investment opportunities. In short, we can no longer afford to pursue the ideal of free trade unless our trading partners are willing to reciprocate.

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, I am pleased to sponsor this resolution that will put the U.S. Senate on record in support of an extension of the current restraint agreement on Japanese auto imports. This resolution makes it clear that it is virtually impossible to justify lifting the auto restraints at this time.

Lifting the restraints on Japanese auto exports to the United States will not only add to the current record setting trade deficit with Japan. It will also signal to other nations that the United States is still not willing to stand up for its own interests in international trade.

We are still without a coherent trade policy that helps American industry compete in world markets. Worse still, this morning the papers report that the administration's cabinet council is content to let our trade and auto policy be made at the whim of our biggest competitor, the Japanese. I only hope that the President is not so willing to abdicate his own authority, and will instead ignore this incomprehensible recommendation.

This bipartisan resolution sends a message to both the administration and the Japanese that the Congress is not going to stand idly by while Japan grabs more of our markets.

But while I agree with the main point of this resolution—that the Voluntary Restraint Agreement [VRA] must be extended—it must be understood that this resolution tells only part of the story. Continuation of the restraint on Japanese auto exports to the United States is critical to the American auto industry. The restraint on Japanese auto imports is a necessity.

Autos account for over 70 percent of our record setting merchandise trade deficit with Japan. And the deficit with Japan accounts for almost one-third of this year's recordsetting merchandise trade deficit with the world of over $123 billion.

Each billion-dollar deficit in merchandise trade costs approximately 25,000 jobs. And every bit of the American market given to overseas competitors makes it that much harder for domestic industry to become more competitive.

Even under the current restraint on Japanese auto imports, the Japanese have had one-fifth of the American auto market for the last 4 years. Last year autos and auto products accounted for over $20 billion of our deficit with Japan. Without restraints the Japanese could take as much as 50 percent of the American auto market. This would add another $20 billion to our deficit at a cost of over 1 million American jobs.

There is no better example of the new realities of international trade than in the auto industry. Over the years Japan has systematically built up its auto industry with tax incentives, tariff, and nontariff barriers, and research and development assistance. Even today nontariff barriers continue to prohibit a free flow of auto imports into Japan.

The United States cannot expect our industries to become more competitive if we allow Japan to open the floodgates on the product that is the single biggest part of the current recordsetting deficits while they do nothing to open their markets or make any other trade concessions.

This is not a new situation or a new issue. There is no reason for the decision to be held till the last minute. Accordingly, I urge President Reagan and Prime Minister Nakasone to announced an extension of the VRA without delay.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I am delighted to join with my distinguished colleagues from Missouri and Oklahoma in sponsoring this resolution linking extension of the Japanese export restraint on autos to increased Japanese imports from the United States.

In the flush of our current economic prosperity, it's sometimes easy to forget that we've got some shaky economic underpinnings. I know many of my colleagues are tired of hearing me talk about the threat of big budget deficits to our economic future so I won't, except to say what we all already know and that is that these deficits exacerbate an already difficult trade situation for the United States. There is no question that deficits have led to enormous overvaluation of the dollar relative to the yen and other foreign currencies. But this is not the only reason why we find ourselves in such a difficult trade situation and, in fact, well on our way to becoming a net debtor nation. That's another subject to keep talking about but I'll bite my tongue here too except to warn that until we get serious about reducing these deficits, we'll just continue our headlong lurch down this unfortunate path.

I'll spare my colleagues any further recitation of these budget-related facts. What I want to talk about now is simple: What is fair and what isn't when it comes to world trade. The way I see it what is fair is basically the way the United States treats its trading partners and what isn't is the way they treat us. Much has already been discussed about our current trade situation. Just as a reminder we have an enormous and incredible $123.3 billion trade deficit with Japan responsible for about one-third of $37 billion worth of this total. Do you realize that this $37 billion trade deficit with Japan is up from $19 billion in 1983, just a year ago. That's an unbelievable jump in just 1 year. Given this deficit it's no surprise that the United States is Japan's largest customer. And, while the growth in Japan's economy has slowed somewhat, this deficit accumulated at growth rates that would be the envy of most countries in the world. I think it's also interesting to look at the components of Japanese-American trade. With the exception of some computers and aircraft, the leading U.S. exports to Japan are raw materials or agricultural products such as corn, soybeans, logs, fish, cotton, aluminum, and beef. In contrast, almost everything they send to us is manufactured such as cars, trucks, electronic equipment, cameras, you name it. In fact, Japan sold $20 billion worth of cars to us alone last year amounting to over half of the trade deficit and one-third of their total exports to the United States. The International Trade Commission estimated the total deficit would have increased some $4 billion without the existing auto import restraints.

While we have given the Japanese almost unlimited access to our market, they have been much less generous to us. Year after year it's a fight just to gain minimal trade concessions from them and they still maintain one of the most subtle yet effective systems of nontariff barriers in the world. It's only been in the recent past that they've eased some of the more onerous barriers such as requirements to use Japanese import agents and insistence on lot inspections for foreign products rather than type inspections. Unfortunately, with respect to type inspections, it is still more difficult for foreign producers to achieve this approval. Japan has also been extremely reluctant to open its markets to American telecommunications equipment. We are extremely competitive in this area yet we were able to sell only $110 million of this equipment in Japan while they sold some $1.5 billion in the United States. Not quite equitable. In fact Japan almost refuses to buy American communications satellites. One more point and then I'll stop. Japan has been very slow to relax restrictions on foreign participation in its capital markets. Doing so would help take some pressure of the dollar in foreign exchange markets.

In short, Mr. President, Japan has a long way to go in opening its markets in a fair and equitable way. I believe the resolution being offered urges the Japanese Government to do so in a responsible and fair-minded manner and underscores our concern over this growing trade imbalance. I hope the Japanese Government listens because I believe this resolution is mild compared to some of the measures that could be in the offering should we not see renewed efforts on their part to open their markets to more American goods.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 16—FAVORING THE CONTINUATION OF THE JOB CORPS PROGRAM

Mr. HATCH submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources:

S. CON. RES. 16

Whereas since 1965 the Job Corps has functioned to assist economically disadvantaged, unemployed youth earn employment opportunities;

Whereas eighty-five percent of its students are high school drop-outs, twenty-five percent have been rejected for enlistment in the United States Armed Forces for failure to meet minimum entry requirements, and one hundred percent are below the poverty level;

Whereas Job Corps is designed to provide students with a positive living environment to develop social and behavioral skills necessary for a productive life in our society;

Whereas Job Corps provides counseling, extracurricular activities, and recreation to assist students with interpersonal relations, self-discipline, leadership, and respect for authority;

Whereas Job Corps provides the health care and proper nutrition which were often neglected and which are required for maximum learning;

Whereas independent evaluations have consistently found the Job Corps to have positive net benefits;

Whereas studies show that Job Corps students averaged more weeks of employment and higher earnings than youth who did not enroll in Job Corps;

Whereas studies show Job Corps students averaged fewer weeks of public assistance and unemployment compensation;

Whereas the Job Corps program is supported by volunteer organizations throughout the nation, including a national alumni group;

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress that the Job Corps program be retained as a separate component of the Job Training Partnership Act, and that sufficient appropriations be made to maintain the Job Corps as a viable federal effort to assist youth to obtain the human capital required for today's labor market and society.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, it is no secret that I have never believed in "handouts" from the Government. Such public sector programs have proven ineffective in addressing the causes of poverty; they have only helped to perpetuate it at taxpayers' expense. Rather, I believe income maintenance programs administered by Government tend to inspire permanent dependence on them. The Job Corps, I once thought, was not much more than a handout for youth so we could start their welfare dependence much earlier in life.

After I was elected a Senator from Utah, and was assigned to the Labor and Human Resources Committee, I began to learn much more about the Job Corps. I studied most of the reports on the effectiveness of the program and the long-term success of its students. Perhaps most importantly, I was invited to visit the Clearfield Job Corps Center operated by the Management and Training Corp. I was greatly impressed by what I saw and by the enthusiastic responses of the students. It was clear that the Job Corps was not a handout program at all, but a hand-up program designed to give youth the chance to learn lifetime skills.

The Job Corps is a unique concept for providing skills training and job counseling primarily to disadvantaged youth: 85 percent are high school dropouts and 100 percent are below the poverty level. As many as 25 percent have been rejected by the U.S. Armed Forces due to their inability to meet minimum entrance requirements. The individual Job Corps centers, managed and operated by public and private organizations, concentrate on developing competency in the basic educational skills and providing the skills training required for employment in the private sector or acceptance into the military.

The training programs have been designed by individual centers, in close collaboration with business and labor unions. The basic Job Corps programs are recognized for their effectiveness in not only basic education and general training, but in changing the attitudes of formerly discouraged young people. The private sector's faith in the Job Corps is exhibited by its willingness to be involved in the operation of Job Corps centers or in launching innovative programs which complement Job Corps training, and provide advanced learning and career development opportunities.

Further, Job Corps centers are residential and provide students with the kind of support that accrues from having nutritious meals, health services, student government, organized sports and recreation, and the chance to see life in a positive atmosphere. This unique concept is one through which teenagers can develop some self-discipline, respect for others, respect for authority, and can receive the friendship and support of their fellow students. Counselors are equipped to handle personal problems. Students can become well-rounded, productive individuals able to cope with the day-to-day problems we all face and who can derive some self-satisfaction from having done so.

The success of the concept is clear from the statistics: In 1979, 93 percent of Job Corps enrollees were placed either in private sector jobs, admitted to school or entered the Armed Forces. The placement rate of the Job Corps has increased steadily since it was created in 1964. Mathematica Policy Research, Inc., in a study performed for the Employment and Training Administration of the Department of Labor, found that:

First, corps members averaged over 4 weeks more employment per year than the control group.

Second, corps members averaged approximately $500 more per year in earnings than the control group.

Third, there was double the likelihood of entrance into the U.S. Armed Forces.

Fourth, corps members were three times as likely to earn a high school diploma or equivalent.

Fifth, 5 percent of corps members went on to college, while none of the control group did.

Sixth, corps members averaged 3 fewer weeks of public assistance than the control group.

Seventh, corps members averaged 1 week less per year of unemployment insurance than the control group.

Eighth, there were significant Job Corps related effects in terms of reducing out of wedlock children among females.

Robert Taggert, in a study issued by W.E. Upjohn Institute for Employment Research, estimates the social benefit-cost ratio of the Job Corps is about 45 to 1. His study is comprehensive since it includes such factors as reduced criminal activity, approximately $2,112 per corps member; reduced treatment costs for drug and alcohol abuse, about $30 per corps member; reduced dependence on transfer payments, approximately $1,515 per corps member; and, most importantly, increased post-program output, about $3,896 per corps member.

In short, I support the Job Corps because it works. We can count the results, measured by those young people who become full, contributing members of our society, rather than welfare junkies.

Since becoming a strong supporter of the Job Corps concept, I had the privilege of being asked to speak to the students of the Clearfield Center at their graduation. I felt a little like a proud parent, proud of the accomplishments of these determined young citizens. They worked hard for an education, for job skills and for self-respect. They beat the odds, and I know they will not give up if the going gets a little rough. They realize that nothing worth having is easily obtained, and that the fuel that drives all of us to greater effort is not the money, or power, or applause. These extrinsic rewards do not last. The payoffs for these graduates is in the personal satisfaction they feel from choosing right over expediency and from going the extra mile.

Mr. President, these young people are the future of our Nation. The Job Corps is where they are learning they truly have a stake in it. While other welfare programs provide only the bare necessities, and pretend to be compassionate even while the computer routinely processes and mails out checks, the Job Corps students understand that a better life requires a life of effort, and a pursuit of personal excellence.

While similar resolutions have been introduced, I am today submitting a concurrent resolution which is a simple enumeration of the reasons why I support the Job Corps. I want to join Senator CRANSTON and other bipartisan supporters of the Job Corps in urging that budget reductions which may be necessary this year to control the Federal deficit be made in the Job Corps Program as a last resort. If budget cuts are required for economic or equity reasons, they should not damage the essential elements of the Job Corps concept, namely its aim to provide life skills as well as job skills for those youth who are most in need.

I hope all Senators will join us in backing this unique education and training program.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 17—RELATING TO DISCOUNT INTEREST RATES FOR DISTRESSED AGRICULTURAL LENDERS

Mr. MELCHER (for himself, Mr. GRASSLEY, and Mr. ZORINSKY) submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs:

S. CON. RES. 17

Whereas, many farmers across the country are suffering serious liquidity problems resulting from the high interest rates and the other costs of agricultural production exceeding the return farmers and ranchers are receiving for their commodities; and

Whereas, the Administration has resisted moving quickly to provide needed Federal assistance to agriculture because it will add to the budget deficit; and

Whereas, in May 1984, the Federal Reserve Board, in cooperation with the FDIC, exercised its authority to extend $3.5 billion in credit directly to Continental Illinois Bank of Chicago to provide liquidity relief and assist in managing its loan portfolio in such a way as to not add to the budget deficit; and

Whereas, this extension of credit was at discount window interest rates: therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives Concurring), That it is the sense of Congress that the Federal Reserve Board, in cooperation with the FDIC, move immediately to use its authority to provide $3.5 billion in direct credit to distressed agricultural lenders at discount window interest rates, using the same procedures as in the Continental Illinois Bank package to avoid adding to the budget deficit.

NOTICES OF HEARINGS

SELECT COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, I would like to announce for the information of the public that the Select Committee on Indian Affairs will hold an oversight hearing on the fiscal year 1986 budget requests on Indian programs on February 27, 1985, commencing at 10 a.m., in room 538 of the Dirksen Senate Office Building. The committee will receive testimony from the Department of the Interior, the Department of Health and Human Services, the Department of Education, and the Department of Housing and Urban Development. Those wishing to testify should contact Peter Taylor, staff director, at 224-2251.

AUTHORITY FOR COMMITTEES TO MEET

COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE, SCIENCE, AND TRANSPORTATION

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Wednesday, February 20, at 9 a.m., to hold a hearing on S. 259 and S. 287, sports franchise issues.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Wednesday, February 20, 1985, at 2 p.m., to conduct a hearing on the nomination of Richard Jones, to be Deputy Administrator of the Federal Aviation Administration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Foreign Relations be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Wednesday, February 20, at 9:30 a.m., to hold a hearing on Soviet-American relations and arms control.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Armed Services be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Wednesday, February 20, in closed and open session, to hold hearings on Soviet treaty compliance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

COMMITTEE ON VETERANS' AFFAIRS

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Banking, Housing ,and Urban Affairs be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Wednesday, February 20, at 2 p.m., to continue a hearing on monetary policy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

FORTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF THE VICTORY OVER NAZISM—JOURNEY FOR PEACE

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, this spring, thousands of celebrations will be taking place throughout Europe commemorating the 40th anniversary of the victory over Nazi Germany. It is most appropriate that Americans join with our friends on the other side of the Atlantic in not only observing that anniversary, but also in honoring the memory of our veterans and those of our wartime allies who gave their lives so that we all could live in peace. Americans should especially join in paying tribute to the countless innocent victims of the Second World War, the millions of ordinary people whose means may not be remembered.

One such individual was Pvt. Joe Polowsky, from my home State of Illinois. It is fitting that Joe was from the Land of Lincoln, for President Lincoln dedicated his own life to peace and reconciliation. So did Joe. In April 1945, Private Polowsky was serving with the U.S. 1st Army's 69th Infantry Division on its eastward drive into Germany. On April 25, Joe and five other American soldiers reached the Elbe River. They found an abandoned sailboat along the shore, paddled to the other side, and met three Soviet soldiers on the embankment. The Third Reich had been cut in two.

The soldiers from both countries viewed the river bank littered with the bodies of German civilians who had perished in a nearby bridge explosion. "I still remember seeing a little girl clutching a doll in one hand," Joe recalled. "She couldn't have been more than 5 or 6 years old." Immediately, the American and Soviet soldiers took an oath pledging to do all in their power to prevent another war. Joe remembered, "All the soldiers swore that mankind must and could be dedicated to the establishment of a peaceful world that would somehow justify the immense striving and suffering of the Second World War."

For the remainder of his life, Joe worked tirelessly in promoting peace between our country and the Soviet Union, urging both to revive the "Spirit of the Elbe" and thereby avert thermonuclear destruction. As a symbol of our wartime alliance with the U.S.S.R., as a symbol of hope for a world at peace, Joe asked to be buried on the Elbe, where he had first met his Russian buddies. He struggled against cancer and financial hardship that this might come to pass. Joe Polowsky died in Chicago in October 1983, and was buried at Torgau on the Elbe the following month.

And so it is fitting that all Americans this year honor not only the memory of the Allied heroes who fell in the cause of peace, but also that we honor the memory of Joe Polowsky and the millions of Joe Polowskys, the Anne Franks, the Tanya Savichevas, the little German girls who died with dolls in hand. It is altogether fitting and proper that we not forget—for ourselves and for the future. The manner in which we Americans pay our respects to those honored dead may well set the tone of United States-Soviet relations for years to come. It is fitting that we do this—in President Lincoln's words—"with malice toward none, with charity for all." Especially today, it is so important that we rededicate ourselves to the creation of a peaceful world. "May this country hold in piety and steadfast faith those who have battled and died to give it new opportunities for service and growth," President Roosevelt said in 1944, "and may it always give its support to those who have engaged with us in the war against oppression and who will continue with us in the struggle for a vital, creative peace."

For these reasons, I applaud one American project which will commemorate the victory over nazism—the 40th Anniversary Journey for Peace. The journey is being organized from our sister State of Kansas, home of President Eisenhower. It has been endorsed by my colleague Senator DOLE. My letter to the project planners reads as follows:

Thank you for your letter telling me of plans for the Journey for Peace which you are organizing.

April 25, 1985, is a day of great historical significance. It is the 40th anniversary of the day delegates convened in San Francisco to draft the United Nations Charter.

Also on that day 40 years ago, Russian and American troops converged on the Elbe, effectively signaling the Allied conquest of nazism. In many ways, the postwar era began on April 25, 1945.

I can think of no better way to commemorate this important anniversary than an expression of solidarity and friendship between veterans of that worthy joint endeavor. Your Journey for Peace signifies that.

It will also serve to remind us that the peoples of the East and West are not natural enemies, if enmity between peoples can ever be considered a natural state.

I am happy to endorse your initiative which I consider a useful contribution toward helping to reverse the dangerously confrontational atmosphere in current East-West relations.

My best wishes.
Cordially,

PAUL SIMON,
U.S. Senator.●

CALDWELL-VAN RIPER, A 20TH CENTURY PIONEER REACHES A 75-YEAR MILESTONE

● Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, I wish today to acknowledge an exciting event in the life of the business community within my State of Indiana. Caldwell-Van Riper, Indianapolis' first advertising agency, has reached the venerable age of 75 years, a feat of some note in an industry where the average age of most agencies is a mere 25 years.

Centerpiece of Caldwell-Van Riper's anniversary celebration is a fine arts competition open to any former or present resident of the State. Five awards totaling $7,500 will be presented to artists whose work best depicts the vitality, growth and progress of the city of Indianapolis, a progress that parallels C-VR's own growth.

Merle Sidener and Guernsey Van Riper founded the agency in 1910, opening their doors on February 20. At that time, they called their company the Publicity Corp, and described themselves as publicity conductors.

In doing so, they introduced Indianapolis to the concept of the advertising agency, an idea that had not yet leaped the Alleghenies when the partners signed their first client. The agency has been a pioneer in the field ever since.

Sidener-Van Riper—a change in name was dictated when the young company became an important presence in the commercial life of the city—grew up with Indianapolis.

The agency's first client was the National Paving Brick Association, a strong trade association at the time horse-drawn vehicles and brick-paved streets were slowly giving way to the motor car.

Early clients reflected the city's growing involvement in the automotive industry—the well-known NAPA logo was developed in those years.

Both the agency and its clients achieved national attention when Sidener and Van Riper placed their first full-page ad in the Saturday Evening Post, a medium whose reach and influence rivaled that of today's network television.

As the industrial and commercial face of the city changed after the First World War, banks, retail merchants, pharmaceutical manufacturers, real estate and transportation companies replaced the automotive interests on the client roster. And, as Indianapolis attracted the national headquarters of business and industry, the agency extended its services to clients spanning the continent.

In the beginning, Sidener and Van Riper said they would "accept clients in whom we can take pride and be reasonably sure of getting paid," a policy still followed today.

That policy led to the partners' concern for truth in advertising which prompted Sidener to develop the concept that later became the Better Business Bureau.

Their concern for professionalism in the industry led to their becoming founding fathers of the American Association of Advertising Agencies whose membership today includes the leading agencies in the country.

One of Sidener and Van Riper's early employees was Howard Caldwell, who left after a 3-year apprenticeship to establish his own agency. In 1955, he returned to the fold, bringing his staff with him to form what eventually became Caldwell-Van Riper.

The merger was the first of several that strengthened and extended the agency's reach both in clients and territory.

In 1973, Winius Brandon changed the name on its door and the logo on its stationery to become the C-VR office at Fort Wayne, a city where C-VR had clients and interests. Gotsch Affiliates merged with the Fort Wayne division 3 years later, bringing a strong list of industrial clients with it.

As more and more clients demanded an expanded public relations capability as well as advertising services, C-VR added another branch to the family tree in 1975 with the merger of Charlene Hillman & Associates, an Indianapolis public relations agency.

A third office in another C-VR market, Evansville, was acquired in 1978 when Conant-Nienaber joined the C-VR fold.

Today, Caldwell-Van Riper still bears the strong imprint of Sidener, Van Riper and Howard Caldwell who won the admiration of the staff for once observing, "After all the meetings, some poor SOB is going to have to go back and write the ad."

He also said, "In this perilous business we've survived because we have been right a hell of a lot more than we've been wrong."

And he is the person who, 26 years ago, hired a PR man—turned advertising AE—Frank Wemhoff, the agency's president since Caldwell's retirement in April 1970.

Edward Van Riper, Guernsey's son, is still active in the agency as a member of the board and chairman-emeritus.

Today, C-VR's client roster shows the depth and versatility of the agency staff as well as the diversity that makes Indianapolis a dynamic city. Represented are banks, business and industry, restaurants, trade associations, real estate, Government units, retail and service companies.

From two partners and a receptionist, the agency has grown to a staff of 90 offering complete marketing, advertising and public relations services.

Indianapolis offices are in a company-owned 20,000 square-foot building at 1314 North Meridian Street, in contrast to the two rooms the Publicity Corp. occupied on the sixth floor of the Majestic Building.

But the staff still faces the challenges met by Sidener and Van Riper: To find creative solutions for client problems and programs.●

THE PRO ARTE CHAMBER ORCHESTRA OF BOSTON

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, the Pro Arte Chamber Orchestra of Boston has successfully developed an outreach program to make their acclaimed performances available to low-income persons and to the handicapped.

Pro Arte is a cooperative orchestra with 140 musicians. Its innovative approach has brought free-lance musicians into a cooperative corporation, and their joint decisionmaking has sparked enthusiasm and encouraged greater artistic effort and accomplishment.

A January 15, 1985, article in the Boston Globe describes the group and a recent performance in Cambridge:

The result is a substantial audience in Sanders Theater, and a unique and rather wonderful atmosphere—this crowd differs from the usual concert assembly, and probably enjoys itself more. That enjoyment communicates itself to the stage, where the players thrive on it, and give it right back.

I congratulate Pro Arte on its well-deserved success. I especially applaud its efforts to reach new audiences. Rosemary Larking, the director of the "Access to the Best Music" program, summed up the goals, "Music is essential for everyone, but there are barriers put up by society. We're overcoming four barriers: architecture, finances, attitudes and transportation."

Ms. Larking, Music Director Larry Hill, and others associated with Pro Arte are doing an extraordinary job in breaking down these barriers. Diverse audiences whose common bond is a love of music are filling the Sanders Theater.

This program represents a major commitment by Pro Arte and serves as a model for other groups who seek to reach wider and more diverse audiences. I ask that the article from the Boston Globe may be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

PRO ARTE THRIVES IN A RARE ATMOSPHERE

(By Richard Dyer)

The Pro Arte Chamber Orchestra must be a grant-writer's dream. The group is a performers' collective; it regularly programs new works by area composers, and doesn't restrict itself to the most famous of them; it makes considerable outreach efforts to senior citizens, the handicapped, and other minorities.

The result is a substantial audience in Sanders Theater, and a unique and rather wonderful atmosphere—this crowd differs from the usual concert assembly, and probably enjoys itself more. That enjoyment communicates itself to the stage, where the players thrive on it, and give it right back.

Furthermore the Pro Arte, unlike some other groups, does not use grantsmanship to mask inferior artistic standards, though it has to be said that they have played with greater precision and with more tonal bloom than they did at Sunday afternoon's concert, which was devoted to music by Mozart, Schumann and David Hoffman, a Brookline resident who is active both as a psychiatrist and as a composer.

Hoffman's piece "Opening Cycles II" is a revision amounting to a recomposition of what must have been a student work he wrote seven years ago (Hoffman was born in 1954). The plan of the piece, he writes in his program note, is to pass "eidetic motives through a larger metric grid"; in the revision, the motives, the phrasing, the harmonies, and the orchestration are new. It begins with some furious ostinato activity full of shifting accents; this gives way to a stretching of the same ideas into a kind of slow movement before they work themselves up into a kind of finale. No doubt the composer meant the music to end inconclusively, even disturbing, but the piece might be more conventionally effective if the larger metric grid were reversed, somehow, so that the questioning gestures came at the beginning and the excitement at the end. But in any case, it's a nice piece, fun to follow, and apparently fun to play; the performance under Larry Hill was persuasive.

Mozart's "Posthorn" Serenade at the beginning of the program had energy and variety and some very classy playing of the wood wind episodes by flutist Michelle Sahm, oboist Barbara Knapp, bassoonist Jon MacGowan and their standmates. But there were also some ill-tuned episodes, and too much scraping of violins. The afternoon's soloist was David Deveau, who offered a sensitive, generally well-played, but curiously reticent performance of the Schumann Piano Concerto. This is music in which the soloist accompanies a fair amount of the time, but Deveau took this too far, and failed to project too many moments of interest in his part. He has plenty of technique, but he seemed embarrassed by the episodes that call for it and determined to get them over with as soon as possible. Florestan was on holiday, and Eusebius failed to give us the Schumann that soars.●

MINNESOTA SALUTE TO PROF. JOHN BORCHERT

● Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, over the past three decades, the Twin Cities metropolitan area has become known as a living laboratory of innovation in regional government.

Spurred on by active organizations like the Citizens League, supported by an unusual compliment of progressive local officials, and orchestrated by a very supported State legislature and series of Governors, the Twin Cities Metropolitan Council and a series of regional operating commissions are now regarded as a model for regional planning, coordination and service delivery throughout the United States.

In addition to active support from organizations, local officials, and State government leaders, innovation in government in the Twin Cities has come about because of an extremely active citizenry.

To help recognize the contributions of active regional citizens, the metropolitan council initiated a Regional Citizen of the Year award in 1984. The award was established to honor one individual each year for particularly outstanding contributions to the region and the advances which it has made.

This year's very deserving regional citizen for 1985 is Prof. John Borchert, a regents professor of geography at the University of Minnesota.

In his 34 years as a university professor and Twin Cities community leader, John Borchert has made many contributions beyond his impact on students. He is a former member of the planning commission in his suburban community of Golden Valley, served on the metropolitan planning commission which preceded the metropolitan council, was a member of the boards of the Minnesota Pollution Control Agency, Minnesota-Wisconsin Boundary Area Commission, and Upper Midwest Council.

John helped found the university's center for urban and regional affairs and served as its first director. Throughout his long career of public and academic service, John has remained first and foremost a professional geographer and mapmaker. But, his approach to his profession has gone beyond "book learning" to have an impact on public policy in the State and region which is seldom realized in a university setting.

Because of the outstanding achievements represented in Prof. John Borchert, I insert the text of recent articles on him from the Minneapolis Star and Tribune and Twin Cities Metro Monitor in the RECORD.

The texts of the articles follow:

JOHN BORCHERT, MAPMAKER—HIS MAPS STRESS AREA INTERESTS

(Ellen Foley)

John Borchert is one of the few people in the country who knows exactly where he is.

Borchert regents' professor of geography at the University of Minneapolis, is the metropolitan area's master mapmaker. His maps have helped transform Twin Cities government and have made him the Metropolitan Council's 1985 Regional Citizen of the Year.

To these accolades, Borchert responds with a disarming modesty.

"All I do is hang up maps every once in awhile," he said, sitting in his university office with its globe, drafting table and stacks of yellowed, rolled-up maps.

But he does much more than that.

His map sense has earned him impeccable academic credentials, including membership in the prestigious National Academy of Sciences, and a reputation as one of the nation's top urban geographers.

He neglects to tell visitors that his maps have been used by governors, legislators, regional planners, state highway officials and suburban planning commissions.

He also shies from taking credit for his role in establishing the metropolitan approach to issues in the Twin Cities area, regarded by many as one of the most progressive at regional planning in the nation.

In the 1950s, when Minneapolis and St. Paul were acting like sibling rivals, Borchert brought out maps that showed officials of both cities how close they were and how much responsibility they shared. The maps convinced them that it was to their benefit to share the planning of efficient highways, adequate sewers, ample parkland and well-planned housing and commercial areas.

"He had much to do with the fact that many people in the Twin Cities metropolitan area have come to think of themselves not just as citizens of a city and a state, but as a region as well," said Gertrude Ulrich, a member of the Metropolitan Council.

To Borchert that viewpoint is a simple exercise of geography.

"It was important to back off once in awhile and look at ourselves on a map that had more on it than the individual municipality and the school district in which we lived," he said.

This is Borchert's approach to life as well as mapmaking. It's rooted in his own experience in a Chicago train station more than 50 years ago.

As a boy he often traveled by train from his home in Crown Point, Ind., to visit Chicago relatives. At the station he was fascinated by the rush of travelers catching trains to exotic-sounding places like Atlanta and Mexico. When he returned home he spent hours in the library looking at Atlases trying to see where those places were in relation to Crown Point.

When he moved to the Twin Cities in 1949, Borchert refined his research method by moving out of the library and into his car, where he took notes on a road map about pertinent features he saw.

He said his family's first task on arrival here was to find a spot to build a house. They drove through the metro area noting on the map the details of street conditions, school and commercial locations, differences in terrain, etc.

The technique became a Borchert trademark in the next 34 years at the university.

"(Borchert) actually studies by going to the places and visiting with the people," said John Adams, a former student and now a professor of geography and public affairs at the university. "He pays attention to the questions that are in people's minds, and it's not often that people at the U are seen as doing that."

Colleagues say the mapmaker became one of the university's superstars because of his excellent research on land use and his performance as a teacher. But they add that his most distinctive contribution to the university and geography has been his penchant for venturing beyond the campus.

He was a member of the Golden Valley Planning Commission, the Twin Cities Metropolitan Planning Commission (the predecessor of the Metropolitan Council), the Minnesota Pollution Control Agency Board, the Minnesota-Wisconsin Boundary Area Commission and the Upper Midwest Council, among others.

He helped found the university's Center for Urban and Regional Affairs and as its first director established a framework that encouraged researchers to go out and examine their community.

"I've always felt that my role was that of a teacher, but the class extended far beyond the classroom," Borchert said.

His innovation and persistence helped Minnesota become one of few States in which geography has an impact on public policy, said David Lanegran, professor of geography at Macalester College and a former graduate student of Borchert's.

"He began to explain cities to people and he began to explain the State to people," Lanegran said. "He has two extraordinary traits—common sense and common decency."

Judith Martin, coordinator of the university's Urban Studies Program and a research associate at the urban center, said Borchert was a role model for many of his graduate students who veered from the traditional course of academia and choose instead public service.

"He has been for a long time one of the people here at the university who is not just involved with working with the outside community but who sees that as an important part of his job—actually getting involved with problems in the community," she said.

He has built a legacy by training Minnesota politicians, planners and consultants who share the same "wild ideas," for which their former teacher became famous, said Ed Maranda, principal planner at the Metropolitan Council and a former Borchert student.

As Lanegran explains, his effect on students is dramatic:

"One thing that is so impressive about John Borchert is that he knows where he is," Lanegran said. "He can explain both the times and the place. That's where the maps come in."

Borchert said he is still busy pursuing that goal, although now he has a national focus. He said he is planning a book that will divide the nation into regions grouped around urban centers.

U'S JOHN BORCHERT HONORED FOR LONG SERVICE TO REGION

(By Lynna Williams)

John Borchert came to the Twin Cities in 1949 as a young assistant professor of geography at the University of Minnesota. He had an infectious smile, say people who knew him then, and his energy and enthusiasm for his subject and his new home were contagious.

Thirty-six years later, his smile and enthusiasm are still being talked about—and so are his accomplishments.

They have brought him recognition here and on a national and international scale. In 1981, Borchert was named a regents' professor, the highest honor a University faculty member can receive. That recognition was especially welcome, Borchert said, because it came from people who know him well.

At the Metropolitan Council's annual State of the Region event Jan. 30, Borchert was again honored by people who know him and his work well. He was named 1985 Regional Citizen of the Year.

The Council began the annual award competition in 1984 to honor a citizen who has made an outstanding contribution to the region as a whole.

"The citizens of our region seem to make outstanding contributions almost routinely," said Council Chair Sandra Gardebring, "so choosing just one to honor is difficult. But as excellent as all the nominations were this year, John Borchert seemed to represent the best of our region's tradition of leadership and excellence."

There's no doubt, Gardebring said, that Borchert has contributed to the region as a whole, both through his own pioneering research and his influence on hundreds of students who continue to have an impact in the area.

METROPOLITAN VIEWPOINT

In fact, said Council Member Gertrude Ulrich who chaired the selection committee, Borchert has "had much to do with the fact that many people in the Twin Cities Metropolitan Area have come to think of themselves not just as citizens of a city and state, but of a region as well."

"I think he's been the most articulate spokesman for a metropolitan viewpoint," said David Lanegran, a Macalester professor who did University graduate work with Borchert. "He's gotten out in the public arena and said what he thinks, applying geography to public-policy issues. The region has benefited in a number of ways."

Borchert says he is an educator rather than an advocate. "I've spent a lot of time talking to many different people about what I know, such as the changing structure of the Metropolitan Area and its changing competitive position. I think my feeling has always been that the strength of a scholar, and of the university, in these issues is their detachment and objectivity."

"If I appear before a legislative committee," said Fred Lukermann, dean of the College of Liberal Arts at the University, "the members know who I am. When Borchert comes in, they put their arms around him. They may not know every paper he's written, but they know him and the way he deals with problems. And they know that everything he says is true."

For a member of the academic community to enjoy that kind of trust with public officials is very rare, Lukermann added, "but he does it with ease. That's Borchert."

INTEREST IN PEOPLE

Another Borchert characteristic frequently remarked upon is the interest in people he brings to scientific research. "It's the merging of natural and social science that most describes him," Lukermann said. "For example, he's one of the major climatologists in the world but his focus is on the effects of climate on man. The human element is what drives him."

"I've often said I don't think there's anything as intellectually liberating as backing off and looking at yourself on the map of the world," Borchert said. "It raises so many questions, you can spend a lifetime thinking about them. And if you do that, you'll always be walking about with your head full of maps on the one hand and talking to people on the other."

His fascination with people and places began, Borchert said, as a child growing up in northwestern Indiana about 40 miles from Chicago. His mother took him to that city frequently to visit, he said, and the contrasts between the two environments started him formulating questions he has never stopped asking.

After study and work in the fields of geology and meteorology, Borchert discovered many of his interests merged in geography. He earned master's and Ph.D. degrees in that subject from the University of Wisconsin. From Madison, he and his family came to the University of Minnesota.

"One of the things that appealed to me about this area was the setting of the University in an urban area. It was an opportunity to work on real problems and immediate questions with people who were helping to make and shape the maps, not just interpret them."

HE SEES CONNECTIONS

Over three and a half decades, Borchert has been involved in dozens of important studies on the growth and development of the Twin Cities as well as on many statewide concerns. He has had an impact on public policies in land use and resource management, from highway planning to lakeshore development.

"Probably the most important thing intellectually about Borchert is that he's not a narrow technician." Lukermann said. "He sees connections and contexts and helps other people see them."

He has served on local, regional and state planning commissions, including the Metropolitan Council's predecessor, the Twin Cities Metropolitan Planning Commission. A former member of the Minnesota Pollution Control Agency, he helped create—and served as first director of—the University's Center for Urban and Regional Affairs.

Even in resume form, it takes nine pages to list his major publications and professional and community service over the years. In 1976, he was elected to the National Academy of Sciences, and national activities began to consume more of his time.

Whatever he's done, Borchert has never stopped teaching geography. Today, his students are scattered throughout almost every government agency—and many other places—in the Twin Cities. And other parts of the United States and world, of course. In fact, the building of a new town in Saudi Arabia is being managed by a former Borchert student.

It's those "regiments of former students" of which Borchert says he's most proud, followed, as a "weak second," by some of the research he's done over the years.

At 66, Borchert quotes something an older friend said to him about the friend's decision to work until age 70. "He said he was just getting the hang of it. I feel that way, too. I still like what I'm doing."●

ABORTION

● Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, since reading a particular news item from Chicago the other day, I have often thought of the words of an old song, "What a difference a day makes, 24 little hours."

The newsclip told of the trial of a man accused of murdering his infant son in June 1983. The man allegedly slammed the infant's head on the floor minutes after birth because of the baby's birth defects. During the trial the Cook County medical examiner testified that surgery might have corrected the defects.

The point is this: Under our existing legal code the parents could have killed the child prior to its birth and no one would have cared—hence, "what a difference a day makes." We would have called it an abortion—1 of 4,000 that are performed each day in the United States.

But because the alleged killing came minutes after the birth, the law calls it murder—a crime punishable under our legal system.

You see, prior to its birth the infant was a fetus, according to the proabortion people, and it is easier to kill a fetus than kill a baby—it sounds more clinical and dispassionate. After the birth, even an abortionist has to call it a "baby."

Mr. President, my remarks today are prompted by a film I recently previewed entitled "The Silent Scream." The film shows via ultrasound an actual abortion performed by a vacuum device. I am sorry to say that words fail me in trying to describe the overwhelming nausea and repugnance I felt during the showing. The grisly atrocity I witnessed was more repulsive than one can imagine. Unless you have seen the film, you cannot appreciate my disgust.

The baby—notice that I choose to call it a "baby" rather than a "fetus"—opened its mouth in an unanswered silent scream as its tiny body was dismembered by the suction apparatus. We were told that the doctor who performed this particular abortion watched the sonogram afterward and was so appalled by what he had done that he had never aborted another baby.

Now come medical experts and other abortion apologists who claim that the baby's nervous system was not sufficiently developed, and, therefore, felt no pain. These so-called experts are members of an infamous group of intellectual rationalists who, historically, have joined in speculating about other peoples' suffering.

The Spanish conquistadores had little trouble justifying their treatment of Native Americans—after all, to them the Indians were not human beings, like a fetus is not a baby.

In the early days of slavery, blacks could be beaten or mistreated any way an owner desired. The experts of the day had decided that blacks were animals who really could not know human feelings anyway.

Hitler and his Nazi self-ordained geniuses exterminated without conscience some 6 million Jews because Jews were in their opinion an inferior, almost subhuman species to whom pain was inconsequential.

Today, 16 million babies—or "fetus" to the cold world of the surgical instruments—have perished because our judicial system, in its great wisdom, has decided that an unborn baby is a nonhuman mass of biological matter.

I find it ironic that we prosecute the people who blow up abortion clinics, yet do not raise our collective voices against the butchery that take place inside them. Fortunately, no one has been hurt in the bombings, but the larger issue still overwhelms us: 16 million babies have been destroyed. I strongly disapprove of the bombings, but I am adamant that the killing which goes on inside be stopped.

How can we as a nation plead with the Almighty for peace, and expect Divine help when we cannot clean up the carnage in our own backyard?

Mr. President, I wish to have included in the RECORD two news articles, one from the American Medical Association News and the other by George Will, which discuss the pain babies suffer when they are killed.

The articles follow:

[From the American Medical News, Feb. 24, 1984]

CHARGES DISPUTED—MD GROUP CLAIMS THAT FETUSES SUFFER PAIN

A coalition of physicians has rallied behind President Reagan, supporting his contention that aborted fetuses suffer "long and agonizing pain."

"A fetus shows the precise behavior as you or I in avoiding pain. It is not a reflex, but an actual aversion to a needle or chemicals. He squirms away from any noxious influence," said spokesman Vincent Collins, MD, professor of anesthesiology at Northwestern U. in Chicago, at a Washington, D.C. press conference.

The physicians delivered a letter to Reagan, saying that "we are pleased to associate ourselves with you in drawing the attention of people across the nation to the humanity and sensitivity of the human unborn. You stand on firmly established ground." Signatories include Richard T. F. Schmidt, MD, and Fred Hofmeister, MD, both former presidents of the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists (ACOG), and 24 other physicans.

The medical community has ignored fetal pain because "doctors don't want to dwell on it." Dr. Collins said. "They are afraid that women who have had abortions will develop guilt reactions."

In a Jan. 31 address to the National Religious Broadcasters convention, Reagan contended that "medical science doctors confirm that when the lives of the unborn are snuffed out, they often feel pain—pain that is long and agonizing."

This was challenged by Ervin E. Nichols, MD, ACOG director of practice activities, who said he was unaware of any evidence that pain is perceived by a fetus. Dr. Nichols said a fetus may have "demonstrated neurological reflexes," but that this should not be interpreted as pain.

The coalition of physicians said they were "astounded" by Dr. Nichols' comments. In response, they convened the "educational" press conference, as a way of "getting the truth out on the table." The press conference was sponsored by the anti-abortion group Value of Life Inc. of Brighton, Mass.

The dispute remains unsettled. Dr. Nichols has performed a National Institutes of Health literature search, and still contends that there is no legitimate scientific evidence showing that fetuses feel pain early in pregnancy.

In fact, scientific literature suggests just the opposite, he says: The fetal spinal cord is not adequately covered until the fifth month of pregnancy, and the fetal cerebellum is not sufficiently developed until the seventh month of pregnancy. A sensation of pain is dependent upon these two processes, he says.

Physicians know that fetuses feel pain, Dr. Collins counters, because:

The cortex is developed between four and five weeks of age.

Reflex actions can be observed between four and six weeks of age.

Brain waves are detectable between six and seven weeks.

Nerves connecting the spinal cord to peripheral structures have developed between six to eight weeks.

Adverse reactions to stimuli are observed between eight and 10 weeks.

Neurotransmitters capable of sending pain signals to the brain are present at 12 weeks.

Opiate receptors, designed to provide analgesia, can be seen at 12 weeks.

"You can tell by the contours on their faces that aborted fetuses feel pain," added obstetrician Matthew Bulfin, MD, of Lauderdale by the Sea, Fla. He described the case of a 25-year-old woman administered a prostaglandin abortion, who expelled her fetus in the middle of the night. Before hospital nurses arrived, she witnessed "the thrashing around and gruesome trauma on his face, and knew that the fetus had suffered."

Saline abortions cause the fetus to feel "the same agony as an adult who has suffered burns over 80% to 90% of his body," Dr. Collins said. The fetus "squirms, throws himself around, and shows a total grimacing patterns of withdrawal," he said.

Pain is most probable during second-trimester abortions, which account for 100,000 procedures a year. Pain during the first trimester is "documented with more difficulty," they said.

Local anesthesia to the mother does not ease fetal pain, Dr. Collins said. He rejected the suggestion that anesthesiologists should play a more major role in the abortion setting, saying, "We don't have enough anesthesiologists to take care of real medical problems. Most anesthesiologists I know would shun any involvement in non-productive, non-curative medicine."

ABORTION DOES CAUSE PAIN TO ITS VICTIMS

(By George F. Will)

In the eight years since the Supreme Court nationalized the abortion controversy, one facet of that subject has been neglected: pain. Abortion is painful for the aborted.

The neglect is explainable. To opponents of abortion, death, not pain, is the paramount issue. And proponents of abortion need (emotionally or logically, or both) to deny the possibility of fetal pain.

In its 1973 decision legislating abortion on demand, the Supreme Court announced that fetal life is not alive. At least that is what the court seems to have meant (if it can be said to have meant anything) when it described the fetus as "potential life." Those who support the 1973 decision are committed to the idea that a fetus, being only "potential" life, cannot feel pain, pain being an attribute of actual life.

Thus does a legal absurdity breed a biological falsehood. This intellectual train wreck is the subject of an essay in The Human Life Review by Prof. John Noonan of the University of California (Berkeley) Law School. There are, he notes, four principal means of abortion.

Sharp curettage involves a knife killing the fetus (if the amateur embryologists on the court will allow us to speak of "killing" life that is merely "potential"). In suction curettage, a vacuum pump sucks out the fetus in bits (and a knife cleans out any remnants). In second trimester and later abortions, a saline solution is injected into the amniotic fluid. The salt seems to act as a poison; the skin of the fetus, when delivered, resembles skin soaked in acid. If by accident the solution leaks into the body of the mother, she experiences pain that is described as "severe." The fetus can be in this solution for two hours before its heart (a stubborn bit of "potential" life) stops beating. Alternatively, the mother can be given a dosage of a chemical sufficient to impair the circulation and cardiac functioning of the fetus, which will be delivered dead or dying.

A fetus, like an infant or an animal, has no language in which to express pain. But we infer, and empathize with, the pain of creatures, such as baby seals, which lack language to express pain.

There are uncertainties about the precise points in fetal development at which particular kinds of sensations are experienced. But observations of development and behavior indicate that by the 56th day, a fetus can move. Discomfort may occasion the movement. Tactile stimulation of the mouth produces reflex action about day 59 or 60. By day 77 the fetus develops sensitivity to touch on hands, feet, genital and anal areas, and begins to swallow. Noonan believes that the physiological literature teaches that "beginning with the presence of sense receptors and spinal responses, there is as much reason to believe that the unborn are capable of pain as that they are capable of sensation."

Americans are proud of their humane feelings and are moved by empathy. Thus, we regulate the ways animals can be killed. Certain kinds of traps are banned. Cattle cannot be slaughtered in ways deemed careless about pain. Stray dogs and cats must be killed in certain humane ways.

But no laws regulate the suffering of the aborted. Indeed, Planned Parenthood, the most extreme pro-abortion lobby, won a Supreme Court ruling that it is unconstitutional to ban the saline abortion technique. That's right: the court discovered that the "privacy" right to abortion, which right the framers of the Constitution neglected to mention, even confers a right to particular abortion techniques.

Most pro-abortion persons have a deeply felt and understandable need to keep the discussion of abortion as abstract as possible. They become bitter when opponents use photographs to document early fetal development. The sight of something that looks so much like a child complicates the task of trying to believe that there is nothing there but "potential" life. And if fetal pain is acknowledged, America has a problem: its easy conscience about 1.6 million abortions a year depends on the supposition that such pain is impossible.

Magda Denes, in her book, "In Necessity and Sorrow: Life and Death in an Abortion Hospital," brought to her subject not anti-abortion convictions but a reporter's eye for concrete details. Examining the body of an aborted child, she described the face as showing "the agonized tautness of one forced to die too soon." That is a description to bear in mind this day, as many thousands of abortions occur.●

● Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, it is a great pleasure for me to commemorate today the 67th anniversary of the Restoration of Lithuanian Independence on February 16, 1918, and the 734th anniversary of the creation of the Lithuanian state in 1251. This event symbolizes not only the desire of a nation for self-determination but also recognizes and encourages an ongoing struggle against the forces that stifle the freedom of the Lithuanian people.

The striving of a nation to determine its destiny is a right that is recognized by all nations of the world and is an essential value upon which the international order has been established. Lithuania has been repeatedly denied that right over the course of history, indeed up to this very day. Accordingly, the United States, which shares the values of democracy, freedom, and justice with the people of Lithuania, has not, cannot, and does not recognize the forceful subjugation of this nation by the Soviet Union. We abhor this violation of the internationally recognized norms of human rights as agreed upon in the United Nations Charter, the Helsinki accords, and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. We reaffirm this day the sentiments expressed in the Atlantic Charter, that the United States yearns "to see sovereign rights and self-government restored to those who have been forcibly deprived of them."

Lithuania began its national quest in 1251, with the baptism of King Mindaugas as King of a united Lithuania. From that day forward the customs and traditions of the Lithuanian people have progressed, despite numerous imperial onslaughts. Following the collapse of the combined Lithuanian state in 1795 to the Russian czar, Lithuanian culture underwent an assault by the czarist government to stamp out Lithuanian language, tradition and religion. The Lithuanian people rebelled often, most notably in 1863; their spirit and determination caused the czarist despots to abandon their attempts at russification following that revolt.

It was finally the scourge of world war that brought the long sought independence to the nation of Lithuania. After defeat in 1917, Germany was compelled to allow the establishment of a 200-member Congress of delegates; democracy, though short-lived, had finally come to Lithuania. Lithuania thrived as an independent state for over 20 years during the 1920's and 1930's, flourishing in land reform, equitable labor laws, education and the arts. That brief period of creativity and accomplishment was extinguished with the ascension of the fascist Nazi and totalitarian Stalinist regimes. This time, instead of war bringing independence to Lithuania, it brought occupation. Under the pretense of an election, a government was formed in 1940 which resulted in the forced annexation of the Lithuanian state as a constituent republic of the U.S.S.R.

This struggle of the Lithuanian people to be free and independent continues today, both in that country and here in the United States. I am deeply concerned with the ongoing denial of religious freedom for the people of Lithuania. Despite a petition signed by some 132,000 Lithuanian Catholics last year, two Lithuanian priests—Alfonsas Svarinskas and Sigitas Tamkevicius—continue to languish in jail as prisoners of Soviet intolerance of their religious beliefs. Just this past August, the Communist authorities denied Pope John Paul II entry into Lithuania to bring his message to the many Lithuanian Catholics who thirst to hear the word of this great world leader.

There are some 300,000 Americans of Lithuanian origin or descent in the United States. I want to express my solidarity with them on this day not only because I share in their desire to see independence once again restored to that country, but also in gratitude to the many great contributions they have made in the United States.

There is a wonderful group of Lithuanian-Americans in the city of Hot Springs in my own State of Arkansas, whom I am proud to salute today. They have joined together in a chapter of the Lithuanian-American Community of the U.S.A., under the leadership of President Steve Ingaunis. I pledge to them and to all Lithuanians that I will continue to provide my unwavering support for a renewed and independent Lithuanian state. We will continue to work with the Lithuanian legation in Washington as the true diplomatic representatives of the Lithuanian nation.

We cannot forget the desire of this proud nation to once again reap the bounty of freedom and self-determination. We shall never forget the inspiration that these patriots provide to the lovers of freedom who continue to hope for the liberation of the oppressed throughout the world.●

THE 117TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE BENEVOLENT AND PROTECTIVE ORDER OF ELKS

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, on February 16, 1985, the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks celebrated its 117th anniversary. The Elks are an exceptionally proud and patriotic group. They became the first fraternal organization, in 1907, to mandate the observance of Flag Day. Their pride in our heritage has never wanted. On behalf of the 1.6 million Elks across the Nation and the 90,000 Elks in Pennsylvania, I ask that the background of the Elks be placed in the record at this time.

The background follows:

BACKGROUNDER—THE ELKS

The Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks is one of the oldest and largest fraternal organizations in the United States.

The first formal meeting was held on February 16, 1868, in New York City. Fifteen persons turned out, most of them young, undiscovered but budding artists who had gathered for companionship and to help their order out-of-work peers.

The idea caught on and spread to other groups and other cities. As it grew, the new organization broadened its membership base to include businessmen, professionals, farmers and representatives from other occupations.

Today there are more than 1.6 million members of the Elks in 2,280 local "Lodges" found throughout all fifty states and the District of Columbia. Over the years, these Lodges have evolved into the primary building blocks of the highly decentralized Elks organization. They provide recreational facilities for the entire family, but the Lodges are also the focal point for the many community service and charitable programs that have become an Elk tradition.

Early in its history, the Elks supported groups such as the Salvation Army and the Red Cross. In 1871, they staged a benefit for the victims of the great Chicago fire. Money was raised for victims of the Seattle fire and the Johnstown flood in 1889. And the Elks were the first on the scene to supply money and rescue assistance during the San Francisco earthquake of 1906. Today, disaster relief continues to play an important part in Elk activities.

Patriotism has also been a hallmark of the Elks. In 1907, the Elks became the first fraternal organization in the nation to mandate observance of June 14 as Flag Day. More than 40 years later, fellow Elk, President Harry S. Truman signed into order a declaration naming Flag Day as an official national holiday.

The Elks National Foundation, the philanthropic arm of the organization, was created in July, 1928, as an income-producing fund to help support national Elk projects and to supplement programs at the state and local Lodge levels. Each year, scholarships are awarded to 500 outstanding high school students across the nation. Emergency educational grants are also provided to children of members who have died or been disabled.

Foundation support of state association projects is based on a "revenue sharing" concept. Funds are provided to each state in proportion to the level of contributions made by individuals in the state. The Elks contributed $26 million in 1983 to support cerebral palsy research, veteran's hospitals, retarded child care and to provide wheelchairs, recreational facilities and other aids to the handicapped.

The Elks devote a great deal of attention to youth programs. Lodges and individual members today sponsor more than 1,000 Boy Scout troops and 3,000 Little League teams, as well as Boy's Clubs and Camp Fire Girls Clubs.

But one of the most important youth programs in recent years has been the annual "Elks' Hoop Shoot,"® a national free throw shooting contest, for boys and girls from ages 8 to 13. Over three million youngsters from all fifty states participate yearly in the "Hoop Shoot,"® from local contests to the national finals where six champions were named.

The program, begun in 1972 on a national basis, provides spirited competition and the chance for youngsters to develop new friendships. Winners and their families also travel to state, regional and national competition, courtesy of the Elks.●

MOTHER SETON SCHOOL

● Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, at a time when education in our country is the focus of so much attention, I am pleased to recognize and pay tribute to the Mother Seton School, the precursor of the American parochial school system, on the anniversary of its establishment February 22, 1810. In commemoration of the school's founding 175 years ago by Elizabeth Ann Bayley Seton, educator and saint, the Mother Seton School will commence its year-long celebration on February 22, 1985, followed by a Eucharistic Liturgy celebration on Sunday, February 24, officially opening activities for the year.

Elizabeth Seton, known as "Mother Seton," is special to all Americans for historical, humanitarian and spiritual reasons. Widowed at the age of 29 with 5 children, Elizabeth converted to Catholicism and was abandoned by her friends and family for doing so. Two years after changing her faith she accepted the invitation of Archbishop John Carroll and moved from her native New York to establish a girl's school near the St. Mary's Seminary on Paca Street in Baltimore, MD.

Opening a school for girls was a pioneering effort at that time in American history, for women and girls were considered inferior to men intellectually and physically and formal education for them was not thought worthwhile. Fortunately John Carroll, the first Bishop of Baltimore, did not share this belief, realizing the future of the Catholic faith in America depended largely upon the education of women and young girls. The bishop envisioned a community of American women who would devote themselves to educating young girls in the ways of Christian living as well as the arts and sciences.

Under Elizabeth Seton's leadership, the school was an instant success. Needing help in her project, several young women joined her in Baltimore, shortly thereafter, forming the nucleus of the American Sisters of Charity. She was designated "Mother" of the small religious community after taking her vows on March 25, 1809.

The establishment on Paca Street quickly outgrew its quarters and so, as a result of the benevolence of Samuel Cooper, a well-to-do seminarian, the Fleming farm in Emmitsburg, MD, was purchased for $70,000 to advance Mother Seton's efforts. In June of 1809, Mother Seton and 16 other women, including her children, 2 sisters-in-law, 2 schoolgirl boarders from Paca Street and 10 sisters, moved to the village of Emmitsburg. They quickly outgrew the Stone House, the first site of St. Joseph's in the valley, and moved 7 months later into a newly constructed house that would serve as both a convent and a school.

Father Duhamel, pastor of St. Joseph's Church in Emmitsburg, asked Mother Seton to let his parishioners into her school. On February 22, 1810, Mother Seton admitted three little girls from his parish, thus forming the Emmitsburg parish school and the nucleus of the American parochial school system. This event was highly significant in that it was the first school that connected with a parish and that gave these children a free Catholic education. Sharing the revolutionary idea with Bishop Carroll that girls were entitled to the same opportunities as boys, Mother Seton formulated the charter of incorporation which stated the purpose of the sisters was the education of young females. There is no evidence that boys were ever admitted.

By 1813 attendance at the school had expanded to 32 paying boarders and 20 day pupils. When Mother Seton died on January 4, 1821, the little community was well established and the school was extremely successful, opening the new St. Euphemia's School to include boys in 1892. After a second expansion in 1957, the school was again renamed to its present day "Mother Seton School."

Under the leadership of Sister Mary Gilbart and her outstanding faculty, the Mother Seton School can boast a first-rate educational curriculum where the uniqueness and individual development of each child is stressed. Multiage instructional units enable teachers to set up math, reading and language arts groups according to ability. The multiaged unit includes an outstanding kindergarten that was made possible through the generous contribution of a Baltimore lawyer.

In addition to math, English, social studies and computers, the school continues to teach Christian values in the tradition of its founder who once said, "Let your chief study be to acquaint yourself with God, because there is nothing greater than God, and because it is the only knowledge that can fill the heart with a peace and joy that nothing can disturb."

The Mother Seton School's reputation not only stands on its fine academic standards and its leadersnip role in the parochial school system and in education for women, but also on its economic and cultural diversity and its commitment to community service. Today this fine institution serves Catholic, Protestant, and Jewish students from 28 towns in 5 counties in Maryland and Pennsylvania, some of whom travel 3 hours to and from school. The school, which is very accessible for the handicapped, reaches out to the community through its work with the elderly and its mission programs for the disadvantaged.

The Mother Seton School is, perhaps, unique in the vital role parents play in providing a volunteer and financial support system. Although the school has not been able to continue its free education to parish children, it is unnecessary to charge full tuition as a result of the parents' successful fundraising efforts.

I am pleased to call the Senate's attention to this celebration and ask my colleagues to join in saluting the success of the Mother Seton School which for 175 years, has been the flagship of the parochial school system in this country and has retained its strong commitment to the values of St. Elizabeth Ann Seton.●

GUN CONTROL

● Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, recently I read a story in a local newspaper about a Boston woman who had a firsthand experience with our system of justice. It seems the woman was returning home on a train from the hospital where she had visited her daughter. Earlier the daughter had been shot while being mugged.

On the train the woman overheard a boy bragging about shooting a girl who wouldn't let go of her bag. The balance of the conversation let the eavesdropping mother know that this was the kid who had shot her daughter.

Unlike some whose vigilante blood would have boiled at this point, the woman had the boy arrested so that justice could deal with him. It did. In spite of his long criminal record, he paid $500 to a bondsman and walked free.

The point is, Mr. President, that all the gun laws notwithstanding, criminals somehow seem to get their hands on firearms when they want them. In fact, today there are some 60 million handguns in the United States, but less than four-tenths of 1 percent will be used to commit a crime. Over 99.6 percent of all America's handguns are not used for illegal purposes. No one can rationally conclude that private handgun ownership in our Nation contributes significantly to crime.

Yet, regardless of the facts, there is a mentality in this Nation which seeks to thwart, or even nullify, the second amendment. Perhaps as a scheme to remake society in their mold, or for some other reason, these antigun people choose to thumb their noses at the Founding Fathers and confiscate privately held firearms.

Our founders knew exactly what they were doing when they guaranteed our right, "the right of the people," to keep and bear arms. They listed that particular right second only to the rights enumerated in the first amendment; the rights of religion, speech, the press, and assembly.

James Madison, the father of the Bill of Rights, originally proposed that the second amendment read: "That right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed; a well armed and well regulated militia being the best security of a free country; but no person religiously scrupulous of bearing arms shall be compelled to render military service in person." His intent in the very first sentence is obvious: We, the people, have an unimpeachable right to possess firearms.

The final version, our present second amendment, passed the Senate only after that body indicated its intent that the right to keep and bear arms was an individual and private right. They did so by rejecting an amendment which would have limited the right (quote) "for the common defense" (end quote).

William Rawle, a friend of Thomas Jefferson and an early commentator on the Constitution, wrote the following about the second amendment in 1825:

> The prohibition is general. No clause in the Constitution could by a rule of construction be conceived to give Congress a power to disarm the people. Such a flagitious attempt could only be made under some general pretense by a State legislature. But if in blind pursuit of inordinate power, either should attempt it, this amendment may be appealed to as a restraint on both.

Mr. President, I could expound at great length on the legal and constitutional arguments which compel me to declare that the second amendment refers to our fundamental individual right as American citizens to keep and bear arms. I recognize that legal scholars have performed amazing feats of semantic gymnastics to prove otherwise. Likewise, I am sure that my colleagues in this body have been amazed at how the 27 words of the second amendment have been so misunderstood; especially when one is familiar with the very clear and concise intents of the framers of our Constitution.

Their intent is perfectly understandable to me, but apparently not to overly zealous lawmakers on the State and local levels. For this reason I have introduced S. 45, the Firearms Ownership Rights Act of 1985.

The intent of this bill is to send a message to those municipalities which would legislate away the rights of citizens to protect themselves, but which want the Federal Government to help fund their folly.

The message is this: Why should the Federal Government support your local law enforcement efforts when, with total disregard for the Bill of Rights, you have stripped your citizens of the best means of keeping the peace in your communities? Do you think that individuals desiring to commit a crime in your community will be unable to obtain a firearm, just because of your antigun laws?

The Second Congress defined the militia statement of the second amendment to include almost every free adult male in the United States. To them a "militia," as used in the context of the Bill of Rights, had reference to the time-honored concept of the entire populace. In other words, the framers considered an armed citizenry essential to ward off tyranny. To them it was the ultimate guarantee of last resort to ensure that "Governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed, that whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it * * *." Those words founded this Nation, and they are as valid today as they were on July 4, 1776.

I recognize that our courts have permitted the States to apply the meaning of the second amendment to their individual circumstances. The States have, for the most part, been true to the fundamentals of our founders.

Yet, in their fervor, some municipalities have far exceeded even the laws of their own States. Neither I nor my lawyer friends can find any constitutional basis for such laws. Indeed, I believe that even the most avid States-rights enthusiast among our founders would recoil with alarm at these events.

S. 45 will prohibit the use of Federal funds for law enforcement activities in those cities which have unilaterally deprived their citizens of their constitutional rights by enacting firearms laws even more restrictive than their States' laws. The Federal Government should not be a party to a city's flagrant disregard for its inhabitants' fundamental rights. Indeed, I find it ironic that a city would, on the one hand, forbid the means of maintaining a "militia" (as understood by the Founding Fathers), yet, on the other hand, ask that someone else help fund their self-diminished law enforcement efforts. We are saying to them, "you cannot have it both ways."

Mr. President, I hope that my colleagues in this body will join me in this effort to preserve the spirit of our second amendment.●

FLORIDA SLOVAK GARDEN

● Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, Florida Slovak Garden is a retirement community in Maitland, FL, that all American Slovaks can call home. In its beautiful surroundings, American Slovaks live in harmony amidst true Slovak hospitality. On Feburary 17, 1985, members and residents of Florida Slovak Garden gathered to celebrate Florida Slovak Day. One of the events that day honored Henry J. Cibula as the "Slovak Man of the Year" for his life long dedication to Slovak Garden and the Slovak people in general. Today, I would like to present before the Senate the accomplishments and contributions of this fine man which make him deserving of this award.

Henry John Cibula was born in Pittsburgh, PA, in 1916. His parents were emigrants from eastern Slovakia. After attending the University of Pittsburgh, Henry Cibula became a registered professional chemical engineer in Pennsylvania. During the next 30 years he worked for several national corporations including Allis-Chalmers, Koppers, and Firestone.

It was during this period that Mr. Cibula's parents moved to Florida and became involved in the early stages of Florida Slovak Garden. His father, John Cibula, served as vice president of the organization until his death in 1965.

After his father's death, Henry J. Cibula moved to Florida. There he founded SERAD, Inc., which he still operates. He soon became the president of Slovak Garden. It is for his contributions through this position to the advancement of Slovak Garden during the next 16 years for which he is being honored.

Under the direction of Henry Cibula, Slovak Garden flourished. New resident duplexes were constructed, and existing apartments were renovated. A lighting system was installed in all of Slovak Garden and the community hall was built. Included in the community was a complete Slovak library and museum where residents, members, and visitors can study Slovak history and heritage. Because of Mr. Cibula's efforts, Florida Slovak Garden greatly increased the value of its property. His decisions concerning finances left the community's treasury able to operate more freely and independently.

Florida Slovak Garden is strong today primarily because of wise judgment and dedicated leadership in the past. The 16 years of Henry J. Cibula's administration added stability and solid continuity to the operation of the Slovak Garden. I commend Mr. Cibula on his outstanding service to the garden and the Slovak people of America.●

ARTHUR LYNCH WILLIAMS COMMENDED ON BOOK "COMMON SENSE"

● Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, in 2 years, it will be the 50th anniversary of the enactment of the laws that established our Social Security system which commenced in 1939. Today, we face serious questions about the system's operations and solvency.

Of all the major issues of interest to Americans, few surpass the very real concern that our citizens have about their future financial security. In fact, on February 12, 1985, a story which appeared on the front page of the Washington Post detailed the very great interest that the citizens of Florida have in Social Security policy. This story described the diverging views of the young and the elderly in Florida about current Social Security costs and benefits. According to this article, one quarter of Social Security beneficiaries rely on Social Security for 90 percent of their income. The elderly in my State and across the country worry about their current benefits and the prospect of benefit freezes, while the young people worry that there will be nothing left for them when they retire.

While we in Congress debate the causes of the program's problems and the possible solution, one thing is certain: it is the goal of all Americans to be financially secure, particularly in their old age. In 1937, Franklin Delano Roosevelt designed the Social Security system to provide a sound foundation for the individual's financial security. Once this secure base was established, it would be up to the vast majority of able Americans to build their own houses of financial independence. Unfortunately, too many Americans rely on the Social Security program to provide their income in their retirement years.

It has been brought to my attention that there are people in the country who have thought long and hard about this dilemma. While Congress has the responsibility to review and perhaps rethink our Social Security system and whether it is fulfilling its intended purpose, I want to commend the efforts by individual citizens, such as Arthur Lynch Williams, Jr., for helping all of us address these concerns in terms of basic financial planning. Mr. Williams is the author of a simple, straightforward book entitled "Common Sense."

Mr. Williams' views on financial security provide guidance to the average American. He believes in consumer education and presents some simple guidelines on how each person can build his or her whole house of financial security using basic tools of financial planning. Mr. Williams encourages people not to look to or rely too heavily on Uncle Sam for their future financial security. This is a key principle in Mr. Williams' writings and one which should be impressed upon all able Americans.

People in our great Nation often work for 30, 40, 50, and sometimes 60-plus years. During these working years, we must all begin to plan for our futures, our families' futures, and for those nonworking days ahead.

As I have already pointed out, Social Security was originally intended to be the minimum requirement for people in their old age and to aid families in the event of the breadwinner's death. There are many ways in which individuals can plan, save, and invest for the future. Mr. Williams points out some simple, straightforward approaches to this problem that are available to individuals at almost any income level. He reviews many strategies for achieving security, including individual retirement accounts, maximum life insurance at minimum premiums, mutual funds, money market funds, and tax-deferred annuities.

The basic premise of Mr. Williams' book is that wage earners and business people alike should pay themselves first to guarantee their retirement. He points out simple concepts often lost in the growing complexity of today's investment opportunities such as the magic of compound interest.

In short, I am glad to see enterprising people like Mr. Williams foster commonsense attitudes and offer us the beneift of his thinking and experience to help all of us look to ourselves and not the Government for our future financial security. I also want to commend Mr. Williams on the publication of his newest book, "Pushing Up People," which expounds on the many opportunities available in our free enterprise system.●

OCONOMOWOC SENIOR HIGH SCHOOL CONCERT BAND, OCONOMOWOC, WI

● Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, it is with great pride that I call my colleagues' attention to the accomplishments of the Oconomowoc Senior High School Concert Band from Oconomowoc, WI. They have been selected to receive the John Phillip Sousa Foundation, Sudler "Flag of Honor" award.

The band is one of only five nationwide to receive this honor. Their achievements in concert performance, regional and national evaluations as well as their range of musical activities and student participation in national honor bands merited this recognition.

In addition to being listed in "Who's Who in American High School Bands," the band will receive the flag of honor and individualized certificates for each member during a concert this month. Their director, Mr. A.J. Hoeffer, will be given an engraved plaque from the foundation for his fine work with the concert band.●

EMPLOYEE EDUCATIONAL ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1985

● Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, I rise today in support of the Employee Educational Assistance Act of 1985, which would make permanent the present-law exclusion from adjusted gross income of employer-paid educational assistance. The exclusion would be limited to $5,000, as under current law, with the addition of annual indexation.

My distinguished colleague from New York, Senator MOYNIHAN, has introduced this bill which is essential in promoting the continual reeducation of our work force. Especially in our rapidly changing world of today—a world in which the technology of today may become obsolete tomorrow—it is paramount that we give employers the incentives to provide educational assistance to their employees. This bill would do exactly that.

What is there to be gained by the passage of this bill? As I have already stated, this bill would provide employers with an incentive to give employees educational assistance. This, in turn, would result in the improvement of employee skills, which may be a requirement of the employer or of the law. Simply, this bill would provide the employee with the education needed to keep his/her salary, status, or job.

The statistics show the popularity of these educational tuition benefits. It is estimated that annually, about 6 million individuals benefit from employer-paid education programs. According to as spokesman for the American Society for Training and Development, there was a 74-percent jump in the number of employer-paid courses between 1978, when the program was expanded to cover a broader range of employee education and training, and 1981. Many of the beneficiaries were women.

Opponents of extending this program argue the tax-free status of employer-paid educational benefits results in the erosion of our tax base. These people argue that taxing employee educational assistance would bring in many more revenue dollars. Such proposals to bring in a few extra tax dollars are ludicrous as well as narrowminded.

I maintain that the net effect of extending these educational benefits will not dangerously undermine our tax base, but instead, will ultimately reap new tax dollars as workers' earnings improve and subsequently produce more tax dollars. When you talk about taxing educational benefits, you are talking about cutting out human potential. Ending these programs would hurt the lowest paid and the lowest skilled workers. These workers are the ones who most urgently need the benefits provided under our proposal.

As a distinguished dean of a noted school of business administration has said:

> To keep America competitive and insure that our workers are prepared for tomorrow's jobs, we need to preserve incentives for all kinds of employees to upgrade their education and skills • • • our competitiveness as a nation depends largely on our competitiveness as a people.

I do not believe any of us could disagree with this assessment. It stands to reason that our economic competitiveness as a nation, as a whole, depends entirely upon the strengths of our individual workers. Historically, this Nation has enthusiastically encouraged its people to pursue education as a means of making oneself a viable competitor in the workplace. Voting against passage of this proposal would undoubtedly discourage many workers from seeking additional education, and the inevitable result would be the undermining of this Nation's strong, proud standing in the world economic community. It is quite simple. To remain strong, a strong nation requires strong workers.

Mr. President, passage of the Employee Educational Assistance Act of 1985 would represent a sound investment in this Nation's workers—who, after all, are the essential component of our economy. I urge all of my colleagues to support this bill and invest in our future and our workers' future—the same group that has always been the special ingredient that has made this great Nation what it is today.●

HIGHER EDUCATION BUDGET

● Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I am deeply concerned that the Reagan administration, in its recent Federal budget proposals, has proposed its most aggressive plan to date to slash Federal support for student aid programs. The President's fiscal year 1986 budget proposals for higher education, in effect, dismantle our Nation's historic Federal commitment to equal educational opportunities for all its citizens. The budget document asserts that the administration's proposals are based on dedication to the restoration of excellence at all levels of education, yet it proposes to terminate or significantly cut Federal programs specifically designed to strengthen and advance the quality of higher education. The reality of the Reagan administration's budget proposals for higher education is that a wide range of education programs would be slashed, with the result of diminishing and denying educational opportunity to thousands of our young people.

I am also deeply disturbed by Secretary of Education Bennett's attitude toward the proposed cuts in student assistance programs, as well as his callous characterization of our Nation's college students. Even President Reagan's former Education Secretary, Terrel Bell, concedes that the administration's proposed cuts in higher education programs would "hurt colleges" and "clobber students." Yet, current Secretary Bennett contends that the proposed cuts require only a "divestiture of certain sorts; stereo divestiture, automobile divestiture, three weeks at the beach divestiture." In my view, Secretary Bennett's mean-spirited comments trivialize a very critical national issue—an issue of grave concern to many middle-income and working Americans.

Since the enactment of the Higher Education Act of 1965, our Government has been committed to policies of equal student choice and access to postsecondary education. This Federal commitment has resulted in the development of the most diverse and heterogeneous system of education in the world. The Reagan administration's proposed cutbacks and restrictions would deliver a severe blow to our educational system, and to the opportunity for each individual to obtain the education that is essential if he or she is to function effectively in our modern society. Continued support for current Federal student aid programs is a sound investment in our country's future. It is clear that the administration has not carefully examined the implications of its own policies—policies which would only serve to limit or eliminate educational opportunities for our young people, and destroy our Government's historic commitment to the principles of equal access to higher education.●

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER [Mr. DENTON]. Morning business is closed.

NOMINATION OF EDWIN MEESE III TO BE ATTORNEY GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Edwin Meese III, of California, to be Attorney General.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, I rise in support of the nomination of Edwin W. Meese III to replace William French Smith as Attorney General of the United States. I base my position on a review of 7 days of hearings before the Judiciary Committee, a report by an independent counsel, and a report by the Office of Government Ethics. I was able to conclude to my complete satisfaction that Mr. Meese has been completely vindicated of any and all suspicion of wrongdoing.

The independent counsel's report concluded: "We find no basis with respect to any of the 11 allegations for the bringing of a prosecution against Mr. Meese for the violation of a Federal criminal statute." The conclusion followed an extensive 6-month investigation of all 11 allegations. The investigators examined all documents believed to be relevant, including files from the White House Office of Presidential Personnel and, the Counsel to the President, senior staff, notes, Mr. Meese's files, telephone logs, bank accounts and tax returns, and documents from GSA, the Merit Systems Protection Board, the Departments of Interior, Commerce, and Labor, the Small Business Administration, and the Departments of Defense and the Army.

The independent counsel interviewed over 200 witnesses including Mr. and Mrs. Meese. Additionally, 45 of the witnesses testified before a Federal grand jury. All witnesses were forthcoming; no witness refused to testify or sought immunity. Mr. Meese was questioned for 2 full days by the independent counsel and testified before the grand jury for another 2 days. His responses were shown to be accurate in every significant respect.

Subsequently, the Office of Government Ethics certified that Mr. Meese was in compliance with applicable laws and regulations concerning conflicts of interest.

Mr. President, I have great confidence in Mr. Meese's honesty and integrity. Furthermore, I know that he will come to the office with an impressive background. In the field of law enforcement, for example, his record of experience and commitment to fighting crime is unsurpassed.

Mr. Meese has extensive courtroom experience as deputy district attorney of Alameda County, but his perspective in the criminal justice systems extends beyond the portfolio of a prosecutor. As legal affairs secretary to the Governor of California, Mr. Meese was chief liaison between California's executive branch and judicial, correctional, and law enforcement agencies.

He understands the legislative role in criminal justice, having represented both the California District Attorneys Association and the Peace Officers Association before the State legislature.

He knows the importance of crime prevention efforts. Both as a volunteer and in an appointed capacity, Mr. Meese has been active in delinquency prevention programs, youth job placement efforts, halfway house rehabilitation programs, and pretrial release programs. He also has worked in prison and bail reform efforts, and served as vice chairman of the California Bar Association's subcommittee on legal services for indigent criminal defendants.

Mr. Meese has been concerned with white-collar crime—in California as vice chairman for the State organized crime control commission and in Washington—through the President's Council on Integrity and Efficiency—an effort he helped establish to put teeth in the Inspector Generals Act.

In sum, Mr. Meese has an understanding that few people can match of the machinery of American justice. Equally important, he understands the principles upon which our system of justice is based. Mr. Meese will prove to be truly a distinguished Attorney General.

I urge my colleagues to vote to confirm the nomination.

Thank you, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER [Mr. DENTON]. The distinguished Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SIMON. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, I want to speak just briefly on the nomination of Ed Meese. If Ed Meese were before this body to be Secretary of Transportation or Ambassador to Norway or some other country, I would be voting for him. I am less concerned about his financial indiscretions than some people are. But I intend to vote against Ed Meese and, to my knowledge, it will be the only negative vote I shall cast on the names that have been submitted by the President up to this point. I shall be doing it for a different reason, if I can go into history just a bit.

Back in 1960, shortly after John F. Kennedy was elected President of the United States, Bob Wallace, who later became Under Secretary to the Treasury and was then on President Kennedy's staff, called me and said the President-elect was considering naming Bobby Kennedy as the Attorney General of the United States and asked my opinion. I told him I had great respect for Bobby Kennedy, thought he was a person of great ability, but that I felt it was a mistake to have someone too close to the President named as Attorney General.

That applies today with equal validity. Whoever is the Attorney General, we ought to have the feeling that justice is being served, that on the 99 percent of the decisions that no one knows about publicly, if an Attorney General has to make a decision between pressure from the White House and the cause of justice, the cause of justice will be served. There is an uneasy feeling on the part of many of us, and I think some of us on both sides of the aisle, that while there is no animosity toward Ed Meese personally, that will not be the case.

The question could be asked: Well, is it not true that almost all Attorneys General are very close to a President? The answer is that that is not necessarily true. And if I can give you an example from another Republican President, Gerald Ford appointed Ed Levi as Attorney General of the United States. He was the dean of the law school of the University of Chicago. I do not think anyone thought that Ed Levi was being appointed because he was a crony of the President. I do not think anyone in this or the other Chamber had any question about Ed Levi standing up for the cause of justice. That is the standard we ought to be following in the appointment of an Attorney General. And so, with some reluctance, because I believe the President generally ought to have the power to appoint whomever he wishes to various positions, I am going to oppose the nomination. The Attorney General, after all, makes decisions in the antitrust field among others, the civil rights area, the Land and Natural Resources Division, he heads the FBI, he heads the Bureau of Prisons, Drug Enforcement Administration, Immigration and Naturalization Services; he has to supervise the U.S. attorneys and make decisions there.

There are a whole series of very, very sensitive areas where the Attorney General of the United States must serve and make delicate, extremely important decisions. The people of the United States ought to feel beyond any question that the cause of justice and justice alone is being served by the Attorney General of the United States. The appointment of Ed Meese, I do not think, meets that standard. For that reason, Mr. President, I shall not vote for Ed Meese for Attorney General.

Mr. HARKIN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa is recognized.

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. President, I join my colleague, the distinguished Senator from Illinois, in also opposing the nomination of Ed Meese to be the next Attorney General of the United States. Mr. President, I too will oppose the nomination when it comes to the floor for a vote, hopefully sometime later this week, perhaps next week, after, of course, the Senate does see that the real important business which ought to be addressed in this body this week is not the nomination of Ed Meese to be Attorney General but the important business we ought to be about is passing some meaningful agricultural legislation to save our family farmers from going under in the next few days and weeks. That is really what we ought to be about, not the nomination of Ed Meese. As I said yesterday, Ed Meese has a job. His income is secure. He gets a paycheck, I am sure, every couple weeks or once a month. The Justice Department is proceeding. The bureaucrats down there seem to be working; everything seems to be going reasonably well. And so to say that most important thing we have about us now is to take up the nomination of Ed Meese I think is a real slap in the face to the thousands of farmers in Illinois, Iowa, the Dakotas, the South and western part of this country who literally are facing forced bankruptcy on a daily basis. In my home State of Iowa just this week another bank went under. That is three since the first of January. Three banks in Iowa have gone under.

Mr. SIMON. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. HARKIN. I am delighted to yield to my colleague from Illinois.

Mr. SIMON. I simply wish to join him in saying this is a pressing matter, and as I understand the Iowa State banking commissioner—I forget his exact title—has said that over 100 banks in the Senator's State may be troubled.

Mr. HARKIN. If the Senator will yield, the exact figure I heard a couple weeks ago was as many as 131 banks in the State of Iowa are now in trouble. As I have said, we have had three go under just since the first of this year.

Mr. SIMON. What we are seeing now may be the tip of the iceberg; it is not simply the farmers but the banks and fertilizer companies, grain elevators and implement dealers—something that could have ramifications far beyond the confines of rural communities is what we are talking about. I commend my colleague and I join in his sense of urgency on this matter.

Mr. HARKIN. I thank my colleague from Illinois. He is absolutely right. It is not just the farmers. If there are people here who buy David Stockman's theory that the farmers are themselves to blame and that the Government has no place in helping to save our family farmers, then look beyond the farmers. Look at the banks that are going to go under, look at the implement dealers, at all the businesses in our small towns throughout the countryside, fertilizer dealers, seed and feed dealers; businesses that maybe exist in Boston, MA, are going to be affected by the failure of these farmers if something is not done and done soon.

Now, there is legislation pending. I noted yesterday and I note again today that the Senate Agriculture Committee has not met since the first of this year with this urgency that is pending before us. With a virtual depression of unprecedented magnitude facing us in this country in agriculture, here we are taking up the nomination of Ed Meese to be Attorney General.

Well, he has waited a year. I think he can wait a few more weeks or maybe a month—I hope no more than just a week—until we pass some agriculture legislation. But the most important thing we ought to be about is getting a debt restructuring plan.

Now, there have been various proposals introduced by various Members of this body on both sides of the aisle, and I think we ought to bring those to the floor for open debate. Let us amend them and let us go through the normal process of the Senate and then let us see what the House does. If I am not mistaken, I think the House this week is passing legislation to address the debt problems in agriculture in this country.

That is really what we ought to be about. I guess what disturbs me is that we are taking this time to talk about the nomination of Ed Meese to be Attorney General. I am going to address that point on Ed Meese himself and why I think he lacks the qualifications to be Attorney General, but I would be remiss if I did not again point out that the urgent business of this body ought to be, before the close of business this week, discussion, debate, amendment, and passage from this body some form of debt restructuring for agriculture in this country and not to take up the nomination of Ed Meese.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. HARKIN. I am delighted to yield to my colleague from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I ask the Senator if he did see a story this morning in the business section, page D1, continued on page D2 of the Washington Post, "Big Fed Loan to Continental Not in Budget"? It goes on to say in the story:

> The Government's $3.5 billion, 5-year cash loan to the troubled Continental Bank of Illinois was arranged last May so that it would not show up anywhere as a budget expenditure, according to a new report by the Congressional Budget Office.

Now, the point is that this action was taken—and I am not citicizing the way it was handled by the administration at all—to save the Continental Bank. I am not criticizing it. I am not doing that at all.

I am saying this was handled in a manner just as a bank would handle it—as a dual interest system, you might say, so that the Federal Reserve made the money available and the money was loaned to the Continental Bank of Illinois, so that Continental could carry on its business and go ahead and redeem whatever paper needed to be redeemed, and the Continental Bank was saved.

Now, as much as I respect the Continental Bank—I have high regard for its new chief officer, John Swearingen, whom I know and greatly admire—if the Government could do this for the Continental Bank, great as that bank is and worthy of saving as it is, why should millions of our farmers be any less worthy of consideration than that great bank? After all, we are talking about millions of farmers that the Senator would like to save.

I ask unanimous consent that this article to which I have referred appear in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BIG FED LOAN TO CONTINENTAL NOT IN BUDGET

(By Hobart Rowen)

The federal government's $3.5 billion, five-year cash loan to the troubled Continental Bank of Illinois was arranged last May so that it would not show up anywhere as a budget expenditure, according to a new report by the Congressional Budget Office.

The money was put up in cash by the Federal Reserve Bank, and the loan was then assumed by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. as part of the overall government bailout of the Chicago bank.

The CBO report, which in general says that the Fed should be more accountable for its spending, reveals that instead of the normal procedure by which the FDIC would have directly acquired the cash by the sale of its own securities, the Fed's discount window "served as the source of financing."

Under the regular procedure, a $3.5 billion FDIC loan would have shown up as a budget expenditure item. The way it was done, there is no record of the loan in the budget.

Normally, says the CBO report, loans and equity assistance from the FDIC's fund are listed in the budget as expenditures; repayments of assistance are listed as offsetting collections. An FDIC sale of securities would show up as a decrease in FDIC's unobligated balances.

In the Continental case, because the cash was provided by the Fed, eliminating the need for the FDIC to disburse cash or to draw down its equity, the Office of Management and Budget decided that the transaction didn't have to show up as a budget outlay, the CBO study says.

The FDIC then assumed Continental's debt of cash to the Fed, acquiring in exchange some of Continental's troubled loans. "Over the next five years, the FDIC will pay the interest and principal payments due on these loans to the Federal Reserve," financing any shortfall from its own reserve fund, according to the CBO. Any FDIC losses will show up as expenditures in future budgets, a congressional source said.

Former Wisconsin congressman Henry S. Reuss said "it is unheard of" for the Fed to use its discount window for a five-year loan. He suggested a bad precedent had been created, whereby the Fed had printed money to help bail out a bank. However, a House Banking Committee staff member said the Fed window was used on a smaller scale in the Franklin National Bank case.

"The Continental Illinois loan is not recorded in the FDIC's budget because the FDIC did not provide any 'budgetary resources,' even though the FDIC did assume the risk of loss in the transaction," according to the CBO report. "The loan is not recorded in the budget under the Federal Reserve's account because the discount operations of the Federal Reserve are excluded from the budget."

The "moral of the tale," said economist James K. Galbraith, former staff director for the Joint Economic Committee, "is that the normal rules for spending and lending money don't apply to the Fed, because discount operations are excluded from the budget."

Legislation to implement some of the CBO's recommendations to make the Fed more accountable will be introduced by Rep. Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), chairman of a Joint Economic subcommittee that released the CBO report. Hamilton's bill would require that all receipts and expenditures of the Federal Reserve System be presented in the budget.

Mr. HARKIN. I thank the Senator for bringing that out. Like the Senator, I have no quarrel with what happened with the Continental Illinois Bank.

Mr. LONG. It is fine to save Continental.

Mr. HARKIN. That is right. I have no problem with that, and I have no problem with the way it was done. But, on the same note, as the Senator pointed out, this administration can use the laws we have on the books today. We do not need tax legislation. We can use the laws on the books today to do the same thing as was done with Continental Illinois.

For example, in the Reconciliation Act of 1981 is a provision that gives the President the power, with a stroke of the pen, to have the Small Business Administration go out right now and, on a case-by-case basis, restructure every farm loan in this country at 5 percent interest for 20 years. That is off-budget. That would not even have to show up in the budget. They can do it the same way as was done with the Continental Illinois Bank, because it is a nonbudget item. They refuse to do that for the farmers.

I have no problems with what they did with Continental Illinois Bank. I understand the ramifications of it. But they say their hands are tied and they cannot do it for the farmers of this country.

Mr. LONG. When I was in Louisiana a few days ago, a fine, hardworking black man, who worked terribly hard for everything he owns, one of the first blacks elected to public office in the State of Louisiana in recent years, since the civil rights legislation, came to me to tell me about this problem. Unless we do something to help farm credit available, here is a man who worked a lifetime so that he could have 200 acres of farmland, and he could be wiped out.

Mr. HARKIN. I want to tell the Senator another story to show the difference between the way the Government is handling the Continental Illinois Bank and the way it is handling my farmers in Iowa.

I said earlier that we had a third bank in Iowa go under since the first of the year. It was the sixth since last year.

Last summer, we had a bank go under in my former district. The FDIC came in, just as they did with the Continental Illinois Bank, and they guaranteed the loans and picked up all the bad debts. I met with the FDIC liquidators at the bank and I said, "What are you going to do with all these loans."

They said: "Some banks will pick up some of the loans. We think we can sell a few more, but some are so bad that no one will pick them up."

I said: "What will you do with them?"

He said: "The FDIC is not a bank. We are not a lender. We can't carry these on our books, so we will have to foreclose."

I said: "Just a second. Aren't you the same FDIC that went into Continental Illinois Bank and did the same thing?"

He said: "Yes, we are the same organization."

I said: "Who had those debts of Continental Illinois Bank?"

He said that there was Mexico, Argentina, Venezuela, and maybe a couple of other countries.

I said: "Are you going to foreclose on those countries?"

He said: "No."

I said: "If you're not going to foreclose on them, don't foreclose on my farmers, either."

This shows the difference in the attitude of this administration, the way it treats the Continental Illinois Bank and the way it treats the farmers. If they are not going to foreclose on Mexico, they ought not foreclose on my farmers, either.

Mr. LONG. I thank the Senator.

Mr. HARKIN. I thank the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARKIN. I yield.

Mr. SIMON. I heard the comments of the Senator from Louisiana and the Senator from Iowa, and I note the presence on the floor of my colleague from Illinois, Senator DIXON.

I want to underscore that what happened to Continental, while it was not a desirable action on the part of the Federal Government, was a necessary action. John Swearingen and the officers of Continental are doing a superb job of turning it around. It is an illustration of what we have to do in the farm economy. We do not want the Federal Government to come in, but there is no choice. Just as John Swearingen and the officers of Continental are turning that institution around, the farmers of this country can turn the farm economy around if we give them a chance.

Mr. HARKIN. This Senator was in the House when the New York City matter came up, when we had to bail out New York City. The biggest city in my district had 60,000 people; yet, I was asked to help bail out New York City, and I did. I voted for it. Why? Because they are part of our great Nation, just as our farmers are.

For someone to say, "Give me a reason," as David Stockman said, "to help the farmers," who he says got themselves into this trouble, is to say that somehow the farming sector of our country is not a part of our country anymore. That is the attitude that I see coming from David Stockman and the Department of Agriculture and this administration.

New York City is a part of this great Nation. I think that what we did at that time to help New York City proved invaluable. They have made good on those loans. They have paid them back with interest, just as the farmers of this country have already paid back the loans of the Government with interest. They have never defaulted. At this time of crisis, when they need that help, this administration is not forthcoming.

51-059 O-86-45 (Pt. 2)

Mr. SIMON. I thank my colleague from Iowa for his leadership on this matter.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, if my colleague from Iowa has concluded his remarks, which I generally support, I have some comments to make about the order of business today.

Mr. HARKIN. I have some comments to make about the order of the day, about Mr. Meese. I will be glad to yield and give up my time, if the Senator wishes, but I do have a statement about Mr. Meese which will take the better part of a half hour.

Mr. DIXON. If the Senator will yield, I have a 2 o'clock meeting of the Subcommittee on Procurement of the Armed Services Committee, at which I am obligated to be in attendance.

Mr. HARKIN. I am more than delighted to yield my time, and I will pick up later.

Mr. DIXON. I thank my colleague.

Mr. President, the Senate has been considering issues related to the nomination of Edwin Meese to the post of Attorney General for many months now. The independent counsel took his oath of office on April 2, 1984. He filed his report on September 20, 1984.

Last year, Congress did not act on the Meese nomination because time ran out. But, once again, the nomination is before us in the Senate, and the time for decision is now.

The question that will soon be put to the Senate will be whether to advise and consent to the appointment of Mr. Meese as Attorney General. It is a role that the Senate rightly takes very seriously.

For my part, I have given this nomination the most careful consideration. For Cabinet posts, in particular, I come at this process with a built-in bias—I think that a President is basically entitled to have his or her appointee.

So I would normally come to this nomination with a disposition to be for Mr. Meese. There is no doubt at all that he is the President's choice, and no doubt at all regarding his closeness to the President.

If the inquiry could be ended there, I would have no doubt on how to cast my vote. But it cannot be ended there. For while I have a general bias in favor of the President's choice, I also, along with the entire Senate, have a responsibility to assess the nominee's qualifications and his fitness for the post of Attorney General of the United States.

Mr. Meese has had considerable experience in public life and long association with Ronald Reagan. The truth is, however, that Mr. Meese does not have the kind of towering legal reputation that makes him a natural choice for the position of Attorney General.

Mr. Meese's views and actions also reflect on his lack of suitability for the post. This is a man that said poor people stand in soup kitchen lines because they want "free food." This is a man who refers to the American Civil Liberties Union as a "criminal's lobby." This is a man who overturned law and policy to give Bob Jones University—a segregated institution—a tax exemption.

Shedding additional light on the Meese nomination are those matters that were within the purview of the independent counsel, Jacob A. Stein. The independent counsel looked into 11 separate areas, and I share his conclusion that there is "no basis with respect to any of the 11 allegations for the bringing of a prosecution against Mr. Meese for the violation of a Federal criminal statute."

But that cannot be the end of the inquiry. It is not enough simply to say that the nomineee for Attorney General cannot be prosecuted for any Federal crime. There remain questions regarding the propriety and ethics of Mr. Meese's conduct—matters the independent counsel declined to review as being outside his charter.

Mr. President, I believe that the most charitable interpretation one can put on Mr. Meese's behavior was that he was insensitive to the ethical considerations involved, insensitive to the fact that he was creating the appearance of using his office for personal gain.

This is a thread that runs throughout the areas investigated by the independent counsel. Mr. Meese seems insensitive to potential conflicts of interest, insensitive to financial disclosure requirements; in fact, insensitive to ethical considerations generally.

Whether Mr. Meese behaved in an unethical manner in specific instances may be open to dispute. I am convinced, however, that time and time again, he does not seem to sufficiently consider ethical concerns before he acts. An Attorney General must set an example. The Attorney General must be the Government's guide in the legal and ethical area. I wish I did not have to say it, but I do not believe Mr. Meese is a suitable candidate to fulfill that sensitive role. He does not meet the kind of standard that this Nation should and must set, and which it has generally set, for its Attorney Generals.

I do not believe Mr. Meese is an evil man, but that is not enough to be Attorney General. I do not believe Mr. Meese has acted illegally, but again, that is not enough to be Attorney General. The fact he is the President's choice is, I regret to say, in this case, not enough. He needs more than that to be the appropriate choice.

I reluctantly urge the Senate, therefore, to join me in opposing this nomination. If we are to be true to ourselves and to our Nation's ideals, we have no other choice.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I hope we are at last completing the final chapter on this nomination. Although I understand that may or may not happen today, hopefully it will; but if not today, tomorrow; if not tomorrow, Friday; if not Friday, Saturday; if not Saturday, sometime next week.

This nomination was first submitted by the President over a year ago. We have had extended hearings, detailed investigations, thousands of pages of testimony and documents. It seems that every issue which could have been raised, has been raised, be it the nominee's competence, qualifications, character, philosophy, or independence of judgment. While there have been some unpleasant moments during this 13 month process, the end result, in the opinion of this Senator, is the right one. A strong record has been established supporting this nomination's swift approval by the full Senate.

THE RECORD

Specifically, the record shows that Ed Meese has a life time of experience in Government and law enforcement which have prepared him well for the job of Attorney General. A scholarship student at Yale and graduate of the University of California at Berkeley Law School, Ed Meese's experiences range from deputy district attorney in Alameda County to volunteer worker in delinquency prevention and youth job placement programs; from legal affairs secretary to the Governor of California, to counselor to the President of the United States. Ed Meese stands shoulder to shoulder among those who have previously held the office of Attorney General in terms of the breadth and diversity of his résumé. And few, if any, of his predecessors surpass this commitment and dedication in the area of law enforcement.

The record also shows that Ed Meese is a fair minded, responsible individual, who is fully capable of remaining independent of the White House and political influence in carrying out the responsibilities of the Attorney General. He also has a deep, abiding respect of the law—all the laws. He understands how important it is for every American citizen to look to the Attorney General as their lawyer—the legal representative of all the people. As he said on the first day of the hearings,

> There must be in the Department and throughout our Government a commitment to evenhanded justice and the equal protection of the law for all citizens regardless of their race, color, sex, creed, background or economic circumstances.

Finally, the record shows that Ed Meese is an ethical man: A man of character and integrity—a dedicated public servant whose financial dealings became an issue only because he made such a substantial economic sacrifice in order to serve his newly elected President. In retrospect, there were some things Ed Meese should have done differently. But then, he was a newcomer to Washington and had not yet been indoctrinated into our hypersensitivity over the appearance of potential conflict. In any event, I believe he has learned from past experience and will make painstaking efforts to adhere to the highest standards of ethical conduct as Attorney General.

CONCLUSION

Mr. President, as I said, I have had the opportunity to work with Ed Meese on a number of occasions. I know him to be a good, honest man—we don't always agree, but I have always had great respect for his opinions. I appreciate, however, that many in the Senate are not so confident about their position on his nomination. As with any contentious nomination, much of the uncertainty stems from the lack of guidance contained in the Constitution concerning what standards should be applied by the Senate in exercising its responsibility to advise and consent.

In this regard, I think it interesting to note that the prevailing view among the Founding Fathers was that the Senate's role in the appointment process would be largely passive. For instance, Hamilton wrote in the Federalist Papers,

> It is not likely that (The Senate's) sanction would often be refused where there were not special and strong reasons for the refusal.

Perhaps the Senate, at times, has been more active in the appointment process than Hamilton expected. As a general rule, however, it has always given the President wide latitude in selecting high level members of his team. Indeed, throughout the history of the Senate, only eight Cabinet nominations have been rejected on the Senate floor—the last occurring over a quarter of a century ago.

During debate on the nomination of Griffin Bell, my friend and former colleague, Birch Bayh discussed the standards he applied in evaluating a nomination and I believe those comments are relevant here. Specifically he said,

> The question is not whether Giffin Bell is perfect. . . perhaps the only person who can judge the nominee by that standard is one who meets the identical standard himself. That means there are going to be very few Members who can decide for or against the nominee on the floor of the Senate. . . . I intend to support Griffin Bell for Attorney General for one basic reason: I think the man is going to be a good Attorney General.

I voted against Griffin Bell, and have since regretted it because Birch Bayh was right—he was a good Attorney General. And I believe that while Ed Meese, too, may not meet everyone's standard of perfection, he will also be a fine Attorney General.

So I would just hope that we can confirm that nomination of Mr. Meese this afternoon and then get on to the highway bill which involves literally billions of dollars, about $7 billion, I am advised. It means $170 million to the State of Illinois, $104 million to Oklahoma, $70 million to Iowa, $73 million to Tennessee, and even $23 million to the State of Kansas.

A lot of people are waiting for that highway money; there may be a lot of farmers who work on the highway part time waiting for that highway money.

But there are some who seem determined to postpone action on the Meese nomination, the highway bill or anything else until they have had their way on another issue.

But seriously I believe that we can and should separate all these matters.

Ed Meese is an honorable man. He has waited 13 months. He has not complained about it. He understands that there is opposition. He accepts that. He simply wants to serve as Attorney General. The President wants him to serve as Attorney General. So I hope that in fairness to Mr. Meese and in fairness to other matters of legislation we hope to take up at the appropriate time—including addressing the farm matter—that we will act speedily on this nomination.

(Mr. SYMMS assumed the Chair.)

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I will vote against the nomination of Edwin Meese III to be Attorney General of the United States.

I did not lightly or easily reach this conclusion. I believe that Presidents generally should be able to have the Cabinet members of their choice. As a matter of policy, every President should be free to select Cabinet nominees who share his philosophical outlook and his policy goals. Disagreement over philosophy or policy is not a sufficient basis for rejecting this or any other Cabinet nominee.

So the fact that Mr. Meese's record on public policy matters does not coincide with my policy preferences would not be sufficient grounds for me to vote against this nomination.

But there are other important factors which must be considered as the Senate discharges its constitutional duty in the filling of high government office.

One is the nominee's integrity and ethical standards. The degree of ethical insensitivity Mr. Meese has demonstrated, reveals a disregard for the appearance of probity that I cannot endorse in an Attorney General of the United States.

Mr. Meese's inability to separate his personal financial interests from his Government responsibilities has been clearly set forth in the public record. It needs, and will receive from me, no detailed repetition; I will, however, briefly summarize some of the aspects most troubling to me:

Mr. Meese accepted two unsecured loans totalling $60,000 which were arranged by his tax counselor, John McKean. Meese paid no interest on these loans nor any of the principal until 26 months after first receiving the money, and then only after a press story revealed their existence. McKean was twice appointed to the Postal Board of Governors and now serves as chairman. Mr. Meese personally took part in clearing these appointments.

Mr. Meese was aided in selling his California home by Thomas Barrack. Barrack, who received no commission, advanced the seller a $70,000 loan to consummate the deal, paid the mortgage for a period of time, and finally absorbed an $83,000 loss on the sale, according to the report of the Independent Counsel. Within a week of arranging that sale, Barrack met with Mr. Meese in connection with his efforts to seek a Presidential appointment. He was subsequently appointed to two Federal positions. Mr. Meese could not recall that meeting until he was shown a note confirming it, and denies any relationship between Barrack's $83,000 contribution on Meese's behalf and Meese's help in getting Barrack an important Federal job, even though both Meese and Barrack acknowledged that they had never met prior to this transaction.

What is the ordinary American to think of this? A total stranger makes what is, in effect, a gift of $83,000 to an assistant to the President. He then asks that assistant to the President for help in getting a Federal job. He, in fact, receives the help and the job. And Mr. Meese suggests that there was no connection between the two. Even if there were not, which must strain the credibility of any objective person, no one can deny that the appearance of impropriety is obvious in such a case.

Mr. Meese failed to disclose an interest free $15,000 loan to his wife on four separate annual disclosure statements. The creditor, Edwin Thomas, first became Meese's immediate subordinate at the White House, and later Regional Director of the General Services Administration in San Francisco. Thomas's wife was first employed at the White House and subsequently appointed to the Federal Merit Systems Protection Board. Mr. Meese claims it never occurred to him that this loan should be reported on the disclosure from.

Mr. Meese obtained a combination of mortgage loans, bridge loans and rescheduled loans from a bank, for a total indebtedness of $420,000. Payments were in arrears on some of these loans for up to 15 months. Four officers of the bank were subsequently appointed to Federal positions. All of these appointments were among those Mr. Meese reviewed. Mr. Meese claimed that he was unaware of the connection.

Mr. Meese accepted preferential promotion to colonel in the Army Reserve, even though the Secretary of the Army had personally called the irregularities in the promotion to his attention. Mr. Meese says he cannot recall that conversation, although he contacted Secretary Weinberger to support the reappointment of the general who approved his promotion.

Mr. Meese accepted a $10,000 check from the Presidential Transition Trust for moving expenses, even through during his initial confirmation hearings last year he testified that he had paid for his moving expenses out of his pocket. When he was advised that the payment of moving expenses by the trust was probably illegal, he asked somebody at the trust to alter the check to reflect consulting expenses.

Taken individually, it may be that no one of these specific instances would represent a serious obstacle to Mr. Meese's confirmation.

But they are not separate incidents which occurred to different people. These lapses, errors, misjudgments, and oversights are all part of one man's record. In their totality they demonstrate at the least an indifference to the appearance of impropriety, at the worst, a misuse of power for personal gain.

It is dismaying to know that despite the substantial number of questions that have been raised, and despite the pointed failure of the Independent Counsel to give Mr. Meese the vote of confidence for which his lawyers asked, this nomination is regarded by many and perhaps is, as a foregone conclusion.

I do not dispute the accuracy of that political judgment. No doubt Mr. Meese's nomination will be approved. But its inevitability does not make it right.

Another important factor in evaluating this nomination is the extent to which Mr. Meese's qualifications justify his assuming the high post of Attorney General. In one sense, the inquiry in this case has unfortunately focused almost exclusively on the search for a disqualification—for a specific act or acts which would at once defeat the nomination. As a result, almost no attention has been paid to Mr. Meese's lack of affirmative qualifications for the position. Regrettably, Mr. Meese's professional credentials have received so little attention because his ethical standards have received so much. When examined, it becomes apparent that they are, at best, modest credentials.

The bulk of Mr. Meese's adult life has been spent in politics, not in the practice of law. His entire legal experience consists of 8 years as deputy district attorney in Alameda County, from 1959 to 1967, and then a 4 year period, from 1977 to 1981, when, according to his resume, he was a self-employed attorney and consultant and part-time law professor.

A closer examination of the latter period reveals that he was not a law professor in the ordinary meaning of that term. He taught no regular law classes. Rather, he periodically conducted seminars and promoted the Center of Criminal Justice Policy with which he was affiliated.

His law practice also can only be described as minimal. During the entire 4-year period in which he worked as a lawyer, only in 1 year did he report the practice of the law to be the major source of his inocme. In 1978 and 1979, he reported $5,100 and $19,500 respectively, in income from the practice of law. While success in the practice of law (or any other field) ought not be judged by the level of one's income, it is clear that Mr. Meese cannot be fairly described as having engaged in the private practice of law in any substantial sense.

Obviously, as is well known, Mr. Meese's close relationship with the President has meant that Mr. Meese devoted considerable time to working on political campaigns. That is an honorable form of employment, but it is not the practice of law.

It is also clear that Mr. Meese's primary qualification for the post of Attorney General is that he is the President's friend.

But in the wake of the Watergate scandals 10 years ago, the Senate went clearly on record as deploring the appointment of close political friends of a President to the post of Attorney General, and even approved an amendment to the Ethics in Government Act to discourage this practice.

That Senate's judgment was the right one. It is a judgment that should be applied against all appointees to the Attorney General's post, regardless of political party or political philosophy.

The Attorney General of the United States does not have the responsibility either for writing the laws or for interpreting the Constitution. But the enormous degree of prosecutorial discretion that the holder of that office possesses means that the Attorney General of the United States, more than any other single person, more even than the President, is the individual whose personal standards and judgments will be stamped on the enforcement of the laws of this country.

For a nation such as ours, a public belief in the impartial administration of the laws is absolutely crucial. Our Nation is deeply founded on the idea of law and respect for its authority. If our Nation is to survive as it began—based on equality before the law—then our laws must be impartially enforced, and they must be seen to be impartially enforced.

The persistent habit by Presidents of both parties of nominating individuals for Attorney General whose only or major qualifications are political creates the serious risk that over time, the impartial administration of the laws, like the authority of the ethics guidelines which should rule Government officials, will be undermined.

If the major qualification for the chief law enforcement official in our system becomes political, without regard to legal qualification, the authority of the law itself will be undermined.

Nothing is so easy to overlook as the gradual erosion over time of principle. Nothing is so hard to recapture as a sound and strong principle once lost in the mist of history. If we allow to become established and take hold in this country, as we are now in the process of doing in recent years in both parties, the practice of appointing as Attorney General unqualified or marginally qualified friends of the President, we will inevitably erode the principle of impartiality and the authority that goes with it.

That would be tragic for our Nation; it would alter the kind of Nation we will become. If we persist in ignoring shortcomings in each particular nominee's case, we will sooner or later have no standards at all by which to judge the fitness of individual nominees.

The process of erosion is already well underway. The debate over this very nomination demonstrates that the principle of high standards for public service has so eroded that the fact of non-indictment is, to some, an endorsement.

Who could have imagined, 10 years ago in the wake of the Watergate scandals, that we would so soon face the confirmation of an Attorney General about whose ethical judgments so many valid questions have been raised, but about whose ultimate confirmation there is virtually no doubt?

The erosion of the ethical standards by which Government officials are judged and judge themselves has been silent, but it has been devastating.

We elected officials wonder so often why so many of our citizens are cynical about their Government in so many cases. To find one reason, we have only to look at the kinds of ethical lapses we are prepared to repeatedly overlook. We cannot expect our citizens to respect the Government if we don't respect it; if the administration offers no more than a standard of noncriminality and the Senate accepts it.

A government or an idea of government can only be as good as the people who administer it. Our Nation's idea of government based on law, of a government constrained by the law, and a system in which the making of the laws is separate from their enforcement, is an idea which has successfully stood the test of two centuries of experience.

It is an idea which has given this Nation the greatest degree of personal, political, and economic freedom enjoyed by any people, anywhere, at any time in all of human history.

But the idea itself is not immune to human weakness or to human failings. If we give the high posts of our Government into the hands of individuals without regard for their personal integrity or their fitness, we will have done our part to undermine the principles of our Government.

It is easy to say—as many do—that no overwhelming case has been made against Mr. Meese. But surely the Attorney General of the United States should meet a higher standard than that no overwhelming case can be made against him. Is there no standard that says an overwhelming case ought to be made for him? Should that not be our standard? And if it were, can anyone doubt that Mr. Meese does not meet it?

I will not appeal to the opinions of editorial writers, although there have been many critical editorials written on this nomination. I will, rather, appeal to the fact that despite the common wisdom in this city that this nomination will and should go through, there is here in this Senate Chamber and throughout the Nation a great deal of uneasiness about his nomination.

That uneasiness reflects the fact that Americans in a sense remain idealists about their Government. They want to be able to have a Government whose officials command their respect, not a Government whose officials have simply avoided criminal indictment.

If we avoid the responsibilities implicit in the Senate's duty to advise and consent to nominations, we will have done our share to deepen the cynicism and encourage the apathy of our citizens.

And that is an outcome which will return to haunt all of us, elected and appointed officials alike, along with all of the American people.

I thank you, Mr. President.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the confirmation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is not a sufficient second.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I again ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There appears to be a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, I feel at the present moment, because of the urgency of the situation in agriculture, that we should be turning our attention to the devising of an effective emergency package to deal with the devastating conditions in American agriculture today.

Mr. President, I understand that there are some meetings going on in other offices at this moment. We, myself and others, have made proposals to the majority leader and others which they have taken to the administration for their consideration. I am hopeful that we will be hearing in the very near future that there is some positive response on their part.

Mr. President, we have given some 14 specific suggestions for consideration in an effective package to help the situation in agriculture, to protect against the future erosion of equity values in agriculture.

Mr. President, while that negotiation goes forward, I would like to share with my colleagues in the Senate a portion of the findings of the Report of the Independent Counsel concerning Edwin Meese III. I think of no more appropriate place to begin than the forward of this document.

On April 2, 1984, I took the oath as Independent Counsel.

On April 4, 1984, I met with two former Special Prosecutors, Arthur Hill Christy and Leon Silverman. Both gave me the full benefit of their experience in the staffing and the planning of their investigations.

I might say, Mr. President, I hope I will have an opportunity, if necessary, to share this whole document with my colleagues. I think it will be constructive.

Shortly after my meeting with Mr. Christy and Mr. Silverman, I met with William H. Webster, Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and members of his staff. Mr. Webster tendered the full cooperation of the FBI and he fully implemented the offer. He gave me my choice of agents and I selected four. They have reported directly to me and my staff with no parallel reporting to the FBI. All four showed great skill and devotion to their assignments.

The criterion used for the selection of Deputy Counsels was demonstrated excellence at the bar. I obtained, on very short notice, lawyers who fully qualified. They are John D. Aldock, David T. Austern, Richard L. Beizer, James A. Bensfield, and George T. Frampton, Jr. Their professional biographies are in an Appendix to this Report.

I may have an opportunity to share that information with my colleagues later:

After the initial press coverage associated with my appointment, I adopted a policy of giving no press conferences.

Each witness called before the grand jury impaneled in the District of Columbia on May 8, 1984, was given the customary warnings, which included the statement that anything the witness said could be used against him. No witness refused to testify. We were successful in affording confidentiality concerning the appearance of witnesses.

During the course of the investigation, we requested documentation from a number of governmental agencies, the White House, and Mr. Meese's counsel. Nothing we requested was withheld.

I received a letter dated July 11, 1984 from Senator Joseph R. Biden, Jr., requesting me, as Independent Counsel, to render my "opinion concerning the propriety or ethics of Mr. Meese's conduct." Senator Biden suggested the use of the American Bar Association's Model Rules of Professional Conduct as the standard for drafting such a comment. In addition to Senator Biden's letter, I received numerous requests to submit an evaluation of Mr. Meese's fitness for the post of Attorney General of the United States. I also received a request from Mr. Meese's counsel to declare ". . . that the evidence does not substantiate the loose charges of moral turpitude against Mr. Meese."

The statute authorizing the appointment of Independent Counsel confines the inquiry to the question of whether a federal criminal law has been violated by the respondent. 28 U.S.C. § 591(c). The Court's order directs Independent Counsel to investigate violations of federal criminal law.

Nowhere in the statute or the order is there a directive to investigate and report on the propriety or the ethics of the respondent's conduct.

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, would the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma yield for a question at this point?

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield for a question without my resuming the floor being deemed a second speech on this legislative or calendar day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has a right to yield for a question.

Mr. BOREN. I yield for a question.

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, I deeply appreciate the Senator from Oklahoma reading this report into the RECORD. I think it is very, very interesting. I ask this question not as a Senator, but as a taxpayer. Is the report that the Senator has on his desk this afternoon, in the Senate Chamber, the same report that cost roughly $720,000 to produce. Is that the report I have been reading about?

Mr. BOREN. I think the Senator is correct. Those were legal costs associated with the representation of the nominee in regard to the preparation of this document.

Mr. PRYOR. I have read some reports about the Senator from Oklahoma saying in all probability—I do not want to misquote my friend—but that in all probability he will vote for Mr. Meese's nomination. I do not want to argue the merits or demerits of that particular vote or whether he should be confirmed or not.

I was listening to other speakers earlier today in the Chamber. It really dawned on me that if farmers of our country had the same ability to get credit as Mr. Meese had, they probably would not be in the predicament they are in at this moment. He really had tremendous opportunities for receiving loans. I do not think any farmer in America has the same opportunities or right. Does my friend from Oklahoma agree with me?

Mr. BOREN. I would say to my friend from Arkansas that I certainly know many farmers—as I am sure he does—who would certainly like to have the same kind of opportunity to obtain credit under the current conditions that they are facing. One of the things that I think we fail to realize is that when a farmer fails to get credit and is pushed all the way to foreclosure on that farm—and there are, tragically, a large number of those foreclosures that are taking place, as my friend from Arkansas well knows, in his own State—not only is that one farmer impacted, but all other farmers are impacted as well by the foreclosure on that farm, because it tends to put more land on the market; it tends to further erode land values; that reduces the equity value of all other farms; that makes it more difficult for all other farmers as well to obtain credit.

I had a very interesting letter I received on February 7 of this year from Mr. Frank Conway, the senior vice president of McClain County National Bank of Purcell, OK. He is writing to me about the very problem that the Senator from Arkansas has brought up in regard to this nomination and the obtaining of credit. He says:

DEAR SENATOR BOREN: I am writing in response to your hearing on Oklahoma agriculture problems. It is my belief that this country cannot survive without agriculture; and mostly agriculture in its present form. I am referring to family type farms and ranches and free enterprise. If the U.S. gets to the point that we cannot feed our Nation and have a surplus to sell, then we are in trouble. I would hate to see our economy continue in its present direction and force the small operator to give up and leave only the large corporates to continue. This could happen if we do not reduce the interest rates, the cost of production and provide better markets for farm products.

Then he says this very interesting thing, and it relates back to what the Senator from Arkansas was questioning me about in regard to credit and the loans obtained by the nominee that we are discussing.

There are no simple answers, but from my own local standpoint, the one thing that would help our farmers and ranchers the most would be lower interest rates; or provide assistance in paying interest due, or both. My point is that lenders are going to be weakened each time that a customer goes through foreclosure. The lenders cannot forgive interest and compete for interest bearing deposits and stay in business. They have to have performing loans to do this.

My suggestion would be for the government to provide money for interest payments, so that customers could stay current on their notes. This does not have to be 100% of the interest, but enough to enable the borrower to avoid past due status and eventual foreclosure. We need this type of assistance more than we need money for new or additional loans. We need performing loans from operations already in existence.

I realize that I have only offered suggestions without solutions; but I do not believe that our state and nation can survive, very long, with a weakened agriculture program that in turn could cause financial failures to numerous lending institutions in agricultural areas. My request to you and everyone involved, would be to keep our established farmers and ranchers in business and keep the family-type operation in existence; whatever it takes.

In other words, it is not only that farmer who is being foreclosed upon, that individual who is suffering a personal tragedy, a great loss. There are some I have talked to who have been on the same farm, in many cases, the third and fourth generations, even, who are now losing all. When that heppens, it also puts additional pressure on that lender. He must find other better performing loans to make up for the losses that are incurred when he has to foreclose upon land. As I say, the equity value of that asset further erodes. So we are impacting the lender's ability to deal with other farms, we are dealing with the equity value being reduced for other farmers. And what happens shortly is this domino effect we have been talking about. This cycle begins to take hold.

That one farmer cannot get credit as other people appear to be able to get credit in our society. He is foreclosed upon, the land is put up for sale, the value of the land goes down, equity for other farmers goes down, the pressure on the bank increases, they cannot carry that farmer because of that situation, other parcels of land are put on the market, that reduces the value of all the other land still there. Before you know it, all the others are in trouble; before you know it, there are fewer customers for Main Street business and that Main Street business as well is foreclosed from getting credit.

I think the Senator from Arkansas is correct in the premise of his question. I think we need to be concerned about the availability of credit on a fair and just basis for all those in our society, whether they happen to be nominees for positions of Attorney General of the United States, members of the White House staff, or those who are attempting to eke out an existence on the farmlands in Oklahoma or any other State.

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, if I am not mistaken, the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma spent the recent recess in his State in agricultural meetings and hearings. I did the same thing. I am of the belief that, as neighboring States, we have some similar problems. We were both Governors at the same time. One of the problems that is not being addressed today with present farm prices, is what is happening to the tax base of the United States? It is being absolutely devastated by the demise of the farmer.

For example, last Friday night my friend and colleague, Mr. BUMPERS, and myself were in Jonesboro, AR. There were 400 chairs set up. It was advertised as a farm crisis meeting. Over 2,000 farmers and businessmen appeared at this particular meeting. Shortly before the meeting started, a farmer from Harrisburg, AR, came to my hotel room and knocked on the door. I was getting ready to go in and speak to the group of farmers and business people. He gave me two cancelled checks. One of those checks was written the 28th day of February 1974—not 1984, 1974. It was written to the State of Arkansas for State income taxes in the amount of $12,757. That was his State income tax for 1973.

He gave me another check payable to the Internal Revenue Service. That check was in the amount of $81,173 for his Federal income tax for the 1973 fiscal year.

I said to my colleague and friend from Oklahoma, that farmer gave me these two cancelled checks and he said:

"Senator PRYOR, in the past 5 years, I have paid not one penny in State or Federal income tax because I have not made a profit."

If we would simply multiply this, I say to my friend from Oklahoma and my colleagues in the Senate, by 60 or 800, or 1,000 farmers—maybe a million farmers today—who are absolutely making no profit whatsoever think of what is occurring. They want to become taxpayers of this country once again.

We are seeing the infrastructure of rural America, the infrastructure of our tax base in 24 rural States, being eroded rapidly by what is happening. This erosion is occurring because the farmer is no longer making a profit. And, today there are hundreds and hundreds and thousands of farmers who are paying no income tax because they simply cannot show enough net profit to have any taxable income.

Once again, Mr. President, they want to pay taxes. They want to be productive. They want a net income to pay taxes from. Until we give them that opportunity, they will remain as individuals in our society who are not paying taxes, and we will see the tax base of our country steadily decline. The infrastructure of this country is at grave risk.

It was described to me, I think, in very simple but lucid terms, when someone said that this country is nothing more than a house that is built upon a foundation. That foundation for 200 years has been agriculture. It has been the rural, the social, the economic fabric of our country that has made this foundation of this house so strong. And, today it is eroding very, very quickly. There is nothing more important before this Senate, or that can come before this Senate than these agricultural issues, certainly not the nomination of Ed Meese to be our Attorney General. There is nothing more important to the Senate today or to this Congress or to this country, whether you live in a rural State or an industrial State, than to look at immediate agricultural credit for the hundreds and thousands of farmers who are waiting desperately on the signs of whether they will have enough money to plant a 1985 crop.

I thank the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. BOREN. I thank the Senator from Arkansas for the point he has made and the questions he has asked me. I say to him only in response to his questions that I agree fully with what he is saying about the improvement that would come to our whole national economy if we could again allow income and cash flow back to the national sector so that whole sector could become participants and taxpayers, paying taxes to the Government.

We have just gone through a very serious session of our own legislature in Oklahoma. We had the experience last year where we had very substantial deficits at the State level, and a very great portion of these deficits can be traced back to the decline in agriculture.

We had testimony in the meeting which I held in Oklahoma City, of which we made an official transcript as a Senate Agriculture Committee hearing, that perhaps 90 percent of all the farmers in my State lost money last year. That means, of course, they are not paying taxes. It means that a large number of their loans become not serviceable.

We said this morning that probably 38 percent of all the agriculture lenders in the country right now are highly leveraged, far beyond what is visible, putting them in the category in which the loans made to them under current regulations could be ended up as nonperforming loans.

If you take 38 percent of $220 billion, you are talking about $90 billion or so, a vast amount of credit that is imperiled right now.

As the Senator from Arkansas knows, those of us who are urging action are not asking for more credit; we are asking for restructuring of the current debt so that we can give the farmers of this country a realistic hope that they can come out from under the debt burden which they now have while we try to structure our long-range answers which will again generate cash flow into the agricultural sector.

A lot of people have asked me whether or not it is in the interest of the United States to maintain the family farm unit and whether or not farmers deserve consideration.

Well, I can only say that we have given consideration to those in need in other countries. The taxpayers of the United States at least indirectly have underwritten loan guarantees for South American countries using the International Monetary Fund. We have underwritten and guaranteed loans and the continued viability of banking institutions in this country, Continental Illinois Bank, for example. And in dealing with the credit in those situations, situations that according to those in the administration cast a cloud over the entire economy, endangering the future of the entire economy, the figures were far below the $90 billion potentially imperiled right now.

It is a strange thing to me that as we have debated over the past 2 or 3 years our policy in Central America there has been a general unanimity of opinion on this floor that it would be helpful if we could have land reform in the Central American countries. There were those in this Senate who wanted to condition any further help to the Government of El Salvador, for example, upon action by that government to bring about land reform. Again and again we heard criticism on this floor that it was not healthy for a society or for a nation to have a dozen families or two dozen corporations own the basic land of that country and control the entire agricultural industry of a nation. Yet we stand by and glorify as the operation of the free market the same kind of trends toward concentration, control, and ownership of land and agricultural production in this country that we have condemned as inappropriate in neighboring nations to our south.

I hear a lot said about the free market. I received a letter yesterday saying, "Why don't you let the farmers compete in the free market? Why are you Senators from agricultural States asking for some kind of treatment for the farmer that will go beyond what the free market would provide?"

Mr. President, the farmers of our Nation would welcome an opportunity to compete in the free market. We are not dealing here with a sector of our economy that is in trouble because of its own inefficiency. We are not dealing with a sector of our economy that is in trouble because it has not kept pace technologically. We are not dealing with a sector of our economy that has failed to keep pace because it has not invested in its means of production. There is not an agricultural producer in the world as efficient or cost effective as the American farmer. There is not a productive unit in agriculture in the world that is as scientifically advanced as our American agricultural units on the average.

There is not an agricultural unit in the world where the average level of capital investment has been as high as the average level of capital investment in the United States. Our farmers would like an opportunity to compete on a level playing field. They would like to be able to sell in the world markets without having other nations, including some European communities, pay export subsidies to their farmers for every bushel of grain that they sell. Our farmers do not run into trouble until they start having to compete with the treasuries of other nations. Our farmers would like to have had a free market in which to compete uninterrupted by Government decisions to impose embargoes which canceled their long-term agreements with other nations, which cast doubt on the reliability of the United States as a trading partner in the agricultural sector. Our farmers would like to have the kind of free market they could control themselves so that they could demonstrate without interruption by our own Government that they are reliable and can be counted upon to fulfill long-term obligations.

But, unfortunately, our farmers have been deprived of those kinds of free market opportunities. Our farmers would like to be able to sell their products based upon a dollar which has an appropriate level of value with other currencies in the world, but they do not have an opportunity to compete on that kind of level playing field.

We have seen every indication of that, for example, in the recent rumored purchase by one of our grain companies of grain from Argentina where the company purported to be able to pay the freight on that grain, bring it into the port of Houston, pay a 21-cent a bushel duty on that grain and then sell below the cost of grain in the United States.

Again, I received some letters from constituents of mine at that time saying, "What is wrong with our farmers? How could they be so inefficient that Argentine farmers could sell us their grain, pay the shipment costs, pay tariffs and duties and still undersell our wheat farmers?"

Well, of course, Mr. President, the person who wrote me the letter did not have the full story. They did not understand that the Argentine currency had devalued almost 90 percent compared to the American dollar in the last year.

When you buy Argentine wheat or products from any other country you first take our dollars and buy their currency to pay them in their own currency. When you can now get twice as many units of Argentine currency for the dollar as you could get just a year ago, you have cut in half the real cost of those products to purchasers in this country. There is not any unit in our economy or in this world anyplace, no matter how efficient it may be, that can long compete under those kinds of conditions. I would call it a free market.

I do not know that there is any other sector of our economy which is selling its product cheaper today than it did 30 years ago while its cost of production, the equipment is uses, and the other inputs in its production have gone up fivefold or tenfold during the same period of time. I do not know that there is another sector in our economy—if there is, I do not know which it is—which has seen its real income, its real standard of living compared to other citizens of this country almost cut in half in the past 35 to 40 years, I do not know that there is another sector of our economy in which the life work of a person can be so immediately impacted by his competitors as is true in agriculture because, as I was saying earlier, let us suppose that the neighboring farm goes out of business. Let us suppose it is a large farm and you have next door to it a small family farm unit that has been operated efficiently and effectively with hard work for three of four generations. Let us suppose you have a farmer on that family farm, who is now 75 years of age, who has labored all his adult life on that farm, has taken almost no cash out of it but plowed it all back by updating his equipment and using the latest technology and science. He has had no real cash benefit from that land, but over time he has had the appreciated value of the land, its market price.

Now as the farm next to him, with large acreage, is forced onto the market by a farmer who is going broke, it causes a 20-percent decrease in land values in that county in which this farm family has worked for four generations.

Through no fault of his own, not because he was not efficient, not because he did not plow back, not because he did not work hard every day of his life, not because he was not careful about every dollar he borrowed, he is wiped out in a very brief period of time—in my example, 20 percent of his life's savings.

I do not know of other units of our economy where ownership is still so widely dispersed, where markets are still so dependent on Government policy, where this kind of immediate negative impact can occur with such speed as is true in agriculture.

So I think that the Senator from Arkansas has quite properly addressed questions to me about why we should be proceeding with this nomination at this time when we should be addressing the crisis we are facing in agriculture.

I say that not with disrespect to this nominee. I can imagine that the weeks and months have moved slowly and he is impatient for us to get on with action on this nomination. I have human sympathy for his feelings. As I have indicated, this is not a personal matter with me. I have every intention, unless something totally unforeseen comes out in this debate that I have not yet heard, to vote for the confirmation of this nomination.

However, in conscience, I simply cannot allow us to conduct business as usual on the floor of the U.S. Senate, pretending that all is right with the world, when I see a crisis sweeping across rural America that is not being addressed adequately; when the restructuring of existing debt that is badly needed is not going forward; when we are endangering not only the farm community itself but also the financial institutions which have provided the credit that has made the existence of that sector possible over the last several years, and the rural communities and the small businesses of all kinds and professional practices of all kinds that rest upon the well-being and continued well-being and continued existence of the agricultural sector.

I could not feel that I would have done my duty as a Member of this body if I had not tried, during these nomination proceedings, to alert my colleagues to what I think is the real danger to the rest of the economy of this country, if we allow a rapid deescalation in land values, the basic unit of our entire economy, in a way that will undoubtedly have an impact, a potentially devastating impact, on the entire economy of this country.

So I can only say to my friend from Arkansas that it is because I share the feelings he has expressed in his questions to me that I feel it is imperative that we continue to talk. As I have said, I look forward, if necessary, to sharing the contents of the special prosecutor's report and investigation, word by word, with my colleagues, and of course many other additional words in relation to the agricultural crisis, as well as words bearing upon the background study of this nominee for office, until we find out whether or not there will be a sufficient response from the administration to this crisis.

I do not want to go back to my home State 1 year from now or 2 years from now, or anyplace else. I do not want to go to New York City. I do not want to go into the heart of Los Angeles, or to have to meet with the auto workers whom the Senator from Michigan [Mr. LEVIN] described yesterday, and say to them that I stood by and did not raise my voice and did not do everything that was humanly possible for me to do in order to alert my country to the danger it faces; that I did not explain that agriculture generates, directly and indirectly, 20 percent of the jobs in this country; that I did not explain that they are the largest single customer of those auto workers in Detroit today; that I did not explain how the marketplace had its impact in 1929, and the financial institutions as they were impacted in the late 1920's and early 1930's by the collapse of American agriculture, the collapse of land values that began the collapse of rural banks, which spilled over to correspondent banks used by them—that I did not do everything I could to avert that.

I want to be able to say that I did everything I could. I hope I will be able to report that we had action, that we had an effective response from the administration, which realized that these are real problems, that these are not impersonal statistics, that human tragedies are occurring, and tragedies that are going to impact on the economic well-being of all of us before we are through.

Mr. President, the ball is now in the court of the administration. There is no reason why we cannot proceed later this afternoon to vote on this particular nomination. All we need is an assurance that an effective package—we have presented 14 proposed parts of an effective package to the majority leader and to the administration—will be put together. We have even made it clear that we do not insist on each and every one of these 14 points worded exactly as we have given it to them. We must have an effective package—not to satisfy me, not to satisfy the Senator from Arkansas, but to meet the pressing need we now face in the American economy.

So the ball is in their court. If we can be assured of a time certain at which we can vote on an effective package, I see no reason why we cannot proceed with other business. But until we do, I think we would all be derelict in our duty as Members of the Senate, as those concerned about the welfare of our entire country, if we did not continue with our effort to alert our colleagues and those who work in the administration to the nature of the threat we are now facing. I certainly have that intention, and I know that is an intention shared widely by many other Members of the Senate.

It is in our hands and the hands of others now pondering our proposals, as to whether we will be able to proceed with other business, including this nomination. It is their responsibility at this point to deal with the emergency economic situation. We have given our good-faith suggestions, and we await an answer as to whether or not they are willing to consider them or make suggestions of their own which will be effective in meeting this crisis.

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BOREN. I yield to the Senator for a question, with the understanding that I do not lose my right to the floor and that it not constitute another speech in this calendar day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Oklahoma has very eloquently painted a picture today of how the trade policy of this country is affecting our agricultural dilemma.

The Senator, who is on the Senate Agriculture Committee with me and others, received, back in December, a publication published by the Senate Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry. This report, as the Senator well knows, was entitled "Trade Policy Prospectives: Setting the Stage for the 1985 Agriculture Legislation."

I think this report is probably one of the most alarming reports I have had the opportunity to read in recent years as a Member of this body. It states that export subsidies are an unfortunate part of today's agricultural trade picture. Foreign government assistance to production, processing, and exports is faced by U.S. exporters of almost all agricultural products.

For example, let me just mention to my friend from Oklahoma who has brought up the subject, the issue, and the problems of our whole trade policy and let us look at a few of the subsidies given by countries that our farmers are directly competing with.

Our farmers today are not asked to directly compete with their neighbors in poultry, rice, soybeans, cotton, and wheat. Nor are they asked to compete directly with farmers in other countries. We are asking our farmers as a policy to compete directly with foreign governments.

I think that this study points out the enormous subsidy given; for example, to poultry producers in Brazil and in the EEC countries, sometimes as high as $400 per metric ton for broilers; also subsidies given to Italian rice producers in excess of $200 per metric ton; Japanese rice producers as high as $1,000 per metric ton; the Taiwan rice producer roughly in the neighborhood of $450 per metric ton.

I know when we talk about trade, when we talk about subsidies, the Senator from Arkansas knows full well what we are up against because every time we talk about trade we hear the response, "Well, we all want to be free traders, we are a free trade country, and that is our policy."

Mr. President, if anyone thinks that our farmers today have free trade, he has another thought coming. Some people don't want to do anything or we might enter into a trade war, my response and the response of the farmers of this country is we are in a trade war at this moment. Not only are we losing that trade war at this moment, but we do not even have a gun that is loaded, and we are losing that trade war without ever having fired one shot. We are losing a trade war. The farmers are losing a trade war. Our exporters are losing a trade war.

Mr. President, it baffles me beyond imagination to still hear people say, "Well, let us not start a trade war."

The bottom line is we are in that trade war. We are losing that trade war today, and we have yet to fire the first shot.

I wish to say that the very distinguished junior Senator from the State of Michigan [Mr. LEVIN] today was in the Chamber, and I can say, Mr. President, to my colleagues that Senator LEVIN's statement—I yield to my distinguished Senator.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I might yield at this point to the Senator from Arkansas without my yielding constituting a speech for the purposes of devising the number of speeches I made on the floor during this calendar day and that when I resume the floor later it still be considered to be part of my first speech for this calendar day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PRYOR. This morning the Senator from Michigan, Senator LEVIN, eloquently expressed what the farmers of our rural State and the citizens of our rural State have been waiting to hear. That is a recognition of the importance of the crisis in rural America by someone who represents a State with relatively little agricultural production; and more importantly, how it affects his own constituency and the infrastructure of this great country of ours.

I applaud Senator LEVIN for his eloquence in his statement and his sympathy toward the problem that we are facing today because that great Senator from Michigan certainly recognizes the fact that if the farmers do not survive they do not buy trucks, they do not buy tractors, they do not buy cars, and this is going to have a domino effect throughout the entire country.

Mr. President, to members of the groups that I had the opportunity to visit with last week while in my home State touring the agricultural sector, I also had the opportunity to mention this to them. I said:

> Fellows, I am not sure you are going to drive your tractors back to Washington or not. I do not know whether you are coming back. I am not saying I advise you to get on your tractors and come back to Washington or not. That is your business.

But, I did say this:

> If you do get on your tractor, and if you do come back to Washington, bring your banker with you because the banker today is in the soup.

The small rural banker, of which 6 percent are on what they call the trouble list, that banker today is part of the financial infrastructure of our great country and is in almost as much danger today of extinction and going out of business as many of our farmers.

We see a new coalition in America of farmers and bankers and small business people who are joining together to come forward and try to make ends meet out of a catastrophic agricultural policy that is going to mean the demise of the infrastructure of our entire country.

A great concern I have sensed over the past several days and weeks, Mr. President, is one that was brought to my attention when I was back home in the State of Arkansas. I believe that my very distinguished friend from Oklahoma [Mr. BOREN], my very good friend, Mr. EXON, from Nebraska, would both agree with me on this. It is a rough accusation, but I believe, Mr. President that today it is the unstated policy of the Farmers Home Administration in Washington to delay giving borrowers a decision. At the State and local levels, in the district levels they are probably unaware of it. I do not think they are going to tell them "No." I think they are going to say to that farmer: "Well, you come back. We cannot talk to you until March 26. You come back and bring all of your information and we will visit with you about your problem." And then March 26 is going to come and that farmer and his wife, and probably their children, are going to walk in there and they are going to talk about their farm problem; they have to have this money to plant that crop,

And, the Farmers Home Administration is never going to give them a final answer. They are going to say: "Well, you have to go back and get some more information from your CPA, you have to get some information from your bank, you have to get some more information from the ASCS office or some other farm-oriented agency or organization."

One, I think it is the policy to bury and innundate the farmers in redtape.

Two, I think it is the policy for them to by benign neglect, ultimately be saying to that farmer that some of you will go out of business, and we are going to frustrate you to death, and finally hopefully you will just walk off from that farm and we will put it on the auction block.

I hope that is not the policy of our country. I hope that is not the policy of the Farmers Home Administration.

Finally, Mr. President, we should send David Stockman a bouquet because it was his statement which I think became the catalyst or the lightning rod whereby the farmers, bankers, and small businesses of this country united with a common concern and a common goal. That goal is to reject the philosophy that 25 or 30 percent of our whole economic agricultural structure should be allowed to go down the drain.

I think that it is very sad he made that statement. The saddest part about it is that that statement seemingly represents not just the statement of a man named David Stockman. It represents the philosophy of government, it represents the philosophy of this administration and a policy of this administration with regard to thousands and thousands of farmers.

Finally, when Mr. Stockman said, or implied, that the farmers were inefficient, implied that the farmers had gone out there to capitalize and to make a lot of money on land speculation during an inflationary period, I received a letter from a farmer in Montrose, AR, dated February 13. This letter was from a man named Duane Massey, Post Office Box 387, Montrose, AR.

I am not going to read all of his letter, but I would like to read a paragraph or two from this farmer from south Arkansas. He gave me permission to do so. He talked about what Mr. Stockman had said in the earlier part of his letter, then he said:

"Conservation" is a key word in our "farming vocabulary".

Our latest model tractor was purchased when it was 4 years old, and is now 6 years old. Our main tractors range from 6 years old with nearly 4,000 hours on it, to 13 years old with nearly 8,000 hours on it.

Our combine is 12 years old. We have two cotton pickers, one 17 and the other 18 years old.

We have three grain trucks, ranging from 21 years to 35 years old, on which I, personally, built the grain beds. I have owned some of these trucks for over 20 years.

Our family car is eight years old and has 130,000 miles on it. Our farm pick-up is 7 years old and has 150,000 on it.

My wife works off the farm, and her income supplements our living expenses, so most of our farm expenses go directly into crop production. Yet, our 1984 crop did not pay even those expenses, much less, leave any margin of profit that might enable us to make a payment on even one of the items mentioned above, that are in such bad need of replacement.

I do not think all of our farmers are inefficient and I certainly do not think all of our farmers out there should be described as land speculators who try to make profits during an inflationary period from the rising cost of land.

Mr. President, as I conclude my statement, I wish to simply say once again and reiterate, as I did when I got up, that there is no matter more pressing before the Congress and before the country than reaching out and solving this problem—no longer talking about the problem, but solving and finding a solution to it.

Mr. President, I think we can do it. I reiterate that I am very hopeful we can postpone the nomination process of Mr. Meese because I think that ranks way down the line in importance and priority compared to the farm crisis that we face.

I see my very distinguished friend from Nebraska, Senator EXON, on the floor. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. EXON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. LEVIN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. COHEN). The Senator from Michigan.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, it is far more urgent that we set a prompt timetable to legislatively address the agricultural crisis than it is to resolve the Meese confirmation. But the Meese confirmation being the pending business, I wanted to address a few remarks this afternoon to that nomination.

Mr. President, I cannot vote to confirm the nomination of Edwin Meese to be Attorney General of the United States.

Eleven times the Senate has rejected nominees for Cabinet-level positions, and in three instances it involved the position of Attorney General of the United States. I suspect that is because the position of Attorney General may well be considered the post next most important to that of the President. The Attorney General, as the chief law enforcement officer of the Nation, is in essence the lawyer for the Government, and since in our country the Government is of, by and for the people, the Attorney General is the lawyer for the people.

The Office of Attorney General was created by the Judiciary Act of 1789, and according to the act itself, the only statutory qualification a nominee for the position must have is that he or she be "a meet person, learned in the law." Meet is a rather archaic word now, but it means fit or proper. Mr. President, Edwin Meese does not fit that description.

In a way, we have been fortunate with this nomination. Because of the unusual number of allegations made against Mr. Meese during his tenure as chief of staff for the President, we have had the benefit of a 385-page report by Independent Counsel Jacob Stein, cataloging and detailing the factual bases behind approximately a dozen different allegations of misconduct. We have an unusually indepth picture of just how Mr. Meese conducts his personal and professional affairs. We should use this information, since we have it, to make the most informed judgment possible about Mr. Meese. We should read the facts and draw our own conclusions about his nature, his instincts, his sensitivities, his fitness for the job of Attorney General.

I have done that. I have reviewed the Stein report, and have followed the hearings before the Judiciary Committee. I have analyzed the conclusions of the Office of Government Ethics. Based on the results of this process, I find serious fault with Mr. Meese's fitness for the following reasons.

Mr. Meese is insensitive to protecting the public trust in Government.

Mr. Meese avoids accepting responsibility for his conduct by reaching for excuses to justify earlier actions.

Mr. Meese is reluctant and evasive in disclosing the truth both to Congress and the public.

Mr. Meese has a pattern of selective memory that neatly protects him from embarrassing or implicating himself.

In short, Mr. Meese reveals and does only that which is the very minimum necessary to get by. And that, Mr. President, is insufficient to get this Senator's vote for his confirmation. Let me explain in greater detail.

INSENSITIVITY TO PROTECTING THE PUBLIC TRUST

First let us look at Mr. Meese's concern for protecting the public's trust in its government. Executive Order 11222 opens with the following statement of policy, and indeed, it is an excellent one:

Where government is based on the consent of the governed, every citizen is entitled to have complete confidence in the integrity of his government. Each individual officer, employee, or adviser of government must help to earn and must honor that trust by his own integrity and conduct in all official actions.

Mr. Meese has demonstrated a fundamental insensitivity to that concern. First, he failed to disclose his personal involvement or recuse himself, in the appointment of John McKean to the Postal Board of Governors when he had received, through Mr. McKean, $60,000 in loans to cover his personal debts and finances. Just picture one of us in that situtation. You are in a meeting with three or four of the other top Presidential advisers, to go over a number of selections for Presidential appointment. According to Mr. Meese, your role is to exercise a veto over anyone the group disapproves of—meaning, the name has to get through this group before it can get to the President. The name of McKean comes up. You are asked for your opinion.

Would you not feel obligated to at least explain your financial relationship with Mr. McKean at that time? It is such an obvious instinct, but one that Mr. Meese did not have. Not only that, but Mr. Meese also received a memo from McKean, in preparation for a meeting the two of them had, and two items listed for discussion at that meeting were interest arrangements for the outstanding loans made through McKean, and McKean's interest in obtaining a permanent appointment to his Federal position on the Postal Board of Governors. Should you not have another person present at that meeting, if you have it at all? Should you not recuse yourself from consideration of the permanent appointment? Would not lights go off in your head signaling the possibility that the relationship between those two agenda items could look bad? Not for Ed Meese. First, he does not recall seeing the memo, but second, in his testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee, he baldly asserts—that "I honestly believe to an objective person, I did not create an appearance of impropriety." Even the timid Office of Government Ethics found an appearance of impropriety in the McKean matter.

There has been a lot of discussion as to the actual facts surrounding the loans—that they were not made, in fact, with McKean's money, but with money from his company; that they were made at prevailing market rates; that Mr. Meese maintains he always knew it was not McKean's money, even though that is not what he wrote on his disclosure form. On the issue of an actual conflict of interest, those factors may or may not be relevant. But clearly revelant here is that Mr. Meese displayed insensitivity to the appearance of a conflict of interest, and in so doing, an insensitivity to guarding the public's trust in the operations of our Government.

Second, Mr. Meese followed the same pattern with regard to the appointment of Thomas Barrack to be an Assistant Secretary of Commerce. He neither recused himself nor disclosed his personal involvement with Mr. Barrack when Barrack's name came before the Senior Personnel Committee for approval. Mr. Meese's involvement with Mr. Barrack pertained to the sale of his California home. Mr. Meese had failed to sell his house for over a year and a half and consequently was carrying the burden of two mortgages for that period of time on two very expensive houses. Mr. Barrack found a buyer for Mr. Meese within 2 to 3 weeks of being asked for help. And, Mr. Barrack did not ask for nor was he paid a real estate commission or a finder's fee. Yet Mr. Meese disclosed none of this to his colleagues on the Personnel Committee.

Third, Mr. Meese accepted and has retained his promotion to colonel in the Army Reserve despite the fact that he knows but for his illegal transfer from Retired to Active Reserve, such a promotion could not have been possible. There were actually two issues of concern here. First, the Army unlawfully placed Mr. Meese on Active Reserve and, shortly thereafter put into place action on his possible promotion. The Army Inspector General determined that Mr. Meese was not eligible at that time for placement in the Active Reserve and that the Army had actually violated its own regulations. Subsequent to that action, however, Mr. Meese's promotional opportunity arose, but such a promotion at the time it was sought was determined by Army superiors to require special treatment and therefore cautioned against it. The promotion itself, apparently, did not violate Army regulations—there is discretion in this area within the Army Reserve—but it certainly required special treatment and unusually swift action. Despite the cautions, however, the Army granted the promotion.

Now, upon hearing about this situation and the difficulties involved, and even assuming Mr. Meese heard about this after the fact—and that is open to question—Mr. Meese has taken no step to try to rectify the situation. He has accepted and retains the promotion—a promotion that, again, but for the illegal reinstatement to active duty, he would not be allowed to have—a promotion that despite the illegal reinstatement, was granted through the exercise of special treatment. He has without any qualms accepted and retained the fruits of an illegal action.

Fourth, Mr. Meese failed to disclose a $15,000 loan made to him and Mrs. Meese, because, he said, it was not the kind of thing he thought he had to disclose. He was wrong. Likewise, he did not disclose the stock he purchased with the loan money, because, he says, he forgot about that.

Finally, in an off-hand remark made before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Mr. Meese probably most accurately described his near contempt for the need to avoid the appearance of conflicts of interest or ethical misconduct. You will remember that the transition trust paid $10,000 to Mr. Meese as moving expenses but upon determining such reimbursement to be of dubious legality, the trust records were changed to reflect the payment as consulting fees. When asked if he should have handled the payment to himself of the $10,000 from the transition trust differently, Mr. Meese said, "Well, Senator, perhaps today I would go through that rigmarole to avoid even Common Cause finding anything to question." That "rigmarole" was the return of funds improperly paid him for moving expenses, submitting a bill for consulting fees, and then receiving appropriate payment for the consulting fees. What most people call ethical care and sensitivity, Mr. Meese labels "rigmarole."

In short, Mr. President, Mr. Meese has shown himself to be a careless man when it comes to concern for the public's trust in its Government. He could have taken small steps that would have helped to dispel suspicion of favored treatment, but Mr. Meese failed to have even the sensitivity to identify the ethically dubious situation. As he said to the Judiciary Committee relative to the McKean nomination, "the appearance problem never crossed my mind at all." Mr. President, I believe that.

EXCUSES

Second, Mr. Meese avoids accepting responsibility for his past conduct by reaching for excuses to justify earlier actions. This is one of the most disconcerting aspects of this nominee. He is a man of excuses—and to find his excuses, he searches the subtlety of the record religiously. He will do almost anything to avoid admitting what might be the true nature of a situation if it will place him in an unfavorable light. Let me give several examples.

First. The question was raised at the Judiciary Committee hearing about the propriety of his nomination to be Attorney General in light of his political connections to the President. The Watergate special prosecutor's report had expressed serious reservations about placing anyone too close politically to the President in the position of Attorney General, and many Members of the Senate have expressed their sympathy for such a concern. When asked how he felt about this situation, what did Mr. Meese say? Did he admit that his connections to the 1980 campaign of the President were intimate and that indeed he was one of the principal campaign advisers but that he disagreed with the recommendation of the Watergate report for various reasons? No. Mr. Meese looked for the excuse, and found it in this answer: Paraphrasing his words, he said, "I wasn't the campaign manager or finance director, which are the positions the Watergate report refers to. I was just the deputy campaign manager involved only in issues and policy and not in handing out political favors or dealing with the various political interest groups." He said, and this is an exact quotation: "I was not a chief political adviser." Now I find that extremely hard to accept. In order to avoid the intent of the recommendation by the Watergate report and the Senators who support the recommendations of the people, Mr. Meese looked for the angle that he could use to wiggle out of an otherwise difficult situation.

Second. Mr. Meese was questioned at some length by the Judiciary Committee about his relationship to Thomas Barrack and the sale of his La Mesa home. Let's set the scene based on the facts and findings contained in the Stein report. The Meeses had not been able to find a buyer for their home for over a year and a half. They were carrying two very large first mortgages, as well as a second and a third on one of the houses. They were not able to meet those obligations and were, in short, financially strapped. They were anxious to sell their home—anxious enough to mention it to Pendleton James at a family barbecue on August 8, 1982. It was so important, in fact, that that very night at the barbecue, James called Barrack, a California real estate man, and asked for his assistance in helping the Meeses to sell their house. Barrack agreed to help and found a buyer and closed on the house in less than 1 month.

When Mr. and Mrs. Meese were to meet Mr. Barrack for the first time at a dinner meeting at a Georgetown restaurant and wondered how they would recognize their patron who did them such a favor without ever meeting them, Mrs. Meese said. "Oh, we'll recognize him. He'll be the one with the halo around his head."

Now that is all fact. It is in the Stein report and it bears on the question whether or not Mr. Meese created an appearance of a conflict of interest in supporting Mr. Barrack's appointment: Did Mr. Barrack do anything of value for Mr. Meese up to the time of his appointment? I think anyone in this Chamber would agree that selling a house that had been on the market for over a year and a half, without a commission or finder's fee was providing something of value. Mrs. Meese certainly saw it that way. But what does Mr. Meese say at the Judiciary Committee hearing on the subject, when it was beneficial to him to downplay the role Mr. Barrack had in his financial dealings? The following exchange with Senator SPECTER occured:

Senator SPECTER. Has anybody contended, Mr. Meese, that you knew about the financial involvement of Mr. Barrack—and you have testified that you found out about it first in 1984—has anybody made any suggestion to the contrary?

Mr. MEESE. Not that I know of, Senator, other than an implication in the so-called Common Cause report.

Senator SPECTOR. And what is the nature of that implication?

Mr. MEESE. The implication was that somehow, he had been helpful to me in this sale. And of course, that is refuted by the facts, other than what is described as the inconsequential assistance in finding a buyer.

"Inconsequential assistance." Do we really think that is how Mr. Meese felt at the time the house sale went through? Could that be how he felt when he was being hounded by his creditors, in large part, because he was still carrying the burden of a second house? Is that why the second most powerful person of the land had dinner with a person he had never met? Barrack was the Meeses' benefactor, in every sense of the word, so much so that Mrs. Meese said they would recognize him by his halo.

Third. A third example. Why did not Mr. Meese offer to give up his promotion in the Army Reserve when he found out about all the difficulties and concerns people had with it and that it was based on an illegal reinstatement to active duty? Here is his excuse—it was the Army's fault. The following exchange took place between Mr. Meese and Senator DECONCINI on this subject:

Senator DECONCINI. How do you feel about having that commission? Does that trouble you?

Mr. MEESE. Senator, it doesn't trouble me in this sense. I was fully qualified by the constructive credit for the promotion, and the Army made the decisions, and I felt I had done everything possible to preclude any kind of special treatment, or any misappropriation of the regulations. In retrospect, what I feel is that if I was—if the proper regulations were not followed, all of the Army redtape and technicalities was not followed in returning me to active status, the fact that I was returned to active status, operated on active status, went on active duty for several days during the period of time, that effectively, any irregularities were waived by the Army, and I was properly promoted.

Senator DECONCINI. And you don't feel any obligation about receiving that, even now that you know that there was applicable laws, regulations, administrative procedures that were misapplied, violated, or ignored?

Mr. MEESE. Well, as the Inspector-General pointed out, when he conducted an investigation of this matter, I believe in 1983, all of these things could have been corrected by the paperwork within the Army, and the fact that they were not, and the Inspector-General's report was reviewed by the Secretary of the Army, they were the ones that decided that no further action should be taken, and that the promotion should be allowed to continue.

"Any irregularities were waived by the Army," he says. "The Army made the decisions." "They were the ones that decided that no further action should be taken and that the promotion should be allowed to continue." In short, so long as it was the Army's illegality, and since they haven't seen fit to correct it, Mr. Meese doesn't feel obligated to offer to correct it either. It is not my fault, says Mr. Meese; it is the Army's, and he just happens to be the beneficiary of it.

Fourth. At the Judiciary Committee hearing, Senator METZENBAUM asked Mr. Meese some questions about an article that appeared in the Washington Post on June 2, 1984, in which a lawyer for Mr. Meese was quoted as saying, "Ed Meese had no knowledge of this under any circumstances" regarding who actually altered the checks for the transition trust from "moving expenses" to "consulting fees." Did Mr. Meese take the error head on and explain just why his attorney said that—like maybe his attorney didn't know all of the details of Mr. Meese's involvement with the transition trust? No, Mr. Meese searches for the excuse, and he finds it in this exchange with Senator METZENBAUM:

Senator METZENBAUM. Now, isn't that statement (in the Washington Post article) false?

Mr MEESE. Not to my knowledge, Senator. I don't know who did the actual work of correcting the records. I talked to someone—I believe it was Ms. von Damm—but I don't know whether it was her, the bookkeeper or who else may have had the technical responsibility of correcting the records.

Senator METZENBAUM. But (Mr. Wallach) made the statement that Ed Meese has no knowledge of that at all under any circumstances. Do you think that statement is correct?

Mr. MEESE. I think it is, because I don't know who did the actual job.

Mr. Meese had previously testified that he believed he told Helen von Damm to change the records, but now he says that, technically, his attorney was correct, because he did not have any knowledge of exactly who it was who took pen in hand and actually changed the records. So he says that the statement by his attorney is true, having found the technical excuse, because he does not know who did the "actual job."

EVASIVENESS

That incident also exemplifies the third point I want to elaborate on about Mr. Meese—that he is reluctant and evasive in disclosing the truth both to the Congress and the public. He is far from candid and forthright. He says and acknowledges only that which he is forced to acknowledge, and even then it is done only begrudgingly.

For instance, during the first set of hearings by the Senate Judiciary Committee, I asked Mr. Meese, for the record, to:

Please state what personal knowledge (he had) relative to the President Carter's papers being physically available to the Reagan campaign.

He replied to that question as follows:

I have no knowledge of any effort by the 1980 Reagan-Bush Presidential campaign, or anybody associated with that campaign, to obtain from the Carter administration, or the 1980 Carter-Mondale Presidential campaign, any private material or information.

While it may or may not be helpful to know that Mr. Meese was not aware of any effort to obtain Carter campaign or White House materials, that was not responsive to the question I had asked him. I had asked him if he had any personal knowledge of Carter campaign or White House materials being present in the Reagan campaign. So I tried again. On March 9, 1984, I wrote to Mr. Meese, stating that his reply to my question had been nonresponsive. I asked him again to answer my earlier question specifically and in full. Mr. Meese never answered that letter. On March 25, 1984, a New York Times reporter asked Mr. Meese a similar question. The reporter wrote:

(H)e (Meese) was silent for a few moments and then said, I had no knowledge of any effort to obtain them. (Emphasis added.)

Because Mr. Meese's nomination was in question during the pendency of the Stein investigation, I withheld pursuing the matter further at that time, until it became apparent that Mr. Meese's name would again be submitted to the Senate for approval. When that became clear, I wrote to Mr. Meese again. In a letter dated December 21, 1984, I asked Mr. Meese to state whether or not he remembered seeing eight specific documents from the 1980 Presidential campaign, and I restated my earlier question.

Did you during the 1980 Presidential campaign believe, or have any knowledge, that copies of nonpublic documents from the White House or the Carter campaign were physically available to, or in the possession of, the Reagan campaign?

Mr. Meese answered that letter on January 23, 1985. He said he did not remember seeing any of the eight documents I listed and he stated:

To the best of my recollection, during the 1980 Presidential campaign I did not believe or have any knowledge that copies of nonpublic documents that had been improperly obtained (emphasis added) from the White House or the Carter campaign were physically available to or in the possession of the Reagan campaign.

Again, Mr. Meese evaded my clear question. I did not ask whether Mr. Meese had known about nonpublic Carter documents being improperly obtained. I asked if he knew if nonpublic Carter documents were in the Reagan campaign, period, however they had been obtained.

Senator LEAHY, on my behalf, posed these questions a final time at the Judiciary Committee hearing. Mr. Meese finally answered. When Senator LEAHY asked Mr. Meese why he had failed to answer these questions previously, Mr. Meese said he had tried to be precise in his writing to a Senator, and it was hard for him to understand just what was being asked. Besides being another excuse, it is an excuse I have a hard time believing. The letters were clear, so clear, in fact, that I believe Mr. Meese had to actually work at avoiding the intent of the question. Mr. Meese was simply trying to provide me with as little information as possible. I can conclude nothing other than that, since the question was so clear and the answers so misdirected or qualified.

As another example of this evasiveness, look at how Mr. Meese answered questions posed to him before the Judiciary Committee on the issue of attorney fees for the investigation by the independent counsel. He was asked if he is contractually obligated to pay the full amount of some $700,000. He stated, unequivocally, "yes" and referred the committee to a written contract dated June 1984. Upon further discussion, however, Mr. Meese stated that the attorneys will accept the amount set by the court and will waive the balance in a full and complete settlement of the fees. In other words, Mr. Meese will not have to pay the entire $700,000. This decision by Mr. Meese demonstrates the ethical shortcuts Mr. Meese commonly takes. The law governing the independent counsel states that the subject of an investigation can have attorney fees "reimbursed"—and I emphasize that word—if he has not been indicted and only for the amount he incurred solely because of the independent counsel investigation. Use of the terms "reimbursed" and "incurred" implies, and I expect the court to so hold, that Mr. Meese would actually have to have paid out those sums of money. Thus, Mr. Meese must state publicly that he is indeed liable for the whole sum. But, the truth of the matter is, that he isn't liable for the whole sum if the court reimburses him for a lesser amount. Mr. Meese, here, wants the facts both ways. He wants the court to interpret his liability as being for the full amount of the $700,000, while at the same time he has an agreement with his attorneys that they will accept whatever the court assesses. That is the kind of ethical corner cutting that exemplifies the Meese style.

Third, when Mr. Meese was asked why he had not included the Biotech stock on his disclosure form—that is, the stock he purchased with the $15,000 loan from Edwin Thomas—he searched for an excuse and stated that he did not have any records of the stock at that time, because the stock was held by the brokerage firm. "I never had it," he said.

Now, that is one of the weaker excuses—so weak, in fact, that it leads me to believe that he is simply evading the truth. Maybe the truth is that he just forgot about it. To some extent, I can accept that. But to use the excuse that he forget it because the stocks were in the hands of the brokerage firm is to strain credulity.

That excuse forces us to assume that Mr. Meese does not keep any list of his stocks separate from the stock certificates themselves or that he does not even keep the receipts of the records from the brokerage company to help him, in case he does not maintain a list, to remember just what is being held in his account.

The most basic home economic skills require such a list or a file, and, as I said earlier, it seriously stretches Mr. Meese's credibility when he proposes an excuse such as this one.

Mr. President, I notice that the Senator from Nebraska is on the floor.

I have been waiting for quite a time, as the Chair knows, for an answer from the Office of Government Ethics to a letter I wrote them some time ago. That letter was due a number of days ago, and finally it was due this morning at 11 o'clock. It came in the middle of the afternoon, and we have not had the time to review it. I will cover that particular issue of that report and Mr. Meese's selective memory at a later time.

At this time the Senator from Nebraska is on the floor, and I yield the floor.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with my distinguished colleague from Arkansas and before him my colleague from Oklahoma in discussing the serious matter with regard to the farmers and ranchers and, I emphasize and underline, small business people in rural America U.S.A. that are in extreme stress today. That is why, although the Meese nomination is before the U.S. Senate, we hope that we can recognize that there are other matters far, far more important to the economy of these United States than the confirmation of Mr. Meese.

Indeed, I have some questions as to whether or not, as Attorney General of the United States, Mr. Meese would be a strong advocate protecting the antitrust laws that are designed to protect some of the farmers of this country, the co-ops of this country, and whether or not Mr. Meese, as Attorney General, would indeed understand the critical relationship that is necessary in this country for a sound farm economy, coupled with sound farm programs and concern—and I emphasize the word "concern"—on the part of those in high public office.

Certainly, in this case, Mr. Meese is moving from the right-hand man of the President of the United States to the top man in the Department of Justice that does have a key role to play with regard not only to mergers, which the distinguished Senator from South Carolina just addresses, but a whole host of other things that directly affect farmers in rural States like mine of Nebraska.

Mr. President, yesterday many of us who serve our States in this distinguished body met together to discuss a critical problem which is permeating rural America and threatening the very structure of our family-based agriculture producers. Indeed, Mr. President, if the direction and the course of family-sized agriculture is not corrected, we are in the process of tearing apart the very fabric—tearing apart the very fabric, Mr. President—of rural America, not only its economic well-being, but the way of life that is an important part of the United States of America.

While each story we told each other yesterday when we met had a different cast of characters, the themes running through each story were similar. That similarity was the fact that our farmers and ranchers are in deep financial trouble and they are crying out for some reasonable help.

No, our farmers and ranchers and small businessmen do not want a handout. All they want is a fair chance.

The plight of the family agriculture unit has dominated much of the news during the recent months as the picture grew bleaker and bleaker as economic recovery skipped over this part of our society.

Battling a second year of uncooperative weather, declining farmland values, crop and livestock prices that allowed little to no return on investment, production costs that have risen twice as fast as prices received for farm products, and more difficult borrowing barriers, the farm and ranch operators—and their brothers and sisters on Main Street USA, and small businesses—are being tested as much as any time since the Great Depression.

In the first 8 months of 1984 in Nebraska alone, twice as many farmers and ranchers went into some form of bankruptcy as in the same period in 1983. An economist for the Federal Reserve Bank of Kansas City indicated that midwestern farmers are facing more financial stress than at any time since before World War II.

Yet, we heard the President, President Reagan, in his State of the Union Message a few days ago—and, yet, we see the President and his administration continuing to gloss over a raging economic fire storm.

Either he does not know, or care, or both about a major economic catastrophe happening now.

Wednesday night, our President delivered his State of the Union Address to the American people. It was a speech full of optimism and hope which all applauded and share to a considerable degree, yet there are serious problems in some areas of our economy including agriculture. Many have been exposed to different viewpoints about these problems—everything from movies like "Country" and "The River," depicting hard-working farm families struggling to survive, to urgent comments by administration spokesman David Stockman, which would drive farmers from the land, have been the other side of that explanation. I simply say that we appeal again for the President's active support and help right now when it is needed the most.

Let's get to the heart of this controversy. We accomplish nothing by pitting one group of Americans against another, by dividing to conquer. The problems in agriculture are national and not just temporary. These difficulties did not arise out of greed or massive speculation by family-sized farmers. The causes are tragically simple, low prices, high production costs, and mismanaged Government policies that among other factors have destroyed international markets.

Ten years ago, wheat sold for $5.25 per bushel—today, it sells for only $3.46. In contrast, we all know that prices for almost every other item produced by American workers such as homes and automobiles have skyrocketed over the same 10-year period. While the price of a loaf of bread has risen by 38 percent over the last decade, the farmer's return on that same loaf of bread has actually declined by 20 percent.

Unlike the situation facing most Americans, the value of agricultural land has dropped dramatically, in many instances 50 percent or more—eating away at the mortgage value farmers use to get operational loans.

Agriculture is unlike any other business. Farmers and ranchers have only limited influence over the marketplace. Consumers oftentimes fail to understand that only 28 cents of each dollar spent for food goes to the farmer. Food packaging alone now costs $24 billion a year. That is $2 billion more than total net farm income. Yes. We can agree that food—basic food—is cheap by any measurement.

Right now in rural America banks and small businesses are closing at a near-record rate. Farmers—farmers of all people—are having to organize food banks to feed their families during this agricultural depression.

Our food exports are dwindling due primarily to the record-high value of the U.S. dollar and unfair subsidies by foreign governments to their food producers.

Last year, European farmers received an average of $4.74 for producing a bushel of wheat—$1.10 more than American farmers. Likewise, European farmers also received $1.17 more than our farmers for producing a bushel of corn. Foreign governments, through high subsidies and import barriers, have devastated our farmers' chances of competing fairly in the international marketplace.

The President is absolutely correct in his call for reducing Federal expenditures and not increasing taxes to attack the budget deficit. Agriculture will take its fair share of the necessary cuts.

We must not systematically dismantle the structure of American agriculture or rip apart the basic social fabric of rural America. We have all grown accustomed to having plenty of food available at a reasonable price. But if the medium-sized farmers are driven out of business, we will be left with nothing but large corporate farm operations. That would mean a concentration of corporate power and monopoly prices, and no longer will housewives, and consumers of the United States only spend 28 cents of each dollar at the grocery store that would go exclusively to the producers of that food.

Our country needs long-term agricultural policies which will insure that we have food available at fair prices for all. Agriculture does not need or want a hand-out.

Food production is essential and farmers and ranchers make that production happen. What American agriculture needs is basic fairness and opportunity, a fair chance, no more and no less.

Measured against the gross State product, a measurement similar to the GNP, agricultural products in Nebraska and Iowa have declined as a percentage of the overall economy, meaning the value of farm products has not kept pace with the increased value of other goods and services.

Declining land values have been a key problem for Farm Belt farmers. Indications are that ranchland value in Nebraska has declined as much as 50 percent in the past 4 years. Farmland value decline ranges from 25 to 50 percent since the peak year of 1981. Since agriculture land serves as the major collateral base for many farm loans, agriculture banks have suffered as well as they attempt to meet strict loan-collateral requirements that are placed upon those banks by the Federal regulatory agencies.

Mr. President, the U.S. Department of Agriculture figures—and these figures are very clear—show that farm debt in relation to assets was heavier in Nebraska, some 30 percent, than in any other State as of January 1 of this year. In my State, for every $10 of assets, the average farmer had $3 debt. A University of Nebraska study indicated that 19 percent of the Nebraska farmers are experiencing moderate to severe financial stress carrying debt-to-asset ratio of 41 percent or better. Another 24 percent of our farmers and ranchers are experiencing some stress according to this same report in varying degrees and I suggest, Mr. President, that this is just the beginning. This is just a serious beginning of a collapse that is clearly signaling to America that it is happening right now.

Mr. President, these figures are startling and behind these figures there is an individual story of stress and strain which make up these impersonal and truly troublesome statistics.

In the next few weeks, the day of reckoning will be upon many of our best food producers. It will be at that time that these producers will have the final word on whether or not they will be able to obtain the necessary financial backing to plant a crop this year. I fear, Mr. President, that even if we in this body move to assist our agriculture sector, that it is already too late for a large number of these people who have already fallen prey to the triple whammy of high interest rates, declining land values, and low commodity prices.

Even though we have already lost a large number of producers we still have the opportunity to act and save a good share of these producers who currently are struggling to find a way to put a crop in the ground this spring. Mr. President, it is this Senator's view that it is part of our collective responsibility to assist this important segment of our economy in their time of need.

As most of you know, a set of proposals has been suggested as emergency short-term measures to alleviate the current credit crunch and give both the farmers and ranchers and their Main Street suppliers the time that is necessary to work their way out of this situation.

In addition to that we in the Congress will be addressing the longer term difficulties with the omnibus farm bill that we are charged with writing sometime this session, which will take over, of course, with the 1986 crop.

Mr. President, we must act immediately if we are to prevent wholesale bankruptcies and foreclosures which could claim up to 30 percent of the remaining farmers and ranchers, the food producers in the Farm Belt.

The PRESIDING OFFICER [Mr. TRIBLE]. The Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. ZORINSKY. Mr. President, yesterday I introduced emergency agricultural credit legislation—Senate Joint Resolution 49—that I feel is vital to the needs of the agricultural community.

We are faced with a severe economic crisis back home, one which is grossly underestimated here in Washington, both by the administration and by many of my colleagues.

This past week, during our recess, I attended farm meetings throughout the State of Nebraska. Everywhere I went, there was a common denominator and a common thread in the conversations farmers had with me. That was, "Do they know in Washington, DC, what is happening to us?"

I think that those in Washington, DC, are coming to know what is happening to farm communities as a result of the severe impact the depression in the farm economy is having on the rural and other banking systems.

It seems that here on the east coast—and I visit here quite often in my current occupation—the bureaucracy in Washington is well-versed in banking, outlays, expenditures, and especially how to print money. They do a good job of printing money here. They have far surpassed anything that was ever envisioned by the inventors of the printing process.

As a result of that, my friends back home indicate that they have experienced a severe economic erosion that has resulted in cash flow completely disappearing from their businesses.

When the administration presented their current farm program to me, I asked one question: "I see how much money this farm program will save in reducing the deficit in our budget, but has anybody gone to the FDIC to estimate how much money will be spent due to the bank failures that will take place as a result of the administration's farm program?"

Several banks have gone broke in the State of Nebraska. We are not unique. It is happening in all agricultural areas. The reason is that farmers cannot pay their bills and banks cannot collect those bills.

Not too long ago, there was a situation in which a banker came to repossess some property on a farm that the family had had in their possession for several generations. It was quite an emotional and traumatic experience. The situation grew tense and the banker finally got the sheriff. The farmer then indicated that he would not give up the farm. The sheriff then got a SWAT team. The farmer came running out of the house firing, and the SWAT team shot the farmer to death.

This is what is happening. We do not have to go to Central America to see violence. We do not have to go to Central America to see poverty and poor people. You can come to the good old U.S.A.—Vertigre, NE, where farmers are sending food to other farmers so that farm families can eat.

I feel that the Government should get out of the business of subsidizing agriculture. We have to end the cheap food policy in the United States. We spend approximately 15 percent of our disposable income for food, while in other countries their populace spends anywhere from 60 to 80 percent of their disposable income for food.

There are many times I wish I could take the consumers of America and place them into the economies of other countries for 2 weeks and let them go shopping in a supermarket and see what the cost of food is in other countries.

Food is a tremendous bargain here. The bargain is so good here it is below the farmers cost of production. If a farmer cannot make a profit, like any other business—he cannot survive.

Profit is not a dirty word; it is something that is required to stay in business. Very few people stay in business if they cannot make a profit. That is just an economic law of survival. That is why I feel that in any future farm bill, the consumer should bear the higher cost of food; not the taxpayer through subsidies in farm bills. I agree with the administration on that point.

How do we go about doing that? I am preparing a farm bill that will raise commodity prices and the price of food to the consumers of this Nation to the extent that consumers might spend 17 percent instead of 15 percent of their disposable income for food.

We will not bankrupt a consumer by having to pay $1.03 for a loaf of bread instead of $1 for a loaf of bread. And you know what that 3 cents would do? It would double the money a farmer receives for a bushel of wheat because only 3 percent of the product that goes into a loaf of bread goes to the farmer for the production of that wheat. The rest of the cost of that bread is in packaging, advertising, delivering, baking, selling, and all the other factors that go with the final sale.

If we were to double the price that a farmer receives for a bushel of wheat, only 3 pennies would be added to the cost of a loaf of bread. I think that is a small price to pay for saving the No. 1 industry in our country, which is agriculture. I think some of my colleagues understand that those long unemployment lines in cities where they once made tractors, where they make pickup trucks, where they make tires and many other commodities—those unemployment lines begin in the corn fields and wheat fields of Nebraska and Iowa and all the other grain-producing States. If a farmer makes money he can spend money. He can buy those items that he needs to produce food.

On a daily basis, I receive numerous letters, and incidentally I might say lately from the children of farmers who are overhearing unpleasant conversations within their own family due to the economic strains placed on them by the severe crisis that exists in agriculture.

Mr. President, yesterday I introduced emergency agriculture credit legislation that will provide much-needed assistance for many farmers experiencing financial stress due to low farm income, high interest rates, and declining farmland values.

The proposal I offered is fiscally sound, and it does not create any new bureaucracy, and the responsibilities associated with making this assistance available will be shared with lenders,

Federal and State Governments, and farmers.

During the past several weeks, I have urged the President and the Secretary of Agriculture to use authorities under existing law to address farm credit problems. However, the Office of Management and Budget's response has been to rule out most proposals other than to offer telephone hotlines and various action teams. Those steps are fine, but the worst agricultural crisis in half a century requires much more.

The threat of foreclosure is the most serious and demoralizing aspect of the current depressed agricultural economy. Although some would say that the media has sensationalized the financial problem of farmers, I believe there is an abundance of evidence proving that our family farm system of agriculture is threatened with extinction by the present credit crisis.

There is an alternative to not saving family farms. The alternative is, and we saw this not too long ago in the form of OPEC, to run food production like a giant business without regard for the need to practice soil conservation, water conservation, prudent land conservation, and land management. The cost of food under an agricultural OPEC would truly be expensive.

But farming is not like other businesses. Having been a former businessman myself, I could always regulate my outgo with my income by going to a 4-day week, a 3-day week, laying off people. I could always balance my outlays with my intake to somehow, some way survive.

In farming, when someone leaves that business or leaves the farm and abandons the farm, or has that farm repossessed, generally business people take over the farm, not farmers but business people. Business people look at one thing and that is the bottom line. Can I make money with this or not? If I cannot I am going to cut my losses and dump this and go on to the next business venture.

I can, frankly, say that anyone taking over a farm today is not going to be in a position to be a steward of that farm. We may take food for granted and some of my colleagues vote like they have never eaten or they will never have to eat or that all the food in our Nation is produced in the aisles of Safeway, but food is produced in the soil of this Nation. That soil has to be preserved. The only way farmers can hand it down from generation to generation is to be concerned about what happens to the land and how it is tilled. A family farm is not an operation where an auditor walks in someday and says "We have to dump this out of our portfolio because we can make more money investing in microchips than we can in farmland so get rid of it because our investors are demanding a greater yield for their investment."

Mr. President, lately I have heard from the Office of Management and Budget that it is time to disinvest in agriculture as we have disinvested in automobile manufacturing.

It is true, we have disinvested in automobile manufacturing. We can disinvest agriculture. We can disinvest in television manufacturing. We can disinvest in shoe manufacturing and all the other things we do in this country and bcome a nation where everything is manufactured in other countries and shipped to us. But the day will come when a few conglomerates will say, "We will now tell you what you are going to pay for your food since you are in no position to produce it for yourselves and we are now going to tell you what you are going to pay for everything you utilize in your country."

Consumers have a stake in the preservation of agriculture. It is not only in the best interest of the consumers, it is in the best interest of the United States of America.

Mr. President, I read history books. I find, unfortunately, we never learn from history; we never benefit from the mistakes we have made. But every empire, every nation, every country's decline and fall has begun when it could no longer feed its own people.

If we do not have a viable agricultural sector in our Nation, we will not have to worry about ED ZORINSKY serving on the Foreign Relations Committee. We will not have to worry about a Foreign Relations Committee. We will not have to worry about foreign policy. We will have to worry about the survival of a nation called the United States of America. If the time ever comes that we cannot feed our own people, everything else will be academic.

One valuable lesson to learn from history books is that above everything else, this country should never forsake its ability to provide a reliable supply of food at an affordable price.

I think that is what this debate is all about. I think that is what our focus of attention is all about. I am in no way attempting to denigrate Mr. Meese by participation in this filibuster.

However, we have an opportunity to bring the focus of attention of the people of our country on a severe problem that has persisted under Republican and Democratic administrations. Only farmers are told who they can sell to, who they cannot sell to, and when they can sell.

Let me just give a brief example relating to the minimum wage law. That law assures everybody who bakes bread, who sells bread, who packages bread, who advertises bread, and who delivers bread of a minimum wage for their participation in the end product. But that law that we passed here in the Congress starts above the farmer and does not include him. The farmer is not guaranteed any money at all for his or her labors of producing the wheat that goes into the production that makes possible the manufacture of a product called bread.

In addition, there is competition within farm ranks. People say, "Well, you cannot even get your farmers together." Of course not. If you are going to feed corn to animals and slaughter animals and go into the beef business and sell beef, you want low-cost feed. But if you are going to sell corn for domestic consumption and human consumption, you want to get a high price for the corn. So, obviously, it depends on what you are going to do with the corn as to what kind of price you want for corn. Quite obviously, everybody has their own unique situation, as we do in the free enterprise system.

But it is not a free enterprise system when just recently I found a Texas farmer who wanted to go over to Mexico and get some cheap bottled gas to process food. He was told he could not import gas from Mexico because the price was too low. Well, why shouldn't a farmer be able to seek the lowest cost of production? If they can save money by lowering their cost of production, they could sell the commodity cheaper.

We will tell the farmer that he can sell in the open marketplace, but you cannot do your best to reduce your cost of production. The public cannot have it both ways. If we are going to turn the farmer free in the marketplace, fine, but make sure that that farmer is on a level playing field, playing by the same rules as all other businesses.

Our farmers can compete with other farmers throughout the world. What they cannot compete with is the treasuries of other nations that subsidize their farmers.

For this or any other administration to say, "We are going to increase our exports through a market-oriented farm bill" is saying to me, "We really don't know what is happening out there in that so-called free marketplace," because there is no free marketplace until such time as we go out and do what needs to be done to recapture our share of exports throughout the world.

We talk about reducing the deficit and the Federal budget here in the U.S. Senate. There are two ways to reduce deficits—raise taxes and decrease spending. The President recommends decreasing spending and I do likewise and many of my colleagues support that philosophy.

There is one other way to do it—and nobody talks about this—and that is create more taxpayers. You do not have to create more taxpayers by increasing birth rates. You can make more taxpayers by decreasing our trade deficit with the rest of the world. There was a $123 billion deficit last year.

Every $1 billion of the trade deficit represents us giving up 30,000 jobs. So when you say how do you create more taxpayers, it is to reduce our budget deficit and trade deficit. There is a $123 billion trade deficit—123 times 30,000 jobs that we have given up to the rest of the world because of our imbalance of trade with other countries. And the more taxpayers you have, the more people you have addressing envelopes on April 15 to the IRS.

If there is anything the taxpayers of America today need, it is more Americans helping them pay taxes, not Congress figuring out a way to spend more of their money. That is why I feel it is very important for us to become more realistic about the export of agricultural goods. However, we can't sell agricultural products without our farmers.

During the last 3 years, over 24,000 farmers with Farmers Home Administration loans have been forced to liquidate their operations due to financial reasons. As a result of overseeing record numbers of farm liquidations since 1981, the Farmers Home Administration now has over 2,200 farms in inventory.

Prior to 1981, the number of farms held by the Farmers Home Administration had never exceeded 260 farms. The farms held by the Farmers Home Administration consist of about 488,000 acres having a value of several hundred million dollars.

It should be noted that this unprecedented number of liquidations has occurred during a time when Federal courts have greatly limited the number of foreclosure actions that the Farmers Home Administration could initiate. The Farmers Home Administration has been working to revise its loan liquidation regulations to comply with court orders. Those revisions will be completed by spring. At that time, the number of liquidations can be expected to dramatically escalate. The General Accounting Office has recently reported to me that 16,000 Farmers Home Administration farm borrowers with outstanding loans of over $3 billion are so far behind on their payments that liquidation appears to be inevitable.

The Farmers Home Administration borrowers are not the only farmers experiencing difficulty. The Department of Agriculture estimates that about 18 percent, or 430,000, farmers have debt-to-asset ratios that are dangerously high—in excess of 40 percent.

In its 1985 Agriculture and Credit Outlook Report, the Farm Credit Administration states that Production Credit Association loan losses totaled $500 million during the past 2 years. That amount exceeds the combined losses during all the other years in the 50-year history of the Production Credit Association.

Further, the Farm Credit Administration estimates that over 3 percent of all farm credit system borrowers could be forced out of business during the next 12 to 18 months.

In addition, farmers have lost an unprecedented amount of equity in their operations during the last 4 years—$200 billion in inflation adjusted dollars.

Further, the rate of return to equity and farm assets has been negative for the past 4 years, although farmers have traditionally realized a low rate of return on their investment. Prior to the Reagan-Stockman-Block years, 1953 was the last time the rate of return to equity was negative. The long-term solution to farm credit problems is stronger commodity prices and improved farm income. Those issues will be addressed in the 1985 farm bill. However, unless immediate action is taken to provide emergency credit relief, thousands of farmers will be forced out of business before the 1985 crop is even planted. For that reason, I have developed an emergency credit assistance proposal—Senate Joint Resolution 49—that will enable farmers to plant a crop this spring and restructure their debt to make them financially sound in future years.

As I have indicated, the administration's response to recommendations that discretionary authorities be used to provide immediate credit relief has been inadequate. Because appropriate administrative actions have not been taken, the bill I have developed requires the administration to begin using certain administrative authorities. Under the legislation, the Farmers Home Administration would be required to take immediate action to hire additional personnel on a temporary basis to process and service loans, to reduce the interest rate on direct loans, and eliminate unnecessary administrative requirements that have discouraged participation in the Debt Set-Aside Program and the Loan Guarantee Program.

In addition, the legislation requires the Farmers Home Administration to act within 15 days on requests from lenders to be designated as approved lenders, a step that will expedite the processing of loan guarantee applications. Further, Senate Joint Resolution 49 establishes a special task force to study agriculture credit problems and make recommendations on what steps can be taken to provide long-term solutions.

The Senate called for the establishment of such a task force on May 2, 1984, when Senate Resolution 287 was approved. Under that proposal, the task force would have completed its work by January 1, 1985, and it is unfortunate that we must now address agriculture credit problems without the benefit of the task force's recommendations.

The many problems surrounding farm credit are complex, serious, and are related to other aspects of the national economy. Federal farm credit programs cannot address the weaknesses in the overall economy caused by bankrupt fiscal policies that result in huge budget deficits. But they must be adjusted to reflect the credit problems for farmers stemming from these policy failures. A careful, unbiased examination of our Nation's agricultural credit industry and Federal agricultural credit policies will assist the administration and Congress in developing long-term legislative remedies.

Mr. President, at this time I yield to the Senator from New Mexico, and ask unanimous consent that if I again receive the floor any future statement or speech today be considered as part of this initial speech, and not be considered as a second speech.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ZORINSKY. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, I rise today to thank my distinguished colleague from Nebraska, the senior Senator from Nebraska as well, and also my colleague from Oklahoma for the leadership they are providing to the troubled farmers of America.

I am pleased to join their effort to focus the attention of the Senate and the American public on the agricultural crisis facing this country. What is this crisis and how did we get into it? The problem is both simple and urgent. By some estimates, 10 to 15 percent of the Nation's farmers now owe so much money with so little hope of repayment that they cannot borrow more to plant and pay family living expenses until harvest.

Widespread bankruptcies of farmers threaten the rural economy that depends on their prosperity.

Moreover, about 24 percent of farmers' debt is held by farm suppliers, neighbors who sold land on credit and other noninstitutional lenders.

The villains in the debt problem are low commodity prices, high interest rates on loans, and dramatic deflation in the price of farm land, particularly in the Midwest.

As 1970's expectations of agriculture as a lucrative business have diminished, prices for farm land have begun to drop dramatically.

For more than a decade, many farmers piled up debt, and were encourage to do so by not only their bankers but also top farm officials in Washington, respected academic economists and local extension agents.

During the 1970's, when export demand for U.S. farm goods rose dramatically every year, ambitious farmers bought more land, better equipment and more farm chemicals to increase their production; many bought on credit.

In the 1980's, export growth, for various reasons, ceased. Debt-laden farmers kept borrowing and the geared-up farm industy kept producing huge surpluses and market prices tumbled. Loans were made against rising land values to farmers who showed little cash profit from one year to the next.

In some regions the problem was compounded by loss of crops to bad weather, particularly the 1983 drought that savaged the Nation's corn crop. In 1980, the Nation's total farm debt was $166 billion; by 1983 it stood at a record $215.3 billion. In 1984 it declined by a little over 1 percent, according to USDA.

Of the total debt, some $60 billion to $70 billion is owed by farmers whose debts exceed 70 percent of their total assets, a ratio considered untenable in current economic conditions.

This year Congress is scheduled to draft a new farm bill and the debate over the farm program is important to every citizen in this country, not just to those who live on the farm or make a living or attempt to make a living through agriculture. It is critical to review some basic facts about this very important industry.

Agriculture is the most productive and most efficient sector of our Nation's economy. It is consistently one of the few sectors of our economy where we have a favorable trade balance. Last year, we sold to other countries $19 billion more in agricultural products than we purchased. Additionally, our farmers have been giving Americans the greatest food bargain in the world. Americans spend only 16 percent of their income for food. The average Russian spends 45 percent for food. Even in Great Britain, the average is about 28 percent. American food consumers get more for their money today than in 1950. In 1950, an hour's wage for the average worker bought 10 pounds of bread or 8 quarts of milk. Today, it will buy 16 pounds of bread or 15 quarts of milk.

In great part, American consumers have received these benefits due to dramatic increases in the productivity of our farmers. At the beginning of this century, one farmworker could only feed seven persons. By 1970, this farmworker supplied enough food and fiber for 47 people. In the past 10 years the productivity of this one farmworker has almost doubled—he now supplies enough for 78 people. This increased agricultural productivity, the rise of output per unit of input, has been a major contributor to improved living standards for Americans. As agricultural productivity has increased, consumers have been able to upgrade their diets at a lower cost.

The farmers, however, have been absorbing the cost of providing these benefits to the rest of the Nation, usually selling below their actual cost of production and by going broke in record numbers. When we have record numbers of farmers going bankrupt, our entire economic system is threatened. Let me review some of our agricultural history.

Just 35 years ago, net farm income for 1 year would have more than paid off total farm debt. This past year the debt was over 16 times as much as annual income. In 1950, net farm income was $19 billion and total farm debt was $12.5 billion. In 1983, net farm income had fallen to $5.4 billion while total farm debt had skyrocketed to $216.3 billion. For the past 5 years, American farmers have had very little income with which to attempt to service a huge debt.

FINANCIAL CONSIDERATIONS

Financial conditions in agriculture continue to deteriorate. Most agricultural lenders are witnessing declines in the overall quality of their loan portfolios as highly leveraged borrowers continue to face severe debt repayment problems. Reserves for loan losses are shrinking, and the increase in nonperforming assets is having an adverse effect on earnings.

Several factors have contributed to these financial problems. Following the boom of the 1970's, net farm income declined sharply in 1980; in constant dollar terms it has remained at historically low levels for almost 5 years. This stagnation, as evidenced through cash marketing receipts, reflects a combination of world grain surpluses, sagging world trade, and weak commodity prices. At first, many farmers as well as agribusinesses assumed that the downturn was temporary and that things would soon get better. Few farmers made the adjustments that lower incomes require; indeed, some continued to expand rapidly, borrowing as much money as they could. In the past 3 years, however, asset values in agriculture have dropped significantly. Between 1981 and 1983, farm real estate values declined about 10 percent, with the decrease in the Corn Belt averaging almost 25 percent. There are pockets—especially those hard hit by natural disasters—where land values have fallen almost 50 percent. At the same time, the farmer's ability to borrow, is declining because so many farms are being forced onto the market. The value of agriculture land has fallen 22 percent in the last 3 years. As land values have fallen, more and more farmers find their equity eroded to unacceptable levels. In the past 4 years, the value of equity in agricultural land owned by the farmers of this country has decreased by over $150 billion.

Another factor that contributed to the current stress in agriculture was the escalation in interest costs. Although nominal interest rates have eased since 1980, real rates have increased, adding further to the burden of highly leveraged borrowers. As a percentage of total production costs, interest costs have doubled since 1975 and now represent about 16 percent of the total. In 1983, agriculture's interest bill was $21.2 billion, as compared with $6.1 billion in 1975. In the past 5 years, we have seen a 200-percent increase in farm bankruptcies and forced liquidations.

From a lender's viewpoint, there is an additional problem because operators with debt-to-asset ratios above 40 percent—though relatively small in number—represent a large share of the total agricultural debt, about two-thirds altogether. Clearly, massive defaults by these borrowers would harm many agricultural lenders. Thus, various proposals for public assistance to help farmers restructure their debts have dual motives: to strengthen agriculture and to shore up troubled financial institutions.

No matter how conservative lenders may be in their business practices, they are vulnerable to widespread economic adversity, especially when their loans are concentrated in a single industry like agriculture. Prudent lenders always establish reserves for loan losses and build these reserves by adding a small fraction to the interest rates they charge borrowers. Normally, these reserves are adequate to handle losses from isolated case situations that inevitably arise with any lender. However, a serious charge-off problem can eat up low reserves quickly. A second, more immediate problem for the lender is the loss of interest earnings whenever a borrower fails to make payments. Nonperforming loans can quickly erode the earnings base of a financial institution. If the lender tries to protect earnings by increasing interest rates, good borrowers will likely take their business elsewhere. Thus, the financial condition of the lender can be adversely affected if the quality of the loan portfolio begins to deteriorate rapidly.

The most pressing problem facing agriculture in this decade is the price-cost relationship. Farmers and ranchers in New Mexico and across the Nation do not receive adequate return on their products to cover the cost of production and show a profit. Traditionally, producers borrow money to finance their production expenses and with the lack of a reasonable profit, these producers often borrow high interest money to finance the cost of doing business. Borrowing on equity, refinancing, and producing more have been the alternatives many farmers and ranchers have chosen. However, increased production adds to the glut of farm and ranch products and is sometimes a detriment to adequate profits.

Adequate prices are beyond the reach of farmers and ranchers on an individual basis. They cannot compete against subsidized foreign agricultural products or stand alone against cartels that supply fuel and other products.

Changes in production methods and techniques over the last few decades have made the agricultural industry a large and intensive user of capital. The statement that best describes this trend is: "It requires fewer and fewer people using more and more capital to produce more and more total product." Much of this change is the result of adopting modern technologies including machinery, fertilizer, disease and pest and weed control, along with the farmers' and ranchers' willingness to use scientific methods and modern-day management practices.

As a result, there is no industry that uses more capital per unit of production than agriculture. Each person employed full time in commercial agriculture requires the investment of at least one-quarter million dollars. There is every reason to believe capital requirements in agriculture will continue to increase during the next 10–20 years.

To the detriment of this industry, the longrun return on capital invested in agriculture has been low. In the last 2 to 3 years, the rate of return has not exceeded 3 percent per annum. At the same time, nationwide net income per acre has gone from $11 in 1950 to $4 today. Total farm income in 1981, adjusted for inflation, was the worst since the depression. Purchasing power from crop sales is only half of what it was 30 years ago. Unfortunately, the equipment to be purchased has inflated beyond the means of producers. In 1970, a 100-horsepower tractor with a two-way plow cost $8,138. In 1981, a 130-horsepower tractor with a plow cost $45,849. This reflects a 568-percent increase in 11 years. Cotton and grain prices have risen only 100 percent.

The tendency for low returns on capital creates a problem for agricultural borrowers. Many financial lending institutions tend to shy away from providing credit for agricultural pursuits. Vertical and horizontal integration in agriculture by large conglomerates has been, in large part, due to economics of scale and to high cost and low availability of capital to individual farmers and ranchers. There is strong evidence that this trend will continue during the next decade and beyond. Agriculture cannot function at this level of capital cost unless price levels of agricultural products move upward.

NEW MEXICO AGRICULTURE

At this time, let me describe the agricultural environment of New Mexico. As a large ranching and farming State, New Mexico is certainly not immune to the agricultural crisis.

To put into perspective the problems which we face, it is important to understand the scope and size of New Mexico's agriculture.

Livestock production clearly dominates New Mexico agricultural income, with beef cattle by far the leader. Dairying has increased 450 percent in the past 3 years, while sheep numbers are increasing slowly. Production per acre is low for beef cattle on native range. On the other hand, production per dairy cow ranks third nationally. Swine production is largely confined to a few large commercial units.

Crop production in New Mexico is highly dependent on irrigation, with approximately 90 percent of total production coming from the irrigated sector. Total acreage devoted to irrigated crop production increased from 1,274,950 to 1,413,000 during the 1970–80 period.

Many challenges and problems face the farmer and rancher in my State as they attempt to go about the task of feeding and clothing the Nation and other countries of the world. Factors outside their control provide the framework within which they must operate. Economic factors, not all of which they can control or adapt to in advance, determine the outcome of production and marketing decisions.

Agriculture and rural New Mexico will undergo tremendous change in the decade ahead. The population base of our State is shifting toward the urban side. Moreover, we can expect about 21 percent more people in the State by the year 1990. In many areas, the limited supplies of ground water are being depleted; both ground and surface water used by agriculture may be preempted by urban or industrial needs, putting more pressure than ever before on water conservation in agriculture. Urbanization of prime irrigated farmlands in the narrow valleys and cultivable areas of New Mexico poses a real loss to agriculture.

Although we are an energy-rich State, New Mexico, because of its varied geography, faces some unusual challenges. It is likely that energy costs will remain relatively high in the 1980's, maintaining pressure on conservation and development of alternate sources. Certain agricultural operations—water pumping and transportation, for example—will feel the impact of extreme economic pressure.

Credit problems facing many segments of New Mexico agriculture are substantial and may result in the loss of many producers and even a shift in ownership. Primarily, this will hit young farmers and ranchers—the key to tomorrow's agriculture.

In 1981, there were 13,600 farms and ranches in New Mexico and they use about 90 percent of the 78 million acres in the Land of Enchantment. In 1981, their cash receipts from farm and ranch marketings was $854 million, down 25 percent from 1980 and 24 percent from the 1979 figures. Receipts from livestock and livestock products decreased by $311 million, while receipts from crops increased by $43 million. Much of the drop in receipts came from beef cattle production as ranchers held back animals and sold at depressed prices, a national trend in the livestock industry. The future outlook for earnings from farm and ranch operations indicates a continuance of depressed prices spurred by surplus production.

The lending picture in New Mexico is no less serious. Let me provide you some figures on New Mexico's FmHA loan portfolio. New Mexico has a total of 13,600 farmers contributing $1 billion in gross cash receipts.

Of those 13,600, 11 percent, or 1,527 presently have loans with FmHA. And of these 1,527 loans, 627 or 41 percent, are delinquent. For fiscal year 1984, New Mexico's portfolio included:

Farm ownership loans of $55 million with $3 million delinquent;

Operating loans of $25 million with $6 million delinquent;

Emergency loans of $40 million with $17 million delinquent; and Economic emergency loans of $30 million with $9 million delinquent.

Forty-one percent of these loans being delinquent is certainly a cause for great concern in our State.

NEW MEXICO FARMERS OBVIOUSLY NEED OUR HELP

Last week in response to the crisis in New Mexico and the rest of the country, and the growing dissatisfaction with the September debt restructuring initiative, the administration announced plans to strengthen its original restructuring plan of last September. Last year's plan included a 5 year or up to 25 percent deferral principal and interest payments and a $650 million loan guaranteed made available to private lenders. The administration has now added an interest write-down option. This option is provided to enlist the participation of those banks which had shied away from the original plan because it left them too exposed financially.

The proposed new program is expected to allow a writedown of either interest or principal by a lender or some combination of both, as long as the overall writedown is equivalent to at least a 10-percent writeoff of the original balance due. The maximum guarantee will likely be no greater than 90 percent of the equivalent writedown of the original balance. The new loan has to be backed by adequate collateral and carry an interest rate no lower nor higher than that being charged to borrowers in good financial standing with the lender.

The major difficulty banks face if they participate in the administration's current program is an immediate reduction in capital. If small country banks write off loan principal, the writeoff will be charged against bank capital accounts.

If writeoffs of principal are large enough, they may reduce bank capital below the capital adequacy ratios acceptable to bank regulators. Agricultural banks are particularly sensitive to bank examinations at present because many small banks are being forced to sign cease-and-desist orders and other enforcement agreements that place onerous burdens on the banks and their management until capital positions are returned to normal levels. If an interest rate alternative to the existing program could be adopted, this capital problem for small banks would be avoided and the banks could assist more agricultural borrowers.

Although the administration's proposal is most certainly a move in the right direction, it is unclear whether it will reach those most in need and not continue to finance farmers who have a strong chance of surviving this crisis. As my colleague of Kansas has said: "This program offers too little assistance and too little hope."

WHAT CAN BE DONE IN AGRICULTURE?

No one can pretend to have all the answers, but some steps clearly must be taken as we consider the farm bill and emergency credit measures presently before this body.

First, and foremost, we must bring down Federal budget deficits which lead to high interest rates for farmers and an overvalued dollar which prevents them from selling in world markets. A balanced Federal budget would be of great economic benefit to our Nation's farmers.

Second, we should develop a long-range, multiyear policy aimed at bringing production in line with demand and announce it early enough so that farmers can make plans. Often programs are changed even after farmers have planted their crops. All of this wastes taxpayers' money and our precious national resources.

Third, in our foreign aid programs, we should make greater use of our surplus farm products.

Fourth, a long-range conservation component is an essential ingredient in any good farm program. We need a program which will allow farmers to take erosion-prone land out of cultivation and place it in conservation treatment for a number of years while also providing financial incentives to make up for lost income from this land. Such a program would save our precious soil resources and would help the taxpayers by reducing surpluses and by cutting the cost of our commodity programs by hundreds of millions of dollars.

Of course, Mr. President, any consideration of long-range improvements in the farm program will become moot if we do not have emergency action on the credit front to keep the massive bankruptcies and collapse of the agricultural sector. This week several alternatives have been recommended to ease the credit crisis. I hope the Senate will move swiftly to consider these worthy options and that we can work in a spirit of compromise with the administration to pass emergency credit legislation. I believe it is essential that Congress take action now, Mr. President.

Mr. BUMPERS addressed the chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I want to echo and to some extent repeat the statistics that the distinguished Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BINGAMAN] has given the Senate. Senator PRYOR and I toured the State of Arkansas last week visiting with farmer groups all over the State, and one of the best suggestions I got was from a farmer down in southeast Arkansas who suggested we move the Department of Agriculture over to the Defense Department; then, he said, farmers could get anything they wanted.

To get down to the question that the American people are asking, or at least the question that David Stockman says they are asking—why the farmer? Why are we debating and holding up the Edwin Meese nomination on behalf of a bunch of people who, it is argued by Stockman, got themselves into this predicament and really do not deserve very much sympathy?

Well, let me start off by saying it is true that when I was a youngster, growing up in rural Arkansas, 25 percent of the people in this country lived on the land. Today that figure is probably a little under 3 percent. And, of course, of the 3 percent not everybody is on the endangered list. It is true that we have a lot of farmers in this country who are well enough off that they are going to survive this crisis whether we take action or not. But Mr. Stockman has said, why should the cabdriver of Washington, DC or New York City subsidize the American farmer? Well, No. 1, the cabdrivers of Washington, DC were not asked to give up a significant part of their income when the Soviets invaded Afghanistan and the embargo was declared. The American cabdriver has never been asked to give up a part of his income to implement a part of American foreign policy over which he has no control and very little interest. I said the other day that asking David Stockman to help the American farmer is like getting on the subway with Bernard Goetz and asking him to loan you $5. I cannot believe he sincerely believes the things he says about the American farmer, having grown up a farm boy himself.

Does not the American cab driver benefit from the reduction in trade deficits that we enjoy as a result of farmers?

Last year we exported $38 billion worth of agricultural products and we imported about $38 billion worth of agricultural products and we imported about $19 billion. So the farmers reduced the trade deficit last year by $19 billion. They are, so for as I know, the only segment of our economy which can say they exported twice as much as they imported.

Sometime this year, 1985, the United States, which is the most powerful Nation on Earth, will become a debtor nation for the very first time since we become a nation. What does that mean? That means that foreigners will have more money invested in the United States than we will have invested in all the other countries of the world. We will then be a net debtor nation. In one sense, we are no better off than Argentina, Brazil, and Mexico, when that happens. But you can say one thing: It is the American farmer who has kept that from happening before this year. It would have happened a long time ago if it had not been for agricultural exports.

Does the American housewife really want the American farmer to go under? Does she want land values to continue to decline and net income of farmers to decline? The most consumer-oriented Senator ought to stop and reflect on this point: If land values continue to decline as they have in the past 6 years, then ultimately the land is all going to be bought by the only people who can afford to buy it, and that is the corporate agricultural interests of this country.

If you want to make a conscious decision and say that is OK, then so be it. But let me tell you what the probable consequences of that will be. The probable consequences will be that once a sizable segment of the farmlands of this country falls into the hands of a few agricorporate interests, you will see prices dictated not by the strong dollar abroad, not by subsidies in this country, but by a few people who happen to control all the supply; and in every case throughout the economic history of this country and every other country, when a very few people control the supply, the price goes up.

Put the approximately 400 million acres of arable land in this country in the hands of corporations and see if soybeans sell for $5.70 a bushel. It will be more like $10.70 a bushel.

So the question that the American people are asking—and it is a legiti-mate question—is, "Why is the family farm worth saving?" I want to reemphasize that we are not talking about saving every single farmer. We are not even talking about saving the inefficient farmer. We are talking about saving efficient farmers who have been losing money steadily for the last 5 years through no fault of their own. They have been good producers. But they are not the ones who set the interest rates. They are not the ones who set the prices on the tractors and the combines they have to buy. They are the victims.

At the expense of being repetitious, let me just point out these facts. I am personally familiar with this because I have a good pastureland farm that I wish I had sold back in the late 1970's, because it would have brought $400 to $500 an acre more in 1978 and 1979 than it would bring today.

Over the past 3 years, farm values have declined by 22 percent, and in some places as much as 50 percent and 60 percent. In the past 4 years, the farmers' equity—that is, the part he owned above what he owed—has declined by about $150 billion.

Listen to this statistic: Farm debt in 1950 was $12.5 billion. That is what farmers owed in 1950—$12.5 billion. The net farm income that year was $19 billion, or $7 billion more than all the money they owed. By 1984, in constant dollars, farm income was down to $5.4 billion. And everyone knows that debt is now up to $215 billion. That is the most staggering of all the statistics anybody could recite. Think about that.

Farm bankruptcies have increased 200 percent in the last 5 years. When the farmers came here in 1978, the first time, driving their tractors, and came back in 1979 and blocked traffic, everybody said: "Isn't that terrible? Those farmers are just making fools of themselves."

They have been doing what is traditional in this country, and that is that when you get desperate, you do anything you can to bring attention to your plight. What they were saying then is, "We are getting in deep trouble."

In the last 10 years, 1 to 2 percent of the farmers have gone out of business every year. But in this year, 1985, it is estimated by some that as many as 10 to 15 percent of the farmers are going to quit and leave the land.

We have lost 300,000 jobs in agriculture since 1982. Since 1981, over 20,000 farms have been auctioned off. That is one farmer losing his farm every 2 minutes.

If you go to a doctor and you have a broken rib and you are the 50th patient, you are not really concerned about the other 49 people in front of you who had broken ribs. You are just interested in yourself. And so it is, if you are not a farmer, you probably do not really care all that much about this problem, "because your rib is not broken."

Out of all the farmers in this country, one study shows that 243,000 of our 2.3 million farms are in very serious financial difficulty, and 145,000 more are in some difficulty.

Of the farms in this country that have $40,000 to $200,000 annual income—what we call the small to medium farmers—19 percent have a debt-to-asset ratio of greater than 70 percent. That means that for every $10 they have in assets, they owe $7.

About 44 percent of America's farmers have a debt ratio of more than 40 percent. Farmers have a much greater debt-to-income ratio than in the past. In 1950, the debt-to-income ratio was less than 1. In 1960, it doubled to 2, then to over 3, and it went up to 8 in 1980 and 10 in 1984.

You know what that means? To put that very simply, that means that farmers on average now are trying to sustain $10 in debt on $1 in average annual income. And that means that if the farmer is paying as much as 10 percent interest, he is just breaking even. If he is paying 12 percent, he is losing 20 percent of his income. He is going in debt 20 percent every year.

Mr. President, 14 percent of all the cash receipts a farmer gets today is going for interest and that compares with 8 percent, or almost less than half that amount, in 1977.

In the Southern States, including my home State of Arkansas, 25,000 of the area's 325,000 farmers are in serious financial difficulty. They are walking insolvencies. We have been losing 1,000 farms a year just in my home State.

Farm income today is lower than it was in the depths of the Great Depression of 1933.

And we thought the farm crisis was absolutely unsolvable in 1933 and the whole country was up in arms, and now there are just a few people from farm States who are dedicated to trying to save the American family farm.

The Farmers Home Administration considers itself the bank of last resort, and I am not one who goes around kicking on the Farmers Home Administration—they do the best they can. We have thousands of applications pending in Arkansas in Farmers Home Administration county offices and most of the time there are no more than three or four people in there to process those applications.

The other day a letter went out to a bunch of farmers in one county saying,

> You are no longer eligible because any farm of more than 1,000 acres is not a family farm, so you are no longer eligible.

And most of those farmers were sitting thinking their application was going to be approved any minute and all of a sudden 30 days before the planting period is to begin they get notices saying,

> No; we are not going to approve your loan; you are not eligible.

Mr. President, these statistics have been given and given and given here, and they have been repeated. But let me tell you, all the statistics in the world would not impress my colleagues as much as seeing the faces of 1,000 farmers in Jonesboro, AR, or 200 farmers in Gould, AR, or 150 farmers in Stuttgart, some of whom I have known virtually all my life, good farmers, good men and women, who love their life and want to stay on the land and have produced efficiently to the point that it is driving them into bankruptcy. One of the biggest problems we have right now, of course, is surplus, and the surplus has been created because of our productivity.

No one came in here and said Chrysler had been well managed. No one came in and said New York City had been well managed. No one said Continental Illinois Bank had been well managed. No one said Lockheed had been well managed. On the contrary, every one of those corporations were bailed out by the U.S. Congress not because they had been well managed, because they had been terribly mismanaged.

And here the American farmer is the most productive, efficient farmer in the world, and he is on the ropes because a contract that the United States made with him years ago promising to him that if he would plant fence row to fence row his commodities would be sold. How many times did Earl Butz say when he was Secretary of Agriculture, "You plant fence row to fence row and we will peddle your commodities," and so the farmers did.

No one said to the American farmer:

> We are going to double the national debt in 4 years and make the dollar so strong all over the world that you cannot sell your commodity.

The American farmer was not asked to acquiesce in that policy decision.

No one said to the farmer—because for a long period of time under Jimmy Carter, we had 20 percent inflation rates which drove the price of a tractor up to $100,000 and a combine up to $100,000—no one asked the farmer if he liked that. He just continued to plant and produce and produce well, sometimes in spite of horrible droughts like the one we had in 1980, which exceeded anything we have ever suffered in our State before, and he came back to plant again, and to provide trade balances for us.

The farmer has indeed been victimized, and as I said at the outset, I am not saying that every farmer is efficient and I am not saying every farmer ought to be saved, but I am telling you that the vast majority of those farmers out there who are in terrible financial difficulty are there because of no fault of their own.

I talked to a farmer in southeast Arkanas the other day who has farmed for 40 years, and he said:

I am selling my equipment for whatever I can get for it, and I owe $300,000 on my land and I am going to sell enough land to cover that, and then I am going to try to find someone to rent the balance of my land.

No one ever questioned his efficiency, his dedication, or his business acumen. It is just a simple fact that you cannot raise soybeans for $5.70 when it costs you $7 to produce them. You cannot sell soybeans for $5.70 and make a profit when it costs you $1.30 more than that to produce them.

You cannot make a profit on rice for $3.65 a bushel when it costs you $4 to $4.50 at a minimum to produce it.

We are not here to debate and we are not asking the majority leader to pass a final solution to this problem. It is difficult. No one here has a final solution to this crisis. All we are saying is let us get some emergency money made available to the farmer right now so he can at least plant his crop. Within 30 days the farmers of my State are going to be sowing rice if they can get the money to do so. And if we do not do something very quickly, they are not going to be sowing rice or anything else.

So what we are asking for is simply help to get the crops planted now, and then when the Agriculture Committee of the Senate has an opportunity to draft a long-range bill, we will talk about how to export more commodities, and we will deal with other long-range issues.

One silver lining in this cloud is that last year the Soviet Union bought a little over 15 million metric tons of grain from the United States and most agriculture economists say that if the United States and the Soviet Union just do not blow their relationship with each other, if they just quit calling each other dirty names and sit down at the table to talk about arms control and at least show some determination to bring that problem under control, the Soviet Union will buy 20 million metric tons from us in 1985.

The Soviet Union is going to buy 70 million tons of grain from someone in 1985. And one of the reasons they are not going to buy more than 20 million tons from us is because they do not consider us a reliable supplier.

But in any event, they are the possible source of a lot of our exports, and that is going to help our farmers.

You know, I go out and talk to these farm groups. A couple of years ago I was down in southwest Arkansas talking to a bunch of farmers, and they were asking me, "Senator, will you ever support a grain embargo against the Soviet Union again?"

And I said I would not, and I cannot imagine supporting a grain embargo against the Soviet Union short of a war or some overwhelming circumstance that I cannot now anticipate.

There was an old man who stood up in the back of that audience that day—75 years old, sixth-grade education, whom I later found out was a horse trader. He said,

You know, Senator, I think we ought to sell the Soviet Union anything they want to eat because I think a fat, happy Russian is a lot less dangerous to us than a starving Russian.

And I told my wife that he has more common sense than most government officials in this country.

Well, Mr. President, those of us who are from farm States perhaps are more sensitive to this crisis because we have seen the look on the farmer's face. I have looked into the eyes of farmers who have been farming all their lives, farming land that their fathers and their grandfathers farmed, and who are desperate and so frustrated. I think we have an obligation to them.

I want to say to the President of the United States, David Stockman, and John Block, if your programs should ever happen to be adopted by the U.S. Congress, God forbid, the few billion dollars you save will be peanuts compared to what you are going to lose in the long run. If you say goodby to the American farmer, I promise you the U.S. Treasury will lose 10 times more than you are proposing to save with these big cuts in our farm programs.

One of the reasons I had a fairly successful second term as Governor of my State was because in 1973 the farmers in my State and all across this country had a bonanza crop. They had a bumper crop, and the prices of their commodities were the highest in the history of the country.

Then in the early part of 1974, the farmers began to pay State income taxes on that crop. I did not care, of course, how much Federal income taxes they paid. I was a Governor, and I was interested in how much State income taxes they were paying. They paid so much—you know how we big spenders are—I had to call a special session to spend it.

Senator PRYOR tells the story about one night a couple of years ago he was talking to a bunch of farmers. He asked,

How many farmers here will be willing to see a tax increase to get the deficit down?

They all started applauding.

He thought he was going to get rotten-egged when he walked out. He said:

You know, I can't believe that. When I suggested we might have to raise taxes to get the deficit under control, I thought they would start throwing tomatoes.

An old farmer said,

Senator, do you know why they were applauding? They couldn't care less what the tax rate is. They ain't going to pay any taxes anyway because they ain't making any money.

If we would make income earners and taxpayers out of the farmers and, instead of saying they got themselves into this mess, help them out, the U.S. Treasury and the American people would be the big beneficiaries.

I frankly do not believe that Congress is going to be callous or insensitive enough to sit idly by and do nothing to save one of the most important segments of the American economy. We did not sit by when Chrysler was going under. We did not sit by for all those other big corporations and we did not sit idly by for New York City.

Yes, we are all independent, but are also dependent upon each other. David Stockman ought to understand that it does make a difference to the cab driver in New York City whether or not the farmer in Iowa is prosperous or not. And I guess the farmer probably wants New York City to have a mass transit program, too.

When I voted to bail New York City out, I did it for the most practical reason in the world. I knew that if New York City went under, every municipality in the United States would have to pay 1 or 2 percentage points more on every bond they sold after that city went under. Not only did the United States make about $35 million out of the deal in the long run, but I like to think of all the money the municipalities in my State saved by keeping the interest rate on their bonds down from what it otherwise would have been.

I would like to take a parochial attitude and say to the Senators from Utah and the Senators from Idaho and the Senators from Washington and Oregon, I couldn't care less about that Bonneville power system. That is just a big subsidy the U.S. Government pays. Why is the U.S. Government subsidizing public power? The people out there on that system are getting power for nothing.

Well, those dams are there, and that hydropower is there, and I am pleased they are getting a break out of it, and I do not mind them getting a break. We are all interdependent. If we start looking at everything in such parochial terms here that we can only see what is good for our particular States instead of what is good for the Nation, we are really going to be headed for big trouble.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. HATCH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I sat here most of the day and have listened to the eloquent remarks of my colleagues throughout the day. I have to say that I commiserate and have a great deal of sympathy with those who have been speaking on the floor today with regard to farm problems and with regard to what our farmers in this country have been suffering.

We simply have to do something positive for the farmer. I am not sure that there is any simple answer to that problem. We have been trying to solve farm problems for all of my lifetime and certainly since I have been in the U.S. Senate. Having served on the Agriculture Committee the last couple of years, I do have to say that the vast majority of effort that has gone on in that panel has been to resolve various conflicts between the States. I have never seen a committee that carves up a pie more carefully than the Agriculture Committee does. And maybe that is as it should be.

One thing that bothers me however, is that we now have on the floor, in executive session, the nomination of the President's choice for the Attorney General of the United States. This is not an inconsequential nomination. This is, as has been repeatedly stated by those who have opposed Mr. Meese's nomination, perhaps the most important single appointment the President can make.

We seem to have a conflict here between whether or not to vote on Mr. Meese or to consider a farm bill before Mr. Meese. My personal feeling is the longer that we delay a vote up-or-down on Mr. Meese as the President's nominee for Attorney General of the United States, the longer we put off solutions for the farmers of America.

So it seems to me that those who are taking this time, yesterday and today, although I agree with many of their aims and goals, are, in essence, delaying an ultimate solution to the farm problem.

My feeling is that we can solve that farm problem, or at least make great inroads toward solving it, within a short period of time if we can move ahead with the orderly course of the Senate's business. If we wanted to do so, we could vote on Mr. Meese up-or-down immediately. That vote would be over in 15 minutes, 20 minutes, a half-an-hour at the most. I think the majority leader has indicated he would like to bring the highway bill to the floor next. That should not take a long time because, basically, we were in agreement on the substance of that bill at the end of the last session.

Mr. MELCHER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HATCH. If I could just finish this statement, then I will be glad to yield to my dear friend from Montana.

I think we could dispose of that bill quickly. And, by the way, that in and of itself would benefit farmers. It would benefit everybody. Farmers could better get there product to market with the necessary highway and bridge improvements.

I think we will get the farm credit issue done. I want it done. I do not want my farmers in Utah or those anywhere else to suffer 1 day longer than necessary. I would like to solve these credit problems. I do not know that going off budget is the way to do it however, I think all items ought to be "on budget."

The American taxpayers ought to know explicitly what is going on. They ought to be able to make intelligent decisions about what is going on; the best way to do that is if everything shows up in that budget honestly and everybody knows precisely what is involved.

I would like to resolve these problems. I would like to resolve them in an orderly and expeditious fashion.

Before I make my final comments about the importance of the Meese nomination, let me yield to my dear friend from Montana.

Mr. MELCHER. I thank my friend from Utah for yielding.

While I shall not support Mr. Meese—and I do not look on Ed Meese as a bad person at all. I look at him as a very capable and productive member of the White House team—I do not really believe that he is the best person nor the best attorney available to be Attorney General. But having said that, that is my pitch on Ed Meese and I have said it. I have said it before publicly and now I have said it on the floor. That is why I am not going to vote for him.

I have no objection, however, of getting to a vote except for one thing. The President must be aware that the problem of farm credit is very urgent. Whether Ed Meese assumes the mantle of responsibilities of Attorney General this week, next week, this month, next month, or the month following is not going to upset the duties, the work of the Attorney General, nor the numerous people in that department.

Mr. HATCH. Will my dear friend yield back at that point?

Mr. MELCHER. Yes.

Mr. HATCH. I agree something has to be done about the farm credit problems. I will work with the distinguished Senator from Montana, as I have done in the past, to try to resolve those problems.

But I also think it is wrong to suggest that the delay of the Meese nomination another day, another week, or another month is not going to make much difference. Let me point out to my friend that the Justice Department today remains without an Attorney General who can exercise strong leadership in the development of new initiatives. As we all know, General William French Smith has desired to leave for more than a year; because of his announcement of that desire, it is difficult for him now to assert the strong leadership that has to be asserted now.

If you look at the personal and professional lives of the present Attorney General and the Attorney General designate, you have to have some sympathy for them because their lives are in a state of uncertainty and chaos. They have been so for more than a year. We have to resolve this. All it takes is a vote up or down. Let the chips fall where they may.

The Antitrust Division remains without a permanent chief. The Civil Division remains without a permanent chief. The Office of Legal Policy has an Acting Assistant Attorney General. The Office of Legal Counsel and the Office of Legislative Affairs remain without a permanent chief. If you look at what is happening down there, one has to be concerned.

On such issues as the legality of vertical agreements, the Grove City controversy RICO reform, and immigration, there is a state of limbo. Administration litigation policy in a variety of civil and criminal law areas remain undecided.

The processing of a significant number of Federal circuit court, district court, and bankruptcy court judges remain uncompleted.

We have 114 additional vacancies today on the Federal bench.

If you just look at the criminal justice reform bill, for example, that we just passed in the last Congress, implementation in various regard is being held in abeyance because the Department is not fully in place. That includes sentencing reform, bail reform, and such. It was one of the most important criminal bills ever enacted in this country.

In the process, the holdup seems to be because the majority leader has not satisfied some Senators as to when he is going to bring to the floor a farm bill that may resolve the credit problem. We thought when we considered the PIK Program that that would solve much of the problems. That has not been the case; it does suggest the potential difficulty in attempting to legislate too hastily in such a complex area as this one.

Mr. MELCHER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HATCH. I am glad to yield.

Mr. MELCHER. The Senator just mentioned the PIK Program. The Senator will recall the Senate never acted on the PIK Program. I advocated at the time before we acted on the PIK Program that we should have the input from farm groups, farm leaders, and farmers themselves across the country. Because of that, we did not act on it. The Senate never acted on the proposition even though the House passed the bill. We let it go. It was not necessary to act on it because unfortunately, I think, in my judgment, the Department of Agriculture implemented the program anyway. But all we are asking for now is not to delay the vote on Meese, but to gain the attention of the President so they can act administratively on solving the farm credit crunch.

We know it can be done. It can be done this afternoon, yet, by the President asking the Federal Reserve Board to provide the same type of relief which was provided for the Continental Illinois Bank in Chicago, providing the window of the Federal Reserve Board for $3.5 billion in credit, the same way they provided it for the Continental Illinois Bank.

We are now told that the Continental Illinois Bank situation has improved. It was off budget. It was $3.5 billion and it was done very rapidly.

We are just asking that the President be aware of this concern and that he act immediately. So far, the President has not responded to letters that we have sent, requests that we have sent, more than 2 weeks ago to resolve this administratively.

So it is merely a means of getting the attention of the President and hopefully we will have that attention and resolution of the problem very quickly. We are not even asking to delay to the point of new legislation. It can be done administratively, if the President is aware of how urgent it is.

I have candidly said how I feel about Mr. Meese. It is not my purpose at all to hold up his appointment or his confirmation by vote 1 minute longer than is required for the President to take notice of the urgency of the agricultural crunch and to apply the same rule that was applied in the case of Continental. I do not think that is too much to ask. I do not want to delay other considerations such as the highway bill or the final vote on Mr. Meese 1 minute longer than it takes for the President to be cognizant.

I think the Senator would agree with what David Stockman has said about applying the pressure or the wringing out of more farmers by not providing the means of guaranteeing the loans could be the last word or the word of the President. I do not think it will be. I thank my friend for yielding.

Mr. HATCH. I thank the Senator for his observations. I know that he has the best interests of the farmer at heart.

All that I am saying is that I think the position of Attorney General of the United States is an extremely important one. It is one of the most important matters we can deal with now. We have to get the situation at the Justice Department cleared up and resolved.

That, of course, is no reflection on William Smith. I think he has given outstanding service to this country over the past 4 years; he will go down in history as having done a great deal for our country.

I make this observation, however—that the farmer is not served by delaying or holding up the nomination of the Attorney General of the United States. Nor is the country well-served. Nor is this body well-served.

Personally, having examined the record, having read the Stein report, having read the Common Cause analysis of the Meese nomination, having studied the report of the Ethics Office, having sat through virtually every minute of the Meese hearings, it is difficult for me to understand how anyone could oppose or seek to delay this President's choice in this case based on the record. I would again call to their attention the summary of allegations and conclusions on Mr. Meese which I placed in the RECORD yesterday (S 1460-2).

Mr. President, I yield the floor and suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. EVANS). The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I think it is very appropriate we note that today is Ash Wednesday and the period of preparation for Easter begins. Easter Sunday falls in the spring time. Those of us who observe Christian traditions full well realize that Easter Sunday is that day for renewal, the rebirth of hope, and it parallels the operation of farmers who plant their crops and hope for those crops to succeed and a harvest will be in order later on in the summer.

What we are attempting to do in our discussions regarding the Meese nomination is to establish the priorities of Congress and impress upon the President that these priorities must be met in terms of the farm credit that is needed for the farmers who are in distress for lack of credit and who will be unable to plant their crops without some additional credit help.

That does not mean every farmer is in distress, but there is a significant number who are, and their lenders, whether it is the banks or the farm credit system with their production credit associations or those farmers who are awaiting Farmers Home loans. Surely we have not heard the final word from the President on this vital question, and I do not believe any of us could be comfortable with the expression of David Stockman in referring to too many farmers and some of them need to be eliminated. I do not believe the President, when he thought this through, would want that to be the final word of this administration, because it would mean that perhaps 15 percent, or even as high as 20 percent, of the farmers of this country would be faced with the serious situation that, lacking credit, they would be unable to plant their crops and would be unable to continue in business so that they could harvest crops.

The resolution that has been submitted today by me and others—and I might add that I am pleased that it is bipartisan—would express the sense of Congress that, facing this vital situation, the President would request action by the Federal Reserve Board to provide $3.5 billion worth of credit to the lenders, the banks in general, scattered around the country, to make loans to farmers, and who are finding in their portfolios up to 15 or 20 percent of their borrowers who are in agricultural production under a stress situation.

It should be noted further that in providing this type of mechanism for Continental Illinois Bank of Chicago in May 1984, the Federal Reserve Board, in cooperation with the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, acted very promptly and provided a window of credit amounting to $3.5 billion.

What this would mean in this situation is that the Federal Reserve Board could open their window, provide credit at the current rate, which for them is 8 percent, and the guaranteed loans then could be made available to the banks throughout the country; and that would perhaps result in an interest rate for the farm borrowers, who are in distress, of about 9.5 to 10 percent. The difference between 8 and 9.5 percent or 10 percent would be the requirement that the banks would have in servicing those loans and vying for the credit from the Federal Reserve Board.

The administration has made it clear that they do not want to provide emergency credit because it would impact on the budget. However, under the law, the Federal Reserve Board operation is off-budget and is not a matter of budget impact. Some people might say, "Well, it is still money." Of course it is still money. They are guaranteed loans. These loans are not going to create situations where much, if any, of the money would actually be lost to the Government. First, it would not have budgetary impact; and, second, in the long run, if farmers are given an opportunity to produce another crop—with better prices for their commodities, it is hoped—they will be successful, with sufficient cash flow to take care of their debts.

It should also be noted that under the conditions that the money was made available to Continental Illinois Bank, it was made available for up to 5 years. That also is significant, because to get the proper cash flow for farmers who are in distress now, with their credit arrangements, it would perhaps be too optimistic to think that their loans could be made secure and the cash flow adequate for just 1 year.

It is absolutely essential that the emergency credit provided at a reduced rate of interest, and the mechanism we are describing in the situation with Continental Illinois Bank permits the loans to be guaranteed and credit to be available at a much lower rate of interest.

Farmers now are generally paying somewhere between 14 and 15 percent interest, some as high as 16 percent, for the credit they need for their operation. Just reducing that, through this mechanism, to a rate of 10 or 9.5 percent will help their cash flow situation immensely.

It is also pertinent to note that while we should pass a new farm bill before midsummer, that would be too late for these farmers who are now in such economic stress that they probably will not be in a position, with sufficient credit, to plant their crops.

So the urgency of this matter is obvious. It is do it now or forget about the production from a number of farm operators. If it will result in 15 to 20 percent of the farm operators throughout the country being unable to secure credit in time for their spring activities, we will have lost a great deal of production, and a great deal of rural America will be in a terrible situation.

The credit is needed to pay bills, and those are bills from the suppliers and the merchants in rural America. So we are not just talking about 15 to 20 percent of the farm borrowers. We are talking about a high percentage of rural America—agribusiness, small business in general—who have the debts that the farmers owe. They have extended credit to farmers and need to be paid.

It also means that the level of business for rural America and the Main Street of America will get probably another year of room in which economic recovery for agriculture can be worked out. We have had economic recovery in some segments of the economy of the United States, which has been most reassuring.

But we have not had economic recovery for the people on the land who produce the food and fiber of this country.

So the priority of having attention to this cannot be challenged as being more significant than whether or not we act on the final vote on the nomination of Ed Meese.

I draw attention in particular to the concurrent resolution that has been introduced today, and might I just read into the RECORD the resolving clause. I do so now.

Therefore be it resolved that it is the sense of Congress that the Federal Reserve Board in cooperation with the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation move immediately to use its authority to provide $3.5 billion in direct credit to distressed agricultural lenders at discount window interest rates using the same procedures as in the Continental Illinois Bank package to avoid adding to the budget deficit.

I think that resolving clause is very easily understood and very easily implemented.

I hope the President will take note of our deliberations on this matter today and consult with his advisers and find it wise to request the Federal Reserve Board that their cooperation be extended immediately on their part for farm credit just as they acted quickly and expeditiously on the matter of the Continental Illinois Bank and that the amount of credit be made available to the same amount that was made available for the bank, and that is $3.5 billion.

I think this is a most reasonable request and the most easily expedited procedure. If that can be implemented, I would personally hope that we would have the vote on Mr. Meese very shortly after its implementation.

We are not sure whether the President is aware of how serious the matter is. I hope that some of our deliberations have been relayed to the President, that he will find it wise and prudent to act accordingly as we recommend.

However, I must say that perhaps there are some other administrative procedures that the President would prefer to take, and if so, if they would amount to the same expeditious treatment of this problem and providing the credit and at reduced interest rates, I express my willingness to consider any method he wishes to take. I advocate that the President do take note of the seriousness and the reason that we are taking this means of impressing on the President and his administration that action should be taken immediately.

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I would like to take this opportunity to state my views on the subject of the nomination of Ed Meese to become Attorney General of the United States. Few nominations have consumed as much of my personal time and energy in the careful examination of the issues involved.

Ed Meese has a long and distinguished record of public service and experience in the field of law. He has spent a lifetime studying and working in the criminal justice system. As a deputy district attorney in Alameda, CA, he gained years of practical experience in the reality of criminal trials. During this time he was also an active participant in the Alameda County Delinquency Prevention and Family Assistance Program to help young people break out of the economic situations that too often lead to crime. From this hands-on perspective, Ed Meese moved on to more scholarly endeavors. He taught law at the University of California at Berkeley, as well as the University of San Diego. He was the director of the Center for the Study and Research of Criminal Law at USD. Ed Meese joined then Governor Reagan's team as legal affairs secretary where he was the chief liaison between the Governor, Mr. Reagan, and the judicial, correctional and law enforcement agencies. Mr. Meese then came to Washington as counselor to the President where he has been a leader on legal and criminal policy reform.

This sketch of the high points of Mr. Meese's career shows a man who has spent 22 years in public service, dealing with the criminal justice system and the law, a man who is highly qualified to be the U.S. Attorney General.

Ed Meese and I have often not seen eye to eye on issues ranging from the Civil Rights Commission to the attempt to restrict the flow of Government information to the public. Yet we in Congress are able to resolve honest differences of opinion between the legislative and the executive branches by our system of checks and balances. It is precisely because of the existence of these checks and balances that I have consistently adhered to a policy of not opposing a nominee of our President unless it can be proven that he or she is unqualified or unfit to hold that office. I do not see this evidence forthcoming in the case of Ed Meese.

A President has the right to nominate whoever he wishes to fill an important post in his own administration. It is a prerogative of his office. The President has made it clear time and time again that Ed Meese is his choice for Attorney General. We are a nation of laws rather than of men, as Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher so eloquently reiterated to the joint session of Congress today. Within this system a President stands judged—as Presidents Nixon and Carter were—in part by the way he discharges the responsibilities for the men and women he nominates and appoints to implement the law of the land or to carry out his programs. The outcome of the November election points to an overwhelming approval of the way this President fulfills his responsibilities. That is not to say large segments of the American people approve of each and every one of his choices to hold high office. We know that and the President knows that. We, in public office, do not realistically expect majority approval from our constituents or our colleagues for every step we take in the course of governmental events.

Consistently, I, for one, have supported the personal choices of the President to fill administration positions when there is an absence of evidence of unethical or unlawful activity in a nominee's background. In this instance, even some of my colleagues who have indicated a willingness to vote against Ed Meese do not charge or even allege wrongdoing or unethical conduct on his part. For these critics, it seems to fall on the principle that the President can do better—that there are surely better qualified people for the post of Attorney General. Simple logic suggests that this is certainly a safe assumption. And very much beside the point.

If Ed Meese has shown us anything in the past 4 years, it is an unrelenting bond of loyalty and philosophical consistency with the President. That is surely what Ronald Reagan is counting on, perhaps above all else, in his persistent support of Ed to head the Justice Department. This is a prerogative that any President must have if he is to be held strictly accountable for his policies and actions and those of his administration.

History has shown us, often through the magnificent window of so-called 20-20 hindsight, that some of the highest offices in the land have been filled through the nomination process by individuals who have demonstrated a remarkable unfitness for office. This does not reflect on the nominating process itself, but on the men and women who betrayed the trust inherent in their offices, and sometimes on the President himself. For Congress to intercede in the nomination process itself without due cause, based on individual preferences of what makes an "ideal nominee," is not what checks and balances are all about. I will vote in favor of bringing Ed Meese into our system as an official who has never had to stand for approval by Congress or any electoral before. Then I would fully employ our checks and balances to make certain the Nation and its people, not just a President or a philosophy of government, are served by the Attorney General.

Mr. President, there is one case before the Justice Department which I have watched with special care over the last several months. That is the case of Baby Jane Doe who was born in New York in 1983 with the condition known as spina bifida. This was certainly a very great difficulty for the parents of this child and in her first days and hours the parents were presented with very difficult decisions. With the advice of their doctors, they made those decisions. And the child is today alive and with her parents.

However, these decisions were challenged by the Federal Government under a completely novel interpretation of the provisions of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973. Baby Jane Doe's parents were taken to court by the Federal Government to have their decisions questioned on the basis that the parents might be discriminating against their child because of her handicap which is a violation of Federal law. The courts found no discrimination and supported as appropriate the decisions made by the parents.

The Justice Department lost both in district court and on appeal. But the parents of Baby Jane Doe did not exactly win. Although the courts on review supported the medical care decisions of the parents and although the parents successfully defended their rights to make their decisions, the Federal Government imposed on that family thousands of dollars in court costs—a burden imposed on top of the medical bills that the family already faced.

I can appreciate the national policy questions that were involved in the Baby Jane Doe case. In fact, I have strongly supported the efforts of the Department of Health and Human Services to write regulations that implement the intent of Congress as reflected in the Rehabilitation Act. But what I cannot understand is the failure of the U.S. Government or of the people who occupy its highest offices to show some compassion and extend some justice to this family which was made an instrument of its attempt to reach this policy through experimental litigation.

The parents of Baby Jane Doe sought relief for their legal fees. The Justice Department opposed the granting of any fees to this family. In other words, it is the policy of the U.S. Government that despite the fact that this family prevailed entirely in court and that the court reaffirmed the correctness of their decisions and that this family was forced to make a costly legal defense against the intrusion of the Federal Government, they are not entitled any relief for the costs. In fact, they must bear those costs on top of the medical expenses which have resulted from the extensive care required by their daughter.

I have done my best to persuade the predecessors of Mr. Meese at the Justice Department that such a policy in this matter is wrong. I hope now to make the same case more successfully with him. And perhaps his own experience with the Ethics in Government Act will open a new avenue of understanding. Under the provisions of that act, the lawyers who defended Mr. Meese during the investigation of the special prosecutor are seeking $700,000 in reimbursement of legal costs from the Federal Government. That the law should cover the legal expenses of Mr. Meese as he assumes the highest legal post in the land while denying a pittance by comparison to this family seems out of place in our American system of justice.

For I pray—as I know that Ed Meese prays—that the Government of the United States can be more than simply powerful in pursuit of its interests, but that it can also be compassionate and that it can through the eyes of its highest officials see the difference between prevailing in the cause of a particular policy and imposing the costs of the policy struggle on an entirely innocent family which already bears a tremendous burden. If Ed could come to see this difference, where his predecessors have failed, intellectually and spiritually, and put the face of mercy on the pursuit of justice, he would do much to allay the concerns that have been expressed by many here on the floor of the Senate.

My vote to support this nomination will not be a politically popular one back home in Minnesota, to say the least. Favorable editorials and comments in support of him are few and far between. Yet when one reviews the negative comments closely, the criticism falls squarely against Meese personally rather than on the nomination process itself. The word "honor" is used frequently in describing, editorially, a trait the writers see Ed Meese lacking. "Honor," like questions of ethical behavior, can be a subjective benchmark that calls into question the very character of an individual. Yet honor is in the eye of the beholder.

I know Ed Meese personally. Few of his editorial critics do. I like him. That, of course, is not enough. Yet I know our nominating process, too, and I have utmost respect for the purpose it serves in our executive branch of Government. Whether I may personally approve of a nominee or not, or agree with him philosophically, cannot be paramount to whether the President approves of his own nominee. As vague and ambiguous as our standards for judging public officials may be these days, I see nothing ethically or legally improper with this nomination.

I will vote in favor of Ed Meese to become Attorney General, Mr. President. And then I will be watching. I trust he will carry out his enormous responsibilities with the skill and wisdom the President has, obviously, staked a bit of his reputation on.

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, it is with the greatest pleasure that I shall cast my vote for confirmation of Edwin Meese III, as Attorney General of the United States.

It has been my privilege to have worked with Mr. Meese for over 4 years now. As a matter of fact, we arrived in Washington together, and I can state, unequivocally, that I have enjoyed working with no one in the administration more than Ed Meese. Always cooperative, always capable, and always professional, Mr. Meese has been a great asset to the President in his administration. I feel very strongly, therefore, that Mr. Meese be allowed to continue in his standard fine job for the President.

During his long and distinguished career in law enforcement, both as legal scholar and law enforcement practitioner, Ed Meese represented the finest of attributes required for the Nation's chief law enforcement official. As a law school professor, as prosecutor, and as director of the Center for Criminal Justice Policy and Management, Ed Meese always excelled. In every step along the way, he manifested exceptional ability combined with a commitment to the public good. An outstanding example of this dedication is to be found in his determination to ensure that the rights of victims of crime were legally considered equal to those of criminals. Individuals all across the country benefited as a result of these efforts.

During his tenure as counselor to the President, I can personally attest to Ed Meese being of invaluable help to the President. On top of doing his normal, superb job, he was probably the most well-liked individual on the President's staff. He was always accessible, always knowledgeable, and always compassionate and optimistic.

Mr. President, Ed Meese has not changed. He is the same man who served so successfully as prosecutor, who distinguished himself as law school professor, and who was outstanding as Presidential counselor. It is clear to me, and obviously to the majority of my colleagues, that Ed Meese is a fine, dedicated, and capable man, and one I want to have as Attorney General of my country.

I am proud to cast my vote in favor of Edwin Meese III as our next Attorney General, and wish to take this opportunity to urge my colleagues to be expeditious in their approval of this nomination. We need to have Mr. Meese at the helm of our Justice Department, doing his usual superb job, as soon as possible.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, as we debate the nomination of Edwin Meese III to be Attorney General, I would like to commend the efforts of Common Cause and its chairman, former Solicitor General and Watergate special prosecutor, Archibald Cox. Mr. Cox and Common Cause have performed a valuable service for the American public by analyzing in an extremely careful and thorough way the facts contained in the report of the independent counsel concerning Mr. Meese. The report of Common Cause sets out the ethical problems and violations of the standards of conduct for Federal employees that are shown by the facts in the independent counsel's report.

The effort Mr. Cox and Common Cause have committed to a more thorough and informed debate on this nomination have contributed substantially to the care with which the Senate has considered it.

In order to facilitate the public's understanding of the issues raised by this nomination, I ask that the report of Common Cause, the testimony of Mr. Cox, and a letter from Mr. Cox commenting further on the issues in the report be inserted in the RECORD accompanying the debate on the nomination.

[A Review of the Independent Council's Report Prepared by Common Cause]

THE CASE AGAINST EDWIN MEESE III FOR ATTORNEY GENERAL

In January 1984 Edwin Meese III was nominated to be Attorney General of the United States. In March, as a consequence of information revealed in the press and during the Senate Judiciary Committee hearings on the Meese nomination, Attorney General William French Smith initiated a preliminary investigation of possible criminal charges against Mr. Meese. Such an investigation is required before asking for the appointment of an Independent Counsel under the Ethics in Government Act. Concerned that the inquiry might be too narrow, Judiciary Committee Chairman Strom Thurmond (R-SC) and Joseph Biden, Jr. (D-DE), ranking minority member of the Committee, asked Attorney General Smith to conduct a comprehensive investigation of Mr. Meese. The next day, Mr. Meese asked for the appointment of an Independent Counsel. Several days later, after Mr. Smith, in accordance with the Act, had requested that a panel of judges from the United States Court of Appeals appoint an Independent Counsel, the court selected Jacob Stein, Esq., a well-known lawyer in private practice, "to investigate any allegation or evidence of violation of any criminal law by Mr. Meese."

Mr. Stein investigated 11 charges against Mr. Meese. They included allegations that Mr. Meese had accepted financial favors in connection with helping individuals to obtain federal jobs, that he had willfully filed false financial disclosure statements, and that he had improperly obtained a promotion in the U.S. Army Reserve.

In late September 1984, the Independent Counsel's Report was released. The Report concluded that there was "no basis" for indicting Mr. Meese on criminal charges. President Reagan immediately hailed the report as a "vindication" of his counsellor. Mr. Meese said he was "very happy" with the Report. Mr. Meese's lawyers, E. Robert Wallach and Leonard Garment, declared that the Report's "exhaustive" inquiry should end "suspicions" and that it would be "grossly unfair" to deny Mr. Meese "the benefit of the favorable outcome." The White House response and the accompanying publicity created the impression that Mr. Meese had been cleared of all wrongdoing and that no legitimate hurdle remained to prevent his confirmation as Attorney General of the United States.

The Independent Counsel's Report[1] does not constitute a "vindication" of Mr. Meese against charges of repeated ethical violations. It does not demonstrate his fitness to serve as Attorney General. Despite the request of Mr. Meese's counsel, Mr. Stein explicitly refused to say ". . . that the evidence does not substantiate the loose charges of moral turpitude against Mr. Meese." He also explicitly refused to make an "evaluation of Mr. Meese's fitness for public office." (3) He explained that neither of these questions was within his jurisdiction.

These are not merely technical distinctions. There is a marked difference between indictable crimes and violations of the ethical standards long applicable to public officials. A finding that there is no basis for prosecuting Mr. Meese for criminal misconduct is not enough to demonstrate that he has the ethical sensitivity and judgment required of an Attorney General.

The evidence summarized by the Independent Counsel, far from vindicating Mr. Meese, clearly shows that he repeatedly acted in violation of the ethical standards that should have governed his conduct, and that he is therefore unfit to be Attorney General.

I. THE ETHICAL STANDARDS REQUIRED OF AN ATTORNEY GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES

Choosing an Attorney General of the United States is one of the most important appointments to be made by a President and confirmed by the Senate. The Attorney General is the chief legal officer of the nation, its highest law enforcement official, and, aside from the Supreme Court Justices and the President, the government official with the greatest responsibility for upholding the Constitution and federal laws. It is the Attorney General who is responsible for advising the President and the heads of all other executive departments on matters of law. It is the Attorney General who bears responsibility for ensuring that the law is applied evenly, impartially, and without regard for the position, power, or party of any of the individuals involved. And it is the Attorney General who has a greater opportunity than anyone other than the President to set the ethical tone of an Administration by both his personal conduct and his advice.

Archibald Cox, Chairman of Common Cause, formerly Solicitor General of the United States, and the first Watergate Special Prosecutor, stresses this point: "The Attorney General must symbolize the highest standards of honor, integrity and freedom from self-interest in the performance of public office. He, more than any other individual, must give the American people confidence that he regards—and is requiring other officials to regard—public office as a public trust." No one can effectively serve those functions who, even though not guilty of a crime, has left the appearance of repeatedly mixing government appointments with his private financial affairs.

An executive order and federal regulations applicable to all government employees—not merely the nation's highest officials—require that public office should not be used, or appear to be used, to serve private ends. Executive Order 11222, "Prescribing Standards of Ethical Conduct for Government Officers and Employees," which has been in effect since 1965, prohibits actions . . . which might result in, or create the appearance of . . . using public office for private gain; . . . giving preferential treatment to any organization or person; . . . losing complete independence or impartiality of action; . . . or . . . affecting adversely the confidence of the public in the integrity of the Government. [Emphasis added.]

[1] The words "Independent Counsel" will be used in this Review, as they are in the Report, to refer to the Independent Counsel and his staff. Also, page references for quotations from the Report are set forth in parentheses following the quotations.

Moreover, White House officials are expressly instructed, by regulation, to "conduct themselves so as to exemplify the highest standards of integrity . . . [and] avoid any action . . . which might result in, or create the appearance of . . . [l]osing complete independence or impartiality . . . ." 3 C.F.R. § 100.735-4. [Emphasis added.] Federal regulations go on to state that—

It is equally important that each employee [of the Executive Office of the President] avoid becoming involved in situations which present the possibility, or even the appearance, that his official position might be used to his private advantage." 3 C.F.R. § 100.735-8. [Emphasis added.]

The reasons for the uniform prohibition against a public official's acceptance of financial favors creating the appearance of a loss of impartiality are plain:

First, even the most scrupulous of individuals who receives financial favors while in public office cannot be sure, even subjectively, that his later official action favoring the donor will not be influenced by gratitude—if not by the hope of future gain. To the extent that his judgment is so influenced, the public will be cheated.

Second, the sight of a government official approving for office or otherwise dealing on behalf of the government with individuals who have done him financial favors undermines public confidence in the honesty and evenhandedness with which government business is conducted. In the words of Executive Order 11222 it "create[s] the appearance of . . . losing complete independence or impartiality of action."

Third, the sight of a government official approving for office or otherwise dealing on behalf of government with individuals who have done him financial favors sets a destructive example inviting other government officials actually to use their offices for personal gain.

A man who has often violated Executive Order 11222, federal ethics regulations, and the basic standards they embody should not be Attorney General of the United States.

II. SELECTED AREAS OF INQUIRY DESCRIBED IN THE INDEPENDENT COUNSEL'S REPORT

The Independent Counsel investigated 11 sets of allegations against Mr. Meese. (See Appendix I for a list of all the inquiries conducted by the Independent Counsel.) This section reviews facts shown by the Independent Counsel's Report in six areas that especially bear on Mr. Meese's fitness for office.

1. The relationship, if any, between the loans made to Mr. Meese and the appointment of John McKean to the United States Postal Board of Governors.

Allegations: In the words of the Independent Counsel's Report: "In June and December 1981, John R. McKean made two loans to Mr. Meese totaling $60,000. It has been alleged that there was a connection between the loans and Mr. McKean's nomination, in October 1981, to an unexpired term on the U.S. Postal Board of Governors, as well as his nomination, in January 1983, to a full term on that Board." (108)

Facts Shown by the Independent Counsel's Report: In late June 1981, while serving as Counsellor to the President and as one of four members of the Senior Staff Personnel Committee, the group making final recommendations for Presidential appointments, Mr. Meese received an unsecured loan for $40,000 from John McKean, with interest due "not less than annually." Mr. Meese treated the loan on his Financial Disclosure Statement as one made by Mr. McKean, not knowing the exact sources available to Mr. McKean from which the money came. (Mr. McKean was actually the trustee or middleman for the loan, which came from private investment funds made available to his firm.) Mr. Meese had met with Mr. McKean, who was President of John R. McKean, Accountants, P.C., on the advice of White House Deputy Chief of Staff, Michael Deaver. Mr. Deaver, who was also discussing his personal finances with Mr. McKean and was about to receive his own loan arranged by Mr. McKean as part of a tax shelter Mr. McKean had suggested, was another member of the Senior Staff Committee.

On July 13, 1981, the Senior Staff Committee met to make a recommendation for a vacancy on the Postal Board of Governors. The list of names submitted to the Committee by the White House Office of Presidential Personnel (OPP), the office responsible for initially identifying potential nominees for presidential appointments, did not include the name of John McKean for the vacancy. Although the meeting agenda indicated a "decision" would be made, the decision was deferred, according to the notes of one participant, "until Deaver and Meese come back with a recommendation."

At a subsequent meeting, Mr. Deaver suggested John McKean for the position. According to two persons attending the meeting, after Mr. James Baker III, White House Chief of Staff, indicated he did not know Mr. McKean, Mr. Deaver turned to Mr. Meese and said, "You know him, Ed." Mr. Meese affirmed that he did know Mr. McKean, and that he would be a good person for the job. A tenative, if not final, decision to select Mr. McKean was then made.

The Report states: "None of those present at the Senior Staff meeting recalled any discussion of the fact that Mr. McKean was Mr. Deaver's accountant or Mr. Meese's accountant, nor of knowing that Mr. McKean had just arranged a loan for Mr. Meese or was about to arrange a loan for Mr. Deaver. None recalled Mr. Meese suggesting that he should 'recuse' himself." (124-5)

About one month after Mr. Meese supported Mr. McKean's nomination, they talked by telephone. Mr. McKean recalled telling Mr. Meese that he had learned that his appointment was going through and said words to the effect, "I appreciate any role you've played in this." (127)

A few months later, on December 28, 1981, Mr. Meese called Mr. McKean at his home and asked if he could borrow an additional $20,000, a matter they had discussed earlier. Mr. McKean arranged to have a check for this amount drawn that day on his personal business account, which was later reimbursed by his firm.

In June 1982, Mr. McKean sent Mr. Meese a bill for $3,900 in interest due on the first $40,000 loan through December 1981, to which Mr. Meese did not respond. Mr. McKean did not press him for a time after late July because of the death of Mr. Meese's son.

In September, while the interest was still unpaid, Mr. McKean informed Mr. Meese by a letter (which Mr. Meese did not recall) that he was interested in a full, nine-year term on the Postal Board that would become available in December. In the letter Mr. McKean stated, "With your help I can continue this [work]." (133)

In early November 1982, Mr. McKean sent Mr. Meese copies of bills showing that his accrued interest then totalled $12,000. At a meeting between the two men held on November 8, Mr. McKean agreed to defer Mr. Meese's interest payments until 1983. The agenda for the meeting called for the two men also to discuss at the same time Mr. McKean's desire to serve for a longer term on the Postal Board. The Report states that Mr. Meese did recall one occasion on which Mr. McKean told him that he was interested in a longer term on the Postal Board of Governors, but Mr. Meese did not give the date. Mr. McKean recalled a conversation that he says might have occurred on November 8, in which he asked and Mr. Meese agreed to support him for the longer term.

On November 17—one week later—Mr. McKean's renomination to the nine-year post was approved by the Senior Staff Personnel Committee. Mr. Meese told the Independent Counsel that he assumed that "Mr. McKean's name later came up at a Senior Staff Personnel Committee meeting, and that he supported the nomination. . . ." (135)

Interest on the McKean loans to Mr. Meese continued to accrue, totaling $20,100 by June 1983. In September, two months after a story appeared in the Washington Post which linked the McKean loan to Mr. McKean's appointments, Mr. Meese secured a bank loan or $80,000 to pay off his loan from Mr. McKean. In February 1984—just before the Senate hearings on Mr. Meese's nomination for Attorney General began—Mr. Meese sent Mr. McKean a check for the remaining $3,340 interest due Mr. McKean.

Conclusions to be drawn from the Independent Counsel's Report: The Independent Counsel concluded that the above facts would not support the bringing of a criminal prosecution against Mr. Meese, chiefly because there was no evidence that "Mr. Meese solicited a loan from Mr. McKean with the express or implied intention of assisting him in obtaining a government position, or that Mr. McKean offered to arrange a loan in the expectation or understanding that Mr. Meese would so assist him." (145) We do not and need not challenge that conclusion. The undisputed facts stated by the Independent Counsel show that Mr. Meese violated not only the most elementary ethical standards but also Executive Order 11222.

A high public official must not accept personal financial favors. A high public official must not give or appear to give government positions in actual or apparent return for favors done for government officials, whether for the appointing officer or for one of his friends. Such conduct is ethically wrong, even if there is no criminal bargain for a quid pro quo.

Mr. Meese did accept very substantial favors from Mr. McKean, both in the unsecured loan with "interest due not less than annually" that Mr. McKean arranged and also in the foregoing of interest. Mr. Meese did join with Mr. Deaver in supporting the first appointment of Mr. McKean, knowing that he had received financial favors from Mr. McKean. Subsequently, when Mr. Meese was further indebted to Mr. McKean, he joined in approving a second appointment for Mr. McKean. This was plainly wrong and a clear violation of ethical standards. Supporting the appointments also violated a regulation specifically applicable to White House employees, directing that "each employee avoid becoming involved in situations which present . . . the appearance that his official position might [have been] used to his private advantage."

2. The relationship, if any, of Thomas Barrack's role in the sale of the Meese's California home and his appointment to federal jobs.

Allegations: In the words of the Independent Counsel's Report: "In August 1982, Thomas J. Barrack, Jr., an attorney and real estate developer, assisted the Meeses in the sale of their La Mesa property. In mid-November 1982, Mr. Barrack accepted a non-Presidential appointment as Deputy Undersecretary of Interior. Shortly thereafter, he was offered and accepted a position as Assistant Secretary of Commerce for Trade Development, but later declined the position and left the government.

"It has been alleged that a connection existed between Mr. Barrack's federal appointments and his involvement, especially his financial involvement, in the sale of the Meeses' La Mesa house." (151)

Facts Shown by the Independent Counsel's Report: As of August 1982, the Meeses had been trying unsuccessfully to sell their La Mesa home for more than a year-and-one-half, a state of affairs causing them serious financial problems. The Meeses had failed to make payments on their California and Virginia houses for substantial periods and their bank had mentioned the possibility of foreclosure on their California property. On August 8, 1982, Pendleton James, who had recently been Director of the Office of Presidential Personnel and was a friend of the Meeses, called his friend Thomas Barrack—with whom Mr. James had been discussing possible federal employment—to seek his assistance in selling the La Mesa property.

Mr. Barrack had never met Ed Meese, but after speaking by phone with Mr. Meese at least twice in early August, Mr. Barrack began arranging a complicated sale of the Meeses' California home involving Irv Howard, a builder who had worked with Mr. Barrack, and Ted Elkin, a close personal friend of Mr. Barrack and his "right hand man." On August 18, 1982, only 10 days after the first phone call, Mr. Barrack and Mr. Meese agreed on a purchase price of $300,000. Both the Howards and Meeses signed escrow instructions for the property. Mr. Howard had not yet seen the property.

A few days later, the Great American Bank notified Mr. Meese's representative on the sale that more money was needed to cover the four loans to Mr. Meese which had been secured by the property as well as other payments due on his Virginia house. Mr. Barrack was informed that an additional $7,500 was necessary to complete the deal. At the same time the Bank informed Mr. Barrack that it would provide the buyer with more favorable financing terms than previously offered. Irv Howard agreed to the higher price with the new financing offered by the Great American Bank.

Mr. Barrack loaned his assistant Mr. Elkin $70,000 to be used toward the down payment. Shortly after September 1, 1982, the day of the closing, Mr. Elkin reimbursed Mr. Howard with Mr. Barrack's money for the down payment Mr. Howard had made. Mr. Howard made only one payment on the mortgage, after which Mr. Elkin—with money supplied by Mr. Barrack—took over the mortgage payments. A few months later, Mr. Barrack cancelled the note for $70,000 to Mr. Elkin, making Mr. Elkin a gift of the money.

One week after the closing on the La Mesa home, Pendleton James arranged for Mr. Barrack to meet with several members of the White House Personnel Office. On this occasion Mr. Barrack also met Mr. Meese face to face for the first time. After the meeting, Mr. Barrack wrote Mr. Meese a note which concluded: "Again, I am very grateful for your counsel and encouragement and if I may be of any aid or assistance please call on me." (210) Mr. Meese did not recall what they discussed. Mr. Barrack told the Independent Counsel that the "counsel and encouragement" reference in the note was likely referring to his having told Mr. Meese about his possible relocation to New York City, something he said he was considering besides government service.

The next month, Mr. James arranged for Mr. Barrack to explore possible high-level government positions with five cabinet secretaries, each of whom received a letter from Mr. James which said, "I should mention that Ed Meese knows Tom and I'm sure also would endorse my strong support." (212) Mr. James sent a copy of this letter to Mr. Meese, asking, "Is there anybody else you think Tom should see when he is in Washington?"

According to the Independent Counsel's Report:

"Mr. Meese stated that he could not recall when he learned that Mr. Barrack was interested in a federal position. He recalled that in August 1982, Mr. James told him that Mr. Barrack was someone Mr. James 'had tried' to recruit into the administration. However, Mr. Meese did not recall knowing that Mr. James was still engaged in such an effort. Mr. Meese told us that he might have known as early as the November 9, 1982 dinner [a dinner with Mr. Barrack that occurred the same day that Mr. Barrack interviewed with Transportation Secretary Lewis and HUD Secretary Pierce, and the day before he was to interview with Interior Secretary Watt and Energy Secretary Hodel], although he recalled no conversation about it. He thought he probably knew at Thanksgiving that Mr. Barrack was going to work for Secretary Watt." (220)

On December 1, 1982, Mr. Barrack began work as Deputy Undersecretary of Interior. One month later, according to the Report:

"In January 1983, Mr. Barrack told Secretary Watt that he had done what he could for the Secretary on his personal staff, and that it made no sense for him to continue there . . . Commerce Secretary Baldridge had an Assistant Secretary position open and recruited Barrack, with Secretary Watt's blessing, to go to Commerce." (220-1)

Concerning Mr. Meese's role in Mr. Barrack's selection for the Commerce Department position, Mr. Meese told the Independent Counsel that "he assumed he raised no objection to this appointment . . ." (222)

In May 1983, eight months after the purchase, Mr. Elkin sold the La Mesa property for $275,000, more than $30,000 below its purchase price. According to the Independent Counsel's Report, "Mr. Barrack contributed, through Mr. Elkin, approximately $83,000 in connection with the house—$70,000 for the down payment and initial expenses and $13,000 for mortgage payments and other expenses." (203)

Conclusions to be drawn from the Independent Counsel's Report: Here again, the facts found by the Independent Counsel reveal clear insensitivity to the ethical standards required of a nominee for Attorney General. Mr. Meese knew that Mr. James had requested Mr. Barrack to help Mr. Meese in connection with the sale of his California house at a time when he (Mr. Meese) was in financial difficulty. Mr. Meese knew that Mr. Barrack rendered him important assistance in the sale. Mr. Meese knew that Mr. Barrack was someone Mr. James "had tried" to recruit into the Administration. Mr. Meese had a copy of a letter from Mr. James telling him that he (Mr. James) was pushing Mr. Barrack for an important government appointment and giving Mr. Meese as a reference. Mr. Meese met Mr. Barrack twice in the fall while Mr. Barrack was in Washington, D.C. Interviewing for federal employment. It is hard to see how Mr. Meese could have missed or not inquired about Mr. Barrack's interest in a government position.

Later, Mr. Meese, knowing that he had received substantial benefits from Mr. Barrack's efforts on his behalf, joined in approving the latter's appointment for a sub-Cabinet position. The Independent Counsel did not recommend presecution because "there was no direct evidence that Mr. Meese's non-veto of Mr. Barrack's appointment to this job was based upon his earlier receipt of assistance from Mr. Barrack . . ." (225) But here again Mr. Meese apparently did not reveal the conflict between his self-interest as the beneficiary of Mr. Barrack's assistance and his own duty as Counsellor to the President to see that government appointments were made uninfluenced by personal gratitude for financial assistance or other personal considerations. Nor did Mr. Meese recognize either the obvious risk he was creating of appearance of impropriety or the dangerous example he was setting for others by participating in the appointment of a man who had given him assistance in arranging the sale of his house when he was badly in debt. The public interest is bound to suffer unless the Attorney General is quicker to perceive the ethical violation in such interconnected dealings even when there is no quid pro quo.

3. Mr. Meese's change of status from the retired Army Reserve to the Active Reserve and his later military promotion.

Allegations: According to the Report: "In July 1981, Mr. Meese's status in the U.S. Army Reserve was changed from Retired to Active. In early 1983, he recevied a promotion from Lieutenant Colonel to Colonel in the Reserve. In the spring of 1983, allegations appeared in the news media suggesting improprieties with respect to these actions, and suggesting that they somehow were linked to the nomination of General William Berkman in January 1983 to a second four-year term as Chief, Army Reserve."

Fact Shown by the Independent Counsel's Report: In June 1981, Mr. Meese addressed the annual meeting of an army group. General William Berkman, Chief of Army Reserve, and Colonel Joseph Sullivan, General Berkman's program and liaison officer—and a long-time acquaintance of Mr. Meese—were both in attendance. A conversation between Mr. Meese and Colonel Sullivan brought out the fact that Mr. Meese was interested in returning to Active status in the Army Reserve. Thereafter Colonel Sullivan initiated actions leading to Mr. Meese's transfer to the Active Reserve. An Army Inspector General's Report issued in 1983 concluded the applicable laws and regulations were misapplied, violated or ignored in changing Mr. Meese's status. (Although not stated in the Independent Counsel's Report, the Inspector General's Report shows that the irregularities included the creation of a position especially for Mr. Meese.)

Colonel Sullivan was also the moving force in obtaining Mr. Meese's promotion to Colonel. Because Mr. Meese did not meet the educational requirements for promotion, the Deputy Chief of Staff for Personnel, Lieutenant General Max Thurman, wrote a memorandum analyzing whether constructive educational credit could be granted to Mr. Meese. In the memorandum dated November 1, 1982, General Thurman pointed out that such credit could be authorized jointly by General Berkman and the Director of the Industrial College of Armed Forces, but he advised against doing so that year. He outlined three approaches that could be taken. The first was to get constructive credit expeditiously for Mr. Meese. The second was to identify other individuals who might qualify for constructive credit so that Mr. Meese would not appear to be unique. And the third was to wait until the following year and pursue constructive credit in the "normal fashion." General Thurman recommended waiting so that "constructive credit for Mr. Meese could be accomplished as part of 'an orderly piece of work,' and a 'regular and normal affair.'" (267)

General Thurman showed this memorandum to General Berkman and told him that he recommended against giving constructive credit at this time "because of the risk that the matter would become publicly known, and would give the appearance of preferential treatment to Mr. Meese." (267)

Secretary of the Army Marsh was sent the memorandum and, according to his testimony, he sent it to Mr. Meese. Secretary Marsh also testified that when he called Mr. Meese about the Thurman memorandum, Mr. Meese said that he intended to take no position and wanted to stay out of the matter. Mr. Meese said that he did not recall the memorandum. Mr. Meese also could not recall speaking to Secretary Marsh on this subject; he could recall speaking about constructive credit with only Colonel Sullivan.

Despite the Thurman memorandum's adverse recommendation and General Thurman's statement to General Berkman that giving Mr. Meese constructive credit, if publicly known, would give the appearance of preferential treatment, within a few days General Berkman approved the constructive credit for Mr. Meese, with Colonel Sullivan hand-carrying the request document to General Berkman for approval. General Berkman then hand-carried it to Admiral Narmi, the Director of the Industrial College of Armed Forces, who also approved it. Mr. Meese was later promoted to Colonel. (Although not stated by the Independent Counsel's Report, Mr. Meese retired from the active reserve in March 1984—several months after the Inspector General's Report concluded that his return to active duty violated the regulations—But he retained his Colonelcy and the attendant higher pension benefits.)

Around the end of October, General Berkman, whose tour of duty as Army Reserve Chief was expiring in June 1983, indicated his interest in a second term. Sometime after November 1—at about the same time that the constructive credit necessary for Mr. Meese's promotion was granted—Mr. Meese spoke with Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger and Army Secretary John Marsh to recommend General Berkman for another term. By mid-December, a decision has been reached to reappoint the General. Mr. Weinberger told Mr. Stein he remembers that Mr. Meese called to recommend that General Berkman be considered for appointment to a second term as Reserve chief. Mr. Meese says he also put in a good word for General Berkman with Army Secretary Marsh. Although General Berkman has been Mr. Meese's Reserve commander more than five years earlier, the relationship between them, according to the Stein report, was "limited and professionally based."

Mr. Meese told Mr. Stein's investigators he recommended General Berkman because he has heard from Reserve officials that General Berkman was doing a good job, it was his impression that the Army Reserve had been enhanced under General Berkman and General Berkman has impressed him in a speech he gave. But the Stein report says Mr. Meese "could not recall the identities of. . . [The Reserve officials] of the date of the conversation." Among the factors the Independent Counsel concluded may have played a role in General Berkman's reappointment was the telephone call from Mr. Meese to Secretary Weinberger supporting General Berkman.

Conclusions to be drawn from the Independent Counsel's Report: The Independent Counsel "found no direct evidence that Mr. Meese took action favorable to General Berkman in return for something done for Mr. Meese by General Berkman . . . ." (280) Again, we do not challenge the Independent Counsel's conclusion. Nonetheless, Mr. Meese—indifferent to the appearance of exchanging his government influence for private gain—went out of his way to support General Berkman's reappointment, during the period when he was seeking a promotion under General Berkman's command.

In addition, these central facts remain: The Secretary of the Army states he telephoned Mr. Meese to call his attention to a memorandum advising against offering constructive credit to Mr. Meese at that time. Instead the memorandum recommended waiting until the following year so that the constructive credit would be part of "an orderly piece of work," and a "regular and normal affair." Nonetheless Mr. Meese allowed others to press his cause and was content to accept the military promotion appearing to result from his White House position.

4. The relationships, if any, of certain loans made to Mr. Meese and the appointment of Gordon Luce, Edwin Gray, Marc Sandstrom, and Clarence Pendelton.

Allegations: The Great American First Savings Bank (Great American) made three loans to the Meeses in 1981 and 1982. Four officials of Great American received Presidential appointments in the Reagan Administration. In the words of the Independent Counsel's Report: "Questions have been raised as to whether there was any connection between the willingness of Great American to grant these loans to Mr. and Mrs. Meese and the appointments of its officials to federal positions. Questions have also been raised as to whether the willingness of the Bank to forego timely payments played any role in the appointments." (150)

Facts Shown by the Independent Counsel's Report: Prior to President Reagan's election in 1980, the Meeses had two loans from Great American, totalling $120,000, which were secured by the first two deeds of trust on their La Mesa, California home. Mr. Meese noted that when he purchased his La Mesa home, "he went directly to Great American for financial assistance in the purchase of his house, since four officers of the Bank at the time—Messrs. Luce, Schmidt [the person Mr. Meese primarily dealt with on his loans], Sandstrom and Gray—had all served with him in the Reagan [California] administration." (152–3)

In January 1981, Mr. Meese telephoned Edwin Gray, who had been Vice President and Director of Public Affairs at Great American prior to 1980, to offer him a position as Deputy Assistant to the President, which he accepted. Mr. Gray had previously expressed an interest in a White House position. In early 1983, he was appointed Chairman of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, with Mr. Meese's strong support.

Mr. Meese obtained a third (bridge) loan from Great American in February 1981 for $132,000, secured by a third deed of trust on his California home. this was to cover the down payment on his new Virginia home and other related expenses.

Also in February 1981, Great American made a fourth loan to Mr. Meese, secured by a first deed of trust on the Virginia home, for $150,000. The total debt was now $402,000. In anticipation of an early sale of the California home, the Bank decided to defer for a "reasonable period" payments due on the notes secured by the first and second deeds of trust on the La Mesa property. According to the Independent Counsel's Report, the Bank had accorded such deferments to other customers.

On June 18, 1981, Gordon Luce, Chairman of the Board and Chief Executive Officer of Great American, was named to the President's Commission on Housing. He was approved by the Senior Staff Personnel Committee, of which Mr. Meese was a member. In the fall of 1982 Mr. Luce was appointed an Alternate Delegate to the United Nations General Assembly, with the approval of Mr. Meese and other Senior Staff Committee members.

On October 14, 1981, Mr. Meese, as a member of the Senior Staff Committee, approved Marc Sandstrom, the Bank's Executive Vice President and General Counsel, to be a recess appointee to the Board of Directors of the Legal Services Corporation. A few months later Mr. Sandstrom was formally nominated to the Board.

Around the same time, Clarence Pendleton, a member of the Bank's Board of Directors, was nominated to be Chairman of the United States Commission on Civil Rights, a position he assumed several months later. Mr. Meese had supported his nomination, but said he was unaware of Mr. Pendleton's affiliation with Great American.

In 1982, Great American began trying to obtain payments (which it had deferred) on the first two loans secured by the Meese's house in La Mesa. In February 1982, Mr. McHenry, the manager of Great American's loan servicing department, informed Mr. Meese by letter that he owed $11,499.84. Mr. Meese did not respond to the letter.

Because the third (bridge) loan secured by the La Mesa house, which was due in full in February 1982, also had not been repaid, the bank decided to modify its agreement with Mr. Meese, extending the original note. Repeated requests by the Bank in February, March and April to sign a Modification Agreement extending the loan until June went unanswered. Then, later in April, the Bank decided to extend the bridge loan until August and provide a fourth loan of $21,000 to cover overdue payments on both the Virginia and California properties and to be secured by a fourth deed on the La Mesa property. In May the Meeses accepted the extension on their third loan and the additional loan.

"On June 17, 1982, Mr. McHenry wrote to Mr. Meese demanding payment and, for the first time, mentioning the possibility of foreclosure. He received no response." (166)

Aside from the additional loan made by Great American to cover past payments due, Mr. Meese had failed to make mortgage payments on his two homes from February until September, when his California home was sold.

Conclusions to be drawn from the Independent Counsel's Report: The Independent Counsel concluded that "despite the various degrees of support Mr. Meese gave to the appointments of Messrs. Luce, Gray, Sandstrom and Pendleton, the evidence does not warrant the finding that such support was connected to the Bank's treatment of the Meeses." (185) The Independent Counsel's Report "found no evidence that Messrs. Luce, Gray, Sandstrom, and Pendleton were involved materially, if at all, in the Meeses' financial dealings with the Bank." Nonetheless, the ethical violation is clear: Mr. Meese participated in decisions to recommend individuals who he knew were high officials of Great American First Savings Bank for government appointments at a time when he had borrowed several hundred thousand dollars from the Bank on favorable terms, including forebearance of monthly payments on some of his loans, and in fact was in default on one of his loans.

5. The relationship, if any, of a $15,000 loan made to Mrs. Meese and the appointment of Edwin Thomas to federal jobs, as well as Mr. Meese's failure to include in his Financial Disclosure Statements the $15,000 loan made by Edwin Thomas to Mrs. Meese.

Allegations: In the words of the Report: "On January 7, 1981, Edwin W. Thomas [a friend of the Meeses] lent $15,000 to Ursula Meese. Mrs. Meese used the money to purchase stock in Biotech Capital Corporation on behalf of two of her children. It has been alleged that there was a connection between the loan and federal appointments obtained by members of the Thomas family.

"Questions have also been raised regarding Mr. Meese's failure to report the $15,000 on his Financial Disclosure Form (SF 278) filed February 19, 1981 . . . or on the forms he filed in May 1981 . . . and May 1983 . . . although the loan was partially unpaid until June 1983. . . ."

Facts Shown by the Independent Counsel's Report: On January 7, 1981, just before President Reagan took office, Edwin Thomas, a close friend of the Meeses, loaned Mrs. Meese $15,000 to buy stock in Biotech Capital Corporation, a company headed by a close friend of Mr. Thomas. Mr. Meese recalled discussing the Thomas loan proposal with his wife, and approving the idea, probably in December 1980. Mr. Meese thought he probably offered Mr. Thomas the job as Assistant Counsellor to the President, also in December 1980. Mr. Meese said he knew as early as election day what role he would play in the new Administration and "never doubted that he wanted Mr. Thomas to be his assistant." (53) In late January, Mr. Thomas began working as Assistant Counselor to the President, a position he held until February 1982, when he was appointed Administrator of the San Francisco Regional Office of the General Services Administration. (In the fall of 1982, Mr. Thomas' wife became an attorney-examiner with the Merit Systems Protection Board and his son took a job with the Department of Labor.)

After taking the position of Counselor to the President, Mr. Meese filed financial disclosure reports, as required under the Ethics in Government Act of 1978. His first report, the draft for which he prepared himself, was filed in February 1981, six weeks after Mrs. Meese received the $15,000 loan from Mr. Thomas. Although the Act clearly requires disclosure of liabilities in excess of $10,000, neither this statement nor Mr. Meese's subsequent statements listed the loan as a liability.

Explaining his omission, "Mr. Meese told members of his staff and others at the White House that it had never occurred to him or 'registered' in his mind that a loan such as this was the kind of thing he was required to include on an SF 278." (75) Moreover, the Report characterizes Mr. Meese as showing a "lack of attention" to his Financial Disclosure Forms.

Conclusions to be drawn from the Independent Counsel's Report: Independent Counsel found "no direct evidence linking the offer of the loan, or the subsequent making of the loan, to Mr. Meese's offer of a job to Mr. Thomas." (72) Whatever his subjective motive, Mr. Meese did link by his actions the receipt by his wife of an undisclosed financil favor and the giving of a government job to the man who had done the favor. Surely—in the words of Executive Order 11222—he became involved in a situation that presented the appearance of "losing complete independence or impartiality."

Not only does his conduct reflect marked in difference to ethical standards, but the Independent Counsel's discussion of Mr. Meese's failure to list the $15,000 loan from Mr. Thomas also shows him to be ignorant of a basic and ethical obligation of public officials.[2]

6. Mr. Meese's receipt of payments by the Presidential Transition Trust.

Allegations: Questions were raised regarding whether Mr. Meese's acceptance of payments from the Presidential Transition Trust was lawful.

Facts Shown by the Independent Counsel's Report: The Presidential Transition Trust was established in August 1980 to raise money to fund the Reagan/Bush Planning Task Force, a group intended to engage in "pre-transition" activities such as identifying government positions to be filled. After the election, when the Trust was terminating, some funds remained in its treasury. With this remaining money, checks were distributed to several persons soon to be members of the Administration, including $10,000 to Mr. Meese clearly designated for "moving expenses." Mr. Meese deposited his check in his bank account on November 22, 1980.

In early December, according to Mr. McPherson, counsel to the Trust, Mr. Meese said that money was needed to pay the moving expenses of the people coming from California to Washington to work in the Administration. After Mr. McPherson learned that this might constitute a legal problem, he informed Mr. Meese, who agreed with him that the matter should be discussed with the Justice Department. According to the Independent Counsel's Report, Mr. McPherson explained that—

"[He] received the oral opinion . . . that [the Justice Department] would probably consider payment of 'moving expenses' by the Trust to prospective government employees to be a violation of 18 U.S.C. § 209(a), a criminal statute barring payment or acceptance by any person of 'supplementation of his salary as a government employee.' [footnote omitted] Mr. McPherson said he reported this to Mr. Meese during December of 1980. Mr. Meese told Mr. McPherson not to pursue the matter further. At no time did Mr. Meese tell Mr. McPherson that he had received a check from the Trust for moving expenses in November and he had deposited it in his account on November 22, 1980." (344-5)

Mr. Meese said that he had no recollection of these conversations, but that he had learned from a source whom he couldn't recall that there might be "a problem" and asked "someone, probably Mrs. von Damm" (the office manager who later became White House Personnel Director) at the Trust to change trust records to reflect that his check was for "consulting fees," which he reported as income on his tax return and Financial Disclosure Form.

Conclusions to be drawn from the Independent Counsel's Report: Independent Counsel concluded that a criminal violation could not be established. We do not dispute this. But there is something disquieting about Mr. Meese's conduct when viewed in the light of Mr. Meese's insensitivity to ethical standards in other situations affecting his finances. Would a man sensitive to ethical standards who had received a $10,000 payment that he learned was "probably illegal" be content to keep the money and simply have the record changed to read "consulting fees?" Mr. Meese may have earned consulting fees. But surely in this difficult situation, an honorable man would want to return the money, submit a statement of the hours spent in consultation, and then obtain payment of his fee.

III. MR. MEESE'S FAILURE TO RECALL SIGNIFICANT EVENTS, CONVERSATIONS AND DOCUMENTS

One of the striking features of the Independent Counsel's Report is the extent to which Mr. Meese claims to be unable to remember significant events or actions. The Independent Counsel's Report reflects a man who is not merely occasionally forgetful, but rather, if taken at his word, suffers from frequent lapses of memory concerning conversations, documents and events bearing upon the integrity of his conduct.

1. In connection with the charges involving Mr. McKean it was important to know to what extent Mr. Meese was aware of Mr. McKean's interest in a government position. When asked questions about documents, conversations or events that would indicate he was aware of this, Mr. Meese answered that he could not recall.

Mr. McKean recalled telling Mr. Meese that he had learned that his appointment was going through and said words to the effect, "I appreciate any role you've played in this." Mr. Meese did not recall this conversation, although he thought it probably occurred. (127)

In a letter from Mr. McKean to Mr. Meese dated September 14, 1982, Mr. McKean expressed his interest in the longer term on the Postal Board, and said, "With your help I can continue this [work]." When confronted with this evidence of his knowledge, Mr. Meese said that he did not recall receiving the letter. (133)

According to the Independent Counsel's Report, "Mr. Meese assumed that Mr. McKean's name later came up at a Senior Staff Personnel Committee meeting, and that he supported the nomination, but he had no recollection of this occurring." (135)

[2] The Independent Counsel's Report documents numerous other examples of Mr. Meese's failure to comply with the financial disclosure requirements of the Ethics in Government Act. The Report notes that during his first four years in office, Mr. Meese initially failed to list at least 20 items on the Financial Disclosure Forms he was required by law to complete.

2. In connection with the charges involving Mr. Barrack, it was important to know to what extent Mr. Meese was aware of Mr. Barrack's efforts to secure a government position. When asked questions about documents or conversations that would indicate he was aware of this, Mr. Meese repeatedly answered he could not recall.

According to the Independent Counsel's Report: "Mr. Meese had no recollection of Mr. Barrack's September 8 visit to his office [their first meeting occurring one week after the sale of Mr. Meese's home] until he found and reviewed the letter in his files. He did not recall what was discussed, or whether anyone else was present. He also did not recall if he knew Mr. Barrack had been interviewed by people in OPP [the Office of Presidential Personnel]."(210)

In a letter to several cabinet secretaries asking them to see Mr. Barrack, Mr. James wrote: "I should mention that Ed Meese knows Tom and I'm sure also would endorse my strong support." Mr. James sent a copy of the letter to Mr. Meese. According to the Report: "Mr. Meese did not recall the October 27 letter. He also did not recall knowing at this time that Mr. Barrack was interested in a federal position, or that Mr. James was seeking to obtain one for him." (214) He explained that he sometimes but not always read the contents of his "reading file" where a copy of the letter would have gone and that other staff read and filed the original.

According to the Report: "Mr. Meese stated that he could not recall when he learned that Mr. Barrack was interested in a federal position. He recalled that in August 1982, Mr. James told him that Mr. Barrack was someone Mr. James 'had tried' to recruit into the administration. However, Mr. Meese did not recall knowing that Mr. James was still engaged in such an effort. Mr. Meese told us that he might have known as early as the November 9, 1982 dinner [a dinner with Mr. Barrack that occurred the same day that Mr. Barrack interviewed with Transportation Secretary Lewis and HUD Secretary Pierce, and the day before he was to interview with Interior Secretary Watt and Energy Secretary Hodel], although he recalled no conversation about it. He thought he probably knew at Thanksgiving that Mr. Barrack was going to work for Secretary Watt." (220)

According to the Report: "Concerning his Senior Staff role in [Mr. Barrack's appointment to be Assistant Secretary of the Commerce Department] Mr. Meese said that he assumed he raised no objection to this appointment, but that he had no recollection of the matter." (222)

3. In connection with the charges involving Mr. Meese's Army Reserve status, it was important to know the extent to which Mr. Meese was aware that he could be receiving special treatment on his promotion and to know what his grounds were for favoring the reappointment of General Berkman. When asked questions about special treatment and the reappointment of General Berkman, Mr. Meese answered that he could not recall.

Secretary of the Army Marsh, who recalled sending General Thurman's memorandum to Mr. Meese and later calling Mr. Meese about it, recalled that Mr. Meese simply wanted to take no position on it. However, "Mr. Meese had no recollection of rceiving the memorandum. When he reviewed the original copy, which we had obtained, it did not refresh his recollection." (269) Mr. Meese also could not recall speaking to Secretary Marsh on this subject, stating that the only person he could recall talking to was Colonel Sullivan.

Mr. Meese spoke with Secretaries Weinberger and Marsh to recommend General Berkman. Mr. Meese explained that he supported General Berkman in part because of recommendations of several Reserve officials. however, "Mr. Meese could not recall the identities of those individuals, or the date of the conversation." (275)

The Independent Counsel apparently regarded Mr. Meese's repeated lapses of memory concerning tansactions of questionable ethical propriety as unimportant in deciding whether to seek an indictment, the truth of which would have to be proved beyond a reasonable doubt. In contexts other than a criminal investigation one might well be warranted in drawing adverse inferences from such repeated inability to answer key questions. But even if no adverse inference should be drawn about Mr. Meese's credibility, the lapses of memory surely confirm the charge of insensitivity to the ethical standards that apply to a Presidential Counsellor and future Attorney General. That a man with Mr. Meese's public responsibilities may neglect some of his personal affairs is readily imaginable. That a man as busy as Mr. Meese may forget incidents seemingly unimportant at the time they occur in the course of his duties is also obvious. But anyone who is truly sensitive to ethical concerns immediately becomes alert and does remember, when names are mentioned or proposals are made that suggest the danger of mixing the personal affairs with public duties, conflicts of interest, or other improprieties.

A man whose sense of propriety forbade his receiving preferential treatment in a military promotion because of his being a Persidential Counsellor, would unquestionably recall a warning telephone call from the Secretary of the Army. He would come alert, and not forget, when the name of the man (Barrack) who arranged the sale of his house came up for appointment to the sub-Cabinet. Likewise, one with appreciation of te impropriety of appointing one's creditor (McKean) to office would come alert and remember when the name of the individual who had arranged a $60,000 loan came up for appointment before a government committee of which he was a member. He would remember a letter from that man asking him for help in obtaining the appointment—if he had any sense of the impropriety of the request and the potential embarrassment if he had a hand in the appointment. Perhaps a man sensitive to ethical standards might forget once, but not on repeated occasions.

In short, even accepting the honesty and candor of Mr. Meese's statements of forgetfulness, they confirm the other evidence of unawareness of, or indifference to, ethical standards required of public officials.

CONCLUSION

We do not suggest that Mr. Meese should be denied confirmation simply because he made mistakes. We do submit that Mr. Meese's actions, though not determined to be criminal, do reveal that he is unfit to be Attorney General.

Confidence in the fairness and impartiality of the administration of justice is essential to a free government. Those who enforce the law must be free from personal interest. The Attorney General must be a symbol of these qualities, not only for the country but for other lawyers in the Department of Justice. Mr. Meese's record of violations of Executive Order 11222, applicable regulations and general standards of ethical conduct makes it impossible for him to be that symbol. He has accepted a promotion that gives the appearance of receiving preferential treatment after being alerted to the problem by the Secretary of the Army. He has failed to understand the wrong in approving for public office persons from whom he has accepted financial assistance. He has displayed an ignorance of the requirements of financial disclosure totally inconsistent with their purpose of revealing conflicts of interest.

An Attorney General can do more to set the ethical tone of an Administration than any other member of the Cabinet. Mr. Meese cannot now perform that function. How could Mr. Meese show by example or tell others that it is wrong to assist individuals in obtaining public office who have done one financial favors, or to accept financial aid or favors from government contractors or their officials, or to accept other preferential treatment?

The Department of Justice has the initial responsibility for investigating charges of wrongdoing against high government officials. Suppose that it were to develop, while Mr. Meese was Attorney General, that on numerous occasions some high official in the White House had supported individuals outside the government for important government positions after he had received unusual financial assistance from them or the organizations in which they held leadership positions. Could Mr. Meese, who has himself been the recipient for such favors, and participated in such appointments, be expected to press a vigorous investigation? Would a young lawyer in the Department of Justice to whom the allegations were referred recommend further investigation knowing that the Attorney General had been in just such a position?

Not infrequently the Department of Justice has the responsibility for investigating gifts made to government officials by government contractors. Could Mr. Meese be expected to see anything wrong in such conduct?

From time to time, attorneys of the Department of Justice are requested to do favors for friends, for political benefactors of an Administration, and for others in positions of influence. Often they have to choose between following high professional standards in the conduct of an investigation or litigation and resorting to unworthy tactics in order to prevail. No one can have confidence that Mr. Meese's example would steer them in the right direction.

In the end the question is very simple. The Independent Counsel did not charge Mr. Meese with a crime. Mr. Meese may have intended no wrong. His past conduct shows, however, that he is blind to the ethical standards and obligations required of a public official. He should not be confirmed as Attorney General.

Appendix I

A List of the Inquiries Concerning Edwin Meese III Conducted by the Independent Counsel

"The Office of Independent Counsel conducted eleven separate inquiries relating to Edwin Meese III. They were:

"1. Mr. Meese's failure to include in his financial Disclosure Statements a $15,000 loan made by Edwin Thomas to Mrs. Meese.

"2. The relationship, if any, of certain loans made to Mr. and Mrs. Meese and the appointment of Edwin Thomas, Gretchen Thomas, Tad Thomas, John McKean, Gordon Luce, Edwin Gray, Marc Sandstrom, Clarence Pendleton, and Thomas Barrack to federal jobs.

"3. Mr. Meese's and his family stock trading.

"4. Whether Mr. Meese obtained special treatment from government agencies for business entities in which he had a financial interest.

"5. Mr. Meese's change of status from the retired Army Reserve to the Active Reserve and his later military promotion.

"6. Mr. Meese's statement to the Subcommittee on Human Resources of the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, House of Representatives, and the Senate Judiciary Committee, concerning Carter campaign materials.

"7. Mr. Meese's retention of cuff links given to him by the government of South Korea.

"8. Mr. Meese's receipt of payments by the Presidential Transition Trust and the Presidential Transition Foundation.

"9. Mr. Meese's reporting on his Financial Disclosure Statements of reimbursements for travel expenses.

"10. Mrs. Meese's receipt of funds from the William Moss Institute.

"11. Mr. Meese' connection, if any, with federal grants to Pepperdine University and American University."

STATEMENT OF ARCHIBALD COX BEFORE THE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE OF THE U.S. SENATE IN OPPOSITION TO THE CONFIRMATION OF EDWIN MEESE III TO BE ATTORNEY GENERAL

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee:

I appreciate this opportunity to appear on behalf of Common Cause before the Judiciary Committee in opposition to the confirmation of Edwin Meese III as Attorney General of the United States. I am Chairman of Common Cause, a citizens' organization of 250,000 members. I am also Carl M. Loeb University Professor Emeritus at Harvard University and a Visiting Professor of Law at Boston University. I have served in the U.S. Department of Justice as a young lawyer, as Special Watergate Proscecutor, and as Solicitor General of the United States.

Neither Common Cause nor I myself came lightly to the conclusion that we should oppose the nomination of Edwin Meese. Although we have often emphasized the constitutional responsibility of the Senate to investigate thoroughly and pass its own independent judgment upon a President's nominees, we also recognize that when a Cabinet post is involved, much can be said for deferring to the President's choice insofar as the grounds for possible objection lie in the realm of political philosophy or policies. We did not oppose Mr. Meese's confirmation until after the hearings last spring brought out such repeated violations of the ethical standards that should govern the conduct of government officials as to make it impossible to believe that he can both symbolize and ensure the honest, even-handed, and fair-minded administration of justice free from the taint of personal self-interest or prejudice. We then became convinced that Mr. Meese's record disqualified him from serving effectively as Attorney General, and that we should oppose his nomination. The intervening months have strengthened that conviction.

51-059 O-86-46 (Pt. 2)

The reasons behind our conclusion that the Senate should not confirm Mr. Meese's nomination are best explained in five steps that I shall first state and then elaborate:

First. The Senate must make its own determination of the ethical propriety of Mr. Meese's conduct. The Report of the Independent Counsel does not pass judgment upon whether Mr. Meese's past conduct disqualifies him from being Attorney General.

Second. A public official must not mix personal financial affairs with the exercise of official power or influence. This is one of the clearest and most widely-accepted ethical standards governing the holders of public office.

Third. Edwin Meese, as shown by evidence detailed by the Independent Counsel, did mix the receipt of personal financial benefits with the exercise of the powers and influence of Counsellor to the President by acting upon matters involving persons who had given him financial assistance.

Fourth. To treat Edwin Meese as vindicated because there is no basis for criminal prosecution would abandon the familiar and Long-accepted distinction between violation of criminal law and violation of the higher ethical standards that government officials should obey.

Fifth. For the Senate to repudiate the moral standard by treating freedom of criminality as sufficient for confirmation as Attorney General would have disastrous consequences throughout the government.

I. THE REPORT OF INDEPENDENT COUNSEL DOES NOT PASS JUDGMENT UPON WHETHER THE PAST CONDUCT OF EDWIN MEESE DISQUALIFIES HIM FROM BEING AN EFFECTIVE ATTORNEY GENERAL

Jacob Stein, Esq. conducted a careful investigation into the charges that Edwin Meese had engaged in numerous improprieties as Counsellor to the President. Mr. Stein found "no basis" for criminal prosecution. That finding should put an end to accusations of criminality. It grossly misrepresents the Independent Counsel's Report, however, to say that it is a "vindication" of Mr. Meese, or that it should remove all obstacles to his confirmation.

The Report does not constitute a "vindication" of Mr. Meese against charges of repeated ethical violation. It does not demonstrate his fitness to serve as Attorney General. Despite the request of Mr. Meese's counsel, Mr. Stein explicitly refused to say ". . . that the evidence does not substantiate the loose charges of moral turpitude against Mr. Meese" (Report, p. 2). Despite many other requests, Mr. Stein explicitly refused to make "an evaluation of Mr. Meese's fitness for public office" (Report, p. 3). He explained that neither of these questions was within his jurisdiction (Report, pp. 3-4), but expressed "an expectation that they will not remain unexplored by those who will strive to do so free from all bias and prejudice" (Report, p. 4).

II. A PUBLIC OFFICIAL SHOULD NOT MIX PERSONAL FINANCIAL GAIN WITH THE EXERCISE OF OFFICIAL POWER OR INFLUENCE

Public officials cannot and should not live in a vacuum. They cannot and should not shut themselves off from those whom they know from past social intercourse or business, professional, or political advice. In making and recommending appointments and also in seeking and evaluating advice, public servants often necessarily rely upon impressions and judgments formed by experience outside of office. The reliance will become abuse if friendship or mutual advantage takes precedence over sincere pursuit of the public interest. Cronyism is an abuse. In this area, however, it is impossible to set down a hard-and-fast rule. Here we must rely upon the integrity, fair-mindedness and public spiritedness of elected and appointed officials and upon the judgments of the electorate.

Once personal material advantage enters the picture—once money is involved—the situation is altogether different. Then a rule can be formulated. Then one can judge objectively whether the ethical standard has been honored or breached. As a result of scandals in previous administrations two precepts that had long been honored by conscientious public servants became firmly established as general rules:

Public officials should not accept personal financial favors from those who may seek appointments or may have other business with the government that either they or the use of their names may influence.

If the proposed appointment or business of a benefactor unexpectedly comes before a public official, that official should stand aside.

High officials who violated these precepts have, upon discovery, been severely criticized and forced to resign. The country was shocked by revelations that a White House aide to President Truman had accepted expensive gifts such as a deepfreeze locker from "five-percenters" seeking to place government contracts for a contingent fee. Part of the major scandal involving the Bureau of Internal Revenue that developed in 1950-1951 as a result of the investigations of Senator Williams and Congressman King was that the Chief Counsel and former assistant head of the Bureau, and also the Assistant Attorney General for the Tax Division, had allowed themselves to be put under obligation by accepting expensive gifts and entertainment from men who turned out to subject to investigation.

When it became known that Associate Justice Abe Fortas had accepted $20,000 from financier Louis Wolfson and a promise of annual payments, he was forced to resign from the Supreme Court even though Justice Fortas neither gave nor promised judicial or official favor nor intervened or promised to intervene on Wolfson's behalf.

When it became known that Sherman Adams, the senior White House aide to President Eisenhower, had accepted the present of a vicuna coat, the loan of an expensive oriental rug, and the payment of his hotel bills from Bernard Goldfine, a textile executive who had matters pending before other parts of the government, Sherman Adams was forced to resign, even though he had committed no crime. Senator Barry Goldwater, a leader in forcing Adams's resignation, succinctly stated a few years later: "There is much more to high standard of public officials than merely staying within the law. * * * It is a question for moral purity in public service."

These precepts were endorsed in Congress in slightly different language in a Concurrent Resolution adopted in 1958 at the time of the Sherman Adams affair (H.R. Con. Res. 175, 72 Stat. B12):

"Any person in Government service should: * * *

"5. Never * * * accept, for himself or his family, favors or benefits under circumstances which might be construed by reasonable persons as influencing the performance of his governmental duties." [Emphasis supplied.]

The precepts have also been embodied in slightly different language in Executive Order 11,222, which forbids an employee in the Executive Branch to do anything that "might result in, or create the appearance of * * * giving preferential treatment to any organization or person" or of "losing complete independence or impartiality of action." A public official who accepts financial favors risks actually "losing complete independence or impartiality of action," for the reasons that Senator Paul H. Douglas so well explained (see p. 8 below). All the more plainly his acceptance of the favors creates that appearance. And surely one who accepts financial favors and thereafter participates in naming his benefactor to a government office engages in conduct "which might * * * create the appearance of * * * giving preferential treatment."

The importance of avoiding appearances that create distrust in government was eloquently stated by Senator Strom Thurmond during consideration of the Senate Code of Ethics:

"John C. Calhoun, who was from my home state of South Carolina, one of the great Senators to serve this body, ably defined this aspect of the public trust in an 1835 speech when he wrote:

"'* * * the very essence of free government consists in considering offices as public trusts, bestowed for the good of the Country and not for the benefit of an individual or party.' * * *

"There is one thing my father told me when I started out in public life. He said, 'You have got to appear right as well as be right.'" (125 Cong. Rec. 8047-8 (March 17, 1977), 125 Cong. Rec. 8349 (March 21, 1977).)

The reasoning behind these ethical standards is simple and straightforward.

First, the public is entitled to the independent judgment of officials whose impartiality cannot have been tainted by the receipt of financial benefits from those whose cases they must judge. The world is full of people who, like Bernard Goldfine, are happy to earn the acquaintance and the gratitude or good will of high government officials by doing them financial favors, not because they are seeking to induce some particular official action at the time but because some day and in some way the acquaintance of one of the powerful may help advance the benefactor's affairs. Their method and the danger were admirably stated by one of the most distinguished Senators in this century, Paul H. Douglas, in a valuable study of Ethics in Government (p. 44):

"Today the corruption of public officials by private interests takes a more subtle form. The enticer does not generally pay money directly to the public representative. He tries instead by a series of favors to put the public official under such a feeling of personal obligation that the latter gradually loses his sense of mission to the public and comes to feel that his first loyalties are to his private benefactors and patrons."

The government official is also bound to know that, if he accepts personal financial favors in his hour of need, then it will be hard for him later—if the occasion should arise—to act upon a request of his benefactor wholly without some sense of obligation or gratitude. Senator Douglas went on to explain the point much more clearly than I can express it:

"What happens is a gradual shifting of a man's loyalties from the community to those who have been doing him favors. His final decisions are, therefore, made in response to his private friendships and loyalties rather than to the public good. Throughout this whole process, the official will claim—and may indeed believe—that there is no causal connection between the favors he has received and the decisions which he makes. He will assert that the favors were given and received on the basis of pure friendship unsullied by worldly considerations. He will claim that the decisions, on the other hand, will have been made on the basis of the justice and equity of the particular case. The two series of acts will be alleged to be as separate as the east is from the west. Moreover, the whole process may be so subtle as not to be detected by the official himself."

The only assurance is to refuse the financial favor or if the gift were mistakenly accepted from one who seemingly could have no government business, to stand aside. That is what H.R. Concurrent Resolution 175, Executive Order 11,222 and the public morality behind them plainly require.

Second, even if the official could achieve complete impartiality of judgment, the sight of a government official approving for office or otherwise dealing on behalf of government with individuals who have done him financial favors undermines public confidence in the honesty and evenhandedness with which government is conducted. Free government cannot survive that loss of confidence.

Third, the sight of a government official approving for office or otherwise dealing on behalf of government with individuals who have done him financial favors sets a destructive example, inviting other government officials actually to use their offices for personal gain. Toleration of the appearance of linking personal financial advantage with government appointments is the beginning of a long downhill slide into major corruption, public cynicism, and the collapse of confidence in public justice. Little favors—timely, well-placed telephone calls—follow. Then bigger courtesies, outright preferences, and the scarcely-concealed sale of influence and the kickback and bribe.

In sum, the standard by which Mr. Meese should be judged is not new. The firm ethical principle forbidding a government official to exercise official power or influence on behalf of an individual or organization that has given him financial assistance was hammered out as a result of scandals in the Truman Administration involving White House aides Matthew Connolly and Harry Vaughn, Assistant Attorney General Lamar Caudle, and officials in the Bureau of Internal Revenue. There was more debate at the time of the Sherman Adams affair and the consideration of House Concurrent Resolution 175, 72 Stat. B12, quoted above. Still further deliberation took place in connection with the acceptance of gifts by Associate Justice Abe Fortas of the United States Supreme Court. While the Watergate wrongs were of a rather different character, they too resulted in legislative actions strengthening the consensus that no official may accept financial favors and then act favorably on government business involving his benefactor. The principle applies regardless of whether the official thinks that he would have taken the same action even if he had not been under obligation. For the Senate now to judge the conduct of Edwin Meese by a different rule would be a long step backward, rejecting a hard-won consensus and opening the door to corruption on a major scale.

III. EDWIN MEESE, WHILE COUNSELLOR TO THE PRESIDENT, REPEATEDLY MIXED THE EXERCISE OF OFFICIAL POWER OR INFLUENCE WITH PERSONAL FINANCIAL AFFAIRS

The Report of Independent Counsel contains a wealth of evidence, mostly undisputed, showing that Edwin Meese did mix the receipt of personal material benefit with the conduct of his official duties, in violation of the established ethical standard for government officials and also in violation of Executive Order 11,222. Independent Counsel concluded that there was "no basis" for a criminal prosecution based upon the evidence described above largely because there was no direct evidence that Mr. Meese made the appointments because of the financial favors, or that the favors were given with the express or implied understanding that Mr. Meese would assist in the appointments. But, as we have shown, the proof of a specific corrupt intent or actual influence upon official action is not an element of ethical misconduct. The ethical standard and the Executive Order are concerned with risk of improper influence and with the appearance that destroy confidence in both government and the individual concerned.

1. While enjoying financial favors from John McKean, Mr. Meese twice supported him for terms on the Postal Board of Governors.

In moving to Washington early in 1981 to serve as Counsellor to the President, Edwin Meese encountered substantial financial problems. On the advice of Michael Deaver, Deputy White House Chief of Staff, he met with John McKean, President of an accounting firm, and in late June 1981 obtained an unsecured loan of $40,000 with interest payable "not less than annually." Apparently Mr. Meese had no previous personal or business contacts with Mr. McKean. Nevertheless, on July 13, 1981, when the filling of a vacancy on the Postal Board of Governors came before the four-member White House Senior Staff Personnel Committee, of which Mr. Meese was a member, decision was deferred, according to the notes of one participant, until Mr. Deaver and Mr. Meese came back with a recommendation. At a subsequent meeting held soon afterwards, Mr. Deaver proposed Mr. McKean. When James Baker III, a third member of the Committee, said that he did not know Mr. McKean, Mr. Deaver turned to Mr. Meese, saying, "You know him, Ed." Mr. Meese, whose direct knowledge of Mr. McKean apparently was still confined to their financial dealings, then affirmed that Mr. McKean would be a good person for the job, and the decision was made to choose him. Mr. McKean later thanked Mr. Meese: "I appreciate any role you've played in this" (Report, p. 127).

Independent Counsel concluded that these facts would not support a criminal prosecution because there was no evidence that Mr. McKean was interested in the position at the time he arranged the loan (Report, p. 146) or that "Mr. Meese sought Mr. McKean's assistance in obtaining a loan with the intention of promising him anything in exchange, or that Mr. Meese in fact initiated any action to propose Mr. McKean for the Postal Board" (Report, pp. 146-7). These findings may be freely conceded. Independent Counsel foiund only that Mr. Meese had not "initiated any action to propose Mr. McKean" [emphasis supplied]. The fact that Mr. Meese actively supported Mr. McKean shortly after receiving the $40,000 loan stands unchallenged. So far as appears, Mr. Meese had no other direct knowledge of Mr. McKean when he assured Mr. Baker that he knew him and thought him a good choice. There is no reason to draw inferences about Mr. Meese's motives in supporting Mr. McKean upon such slender personal knowledge. As explained by Senator Douglas in the passage quoted above, neither observers nor the one receiving such a financial benefit and then acting in a matter affecting his benefactor can be sure of the part played by reciprocity. Vital ethical standards were violated by Mr. Meese's prompt support of a man to whom he was in debt for financial assistance.

On December 28, 1981, Mr. Meese turned to Mr. McKean for another $20,000 loan.

In September 1982, while Mr. Meese was in default in the payment of interest on the first loan, Mr. McKean wrote Mr. Meese a letter saying that he was interested in a new full nine-year term on the Postal Board that would become available in December. Mr. McKean added: "With your help I can continue this [work]" (Report, p. 133). Mr. Meese testified that he could not remember the letter (Report, p. 133). In early November Mr. McKean sent Mr. Meese copies of bills showing that his accrued interest totalled $12,000. The two met on November 8 to discuss the problem of interest payments. The written agenda for the meeting also called for the men to discuss Mr. McKean's desire to serve for a longer term on the Postal Board. Mr. McKean did agree to defer Mr. Meese's interest payments until 1983. Whether they also discussed Mr. McKean's desire to have Mr. Meese's help in obtaining a new, full term on the Postal Board of Governors is left chiefly to inference from the agenda. Supporting that inference is the fact that Mr. Meese did recall that on some occasion Mr. McKean told him that he was interested in a longer term on the Postal Board of Governors and Mr. McKean recalled a conversation, which he said might have been on November 8, in which he asked and Mr. Meese agreed to support him for the longer term.

One week later Mr. McKean's renomination to the nine-year post was approved by the Senior Staff Personnel Committee. Mr. Meese supported the nomination (Report, p. 135).

In this instance Independent Counsel found no basis for prosecution because—

"There is no direct evidence that there was any connection between McKean's willingness to continue to forgo interest until 1983 and Mr. Meese's willingness to support him for a longer term on the Board." (Report, p. 147, emphasis supplied.)

A decent sense of the ethical obligations of a public official forbade such support for a personal financial benefactor regardless of any conscious or even unconscious causal connection in the official's mind. Mr. Meese gave that support, whatever his state of mind.

The support was also a patent violation of Executive Order 11222 without regard to Mr. Meese's state of mind. The order forbids an employee in the Executive Branch to do anything that "might result in, or create the appearance of * * * giving preferential treatment to any organization or person" or of "losing complete independence or impartiality of action." For Mr. Meese to support Mr. McKean for the full term on the Postal Board of Governors just after Mr. McKean had both requested Mr. Meese's support and agreed to Mr. Meese's further deferring interest payments already overdue, indisputably "might * * * create the appearance of * * * using public office for private gain" of "giving preferential treatment" and of "losing complete independence or impartiality of action."

2. Mr. Meese mixed the receipt of personal financial benefit with the exercise of official power and influence by joining in approving Thomas Barrack for a Presidential appointment after Mr. Barrack had relieved him of his financial embarassment by accomplishing a favorable sale of his California home.

In June and July 1982 two facts conjoined:

(1) Thomas J. Barrack, a California lawyer and real estate developer, made known his interest in a post in the federal government.

(2) Edwin Meese's financial difficulties were increasing because a buyer had not been found for his California house that had been on the market for a year and a half.

Pendleton James, who had been Director of the Office of Presidential Personnel, was a friend of both Mr. Meese and Mr. Barrack. He had been discussing federal posts with Mr. Barrack for some months. By late July 1982 he knew of Mr. Barrack's desire for a federal job. He also knew by early August of Mr. Meese's financial difficulty because of the difficulty in selling the house. With knowledge on both points, on August 8, 1982, Mr. James, who had just left the White House, asked Mr. Barrack to help arrange a sale of the house for Mr. Meese, who in fact could also help Mr. Barrack obtain the federal job. Within a month, Mr. Barrack had worked out a complicated sale of the house to a builder who had worked with him. In fact, Mr. Barrack put up the $70,000 down payment first as a loan but later as a gift. Mr. Barrack also paid other costs and thus "contributed * * * approximately $83,000 in connection with the house" (Report, p. 203).

Within a week after the closing of the sale, Mr. Barrack was in Washington for interviews arranged by Mr. James at the Presidential Personnel Office. He met with Mr. Meese, with whom he had previously talked only by telephone. After the meeting Mr. Barrack wrote to Mr. Meese saying in part, "Again, I am very grateful for your counsel and encouragement. * * *" (Report, p. 210) Mr. Meese could not remember the meeting until shown the note, and then could not remember what was talked about. Mr. Barrack, although he had come to Washington and spent the previous day in interviews about federal employment, asserted that the subject was never mentioned during his meeting with Mr. Meese. He thought it likely that the counsel for which he had thanked Mr. Meese related to a possible move to New York.

On October 27 Mr. James wrote to five Cabinet Secretaries urging Mr. Barrack's qualifications for a high level position. He also said—

"I should mention that Ed Meese knows Tom and I'm sure also would endorse my strong support." (Report, p. 212)

"Ed Meese" knew "Tom" only as the benefactor who had arranged the sale of his house.

Mr. James sent Mr. Meese a copy of this letter to five Cabinet Secretaries, and also told Mr. Meese of his efforts to get Mr. Barrack into the Administration in an accompanying note. Mr. Meese said that he did not remember seeing the note or the copy of the letters. Two weeks later, while Mr. Barrack was in Washington for interviews with Cabinet Secretaries, Mr. and Mrs. Meese and Mr. Barrack dined together. At Thanksgiving the Meeses stayed at the Barracks' house in California. On December 2, Mr. Barrack attended a birthday party for Mr. Meese.

Early in December Mr. Barrack took a post in the Interior Department under Secretary Watt, but he appears to have either continued or soon resumed the search for a higher level government appointment. On February 14, 1983, a White House Personnel Office memorandum came before the four-member Senior Staff Personnel Committee stating that Secretary Baldrige of the Commerce Department had requested that Mr. Barrack be named Assistant Secretary of Commerce for Trade Development. Mr. Meese joined in approving the request despite his knowledge that he was obligated to Mr. Barrack for relieving his financial distress.

Independent Counsel found that "Mr. Meese did not violate any federal criminal statute in connection with Mr. Barrack's recommended appointment" (Report, p. 225), but the grounds of the finding do not exonerate Mr. Meese from the charge of ethical improprieties heretofore condemned in other public officials. Independent Counsel rested heavily upon the absence of "direct evidence that * * * Mr. Meese promised to support or use his influence on behalf of Mr. Barrack" (Report, pp. 223–4, emphasis supplied). Acting favorably upon a matter involving Mr. Barrack was wrong for a public official who had received Mr. Barrack's financial help, with or without the promise. It was wrong even if there was "no direct evidence that Mr. Meese's non-veto of Mr. Barrack's appointment to this job was based upon his earlier receipt of assistance from Mr. Barrack" (Report, p. 225). For reasons explained by Senator Paul Douglas in the passage quoted above, it is futile to probe for actual motivation—except in criminal cases. The message that observers are bound to read into the sequence of events involving Mr. Barrack—Mr. James' going to a man interested in a government appointment in order to get financial help for Mr. Meese, followed by the use of Mr. Meese's name to help get Mr. Barrack a job, then followed by Mr. Meese's joining in approving his benefactor as an Assistant Secretary—is that private financial assistance for White House officials is a path to favorable governmental decisions.

3. While enjoying financial favors from Edwin Thomas that he failed to disclose as required by the Ethics in Government Act, Mr. Meese selected Mr. Thomas to become Assistant Counsellor to the President.

On January 7, 1981, Edwin Thomas, a close friend of the Meeses, loaned Mrs. Meese $15,000 to buy stock in Biotech Capital Corporation, a company headed by a close friend of Mr. Thomas. No due date nor interest rate was mentioned. No interest was ever paid. Mr. Meese approved accepting the loan. Later that month, Mr. Meese offered Mr. Thomas a position as Assistant Counsellor to the President, a position Mr. Thomas accepted.

Mr. Thomas and Mr. Meese were longtime associates. Viewed in isolation the Meeses' acceptance of the interest-free loan of $15,000 from Mr. Thomas might perhaps seem to be no more than an indiscretion flowing from poor judgment and at most a technical violation of 5 U.S.C. 7351 (prohibiting the acceptance of gifts from a subordinate) and Executive Order 11,222. But the incident does not stand in isolation. The loan was one of a series of financial favors that Mr. Meese accepted from individuals who he would appoint or would support for federal office, including Mr. McKean and Mr. Barrack who were not old friends.

The incident must also be viewed in the context of Mr. Meese's financial disclosure reports made under the Ethics in Government Act of 1978. Mr. Meese did not report the Thomas loan in 1981, 1982 or 1983, even though the Act explicitly requires disclosure of every liability in excess of $10,000. These were plain violations, though found not to be criminal because there was insufficient evidence of unlawful intent.

Mr. Meese's explanation of the failure to make disclosure was that "it had never occurred to him or 'registered' in his mind that a loan such as this was the kind of thing he was required to include on an SF 278." (Report p. 75) That it "never occurred to him" to disclose receipt of a sizable financial favor and the resulting debt to an individual whom he was appointing to work under him in the White House exhibits an extraordinary indifference to the purposes of the required financial disclosure and the need to avoid both actual and apparent conflicts of interest.

4. While enjoying favorable treatment on several hundred thousand dollars in loans from the Great American First Savings Bank, Mr. Meese supported the appointments of several officers of the Bank.

Prior to President Reagan's election in 1980, the Meeses had two loans from Great American, totalling $120,000, which were secured by the first two deeds of trust on their La Mesa, California home. Mr. Meese noted that when he purchased his La Mesa home, "he went directly to Great American for financial assistance in the purchase of his house, since four officers of the Bank at the time—Messrs. Luce, Schmidt [the person Mr. Meese primarily dealt with on his loans], Sandstrom and Gray—had all served with him in the Reagan [California] administration" (Report, pp. 152-3).

In January 1981, Mr. Meese had two loans outstanding from Great American and was about to negotiate two more loans to finance purchasing a home outside Washington, D.C. Mr. Meese telephoned Edwin Gray, who had been Vice President and Director of Public Affairs at Great American prior to 1980 (when he took a leave of absence), to offer him a position as Deputy Assistant to the President. Mr. Gray, who had previously expressed an interest in a White House position, accepted. After returning to the Bank in August 1982, Mr. Gray was appointed in early 1983 Chairman of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, with Mr. Meese's strong support.

Mr. Meese obtained the third (bridge) loan from Great American in February 1981 for $132,000, secured by a third deed of trust on his California home. This was to cover the down payment on his new Virginia home and other related expenses and was due in full a year later.

Also in February 1981, Great American made a fourth loan to Mr. Meese, secured by a first deed of trust on the Virginia home, for $150,000. The total debt was now $402,000. Anticipating an early sale of the California home, the Bank deferred for a "reasonable period" payments due on the first two loans. Thus because the Bank had deferred this debt and had structured the third loan so that no payments were due prior to 1982, the only Bank obligations the Meeses had to meet in 1981 were the interest payments on the mortgage on their Virginia home. Nonetheless, they failed to make any payments until December 1981.

On June 18, 1981, Gordon Luce, Chairman of the Board and Chief Executive Officer of Great American, was named to the President's Commission on Housing. Mr. Meese apparently took part as a member of the Senior Staff Personnel Committee in approving Mr. Luce. Later in 1982 Mr. Meese approved Mr. Luce's appointment as an Alternate Delegate to the United Nations General Assembly.

On October 14, 1981, Mr. Meese, who was now even more in arrears on his Virginia mortgage payments, approved Marc Sandstrom, the Bank's Executive Vice President and General Counsel, to be a recess appointee to the Board of Directors of the Legal Services Corporation. A few months later Mr. Sandstrom was formally nominated to the Board.

Around the same time, Clarence Pendleton, a member of the Bank's Board of Directors, was nominated to be Chairman of the United States Commission on Civil Rights, a position he assumed several months later. Mr. Meese had supported his nomination, but said he was unaware of Mr. Pendleton's affiliation with Great American.

Until rescued by Mr. Barrack's sale of his California house in September 1982, Mr. Meese's financial situation deteriorated. He became more and more dependent on the Bank's willingness to defer his obligations. In 1982, Great American began trying to obtain payments (which it had deferred) on the first two loans secured by the Meese's house in La Mesa. In February 1982, the Bank informed Mr. Meese by letter that he owed $11,499.84. Mr. Meese did not respond.

Because the third (bridge) loan secured by the La Mesa house, which was due in full in February 1982, also had not been repaid, the bank decided to modify its agreement with Mr. Meese, extending the original note. Repeated requests by the Bank in February, March and April to sign a Modification Agreement extending the loan until June went unanswered. Then, later in April, the Bank decided to extend the bridge loan until August and provide a fourth loan of $21,000 to cover overdue payments on both the Virginia and California properties and to be secured by a fourth deed on the La Mesa property. In May the Meeses accepted the extension on their third loan and the additional loan.

Aside from the additional loan made by Great American to cover past payments due, Mr. Meese failed to make mortgage payments on his two homes from February until September, when his California home was sold.

The Independent Counsel concluded that "despite the various degrees of support Mr. Meese gave to the appointments of Messrs. Luce, Gray, Sandstrom and Pendleton, the evidence does not warrant the finding that such support was connected to the Bank's treatment of the Meeses" (Report, p. 185). The independent Counsel's Report "found no evidence that Messrs. Luce, Gray, Sandstrom and Pendleton were involved materially, if at all, in the Meeses' financial dealings with the Bank." The Bank officials in fact may have not interfered in the Bank's treatment of Mr. Meese. But that does not change the fact that Mr. Meese placed himself in a position where he was repeatedly asked to make official decisions that would affect the careers of individuals who could wield influence over his precarious financial plight. Mr. Meese repeatedly failed to remove himself from situations where his impartiality was clearly threatened by his personal financial status. Here, again, he violated Executive Order 11,222.

The special relevance of these incidents to Mr. Meese's fitness to be Attorney General is demonstrated by a simple example. Suppose that an Assistant Attorney General had financial relations with a bank paralleling those of Mr. Meese with Great American, and the Assistant Attorney General was then called upon to decide whether to authorize legal actions against high officials of the bank. Any lawyer sensitive to the necessity of avoiding conflicts of interest would immediately disqualify himself. His failure to disqualify himself or failure to reveal his connections would lead to the strongest criticism if not disciplinary action.

5. Mr. Meese knowingly accepted apparently preferential treatment in his promotion to Colonel in the Army Reserve, and helped General Berkman, who played a principal role in his promotion, obtain reappointment as Chief of the Army Reserve.

Edwin Meese, while in California, had been a member of the U.S. Army Active Reserve, but in 1977 he retired. In June 1981, while Counsellor to the President, Mr. Meese addressed the annual meeting of the U.S. Army Civil Affairs Association. General William Berkman, the Chief of Army Reserve, was also addressing the meeting. While there, Mr. Meese met his long-time acquaintance, Colonel Joseph Sullivan, who was General Berkman's program and liaison officer. Mr. Meese told Colonel Sullivan that he would be interested in returning to active status.

Colonel Sullivan then worked out a series of complicated steps necessary to return Mr. Meese to active status. An Army Inspector General's Report issued in 1983 concluded that applicable laws and regulations were misapplied, violated or ignored in changing Mr. Meese's status. The Inspector General's Report showed that the irregularities included the creation of a position especially for Mr. Meese.

"In another attempt to assist Mr. Meese" (Report, p. 258), Colonel Sullivan then directed inquiries to see whether an educational requirement that Mr. Meese had failed to complete could be waived in order to permit his promotion to the rank of Colonel. Colonel Sullivan first pressed the Secretary of the Army, John Marsh, to send a letter drafted by Colonel Sullivan to the promotion board requesting a waiver. Mr. Marsh refused.

Then, as a result of Colonel Sullivan's efforts, the Deputy Chief of Staff for Personnel, Lieutenant General Max Thurman, wrote a memorandum on Mr. Meese's options, concluding that constructive educational credit could be granted to Mr. Meese by General Berkman and the Director of the Industrial College of Armed Forces, but advising against doing so that year. General Thurman recommended waiting so that "constructive credit for Mr. Meese could be accomplished as part of 'an orderly piece of work,' and a 'regular and normal affair.'" (Report, p. 267) General Thurman, who showed this memorandum to General Berkman, told the General that he recommended against giving constructive credit at that time "because of the risk that the matter would become publicly known, and would give the appearance of preferential treatment to Mr. Meese." (Report, p. 267)

Secretary of the Army Marsh sent the memorandum to Mr. Meese. Secretary Marsh also testified that he telephoned Mr. Meese to call attention to the memorandum and asked whether Mr. Meese had read it. Although this call surely should have raised a red flag, Mr. Meese, according to Secretary Marsh, said that he intended to take no position and wanted to stay out of the matter. Under the circumstances, Mr. Meese's reply can only lead to the inference that Mr. Meese was content to accept the military promotion appearing to result from preferential treatment. (Mr. Meese said that he did not recall the memorandum and he also could not recall speaking to Secretary Marsh on this subject.)

General Berkman then approved the constructive credit for Mr. Meese in early November. Afterwards, General Berkman hand-carried the request document to Admiral Narmi, the Director of the Industrial College of Armed Forces, who also approved it. Mr. Meese was later promoted to Colonel. In March 1984, several months after the Inspector General's Report concluded that his return to active duty violated the regulations, Mr. Meese retired from the active reserve. However, he retained his Colonelcy.

Around the end of October, General Berkman, whose tour of duty as Army Reserve Chief was expiring in June 1983, indicated his interest in a second term. At about the same time that the constructive credit necessary for Mr. Meese's promotion was granted, Mr. Meese telephoned Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger to recommend General Berkman for another term and also spoke with Army Secretary Marsh to support General Berkman. Mr. Meese explained his recommendation to the Independent Counsel chiefly by saying he had heard good things about General Berkman from persons whose names he could not recall. General Berkman was reappointed. The Independent Counsel concluded that Mr. Meese's telephone call to Secretary Weinberger may have played a part in the decision.

The Independent Counsel concluded that no prosecution was warranted because he "found no direct evidence that Mr. Meese took action favorable to General Berkman in return for something done for Mr. Meese by General Berkman.* * *" (Report, p. 280) Again, we do not challenge the Independent Counsel's conclusion. Nonetheless, Mr. Meese—indifferent to the appearance of exchanging his government influence for private gain—went out of his way to support General Berkman's reappointment, during the period when he was seeking a promotion under General Berkman's command.

IV. TO TREAT EDWIN MEESE AS VINDICATED BY INDEPENDENT COUNSEL'S REPORT IS TO ABANDON THE FAMILIAR AND VITAL DISTINCTION BETWEEN FREEDOM FROM CRIME AND OBSERVANCE OF THE ETHICAL STANDARDS THAT SHOULD BIND PUBLIC OFFICIALS

There is a long and widely recognized distinction between the proscriptions of the criminal law and the ethical standards that should be honored by public officials. Individuals guilty of ethical shortcomings have been forced from office even though there was little or no basis for prosecution, as shown by the familiar instances of Presidential Aide Sherman Adams, Supreme Court Justice Abe Fortas, and National Security Adviser Richard Allen. Senator Goldwater, who took the lead in pressing for Adam's resignation, some years later declared—

"There is much more to [the] high standard [required] of public officials than merely staying within the law.* * *

"It is up to public officials to prove their innocence of moral stain, not up to the public to prove their guilt. It is a question for moral purity in public service."

William Safire, a White House Aide under President Nixon, wrote on March 29, 1984 in connection with Mr. Meese's nomination:

"Mr. Meese should withdraw because he made mistakes that must not be assumed as right; because whatever the explanation, the pattern that emerged of lenders who were patronage recipients must be treated as unethical; because a course of conduct improper on its face cannot go without some political consequences.

Mr. Meese may not be guilty, but he is not blameless; the charges may not lead to indictments, but they are not trivial. He could remain a useful White House counselor—no mieskeit, he—but he would not be a credible Attorney General."

Similarly, on December 31, 1984 the Los Angeles Times observed:

"There may indeed be nothing illegal about a government official conferring public awards on those who have done him private favors, but unproscribed or not, such actions are ethically indefensible."

Recent editorials in other newspapers from coast to coast expressed essentially the same view—The Buffalo News, for example, The Virginian-Pilot, The Charlotte Observer, The Cleveland Plain Dealer, the Kansas City Times, The Des Moines Register, the Austin American-Statesman, the Arizona Daily Star, and The Seattle Times. Opposition on the grounds of cronyism was expressed by the Chicago Tribune.

The settled distinction between criminal and unethical conduct is also widely acknowledged outside the realm of government. Individuals charged with the trust of expressing a fair and impartial judgment for the benefit of others are not free to pass judgment where they have accepted financial favors or otherwise come under obligation. The president of a bank would not tolerate a loan officer who approved a large commercial loan to a realty company which had bought the loan officer's house in order to relieve his financial embarrassment. A newspaper editor would not send out to interview a controversial figure a reporter who had received from the same man an interest-free loan without due date. If the reporter repeatedly turned in favorable stories about individuals who had done him financial favors, without making full disclosure, the editor would not even keep him on the payroll, much less promote him, even though there was no direct proof of quid pro quo.

V. FOR THE SENATE TO REPUDIATE THE ESTABLISHED MORAL STANDARD BY TREATING FREEDOM FROM PROSECUTABILITY AS SUFFICIENT FOR CONFIRMATION AS ATTORNEY GENERAL WOULD HAVE DISASTROUS CONSEQUENCES THROUGHOUT THE GOVERNMENT

To abandon the settled moral standard for a rule that says the President's nominee for Attorney General should be approved whenever there is no basis for criminal prosecution would have disastrous consequences. The Attorney General is our highest law enforcement officer. He must symbolize the fair-minded, impartial, sensitive but impersonal administration of justice. He has more opportunity to set the ethical tone of an Administration than any official other than the President. An individual cannot convincingly symbolize fair-mindedness, impartiality, and freedom from personal interest if he himself has repeatedly accepted material favors and then used his official position in a way that helps his benefactors. The force of the precedent would be felt throughout the government.

1. Consider first the impact within the Department of Justice. Attorneys in the Department are constantly making recommendations and decisions concerning the bringing of suits, the compromise of pending suits, and the prosecution or abandonment of appeals. Tax cases run from simple defense of alleged wrongful collections to collecting civil penalties for fraud to criminal prosecution. Many other cases call for selection over a similar range of possibilities. When a file is first brought to an individual attorney in the Department, only he is likely to know whether he is disqualified. Suppose now that a lawyer in the Tax Division receives a file dealing with alleged income tax delinquencies of the president of a savings and loan association. The central question is whether to sue for penalties for income tax fraud. The association holds a large mortgage on the lawyer's home. The lawyer, being financially hard-pressed, is in default on the mortgage payments. Recently, the bank has been generous in overlooking defaults. The lawyer has never dealt with its president personally. He needs another extension. Should he act on the case? To act would not be a crime. The lawyer knows or should know that most of his colleagues would stand aside as required by the pertinent regulations. But he would also know—if Mr. Meese were confirmed—that the new Attorney General, while in almost exactly the same situation on his debt to the Great American First Savings Bank, had supported the appointment of a Bank official to a federal post without disclosing his obligation to the Bank. The lawyer would also have every reason to suppose that the Senate saw no impropriety. If he followed the obvious parallel, if he followed Attorney General Meese's example, he would not disclose his personal financial involvement with the bank but would decide whether the United States should sue the bank president for fraud.

Perhaps the lawyer recommends, or makes the decision, that no penalties be sought. Later the facts are disclosed. Should the Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Tax Division take disciplinary steps if there is no proof that the lawyer acted in bad faith? He could have no confidence that Attorney General Meese would approve a reprimand or suspension.

The example is not the figment of wild imagination. The Department's lawyers are constantly called upon to make recommendations or to decide whether to authorize criminal prosecutions, civil actions or appeals. Every now and then a lawyer finds on his desk a case involving someone to whom he is indebted or someone he knows. He may even receive requests for favors. In the past, no lawyer has doubted his obligation to stand aside.

2. The repercussions of abandoning the precept that a public servant must not allow his personal financial affairs to become linked to exercise of governmental power or influence by acting in matters affecting individuals who have assisted him financially would reach far beyond the Department of Justice. To say that acceptance of such favors, even when the donors later receive favorable intervention by the recipient, is no barrier to confirmation as Attorney General because there is no prosecutable crime, would license the offer and receipt of such financial favors followed by official action on the donor's requests throughout the government. It would say that Sherman Adams, who committed no prosecutable crime, should not have been forced to resign.

Sherman Adams was, and Edwin Meese is, a high White House official. But the license would run on a small scale to the tens of thousands of officials constantly engaged in making decisions ranging from the letting of multi-million dollar contracts, to appointing junior personnel, to granting or denying claims for social security benefits. Presently, Executive Order 11,222 forbids government officials to act on any matters involving individuals or organizations to whom they may own some personal obligation—if only a debt of gratitude for a financial favor. Harry Pollack, Director of Personnel at the Securities and Exchange Commission for 17 years, has recently written Senators to say: "I had occasion to recommend the disciplining, suspension and/or firing of individuals for violation of the SEC's Conduct Regulation, for infractions in many cases of a lesser severity than those that involved Edwin Meese." Personnel officers in other departments and agencies must have had the same experience. For them to stop enforcing the regulation—to abandon the moral standards embodied in the Executive Order—would quickly destroy the morale of the public services and also the public's confidence in the impartiality and integrity of government. Yet, how could a government personnel officer or higher official continue to take any disciplinary action in such cases if the Senate of the United States has endorsed the principle that one who, as a high White House aide, has repeatedly violated the same regulation and moral standard is fit to be Attorney General because the evidence falls short of showing that he committed a crime? On the ground that the same standards do not apply to the really powerful officials? Or to the President's friends?

The danger of eroding both morale and public confidence is not fanciful. Before the case of Sherman Adams, there were similar favors bestowed upon two of President Truman's aides. Investigations in the late 1940s and early 1950s shook the Bureau of Internal Revenue, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and the Maritime Commission. By the searchlight of publicity, by both Congress and Executive Order, by the promulgation of ethical standards, and by their enforcement, both morale and public confidence were improved. The Senate should not step back.

3. Senator Strom Thurmond has explained as well as anyone the public importance of the ethical standards set by the Senate—set, we submit, not only for the Senate but also for the Senate to use in passing upon specific cases:

"It is our solemn duty to set an example for honesty and integrity in our Nation. If the Congress, the President, and the judiciary do not bear this responsibility, then, our national leadership will cease to be a leadership based on institutional trust and respect (125 Cong. Rec. 8047 (March 17, 1977)). * * *

"The Members of Congress are among our top leaders. If we do not set the standards for the people of this country to follow, who is going to set the standards? To whom can the man on the street look for proper standards of behavior and conduct? To whom can people on the street look to emulate in their life and conduct, especially in public office?" (125 Cong. Rec. 10047 (April 1, 1977).)

Earlier, Senator Paul H. Douglas, in a time shaken by other scandals, pointed out that "there is another and even more compelling reason why we should raise our governmental actions to a higher ethical plane. That is because of the powerful example set by public officials." The example of the Attorney General will be more powerful than any other.

Organized society depends upon a wide network of obligations that cannot be enforced by criminal punishment but that are honored, must be honored, by most of us if free society is to survive. To tell men and women to forget such moral obligations and feel free to say, "The law does not require me to do that, therefore I won't do it," would destroy the trust and confidence upon which we all depend. For a young reporter to fabricate a fascinating story about drug abuse is not criminal. Is the fabrication henceforth to be acceptable? Suppose that an employee of a realty company is charged with finding parcels of land that his employer may buy and sell at a profit. He finds acreage that offers extraordinary profit and therefore buys it for himself. Should it henceforth be tolerated because it is not a crime? The appointed Administrator of a decedent's estate invests $100,000 from the estate in his own business venture, believing that the investment is sound. Such conduct has long been regarded as a breach of trust. It is rarely a crime. Are we therefore to say that henceforth such conduct is acceptable? A businessman gives the Federal Bureau of Investigation a false account of the activities of an associate with whom he has bitterly quarreled. Are we henceforth to say that such fabrications are acceptable if the witness neither took an oath nor put the statement in writing, and therefore committed no crime? One's spontaneous statement to all these questions is "No, of course not." Yet affirmative answers are the inevitable logical consequence of espousing the proposition that one is fit to be Attorney General because the ethical derelictions with which he is charged have been found not to be prosecutable as crimes.

In summary, the essential issue before the Senate Judiciary Committee and the Senate can be shortly stated. The Report of Independent Counsel does not resolve the question of whether Mr. Meese's conduct as Counsellor to the President violated ethical standards so seriously as to disqualify him from becoming Attorney General. Independent Counsel explicitly denied requests to pass judgment either upon the charges of unethical conduct or upon Mr. Meese's fitness to be Attorney General.

Nor can the Senate responsibly defer to the President's judgment upon whether Mr. Meese's conduct, while Counsellor to the President, violated established ethical standards and Executive Order 11,222 so plainly and so often as to disable him from performing the Attorney General's high responsibility of both symbolizing and ensuring fair-minded, even-handed and sensitive administration of justice untainted by personal favor, gratitude or other obligation. Senators have not infrequently thought that they should not oppose a Cabinet appointment because critical of the nominee's political or legal philosophy. Common Cause does not oppose Mr. Meese's confirmation on that ground. There are many highly conservative lawyers who would bring distinction to the office of Attorney General and inspire the highest morale and professional standards throughout the Department. Possibly, a Senator might think that he should not seek to pass judgment on the professional competence, reputation or experience of a nominee. That point seems arguable, but we do not press it here. We do submit, however, that the Constitution puts upon the Senate of the United States the full and independent responsibility of deciding whether a nominee can be expected to conform to the ethical standards befitting public officials, especially those charged with the administration of justice.

Mr. Meese enjoyed financial favors, which he followed with the exercise of governmental power in favor of his benefactors. In the past, such conduct has long been condemned as grossly unethical, even if there was no proof of a causal connection. For the Senate to confirm Mr. Meese on the ground that Independent Counsel found no basis for criminal prosecution would therefore assert that, in passing on the fitness of a nominee for the Nation's chief law officer, the Senate is indifferent to ethical violations—provided only that the nominee has committed no crime. More particularly, the vote to confirm Mr. Meese would say not only to thousands of government officials and employees but people everywhere:

"We, United States Senators, think that anyone in public office should feel free to accept large financial favors that might not otherwise come to him. Don't worry that those who do you a favor may later look for government appointments or have business with government that you may affect. Don't even worry about later participating in their appointment, or their receipt of other governmental benefits. We, as Senators, see nothing wrong in this. Just be sure not to commit a crime."

Not just confirmation of Edwin Meese but the moral code of the Senate is at stake.

COMMON CAUSE,
Washington, DC, February 14, 1985.

DEAR SENATOR: I write, both personally and on behalf of Common Cause, to urge you to vote against the confirmation of Edwin Meese to be Attorney General of the United States.

In deciding whether to confirm Mr. Meese, the Senate bears a heavy responsibility, with potential consequences that reach far beyond this man, or this office.

We recognize that much can be said for the Senate's deferring to the President's choice insofar as objections relate to his philosophy or policies. But however controversial the issue of voting on a nominee's policies may be, no one may reasonably challenge the Senate's responsibility, indeed its duty, to consider ethical standards of conduct in reaching a determination on the next Attorney General. In the nomination before it, the Senate must determine—uncomfortable though it will be—whether Mr. Meese has observed the ethical standards required of a public official. It must decide whether Mr. Meese's example, as the chief legal officer of the Nation, would encourage the highest standards of integrity and freedom from favoritism or other self-interest in government. It will decide whether the Senate honors its responsibility to set an example of ethical sensitivity and integrity in government.

The Senate must make its own determination of the ethical propriety of Mr. Meese's conduct. The Report of the Independent Counsel does not pass judgment upon whether Mr. Meese's conduct disqualifies him from being Attorney General. Indeed, Mr. Jacob Stein, Esq. as Independent Counsel, refused to evaluate Mr. Meese's fitness to be Attorney General and expressed "an expectation that . . . [this issue] will not remain unexplored by those who will strive to do so free from all bias and prejudice." Mr. Stein's conclusion that there was no basis for bringing a criminal indictment against Mr. Meese did not exonerate him of all wrongdoing.

The independent Counsel's Report shows that Mr. Meese repeatedly participated in appointing to high government positions individuals who had done or were doing him financial favors or who were affiliated with an organization that had done him financial favors. This was wrong.

It is wrong for a government official to accept financial assistance from a benefactor who has solicited help in obtaining an official position, or to accept help in relieving him of financial difficulties and then use his official position to support that benefactor's appointment to high office. It is wrong for a government official who is heavily in debt to a bank that has treated him as a preferred customer to then use his official position to support the bank's officers for government positions. It is wrong for a government official to accept apparently preferential treatment in a promotion and then use his official influence to help someone who played a role in his promotion.

There is—and should be—an inviolate rule of conduct governing all who, as public servants, have been entrusted with the public welfare. A public servant should never mix the exercise of official power or influence with personal financial affairs. If the proposed appointment or business of a benefactor unexpectedly comes before a public official, that official should stand aside.

High officials who violated these precepts have, upon discovery, been severely criticized and forced to resign. When it became known that Associate Justice Abe Fortas had accepted a substantial sum from a financier, he was forced to resign from the Supreme Court even though he neither gave nor promised judicial favor, nor promised to intervene elsewhere on the financier's behalf. When it became known that Sherman Adams, the senior White House aide to President Eisenhower, had accepted the present of a vicuna coat, and other gifts from a textile executive who had matters pending before other parts of the government, Sherman Adams was forced to resign, even though he had committed no crime. Senator Barry Goldwater, a leader in forcing Adams' resignation, succinctly stated a few years later: "There is much more to high standard of public officials than merely staying within the law. . . . It is a question for moral purity in public service."

The principles stated above have been made applicable to all government employees in the executive Branch by Executive Order 11,222, which forbids a government employee to do anything that "might result in, or create the appearance of . . . giving preferential treatment to any organization or person" or of "losing complete independence or impartiality of action." A public official who accepts financial favors, such as Mr. Meese accepted, plainly risks "losing complete independence or impartiality of action." And surely one who accepts financial favors and thereafter participates in naming his benefactor to a govenment office, as Mr. Meese did, engages in conduct "which might create the appearance of . . . giving preferential treatment."

The executive order is necessary to ensure that all of us get evenhanded, impartial judgments by public officials, untainted by gratitude for past financial favors or hope of future financial benefit. The order has heretofore been enforced throughout the government. In the Department of Housing and Urban Development a Construction Analyst was reprimanded for recommending for employment by a HUD client a contractor who had purchased the Construction Analyst's home. In the Small Business Administration an Assistant District Director was removed from office for approving loans to borrowers with whom he had a financial relationship, including borrowers who had sold him property. Mr. Harry Pollack, who was Director of Personnel at the Securities and Exchange Commission for 17 years and was responsible for administering that agency's rules of conduct, has stated he "had occasions to recommend the disciplining, suspension and/or firing of individuals for violations of the SEC's Conduct Regulation, for infractions in many cases of a lesser serverity than those that involved Edwin Meese. . . ."

In a letter to Senators Thurmond and Biden dated January 29, 1985, David H. Martin, Director of the Office of Government Ethics has certified that Mr. Meese "was in compliance with applicable laws and regulations. Much of Mr. Martin's reasoning is patently absurd. For example, ethics regulations prohibit an employee from accepting "any gift . . . loan, or any thing of monetary value from a person who . . . [h]as interests which may be substantially affected by the performance or nonperformance of [the employee's] official duty." Mr. Meese accepted from John McKean an extension of the date for paying interest on an overdue loan at a time when he knew that Mr. McKean was seeking a government appointment that would "be substantially affected" by Mr. Meese's support while performing his duty of passing on such appointments. Mr. Martin writes that the regulation is inapplicable because Mr. McKean was lending other people's money. But it was Mr. McKean who arranged the first loan and Mr. McKean who made the new loan by deciding to agree to deferral of overdue interest. Mr. McKean gave help that Mr. Meese needed, and it was at least partly to Mr. McKean that Mr. Meese became personally obligated. Whether Mr. McKean was agent or trustee for an undisclosed principal is manifestly irrelevant.

Mr. Martin also suggests, for example, that the ethics regulation that prohibits actions that might create the appearance of losing complete independence is inapplicable because Mr. Meese did not "initiate" Mr. McKean's appointment. There is a conflict of interest when an official participates in a government decision involving someone to whom he is under obligation for personal financial assistance regardless of who "initiates" the action.

Mr. Martin's principal reason for exculpating Mr. Meese appears to be that this was an appearance problem only and there existed credible explanations for the actions of both Mr. McKean and Mr. Meese independent of their financial relationships. Similar arguments were presented on behalf of Mr. Meese at the recent Judiciary Committee hearings.

Mr. Martin's view that one may look behind a conflict of interest to see whether there was actually a corrupt bargain flies in the face of Executive Order 11,222, quoted above. The Executive Order has not been applied in that fashion in other cases. Mr. Martin's interpretation also flies in the face of the historic principle applicable to all those, inside or outside government, who hold positions of trust. A trustee is guilty of a breach of trust if he invests money or otherwise acts on behalf of the trust in a situation that also may affect his personal financial situation. The same rule applies to government officials, who are charged with acting as trustees for the people. Mixing personal financial affairs with government business does not merely give the appearance of wrongdoing. It does not constitute a kind of tentative conclusion—subject to further investigation of the official's "true" intentions. The appearance of wrongdoing cannot be dismissed as a misinterpretation, misperception, or misconstruction of the official's actions by those observing the official—that can be corrected with greater information. The mixing of financial favors and official duties is itself a wrong and is generally understood to be wrong.

The reasoning behind this rule is simple and straightforward.

First, the public is entitled to the independent judgment of officials whose impartiality cannot have been tainted by the receipt of financial benefits from those whose cases they must judge. The government official is bound to know that if he accepts a personal favor in his hour of financial need, then it will be virtually impossible for him later to act upon the business of his benefactor wholly without some sense of obligation or gratitude. Neither he nor anyone else can possibly be sure that his judgment was unaffected. Senator Paul Douglas, one of the most distinguished Senators of this century, explained the reason while discussing the problem that arises when a government official accepts financial favors:

"What happens is a gradual shifting of a man's loyalties from the community to those who have been doing him favors. His final decisions are, therefore, made in response to his private frendships and loyalties rather than to the public good. Throughout this whole process, the official will claim—and may indeed believe—that there is no causal connection between the favors he has received and the decisions which he makes. He will assert that the favors were given and received on the basis of pure friendship unsullied by worldly considerations. He will claim that the decisions, on the other hand, will have been made on the basis of the justice and equity of the particular case."

Second, even if the official could achieve complete impartiality of judgment, the sight of a government official approving for office individuals who have done him financial favors undermines public confidence in the integrity of government.

Third, the sight of a government official approving for office individuals who have done him favors sets a destructive example, inviting other government officials actually to use their offices for personal gain.

The rule against mixing personal financial favors with government duties and influence has been long accepted. Yet to this day Mr. Meese has never admitted or agreed that his conduct in support of his benefactors was wrong. He has couched his statements that he would act differently in terms of his desire to avoid the misinterpretations—the errors—of his critics. In effect, his position is that the wrong lies not in him but in others. And by this reasoning, it follows that if no one doubted the innocence of Mr. Meese's intentions, there would be nothing wrong with his continuing to act officially on behalf of those who provided him substantial favors.

What would it mean to confirm Edwin Meese as Attorney General?

Edwin Meese has admitted no wrong. The issue is drawn. The Senate must decide between affirming the ethical standards of conduct previously required of public officials or endorsing a reinterpretation that eviscerates the precept against mixing personal financial affairs with the exercise of government power. The established rules generally applicable to government employees cannot long be sustained if the Senate of the United States has voted that one who, as a high White House aide, repeatedly violated the same regulation and moral standard is fit to be Attorney General. How can the case of Mr. Meese be conscientiously distinguished? Surely not on the ground that the general standards do not apply to the really powerful officials. Nor to the President's friends.

The repercussions of rejecting the settled ethical precept and established government rule would reach far beyond the Department of Justice. To say that accepting favors followed by favorable government action by the recipient is no barrier to confirmation as Attorney General would license the mixing of favors and official duty throughout the government. It would say that Sherman Adams, who committed no prosecutable crime, should not have been forced to resign. It would say that Justice Abe Fortas, who merely accepted financial favors and committed no prosecutable crime, should not have been forced to resign. It would send a signal of ethical blindness to the tens of thousands of officials constantly engaged in making decisions ranging from the letting of multi-million dollar contracts, to appointing junior personnel, to granting or denying claims for social security benefits.

In the past, conduct such as Mr. Meese's has been condemned as grossly unethical, even if there was no proof of a causal connection. For the Senate to confirm Mr. Meese on the ground that Independent Counsel found no basis for criminal prosecution would therefore assert that, in passing on the fitness of a nominee for the Nation's chief law officer, the Senate is indifferent to ethical violations—provided only that the nominee has committed no crime. More particularly, the vote to confirm Mr. Meese would say:

"We, United States Senators, think that anyone in public office should feel free to accept large financial favors that might not otherwise come to him. Don't worry that those who do you a favor may later look for government appointment or have business with government that you may affect. Don't even worry about later participating in their appointment, or their receipt of other governmental benefits. We, as Senators, see nothing wrong in this. Just be sure not to commit a crime."

More than any other appointment to the Executive Branch, the Attorney General of the United States is responsible for setting the moral tone of an Administration. In exercising its responsibility for the confirmation of Edwin Meese III to be Attorney General, the Senate will demonstrate the moral code it holds applicable to the officials of the United States Government.

I urge you to affirm the standards of conduct necessary for public confidence in the integrity of government, and to vote against the confirmation of Edwin Meese.

sincerely,

ARCHIBALD COX,
Chairman.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, It is also important that the public has access to a detailed summary of the facts discussed in the report of the independent counsel as well as testimony given during the hearings of the Judiciary Committee that bear on the ethical questions that have been raised by the record in this matter. My staff has prepared a summary of this information and I ask that this document be included in the RECORD.

The document follow:

BRIEFING PAPER ON NOMINATION OF EDWIN MEESE TO BE ATTORNEY GENERAL

Questions about Mr. Meese's conduct raised by the Report of the Independent Counsel and the hearings before the Judiciary Committee fall in these areas:

1. His participation in recommending Presidential appointments for persons with whom he had business dealings;

2. His acceptance of a promotion to colonel in the Army Reserve despite a finding by the Army Inspector General that he had been given preferential treatment;

3. His acceptance of a $10,000 check designated "moving expenses" from the Presidential Transition Trust despite the fact that he was informed of a criminal prohibition on reimbursement for these expenses; and

4. His violation of financial disclosure rules and failure to recall certain information.

(Unless otherwise noted, page references are to the Report of Independent Counsel Concerning Edwin Meese III. Page references to the 1985 hearings are to the original transcript.)

This briefing paper discusses some of the key findings in the Report of the Independent Counsel as well as testimony given at the hearings that bear on these issues. In addition, a number of other areas received some attention at the hearings, including Mr. Meese's relationship with General Dynamics and its disputes with the Justice Department and the Navy over cost overruns, the claim by Mr. Meese and his lawyers for attorneys' fees resulting from the investigation of the independent Counsel, and Mr. Meese's possible knowledge of internal papers from the 1980 Carter campaign in the possession of the Reagan camp. Although these issues may also come up in the debate over Mr. Meese's confirmation, this paper does not discuss them.

PARTICIPATION IN PRESIDENTIAL APPOINTMENTS

White House Standards of Conduct required Mr. Meese to avoid the possibility or appearance of conflict and to decline to accept things of monetary value from a person if the performance of his official duty substantially affected that person. Nevertheless, Mr. Meese participated in a series of decisions by the Senior Staff Personnel Committee in the White House to recommend Presidential appointments for persons with whom he had financial dealings. The evidence in the report indicates that Mr. Meese did not disclose his financial dealings to the Senior Staff Committee or decline to participate.

The general conflict of interest standard for White House employees in the Code of Federal Regulations, which applied to Mr. Meese (see 3 C.F.R. Section 100.735-8), provides that:

"Each employee (should) avoid becoming involved in situations which present the possibility, or even the appearance, that his official position might be used to his private advantage."

The more specific rule regarding the acceptance of gifts, entertainment, and favors (see 3 C.F.R. Section 100.735-14) provides that:

"An employee shall not . . . accept, directly or indirectly, any gift, gratuity, favor, entertainment, loan or any other thing of monetary value from a person who: . . . has interests which may be substantially affected by the performance or nonperformance of (the employee's) official duty."

The rules specifically exempt accepting loans from banks or other financial institutions on "customary terms." Consequently, loans from individuals or organizations that are not banks or financial institutions are covered by the rules as well as any loan from banks or financial institutions that are made on special, preferred terms.

THE MCKEAN APPOINTMENTS

Mr. Meese participated on two occasions in decisions to recommend Presidential appointments for John McKean. In June 1981, Mr. McKean met with Mr. Meese on two occasions to arrange a loan of $40,000. (pp. 110, 114) The loan was unsecured and interest was not payable for a year. (p. 146) On July 27, Mr. McKean's name came before the Senior Staff Personnel Committee for a recommendation for an appointment to the Postal Board of Governors. (p. 125)

Mr. McKean's name was not on the original list of possible nominees submitted by the Office of Presidential Personnel. (p. 120) Mr. Meese participated in the July 27 decision to recommend Mr. McKean and told the Committee that he knew him and that he would be good for the job. (p. 123) None of those present at the meeting recalled that Mr. Meese said anything about his financial relationship with Mr. McKean or suggested recusing himself (pp. 124-125).

In December 1981, Mr. McKean arranged another $20,000 loan for Mr. Meese on the same terms of the earlier loan—unsecured and no interest payable for a year. (pp. 128, 146) In June 1982, an interest payment was due on the first loan, but no payment was made. (p. 130) On November 8, 1982, Mr. McKean met with Mr. Meese to arrange an extension of credit on the two loans and to arrange deferring the interest until 1983. (p. 131) The agenda for this meeting suggests that at this same meeting Mr. McKean raised his interest in a longer term on the Board. (p. 133)

(This "tentative agenda" was included in a November 4, 1982, letter from Mr. McKean to Mr. Meese. It lists several items for disucssion, including "1. Note renewals . . . 2. Interest Billing . . . 4. United States Postal Board of Governors term of office . . .") According to Mr. McKean, at that same meeting, or in another conversation around that time, Mr. Meese agreed to support him. (p. 134)

On November 17, 1982, Mr. McKean's name came before the Senior Staff Committee for a recommendation for a longer term. Mr. Meese participated in this decision and there is no indication in the Report of the Independent Counsel that he disclosed his relationship with Mr. McKean to the Committee. (p. 135) No payment was made on either loan until August 1983, over two years after the initial loan and after stories about the loans had appeared in newspaper articles. (p. 137)

The Office of Government Ethics analyzed whether or not Mr. Meese had violated White House Standards of Conduct in accepting the loans and interest deferrals arranged by Mr. McKean, then participating in the decisions to recommend Presidential appointments for him. A memorandum, dated January 14, 1985, prepared by two staff attorneys in the Office of Government Ethics concluded:

". . . with respect to the loan Mr. Meese received from his accountant, Mr. McKean, our examination reveals three ethics violations. Mr. Meese should not have participated when Mr. McKean came before the senior staff twice for approval with respect to positions on the Postal Board of Governors." (memorandum, p. 2)

After the staff discussed their memorandum with Mr. Martin, the Director of the Office of Government Ethics, these conclusions were modified. According to Mr. Martin's letter to the Committee, dated Jan. 29, 1985, the final conclusion of the Office of Government Ethics was that there were no violations of the Standards of Conduct in the case of the McKean appointments. Mr. Martin concluded that there was no violation of the rule regarding accepting things of monetary value because Mr. McKean was the trustee of the loan and did not use his personal funds. (Martin letter, Jan. 29, 1985, p. 2) He concluded that there was no appearance of impropriety (or, as Mr. Martin put it, no "substance to the appearance problem") for these reasons;

"At the time the loans were made, there was no evidence that Mr. McKean was interested in, or even contemplated receiving, a federal position;

"Both loans were arms-length transactions at higher than prevailing bank rate interest;

"Consideration of Mr. McKean's name was initiated by Mr. Deaver;

"Mr. Deaver initiated the nomination of Mr. McKean for a longer term on the Board, at which time the appointment process was already in motion; and

"The Independent Counsel's report found no evidence that Mr. Meese spoke to anyone or took any action to assist Mr. McKean in obtaining a longer term." (Martin letter, p. 2)

Archibald Cox, former Solicitor General and Chairman of Common Cause, testified as to his interpretation of conflict of interest regulations for federal employees. In regard to the McKean appointments and Mr. Meese's participation, Mr. Cox testified:

"I think he should have taken himself out of any discussions of appointment(s) for people to whom he was either indebted or people who had rendered him financial assistance . . . to discuss McKean's desire for a full term on the Postal Board of Governors, at the same time he discussed whether interest would be deferred, was itself a wrong. And, indeed, to accept the loan from one who was coming before the Presidential Personnel Board violated the regulations applicable to the White House . . ." (Tr. p. 187, 1/31/85).

As to Mr. Martin's argument that there was no violation of the rule regarding acceptance of gifts or other things of monetary value because the loans were not from Mr. McKean's personal funds, Mr. Cox testified:

"I must say, in reading the letter from the Office of Government Ethics, when I read that I found it incredible. I do find it incredible that anyone would say, oh, it doesn't matter, because Mr. McKean, with whom Mr. Meese dealt, was acting for another." (Tr. 188, 1/31/85)

As to Mr. Martin's argument that Mr. McKean did not give Mr. Meese something of value when he made the decision to defer payments, Mr. Cox stated:

". . . Certainly it's of value to me, if I am in arrears of interest on a debt and can't pay it, to have it extended. I don't see how anybody could see it in any other terms. It's something of value." (Tr. 190, 1/31/85)

Although the interest rate may have been comparable to interest rates charged for personal loans at that time, the fact that the loans were unsecured, with no interest payable for a year, indicates that these were not the type of loans that were customarily available to persons in Mr. Meese's financial condition. In addition, the payments were deferred on the loans for over two years. The Report of the Indepenent Counsel states:

". . . it could be concluded—and we assumed arguendo for purposes of our analysis—that Mr. McKean afforded the Meeses something of value by arranging for them, quickly and on an informal basis, an unsecured $40,000 loan (later increased to $60,000) with no interest payable for at least a year, particularly inasmuch as at a late time interest payments were waived for over 14 months." (P. 146)

In short, the argument that Mr. McKean did not give Mr. Meese something of monetary value is based on the fact that the loan was not from Mr. McKean's personal funds. On the other hand, Mr. McKean made the decision to arrange the June 1981 loan. (pp. 111-113) Mr. McKean made the decision to arrange the December 1981 loan. (p. 128) Mr. McKean agreed to a deferral of payments at the November 1982 meeting with Mr. Meese (p. 131) Consequently, the evidence shows that Mr. McKean played a major role in arranging these loans and deferring payments.

In regard to Mr. Martin's argument that the appointment was initiated by Mr. Deaver, Mr. Cox stated:

". . . I find it unbelievable that anybody could think that it matters who spoke first.

"Imagine what applying that rule through the government would be . . . I can't believe that Mr. Martin intends to generalize such a rule all through the government employees of the United States. I really find it frightening." (Tr. 191, 1/31/85)

As Mr. Cox pointed out, applying such a rule would mean that, as long as an employee was not the first person to be responsible for a matter or to recommend action, he or she would be free to participate regardless of financial conflicts of interest. (Id.)

Finally, as to Mr. Martin's argument that Mr. McKean was not interested in a federal position at the time of the loans, this statement is correct as of the time the initial loan was made in July 1981. However, at the time of the second loan in December 1981, Mr. McKean had already received an appointment to the Postal Board of Governors. At the time of the agreement to defer payments on the loan in November 1982, Mr. McKean was actively seeking an appointment to a longer term of the Board. (see pp. 133-134). The agenda of the November 8, 1982 meeting suggests that Mr. McKean raised his request for reappointment at the same meeting at which Mr. McKean agreed to a deferral of payments. (pp. 131, 133-134). Moreover, the terms of the Standards of Conduct are not limited to cases in which a person is seeking a favor at the time he provides something of monetary value to a government official.

THE BARRACK APPOINTMENT

Mr. Meese also participated in the decision to recommend a Presidential appointment for Thomas Barrack in February 1983. (p. 225) Mr. Meese first spoke with Mr. Barrack in August 1982 when Mr. Barrack agreed to try to help Mr. Meese sell his California home, which had remained on the market for almost two years. (p. 189)

Mr. Barrack eventually arranged the sale of Mr. Meese's house by finding buyers and arranging financing. No commission was paid to Mr. Barrack for his role in the sale of the house. (p. 196) In addition, Mr. Barrack eventually contributed $83,000 of his own funds in connection with the sale of the house. (p. 203)

The Independent Councel did not find evidence that Mr. Meese was aware that Mr. Barrack contributed financially to the sale of the house. (p. 223) However, even aside from Mr. Barrack's financial contribution, the Report concluded that Mr. Barrack assisted Mr. Meese in several ways that Mr. Meese knew about:

"We found that Mr. Barrack assisted the Meeses in several respects. He found the Howards to buy the property, negotiated the initial price and other terms of the sale with Mr. Meese, and negotiated both the final sales price and the Howards' loan with the bank. These facts were known to Mr. Meese." (p. 223)

The staff of the Office of Government Ethics also analyzed whether Mr. Meese's conduct in this situation violated White House Standards of Conduct. In their January 14 memorandum, the staff stated:

". . . Mr. Meese's approval of Mr. Barrack's appointment involves an appearance problem under 3 C.F.R. 100.735-4(c). Because Mr. Meese had received Mr. Barrack's assistance in the sale of his home, he had a personal interest in the appointment. Mr. Meese's participation in the approval of Mr. Barrack's appointment gives the appearance of preferential treatment and raises the question of whether Mr. Meese could have retained his impartiality." (p. 2)

After discussions with Mr. Martin, this conclusion was also modified. Mr. Martin concluded there was no violation of any standard of conduct in regard to the Barrack appointment because:

"Mr. Barrack arranged or found purchasers for the Meese residence based on his belief that it was a good deal for the purchasers. Additionally, Mr. Meese was unaware of any financial involvement by Mr. Barrack. The sale of the Meese residence took place in September, 1982 and Mr. Barrack's appointment was not even considered until February, 1983." (Martin letter, p. 2)

Mr. Cox testified that "Mr. Meese should not have acted when the recommendation of Mr. Barrack came up." (Tr. 189, 1/31/85) As to Mr. Martin's argument that there was no violation of a standard of conduct because Mr. Meese did not know that Mr. Barrack had contributed $83,000 of his own funds in connection with the sale of the house, Mr. Cox stated:

". . . the Independent Counsel did find that Mr. Barrack assisted the Meeses in respects that Mr. Meese did know about. He found the Howards to buy the property, negotiated the initial price, other terms of sale with Mr. Meese, negotiated both the financial sales prices and the Howards' loan with the bank.

"It was terribly important to the Meeses' financial condition that somebody do these things." (Tr. 193, 1/31/85)

Mrs. Meese, in fact, commented before a November 1982 dinner with Mr. Barrack that he is the one "with the halo around his head." (p. 218)

In regard to Mr. Martin's argument that there was no violation of a standard of conduct because the decision to recommend a Presidential appointment occurred five months after the house sale, Mr. Cox testified:

". . . Considering the amount of aid that Mr. Barrack gave Mr. Meese in trying to sell the house . . . I don't think that six months or five months was anywhere near enough to say, oh, that's a thing of the past. It is also significant . . . that Mr. Meese's connections with Mr. Barrack had multiplied. Mr. Barrack had been coming to his office at times when Mr. Barrack is talking about a government job; they meet again in November at dinner . . . Mr. Meese goes and stays at Mr. Barrack's ranch . . . This certainly would be calculated to keep the earlier transaction very much in the foreground." (Tr. 192, 1/31/85)

In addition to Mr. Meese's participation in this decision, there are a number of questions about the accuracy and completeness of Mr. Meese's recollection of the series of meetings between Mr. Barrack and Mr. Meese during the period when Mr. Barrack was searching for a federal position. Neither Mr. Meese nor Mr. Barrack recalled a meeting in Mr. Meese's office on September 8 until they were shown a letter to Mr. Meese from Mr. Barrack referring to the meeting and thanking him for his "counsel and encouragement." (p. 210) Mr. Barrack explained the note as a reference to discussing with Mr. Meese the problems of moving to New York City. (p. 210)

Mr. Barrack also had dinner with Mr. and Mrs. Meese on November 9, 1982 at a Georgetown restaurant. (p. 218) Both Mr. Barrack and Mr. Meese said there was no discussion of the fact that Mr. Barrack was interested in a federal position even though Mr. Barrack interviewed with two cabinet secretaries that day and planned to interview with three more during the next two days. (p. 215) Finally, Mr. Meese stayed at Mr. Barrack's ranch over Thanksgiving 1982. (p. 219) In response to a letter from Chairman Thurmond prior to the hearing last year inquiring about the circumstances of Mr. Meese's relationship with Mr. Barrack, Mr. Meese mentioned only the meeting with Mr. Barrack in November 1982. (See letter from Edwin Meese to Chairman Thurmond, February 29, 1984, p. 5.)

PROMOTION TO COLONEL

Mr. Meese testified to the Committee last March that he insisted that the Army follow its rules in dealing with his transfer to the Active Reserve and his promotion to colonel. he said that he was a "victim of bad judgment within the Army" because of the Army's extensive violations of its own procedures. (Tr., p. B 112) He also testified:

"I also stated at that time that I wanted to be absolutely sure in view of my civilian position that there was no special treatment, no favoritism, or no bending of any rules in regard to my case.

"The result of (the Inspector General's investigation) clearly verified the fact that I did not seek any special treatment, and indeed, made specific representations to the contrary, and the investigation further stated that at no time did I have either any involvement in, seeking of, or knowledge of, any special treatment. (Tr., pp. A25–A26)

"I certainly did not seek special treatment. Indeed, I specifically asked not to have any special treatment. All of the actions you have described were totally unknown to me." (Tr., p. B110)

The Independent Counsel, however, found that Mr. Meese was sent a memo written by the Deputy Chief of Staff of the Army stating that he was educationally unqualified for promotion to colonel. The memorandum warned that Mr. Meese should not be promoted unless others in his position were given the same opportunity to bypass the required course work. In order to avoid the necessity for Mr. Meese to complete the course work, the Army was considering giving him "constructive credit" for his work experience. However, the memorandum pointed out that constructive credit had not been awarded during fiscal year 1982 for the level of course work required by Mr. Meese. The memo stated that only 610 of 2,500 persons on the list to be considered for promotion would be promoted that year. While almost all the persons on the eligible list were educationally qualified, Mr. Meese was not.

For all these reasons, the memorandum recommended against consideration of his promotion that year and in favor of deferring consideration until others in Mr. Meese's position could have the same opportunity to apply for constructive credit. By deferring consideration, the memo concluded, Mr. Meese's application could be pursued "in a normal fashion" and his promotion could be pursued as an "orderly piece of work" and a "regular and normal affair."

No copy was made of this memorandum and the original was given to the Secretary of the Army, John Marsh. (p. 267) Secretary Marsh then sent the original of this memo to Mr. Meese and called him personally about it. (p. 269) The report cites Secretary Marsh as recalling that: "Mr. Meese 'did not wish to take any action,' and indicated that he simply wished to take no position, and wanted to stay out of the matter." (See p. 269)

Questions about Mr. Meese's promotion led to an investigation by the Inspector General of the Army. The Army Inspector General's Report concluded that Mr. Meese did not meet the education requirements for the promotion and was given preferential treatment. (p. 261) The Inspector General's Report also concluded that Mr. Meese had no knowledge of violations of regulations or special treatment. The IG's Report, however, makes no reference to the facts that the memorandum was given to Secretary Marsh, that it was then sent to Mr. Meese, and that Secretary Marsh called Mr. Meese about the memo. Apparently, the investigators were unaware of these developments.

The principal issue for the Committee was whether Mr. Meese was put on notice of this possibility of preferential treatment but, nevertheless, accepted the promotion. An additional issue was whether he was straightforward with the Committee in testifying that he insisted on no special treatment and had no knowledge of it.

Mr. Meese testified that he did not recall the telephone call from Secretary Marsh. (Tr. p. 164, 1/30/85) However, he was able to state what he believed was said:

"Mr. MEESE. I think that probably the conversation was very benign, in the sense that he said he was probably sending Colonel Sullivan over to talk to me, but he certainly, at no time, I'm sure, said anything about there being any problem with this promotion, or it would have registered with me . . ." (Tr. p. 164, 1/30/85)

Mr. Meese responded similarly in response to questions from Senator Baucus:

"Senator BAUCUS. Did you receive a telephone call from anyone advising you of possible questions about the propriety of the promotion?

"Mr. MEESE. There is a telephone call referred to in the Independent Counsel's report, purportedly from the Secretary of the Army. I do not remember the phone call, but I am sure that in the phone call nothing was raised about any questions." (Tr. pp. 21–22, 1/30/85)

Although Mr. Meese testified that he did not recall the memorandum, he was able to state how the memorandum was delivered to him:

"Senator METZENBAUM. . . . This is a memo written entirely about you. It's written by a Lieutenant General, the Army Deputy Chief of Staff for Personnel. The Secretary of the Army calls you about it. He recalls that you returned it to him. . . . you don't recollect—you say you didn't see it. How do you explain that to the Committee?

"Mr. MEESE. I think it's very simple, Senator. I don't recall it because I don't believe that it ever came to me and that I ever saw it. I believe, and I reflect on this partially because of the Independent Counsel's inquiry, that Colonel Sullivan probably brought the memo and asked if I wanted to see a memo on the subject of my promotion.

"I would have taken the same position then as I always did, that I did not want to see any internal Army documents pertaining to my promotion, because I did not want to have any special information or take any special part, or have any involvement other than what any other Army officer in my position would have." (Tr. pp. 247–248, 1/30/85)

The thrust of Mr. Meese's testimony is that Colonel Sullivan probably brought the memorandum to him, but that he did not look at it. He testified that he did not recall the telephone call from Secretary Marsh. Secretary Marsh's statement to the Independent Counsel was that he personally called Mr. Meese about the memorandum and that Mr. Meese told him he wanted to take no action and stay out of the matter. In addition, the Report of the Independent Counsel indicates that Mr. Meese was aware of the problem of inadequate course work at the time Secretary Marsh sent the memo to him because of Mr. Meese's discussion with Colonel Sullivan about the possibility of a waiver or constructive credit as a substitute for the course work. (p. 266)

In summary, the question is whether Mr. Meese had sufficient notice of the concerns raised within the Army that he should have taken more affirmative actions to insure that the Army follow its regular procedures.

REIMBURSEMENT FOR MOVING EXPENSES

Mr. Meese accepted and kept a $10,000 check for moving expenses issued to him from the Presidential Transition Trust in November 1980. (p. 342) The check was marked "moving expenses" and was intended by the Trust to assist Mr. Meese and other officials in the new administration in their move to Washington. (pp. 342–344) After Mr. Meese had deposited the check, he was informed that the lawyers for the Trust, and subsequently the Office of Legal Counsel in the Justice Department, had concluded a criminal statute probably prohibited him from accepting reimbursement for moving expenses. (pp. 344–345) Mr. Meese told the lawyer who advised him of the problem not to pursue the matter further, but did not tell him he had already deposited the check. (p. 345) According to Mr. Meese's own recollection, after he was informed of the prohibition, he contacted someone at the Trust, probably Helene von Damm, and directed her to alter the Trust records to reflect a payment of a consulting fee. (See pp. 345–346). The designation "moving expenses" on the canceled check and checkbook stub were altered to show "consulting fees." In addition, the Trust altered the records of four other checks—$10,000 checks to E. Pendleton James and Michael Deaver, a $2,000 check to Helene von Damm, and a $9,942.30 check to William Clark. (p. 346)

The first question about these circumstances is whether this payment could, in substance, only be considered as reimbursement for moving expenses and, in light of the notice to Mr. Meese about the legal problems with such a payment, whether he should have kept it. Mr. Meese testified that he had performed adequate services to justify payment for $10,000 in services. However, Mr. Meese testified that at the time he received the payment and deposited it, he considered it to be payment for moving expenses. (Tr. p. 244, 1/30/85) Mr. Meese never submitted a bill for services to the Trust. (Tr. p. 235, 1/30/85). At the time he received the check he did not plan to submit a bill for services. (Tr. p. 235, 1/30/85) Thus, the evidence in the Report of the Independent Counsel shows that Mr. Meese considered the payment to be reimbursement for moving expenses until he was informed of the legal prohibition on such a payment.

The first public account of the payment apparently occurred in an article in the Washington Post in June 1984. That article, in reporting that the records of the check to Mr. Meese were altered, contains the following paragraph:

"E. Robert Wallach, a lawyer for Meese, said the White House counselor had no idea who was responsible for blacking this out. 'Ed Meese has no knowledge of this under any circumstances.'" (June 2, 1984, p. A-2)

At the hearing Mr. Meese was asked if the statement made by his lawyer as quoted in the June 1984 Washington Post story was correct:

"Senator METZENBAUM. Now, isn't that statement (in the Washington Post article) false?

"Mr. MEESE. Not to my knowledge, Senator. I don't know who did the actual work of correcting the records. I talked to someone—I believe it was Ms. van Damm—but I don't know whether it was her, the bookkeeper or who else may have had the technical responsibility of correcting the records.

"Senator METZENBAUM. But (Mr. Wallach) made the statement that Ed Meese has no knowledge of that at all under any circumstances. Do you think that statement is correct?

"Mr. MEESE. I think it is, because I don't know who did the actual job." (Tr., p. 239, 1/30/85)

Mr. Meese did not refer to a payment from the "Presidential Transition Trust" on his 1981 disclosure form. In the section of the report calling for "Compensation In Excess of $5,000 Paid By One Source" there is no reference to the Trust, although there is a reference to the Presidential Transition Foundation. (See financial disclosure form for Edwin Meese III, Feb. 20, 1981, p. 5) Mr. Meese explained his failure to disclose separately a payment from the Trust on the grounds that the Trust and the Foundation were "part of the same organization." (Tr. p. 39, 1/30/85). However, the Trust was created by a Trust agreement on August 15, 1980 (see p. 340) while the Foundation was established as a separate corporation on November 5, 1980. (p. 340)

Mr. Meese testified to the Judiciary Committee last March that he had paid all his moving expenses:

"Senator HATCH. And in addition to that, if I understand correctly you had to pay all of your moving expenses as well.

"Mr. MEESE. That is right.

"Senator HATCH. And all of the costs of bringing your family back here, as well.

"Mr. MEESE. Yes, Senator.

"Senator HATCH. And that all this came out of your own pocket?

"Mr. MEESE. Yes, sir."

DISCLOSURE VIOLATIONS AND PROBLEMS WITH RECOLLECTION

An additional concern about Mr. Meese's fitness for office is his lack of attention to financial disclosure forms and his inability to recall key information. According to the Independent Counsel's Report, Mr. Meese frequently failed to make proper disclosures on his financial disclosure forms. The Report of the Independent Counsel concluded that no criminal prosecution was warranted because there was inadequate proof of intent, but it also concluded that Mr. Meese paid little attention to disclosure requirements: "only the weakest possible inference of willfulness could be drawn, particularly in light of Mr. Meese's general lack of attention to the (disclosure) forms and to his other personal financial affairs, and the numerous other non-material errors on his (disclosure forms)." (p. 97) For example, Mr. Meese failed to disclose a $15,000 loan from Edwin Thomas on his 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984 disclosure forms. Attachment 1 shows other disclosure violations noted in the Report of the Independent Counsel.

The Independent Counsel's Report as well as the hearing testimony also show a recurring pattern of failure to recall documents, conversations or events. Although some of this information is minor, and could not be reasonably expected to be recalled, much of the information is significant. For example, the Independent Counsel cited Mr. Thomas as recalling that he reminded Mr. Meese of the loan in February 1981 (p. 40) and that he discussed the loan with Mr. Meese in February 1982 at a going away party. (p. 42) Mr. Thomas recalled discussing the loan with Mr. Meese in October 1982 in San Francisco and Mr. Meese recalled that conversation. (pp. 42-43) Mr. Meese discussed the loan twice with Mr. McKean in the fall of 1982 and Mr. Meese recalled those conversations. (pp. 45-48) Mr. Thomas recalled discussing the loan with Mr. Meese again in May 1983 in connection with the sale of Biotech stock. (p. 49) Nevertheless, Mr. Meese told the Independent Counsel that at all relevant times when he signed his financial disclosure form he failed to recall the existence of the Thomas loan. (p. 103)

Mr. Meese also failed to recall the visit by Mr. Barrack to his office in September 1982 (p. 210), the memorandum prepared by General Thurman discussing his promotion, the telephone call from Secretary Marsh asking him if he had read the memo from General Thurman, the conversations with the lawyer from the Presidential Transition Trust informing him of legal problems in receiving reimbursement for moving expenses (p. 345), two conversations with Michael Deaver about arranging payment for Mr. Deaver's moving expenses (p. 349), and a letter from a California bank threatening foreclosure on his home (Tr. p. 265-266, 1/30/85).

ATTACHMENT 1—DISCLOSURE VIOLATIONS NOTED IN REPORT OF INDEPENDENT COUNSEL

1981 FORM

Failed to disclose a $15,000 loan from Edwin Thomas, as filed originally and as refiled after modifications (84).

1982 FORM

(1) Failed to disclose the $15,000 loan from Edwin Thomas (95).

(2) Failed to disclose the holdings of Biotech stock (85).

(3) Failed to properly report that John McKean was trustee of loan, not source (87).

(4) Failed to disclose eight trips paid for by outside groups (359).

1983 FORM

(1) Failed to disclose the $15,000 Thomas loan (95).

(2) Failed to properly report that McKean was trustee rather than source of loan (90).

(3) Failed to disclose the gift of forbearance of interest during 1982 from the creditors of the McKean loan as determined by the Government Accounting Office (90, fn., 145).

(4) Failed to disclose ten trips paid for by outside groups (359).

1984 FORM

(1) Failed to disclose the sale of American Cytogenetics stock in April 1983 (91).

(2) Failed to disclose the $15,000 Thomas loan (92).

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER [Mr. GRAMM]. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDERS FOR THURSDAY

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL TOMORROW AT 10 A.M.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, as in legislative session, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today, it stand in recess until 10 a.m. on Thursday, February 21.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR RECOGNITION OF CERTAIN SENATORS TOMORROW

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that following the two leaders under the standing order tomorrow the following Senators be recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes each under special orders—THURMOND, SPECTER, PROXMIRE, BOREN, PRIOR, HARKIN, SYMMS, and HART.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR PERIOD FOR TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS TOMORROW

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, following the special orders just identified, there be a period for the transaction of routine morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 12:30 p.m., with statements limited therein to 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE MEESE NOMINATION

Mr. DOLE. Following morning business, the Senate will automatically resume the Meese nomination in executive session.

INTERSTATE HIGHWAY FUNDING ACT OF 1985

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a summary of the Interstate Highway Funding Act of 1985, along with the amount each State would receive if we pass the legislation this week. It totals about $7 billion. I have been indicating that if we can dispose of the Meese nomination—and I am hopeful that we can; we have made some progress on the related matter—we can then turn to the highway bill, because it is very important from the standpoint of every State in the Nation. I hope that might be accomplished no later than Friday afternoon.

There being no objection, the summary was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INTERSTATE HIGHWAY FUNDING ACT OF 1985

BACKGROUND

The Surface Transportation Assistance Act of 1982 included a provision requiring Congressional approval of cost estimates before Interstate construction funds and Interstate substitute funds can be apportioned to the States.

The specific cost estimates which must be approved are referred to as the Interstate Cost Estimate and Interstate Substitute Cost Estimate. The Interstate substitute funds represent amounts originally allocable to Interstate highway construction which the States, with DOT approval, have been allowed to divert to other highway or transit programs.

The oversight function is appropriate, but it must be done in a timely fashion. The States need stable, reliable long-term funding to plan large, costly highway projects. These funds must be released when the States were assured they would be available.

In the past, the ICE had been approved for a two-year period. Because of legislative complications, the last approval was five months late and only covered six months. Because of this, some States undertook lower priority, but less costly, projects. This is not a good return on Federal expenditures and will delay completion of the Interstate highway system.

IMPACT OF THE BILL

The bill will approve the ICE for the second half of FY 1985 and for all of FY 1986.

The bill will also approve the ISCE to apportion Interstate Substitute funds for the remainder of FY 1984 and for FY 1985 and 1986.

The amounts at stake here are over $7 billion. On a State-by-State basis, this bill will mean, for example, over $170 million to Illinois, over $104 million for Oklahoma, over $70 million for Iowa, over $73 million for Tennessee and over $23 million for Kansas.

It is estimated that they will provide between 150,000 and 250,000 direct construction jobs and up to an additional 200,000 related jobs. In addition to being good transportation policy, it will be good for the economy.

ESTIMATED APPORTIONMENT BASED ON S. 391 OF $5.28 BILLION OF FISCAL YEAR 1985 AND 1986 INTERSTATE FUNDS AND $779.6 MILLION OF FISCAL YEAR 1984 AND 1985 INTERSTATE HIGHWAY SUBSTITUTE FUNDS—85 PERCENT MINIMUM ALLOCATION FUNDS BASED ON SECTION 124

Medical Corps, U.S. Army.

Col. Robert R. Jorgensen, xxx-xx-xxxx
Veterinary Corps, U.S. Army.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

THE 1986 BUDGET

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Washington Report for Wednesday, February 13, 1985, into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

THE 1986 BUDGET

President Reagan has just sent his 1986 budget to Capitol Hill. He wants to spend $974 billion, collect $794 billion in taxes, and run a deficit of $180 billion.

Under the fiscal plan that the President has proposed, spending would increase for defense, social security, and interest on the national debt, which make up two thirds of the budget. He hopes to reduce spending in the remaining one third of the budget by 10% overall. In effect, he is calling for a freeze in total spending, other than for debt service. He would eliminate more than 25 programs, including revenue sharing, the Job Corp, the Small Business Administration, the Economic Development Administration, the Legal Services Corporation, federal support for Amtrak, loans of the Farmers Home Administration, and subsidies for shipbuilding, mass transit, and air carriers. He would cut into farm price supports, soil and water conservation programs, welfare, low-income energy assistance, student loans, education for the handicapped, veterans' health care, Medicare, the Export-Import Bank, sewage treatment grants, the Strategic Petroleum Reserve, and subsidies for housing and rural electrification. Inside the government itself, he would roll back federal workers' pay by 5% phase out 35,000 jobs, and trim cost-of-living raises for military and civilian retirees. The budget is silent on taxes, except that Mr. Reagan recommends a few minor tax cuts and user fees and promises a later effort to simplify the tax code.

The themes of the 1986 budget are the same as those of the four previous Reagan budgets: low taxes, less federal regulation, and a reordering of priorities under which defense spending is increased while domestic spending is curbed. The President notes that the progress in reducing inflation represents no "final victory," and that the Federal Reserve should continue its policy of restraint in managing the nation's money supply. He concedes as well that the $180-billion deficit is a "far cry" from his goal of a balanced budget.

The economic assumptions that the President makes to support the budget are too optimistic. He estimates that the economy will keep growing at an annual rate of 4% through the end of 1986. He supposes that the inflation rate will rise slightly to 4.3%, that the unemployment rate will edge down to 6.8%, and that interest rates will keep declining for another two years. The five-year projections accompanying the budget are even more optimistic. What troubles me about the assumptions is Mr. Reagan's bet that huge deficits will not spur inflation and drive interest rates up as the recovery matures. Also, he ignores the possibility of a recession, which is likely to occur within the next three years. Either scenario might leave the nation with yearly deficits in excess of $300 billion.

Several special features of the budget should be noted. First, the President is to be commended for his suggestion that all off-budget programs be brought onto the budget, and for his insistence that administrative overhead be trimmed. Also, he deserves credit for proposing tough, even draconian, spending cuts. Indeed, this budget invites conflict with most of the organized forces of American politics. In past years, his spending cuts have centered on low-income people, but this time he shows that he is prepared to move against politically sensitive programs favored by the middle class, perhaps because after the last four budgets not much more could be done to restrict programs of benefits to the poor. The President's spokesmen admit that the spending cuts are aimed at state and local governments, farmers, small businessmen, and families of average means.

Second, while the President is to be commended for setting as a goal a gradual decline in the deficit, the budget does not advance a solution to the problem of deficits. It says implicitly that sharp reductions in one-third of the budget, combined with large increases in the other two-thirds, cannot bring the budget into balance in the foreseeable future. The budget tests Mr. Reagan's oft-stated belief that deficits matter and makes it clear the deficits have never been as important to him as his rhetoric would suggest. His true objectives are to lower taxes and shift spending toward the military and away from domestic concerns. The rearrangement of government, not its shrinkage, has been his plan all along. Today, the federal government is taking up nearly one-quarter of the nation's wealth, far more than the 20% share about which the President spoke four years ago. An impression widely shared among members of Congress is that Mr. Reagan has not done enough to reduce deficits.

Third, during the successful election campaign, the President did not lay out the spending cuts that he is now calling for. In some cases, he affirmed his support for continuing or expanding programs that he now targets for reduction. The budget does not break his promises in regard to taxes, social security, and defense spending, but neither does it hold him to his assurances that he could reduce the deficit without going after popular programs.

Fourth, some of the spending cuts are misleading. An example is the reduction of more than $1 billion in foreign aid, which is unlikely now that the President has committed himself to large but unspecified increases in aid to Israel.

Fifth, the defense buildup, now entering its fifth year with a request for an increase of more than 8%, continues to focus too narrowly on the purchase of advanced weapons. Not enough attention is paid to combat readiness.

Sixth, the budget would enlarge the role of government in several areas, including medical research and toxic waste cleanup, as it took the government out of others, such as farming.

Finally, the President will have trouble getting his spending cuts through Congress, but he has taken control of the terms of the political debate and he will succeed on many of them. He will not get his full request for the Pentagon. I think that an increase in the range of 3% to 5% is far more likely than an 8% hike.●

SCOOP JACKSON'S LEGACY

HON. JACK F. KEMP

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, it was my privilege to have known Senator Henry "Scoop" Jackson, to have served in Congress with him, and to have called him my friend. My wife, Joanne, and I treasure our continuing friendship with Helen Jackson. Her husband's death in September 1983 was a deep loss for the country, and his leadership has been sorely missed.

One of Scoop's many inspired contributions to public policy was the suggestion that a National Bipartisan Commission on Central America be established, to focus the Nation's attention on the pressing need to understand the dangers facing our neighbors, and to develop a comprehensive agenda for a prosperous and secure future for our hemisphere. Thus was born the Jackson Commission, named in his honor, whose work forms the basis of President Reagan's policy for Central America; and I was honored by being asked to serve on the Commission.

Yet there is no greater evidence of the lasting impact of Scoop's service in Washington than the men and women who worked with him, who learned from him, and who stayed in Government to further the Jackson tradition. Assistant Secretary of Defense Richard Perle is one of those excellent public servants who came from the Jackson office; Assistant Secretary of State Elliott Abrams is another.

Like Senator Jackson, Elliott Abrams has distinguished himself as a forceful and eloquent advocate of human rights. And he is equally eloquent in writing of the character and qualities of his former boss. Elliott's article in the February issue of Reader's Digest, entitled "Unforgettable Scoop Jackson," is a touching tribute to a great American. I ask that the article be reprinted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and commend it to my colleagues' attention.

● This "bullet" symbol identifies statements or insertions which are not spoken by the Member on the floor.

I'm proud to have known Senator Jackson and to recognize not only his impact on his own party but his profound impact on the Republican Party as well.

The article by Elliott Abrams follows:

UNFORGETTABLE SCOOP JACKSON

(By Elliott Abrams)

In the Senate reception room of the Capitol are portraits of five men, selected a quarter of a century ago to constitute a Senate hall of fame; Daniel Webster, John C. Calhoun, Henry Clay, Robert La Follette and Robert A. Taft. Columnist George Will recently suggested that a sixth portrait be added. "A Senate hall of fame without Henry Martin Jackson," he wrote, "is as unthinkable as Cooperstown without George Herman 'Babe' Ruth."

"Scoop Jackson, who died in September 1983, was my friend and former boss. I came to Washington to work for him and, like so many of his staff, remained in the federal government. Being in Scoop's office, watching him moving and shaking committees and statesmen, admiring his incorruptible style, got us hooked on public service.

Although Jackson wielded great power during his 42 years in government, he had no time for the egotism that often afflicts the powerful. He was interested in the work, not the credit. He held himself accountable to the citizens of Washington State who elected him, whom he once described as "hard-working, sensible folks who don't swallow any kind of political line. They vote for individuals and expect them to remain individuals." He believed deeply in bipartisanship, and used to say that "in national security the best politics is no politics."

Throughout his long career in government, the Senator never wavered in his beliefs, never tailored them to fit the mold of fashion, never thought that what people said about you was as important as what you did. His idea of "packaging" himself for politics was to buy a few new neckties. "For all of us who served him," said House Majority Whip (and former Jackson staffer) Tom Foley, that service "will remain to the end of our days a matter of enormous pride."

SECURITY FIRST

Scoop was born in 1912 in the rough-and-tumble lumber town of Everett, Wash. A child of Norwegian immigrants, he acquired his nickname from a comic-strip character whom his sisters thought he resembled. His older sister, Gertrude, a teacher, spent part of her meager paychecks to help him through law school. He was elected county attorney and, in 1940, at age 28, a U.S. Congressman.

This was the world of Roosevelt, Churchill and Hitler, and of Europe at war. To the young Congressman's thinking, national security was paramount. The Nazi invasion of his parents' homeland that same year had left a searing impression on him. "We're dealing with survival," he would tell those who advocated less spending on defense and more on domestic programs. "Norway had a thousand years of freedom—clean air, clean water, clean land. They had one of the first health programs. What good did it do them when the hobnail boots took over in the spring of 1940?"

Scoop served with distinction for 12 years in the House, but it was in the Senate, to which he was elected in 1952, that he made his greatest mark. As a freshman Senator, he was disturbed by top-secret reports on America's lagging missile program. Stressing how quickly the Soviets had developed nuclear bombs, he believed they would make a quantum jump and come up with a rocket delivery vehicle. He wrote President Dwight D. Eisenhower to urge that ICBM development be put on a wartime basis, prompting Eisenhower to undertake a full-scale briefing on the matter for the first time. Two years later, in 1957, the Soviets surprised the world with the powerful rocket that launched Sputnik, the first satellite. Colleagues began listening more closely to Senator Jackson, and American ICBM efforts were greatly accelerated.

Senator Jackson soon became one of the most influential men in the Capitol when it came to national security. For years he was ranking Democrat on the Senate Armed Services Committee, renowned for his extraordinary grasp of detail. In 1959 he initiated a landmark study of the National Security Council and of policy making at the Presidential level. He was a leader in restoring relations with China and forming the closest possible alliance with Israel, viewing the two countries as natural friends in the struggle against Soviet aggression. He helped defeat the proposed Senate ratification of the SALT II agreement, arguing that it relied too heavily on Soviet "good faith" and not enough on hard verification, and that in effect it only ratified the Soviet arms buildup.

QUIET MAN

Scoop was also a life-long advocate of human rights abroad. He had visited a Nazi concentration camp at the end of World War II, and was ever aware of the slave-labor camps in the Soviet Union. He wrote the Jackson Amendment of 1974, which grants more favorable tariff treatment to non-free-market countries that pledge to allow their citizens freer emigration. When Soviet dissidents needed a champion in Washington, they always knew where to turn.

Finally, Scoop was an old-fashioned conservationist who believed in a balance between development and preservation. As chairman of the Senate Interior Committee (later called the Energy Committee), he pioneered environmental legislation. He wrote the National Environmental Policy Act, which established a council to monitor environmental developments and keep the public informed. But he also has a continuing concern for the nation's energy needs. He advocated exploration for oil and natural gas and other energy development that would keep America growing. "Every time a tree is cut, a mineral mined, a dam constructed or a road built, the public interest is not being attacked," he said. Yet Jackson was the only Senator ever to win the Sierra Club's John Muir Award for conservation.

Scoop's achievements in the Senate, however, don't reveal what was so special about him as a person. Let me start with his integrity. "There has never been one breath of scandal around Henry Jackson," said his longtime fellow Senator from Washington, Warren Magnuson. "That's something in this day and age." As President Reagan noted: "Other people were embarrassed when disclosure laws revealed their vanities. Scoop was embarrassed when they revealed his virtues."

The President was referring to what Scoop had done with the money he earned giving speeches—as much as $56,000 one year. Quietly, he had put every cent into a scholarship fund in memory of his sister Gertrude, to help needy children back home in Everett. "He had never told the voters," observed President Reagan. "He never even told his own staff."

It was typical of Scoop's quiet style. His power came not from flights of rhetoric on the Senate floor, but through "putting the arm" on colleagues behind the scenes—often in the Senate gym. Each day he would return from the swimming pool with new ideas, new commitments. Once, when a staffer asked how he'd gotten a majority for a new proposal, his reply was something like this: "Maggie said he talk to Russell, and Tom promised this if I would back him on Ed's amendment, and Mike owes me one for last year's help on Pete's bill . . ." and so on. Not the stuff of network news, but very much the way to get business done in the Senate.

THE HUMAN TOUCH

Scoop had a special relationship with his "troops," as he called the people on his staff, many of whom stayed with him for decades. (Our softball team was called "Scoop's Troops.") He squeezed us dry—of ideas, speeches, bills and sheer hard work. He expected the best we could do. But he never asked us to do anything he wouldn't do himself. If you tried to carry his suitcase, you got into a wrestling match with him. He used strong language only under extraordinary provocation, and he never berated a staff member.

Once, because a new aide had given him inaccurate data, Scoop was forced to issue a retraction after a major press conference. The aide expected to be fired. Instead, Scoop put his hand on the young man's shoulder and told him, "We all make mistakes."

Performing tasks for his constituents was not a necessary evil to Jackson; it was one reason he was in government. "He used to drop by my office pretty nearly every morning," recalls Senator Magnuson. "He'd say, 'Who's in trouble today? Who can we help?' "

Once a staff member went to Scoop's office to bring him to the Senate floor where he was desperately needed to lead the debate over a bill he was sponsoring. Scoop was on the phone—and stayed on. The aide became frantic, but to Scoop that telephone call was more urgent. He was trying to arrange the transfer of a young soldier wounded in Vietnam from a VA hospital far from his home to one his parents could visit. Scoop had the Pentagon on the line, and he wasn't getting off until the answer was "yes."

Busy as Scoop was, he never forgot the human element. When my father died—five years after I left Scoop's staff—one of the first people to call and console me was Senator Jackson.

Scoop was a fabulously successful vote-getter in his home state, winning re-election in 1976 with 74 percent of the vote.[1] Voters liked his honor and incorruptibility, his constant hard work, his compassion for the weak. He also had a particularly disarming way with youngsters that showed at the oddest times. En route to chair a committee hearing one morning, he saw a staff member's eight-year-old nephew standing in the office. "You come along with me," he said,

[1] The Henry M. Jackson Foundation has been set up as a memorial to the Senator, with its major support going to the Jackson School of International Studies at the University of Washington.

tousling the boy's hair. In the committee room, he seated the awestruck boy behind him in the glare of the television lights, and from time to time leaned back to give the lad an explanation of the proceedings.

Twice Scoop went after his party's Presidential nomination. His 1972 campaign was only a trial run; in 1976 he raised money and ran widely, winning primaries in New York and Massachusetts. But he was still a Senator above all else, much to the despair of his campaign aides. No sooner had someone gotten his attention about a fund-raiser in Boston or a campaign stop in Miami than the office buzzer would announce a roll-call vote, and Scoop would run for the subway to the Capitol, leaving the pols sitting in their cigar smoke.

In the campaign Scoop preached oldfashioned New Deal liberalism at home and a strong and active defense of freedom abroad. But this combination had fallen out of favor with many Democrats in the wake of the Vietnam war, and Jackson's candidacy evaporated. His rocklike reliability, his refusal to sway with the political winds, may have cost him the Presidency.

In August 1983 Jackson went to China for the fourth time and, as usual, followed a strenuous work schedule. He caught a bad cold, but when he came home he didn't slack off. On September 1—after a day that must have been exhausting for a 71-year-old weakened by a cold—he went home to his wife and went to sleep. He never woke up.

Last June 26, many of Scoop's friends gathered at the White House to hear President Reagan award him, posthumously the Medal of Freedom, the nation's highest honor. It was a rare moment in the spotlight for his widow, Helen, and their children, Peter and Anna Marie, for Scoop had kept his private life private and talked of his love for his family and his pride in them only to people close to him.

"Henry Martin Jackson was one of the greatest lawmakers of our century," the President read from the medal citation. "He embodied integrity and decency in the profession of politics. For those who make freedom their cause, Henry Jackson will always inspire honor, courage and hope."●

STREAMLINE PROCEDURES FOR MILITARY BASE CLOSING

HON. DENNY SMITH

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. DENNY SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing legislation today to streamline the study and notification procedures contained in 10 U.S.C 2687 on closing military bases or realigning military activities. The modifications that I am proposing should eliminate the years of unnecessary delay that are associated with effecting a closure or realinement while retaining adequate safeguards for: First, notifying Congress; second, consulting with local governments, and third, accomplishing appropriate studies on proposals likely to have a significant socioeconomic impact prior to making final decisions.

Let me review for a moment the need for this legislation. Years of unnecessary delay have resulted from the onerous and in many instances, unnecessary study and notification procedures that pertain to closure or realinement actions; 10 U.S.C. 2687 has been effectively used by local interests to delay and reverse national security decisions purely for the purpose of saving civil service jobs in their town or State.

BACKGROUND

Prior to 1977, a relatively routine and unencumbered process was used to declare DOD facilities excess to military needs. In 1977, revised procedures were passed creating a number of new legislative requirements in reaction to DOD's decisions to close a number of major installations and to realine numerous activities. Of the 19 major installations announced for closure in 1977, only 5 were able to surmount the legislative roadblocks. The existing legislative roadblocks reflect the intent of a few Members of Congress to delay any action on the realinements or closures for political rather than national security. Consequently, national security decisions are being thwarted by local political interests which are counterproductive to providing a strong national defense in a fiscally responsible manner. The study requirements and legal challenges involved have added years of unnecessary delay to the disposal process.

Title 10, United States Code, section 2687 applies to any DOD facility with as few as 300 civilians, worldwide. Political interest resulted in the criteria being drawn to encompass just about every action rather than focusing on those likely to result in a significant impact. Accordingly, the Secretary of Defense is prohibited from taking any action involving a reduction by more than 1,000 or by more than 50 percent, in the number of civilian personnel authorized at the installation. A proposal affecting as few as 150 civilian personnel in a major metropolitan area could trigger the study requirements. Only if the President certifies to Congress that such action is necessary for reasons of national security or military emergency can the study requirements be waived.

Do we have to wait until the Nation is at war before the Secretary of Defense can adjust the base structure to manage our forces efficiently? Before the Secretary of Defense can make a tentative decision to close or realine, he must:

First, notify Congress that the installation or facility is a candidate for closure or realinement;

Second, issue a public notice of his intent to initiate a study on closure or realinement;

Third, prepare a study on the fiscal, economic, budgetary, strategic, and operational consequences of the proposed actions;

Fourth, evaluate the environmental consequences pursuant to the National Environmental Policy Act.

Only after those steps are completed, can a tentative decision be made. The Secretary must wait an additional 60 days before he can make a final decision. Even after a final decision is made, and assuming there is no court challenge, actual closure is still a number of years away.

Past experience indicates that it may take an additional 1 to 3 years to effect transition of the mission and transfer of the facilities to GSA for disposal. By this time, officials may have changed political office or lost their desire to pursue this onerous task.

PROPOSAL

To correct these abuses and to allow the Secretary to get on with the business at hand. I am proposing several modifications to 10 U.S.C. 2687; specifically:

Modify the criteria to limit extensive study and consultation to those proposals which could likely cause significant adverse socioeconomic impacts on the local or regional economy.

Simplify the study and the reporting requirements.

Reaffirm the requirements of NEPA compliance but grant a limited exemption of the provisions of NEPA concerning judicial review of Federal decisions to close, realine, transfer, exchange, or reuse military facilities or installations.

I believe there are sound fiscal, policy, and national security reasons for these changes.

MODIFICATION OF STUDY CRITERIA

It is intended that the Secretary of Defense will notify Congress of any proposal to realine missions or close any facilities. However, formal reports will only be required on actions that are likely to have a significant socioeconomic impact on the region affected. To affect that, I am proposing a change that will modify the threshold criteria for determining whether studies are mandatory.

Title 10, United States Code, section 2687 uses the number of civilian personnel impacted as the sole criterion for triggering the study and notification requirements. The criterion selected is entirely inappropriate. The issue of primary concern to local communities is the economic impact. Closures which have an inconsequential impact on the economy have been delayed for years purely because of the unnecessary study requirements embodied in 10 U.S.C. 2687. In retrospect, many costly and unnecessary studies assessing this impact have been done, directing scarce resources to unproductive uses. The cost of individual studies has ranged from $10,000 to $600,000.

We need to give the Secretary of Defense the flexibility to operate the Defense Establishment more efficiently with as little overhead as possible.

I am proposing that we change the triggering criteria to eliminate the studying of inconsequential actions—that is, those likely to have a minimal impact on the local economy. The triggering criteria will be changed to a measure of the unemployment rate in the economic region rather than using the number of civilian DOD employees affected.

This will serve as a screening mechanism to eliminate wasteful, costly, and unnecessary socioeconomic studies. To that end, I am proposing that we use a 1-percent change in the unemployment rate as the preliminary screening criterion for deciding whether or not a proposal requires more detailed study. This factor was selected after considering various criteria and after considerable discussion with experts in the field. Numerous socioeconomic studies were reviewed concerning mission realinement or closure. That review indicated that a 1-percent change in the region's unemployment rate has minimal economic impacts on the regional economy in the vast majority of cases.

The change in unemployment rate would be computed in the following manner: Percent change in the region's unemployment rate (ΔE) equals the number of anticipated civilians that would be unemployed in the region as a result of the military action (UE) divided by the regions total civilian work force, ΣWF, using the most recent data; that is:

$$\Delta E = UE/\Sigma WF$$

If the percent change is 1 percent or more, the studies as required by law, must first be completed and submitted to Congress before any final decision is made. Of course, the Secretary will have discretion to consider other socioeconomic factors and initiate formal studies for actions that would change the unemployment rate by less than 1 percent. It is intended that he would do so only in borderline cases where there are extenuating circumstances.

This approach reduces bias and permits calculation using readily available data collected by the Bureau of Labor Statistics. The approach is regionally sensitive as opposed to the current criteria which are arbitary. The Secretary will be responsible for defining the economic region of influence. In doing so, he should take into consideration such factors as population density, commuting patterns and other special circumstances concerning the area.

SIMPLIFY AND STREAMLINE THE STUDY AND PROCEDURAL REQUIREMENTS

The extensive study requirements contained in 10 U.S.C. 2687 is duplicative and confusing. Not only is a detailed justification required but also—statements on the fiscal, local, economic, budgetary, environmental, strategic, and operational consequences. Section 2687(b)(2) reaffirms that the Secretary of Defense is required to comply with the requirements of NEPA. In addition to preparing the necessary environmental assessment or impact statement, the Secretary is also to include an environmental analysis in the detailed justification that is to be submitted to Congress (reference section 2687, (b)(3)). This is unnecessary duplication.

I am proposing we modify this section to eliminate the redundancy and to focus on the key factors to assure that the decisions are not arbitrary and capricious.

In calling for a detailed justification, there is a tendency on the part of the executive branch to provide voluminous material that obscures the essential facts.

A concise statement of findings on the socioeconomic impacts with a succinct justification for taking the proposed action relative to the economic, strategic and operational aspects will better enable the public and the Congress to review and maintain oversight of the proposed action. Existing requirements place a burdensome hurdle on the Secretary's ability to move with timely deliberation in implementing realinement or closure, hampering his effectiveness in completing those actions.

Title 10, United States Code, section 2687(c) provides for the President to exempt certain actions. To do so, however, the President must certify to the Congress that such closure or realinement must be implemented for reasons of national security or a military emergency. Since the certification process for instituting this exemption falls principally on the Secretary of Defense, the President may decide that it is appropriate to delegate this authority to the Secretary.

PRECLUDING JUDICIAL REVIEW OF DECISIONS UNDER NEPA

The disposal of surplus property has met tremendous barriers in many cases because employees and local communities have brought suit against DOD on the grounds of insufficient socioeconomic analysis in the environmental impact statements. Any delay in the implementation of decisions to close facilities or realine activities comes as a welcome reprieve to those who might be relocated or lose their jobs. Inappropriate legal challenges have added years of delay and excessive cost to the disposal process.

DOD has made considerable effort to comply with the National Environmental Policy Act [NEPA] and has done so as the record shows. The courts have ruled consistently in DOD's favor. Generally, the real reason for the challenges have been socioeconomic concerns of the local community rather than environmental impacts. The appeals court has ruled that socioeconomic impacts in and of themselves do not necessitate the need for an EIS under NEPA. This has always been DOD's position. In Breckenridge v. Rumsfield, 537 F. 2d 864 (1976), the appeals court specifically stated:

> We hold the District Court was in error in undertaking to transform NEPA from a law designed to protect and enhance the natural resources of the nation into a statute prohibiting the discharge and transfer of personnel at an army installation, and that it was not the intention of Congress for NEPA to be used for purposes of promoting full employment or to prevent the discharge or transfer of federal personnel. . . . NEPA is not a national employment act. Environmental goals and policies were never intended to reach social problems such as those presented here.

Current law requires the Department of Defense to comply with NEPA which is appropriate and good public policy. It provides for better Federal decisions and is a reasonable expectation.

However, to prevent continuing inappropriate use of this law as a means of delaying decisions to save Federal jobs, we should provide a limited exemption in that such decisions to close, realine, transfer, exchange, or reuse military facilities are not subject to judicial review under NEPA. All such actions regarding base closure or realinement will need to be environmentally assessed and formal EIS's prepared and processed in accordance with NEPA regulations when it is determined that the proposal is a major Federal action significantly affecting the quality of the human environment. The Secretary is required to have prepared the necessary draft and final EIS's, and to seek and consider public views pursuant to the Council on Environmental Quality Regulations. This limited exemption would be for NEPA review only and not apply to any other substantive environmental law such as the Endangered Species Act or the Historic Preservation Acts.

SUCCESSFUL COMMUNITY ADAPTABILITY

The experience of communities affected by earlier base realinements clearly indicates that communities can successfully adjust to such actions. Over 123,000 new jobs have replaced the loss of 87,000 former DOD or contractor jobs. This is based on a DOD survey of 97 communities conducted in November 1981.

During the 20-year period since May 1961, economic adjustment assistance has been provided to over 280 communities throughout the Nation affected by major cutbacks, contract terminations, major base expansions and military base closures. Numerous success stories exist of how these facilities have been quickly converted to productive local use which has generated new jobs, industry, tax revenue, and educational opportunities.

NOTIFICATION PROCESS

A final change enacted by this bill would amend 10 U.S.C., 2687(b), (4) that presently reads:

A period of sixty days expires following the date on which the justification referred to in clause (3) has been submitted to such committees.

This bill would speed the notification process by changing the idle time in which the proposal lays dormant from 60 to 30 days. This would make it consistent with the time frames established for NEPA review.

CONCLUSION

The administration has presented Congress with the bold management initiatives needed to pursue the disposal and sale of surplus Federal property. Creative and worthwhile administrative changes have been made to stop the transfer of surplus Federal facilities—except for those destined for use as jails—to other Federal agencies or State and local governments. All buyers will be required to pay full market price. Congress must take this opportunity to remove the unnecessary legislative barriers that bar the President and the Secretary of Defense from taking the swift action necessary to manage our base structure efficiently. Moreover, we need to shelter national security decisions from local self-serving political interests.

This bill will accomplish those tasks.●

TEENAGE SUICIDE

HON. GARY L. ACKERMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, the dramatic increase in suicide among teenagers in this country has forced the national spotlight to shine on this issue. Tragically, suicide has become the second leading cause of death for young people. In 1950, the suicide rate for the 15–24 age group was 4.9 per 100,000 youngsters. In 1965, the suicide rate was 8.1. By 1983 the estimated rate was 11.7.

Because of these astonishing figures, Messrs. HAWKINS, MILLER of California, and BIAGGI have joined me in introducing what we believe is a responsible and necessary piece of legislation to combat this suicide epidemic. The measure would create a small competitive grant program within the Department of Education. The Secretary would be authorized to solicit grant proposals from local education agencies to establish and operate programs of suicide prevention. The measure, if enacted, would establish a 3-year authorization of $10 million per year; no grantee would be awarded more than $100,000 in any year.

The Secretary of Education would assess each proposal based on its ability to:

First, increase awareness of teenage suicide among school personnel and community leaders;

Second, train school personnel in individual and schoolwide strategies for the prevention of teenage suicide;

Third, initiate and implement school-based suicide-prevention programs and pilot projects throughout the local educational agency; and

Fourth, utilize community resources and community cooperation in the development and implementation of suicide-prevention programs.

Mr. Speaker, suicide knows no geographic, educational, income, ethnic, religious, or gender boundaries. An adolescent living in Shaker Heights, Skokie, Fullerton, or Scarsdale is just as susceptible to suicide as one living in Cleveland, South Chicago, Watts, or the South Bronx. Leading psychiatric experts consider this distressing problem a major challenge of the eighties. According to the National Center for Health Statistics, about 5,000 young people take their lives each year. Research indicates that 500,000 others attempt to do so annually. Because there are no guidelines, schools have had to improvise programs. But these usually come too late—only after an adolescent's death. Such recent movies as "Surviving," "Silence of the Heart," and "Ordinary People" illustrate the problem. However, only a concerted effort by the Federal Government can bring about a significant reduction in his unacceptable and unfortunate trend.

As a former junior-high-school teacher, I fully realize that the task of identifying suicidal teenagers is difficult. But the most accurate means of finding these youngsters is through our educational institutions. This bill would enable school officials and guidance counselors to receive the Federal commitment which is so important to combating teenage suicide, and would assist these professionals in creating those critical programs that will save lives.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation, by saving innocent children and sparing families excruciating agony, would fill a void in our education system, a void that the Federal Government should help rectify. I invite my colleague to join in sponsoring this important measure.

Thank you.●

THE 1985 FARM BILL, PART TWO: THE IMMEDIATE NEED FOR FARM CREDIT LEGISLATION

HON. STEVE GUNDERSON

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. GUNDERSON. Mr. Speaker, anyone who picked up a copy of Time or Newsweek magazines last week read about the credit crisis facing agriculture. Unfortunately, for all too many of those readers, this was the first they had heard about the credit and price problems that many of us with rural constituents had been warning the Nation about since 1981.

Quite frankly, the Time and Newsweek stories should not have surprised anyone. Given the economic events of the last decade, farm credit problems were inevitable. At the beginning of the 1970's, farmers were given price signals to plant fence row to fence row and assurances that any surplus would be marketed internationally. And, since real estate was being used as a hedge against inflation at that time, producers who were considering the expansion of their operations found that their individual borrowing capacities had expanded because of increasing land values.

However, double-digit inflation also brought double-digit interest rates by the end of the 1970's, and a grain embargo left us with limited international markets for our surplus domestic production. Accordingly, commodity prices dropped at a time when interest costs soared. As a result, a recession has plagued the farm economy since 1981, and land values—as well as farmers' borrowing capacity—have declined.

THE CURRENT FARM CREDIT SITUATION

The facts are that there are thousands of producers throughout our country who will not be able to get their crops in the ground or otherwise continue farming without some sort of action to make credit available to them.

Statistics for 1984 show that 7 percent of operators nationwide have debt-to-asset ratios in excess of 70 percent. Another 18 percent are in the 40- to 70-percent range. That's a full one-quarter of our producers who were experiencing significant financial stress during the 1984 crop year. Of these, 125,000 farmers are in severe and immediate financial trouble.

And those of us who come from the Great Lakes area and represent primarily dairy and livestock farmers have even less encouraging news. Over 30 percent of all of the producers in our area (including almost 35 percent of our dairy and livestock operators) have debt-to-asset ratios above 40 percent.

Since these surveys were completed, the overall picture for agriculture has not improved. In my State, alone, I have been told that we could lose a minimum of 25 percent of our livestock and dairy farmers within 2 years without positive action. Some other areas of the country, most notably the Great Plains, are even worse off.

Now, the basic problem is that the Farm Credit System and the commercial lenders which normally meet the credit needs of the vast majority of our farmers cannot, for the most part and for a variety of reasons, respond to the current increased demands for farm credit.

First, the independent Farm Credit System made up of Production Credit Associations [PCA's] and Federal land banks already has 6.6 percent of their borrowers in some stage of delinquency. In fact, $2 billion of their $78 billion in assets (97 percent of which are held in farm loans) are completely nonperforming. And they have acquired $500 million in property in the last 5 years.

Second, the 4,100 commercial lenders who have at least 25 percent of the portfolio in farm loans have FDIC regulations to meet in order to stay in business. Right now there are 800 problem banks in the United States, 100 of which are expected to close this year. In fact, over half of the nine banks that have gone out of business since the beginning of the year have been agricultural lenders.

If that statistic holds for the rest of the year, it means that about 10 percent of our commercial lenders who specialize in farm loans are in trouble and at least 1 percent of them will not be around at this time next year. And you can bet that the remainder are being overly cautious about the loans they approve.

Finally, the declining value of real estate continues to complicate the farm credit scene. Over 75 percent of all farm assets are held in real estate. The reduction in land values in the last 2 to 3 years of up to 30 and 40 percent in the Midwest—and elsewhere—has only served to further erode the borrowing capacity of every producer.

In fact, according to a 1984 ABA Credit survey, about 30 percent of Midwest farmers will be at their practical loan limits this year. In short, there are many good producers who, through no fault of their own, will not be able to obtain a loan to get a crop in the ground this spring if government at all levels does not act—and act soon.

THE FEDERAL RESPONSE

At the Federal level, the Farmers Home Administration [FmHA] has traditionally responded to the credit needs of the highly leveraged farmers as the Nation's lender of last resort. And, on February 7, Secretary Block announced revisions in the administration's September credit relief package.

Under these revised regulations, Federal guarantees of existing private-lender loans would be permitted after a sufficient principal writeoff or interest writedown to produce a positive cash flow, and attempts would be made to work toward eased FDIC regulations for lenders who work with troubled borrowers. This is certainly a step in the right direction. However, it is but a first step.

While the administration's credit package can assist those producers who have had significant credit problems in the past and continue to have a negative cash flow, it does little to address the "new credit crunch"—that is, the credit problems of those good producer/managers who still have a positive cash flow, but have been denied credit for the first time ever because of inadequate collateral due to declining real estate values.

Clearly, we have regular FmHA programs which would normally assist such producers. Unfortunately, the facts are that they are not presently funded at sufficient levels to meet these new demands for guaranteed operating loans.

That's why it is so important to proceed on the farm credit issue in advance of the farm bill. While the farm bill is the major piece of agricultural legislation we will produce this year, the long term will never come for many of these producers if the credit issue is not fully addressed immediately.

Obviously, we must not only meet the credit needs of our producers in the short term but also create an economic environment that permits the long-term repayment of these debts. To meet those short-term credit needs, it seems to me that we must do four things at the Federal level: (1) Current nonfunctioning loans should be rewritten and guaranteed by the Government if a positive cash flow results; (2) $3 billion in loan guarantees should be provided for new operating loans for good farmers who find themselves without adequate collateral due to recent land devaluation; (3) the Federal Government should assist and stand behind the Farm Credit System with the same insurance FDIC provides to private institutions; and (4) charges for credit, such as new loan origination fees proposed in the recent budget, should be delayed.

Mr. Speaker, when debt forces our farmers off their land, you can bet that the small businesses, banks, hospitals, schools, and churches of our rural towns and villages will not survive long. Clearly, within the credit crisis confronting agriculture we are literally facing the fundamental destruction of rural society. As I've said before, that should concern every Member of Congress for, as a nation, we cannot afford to lose our small towns and villages.

Those of us on the Conservation, Credit and Rural Development Subcommittee of the House Agriculture Committee will begin marking up emergency credit legislation on Thursday. Of course, at this point we do not know what final form this legislation will take.

But, whatever its provisions, it is my sincere hope that both the Congress and the administration will give it a fair and impartial review as well as expedite its consideration. The financial future of thousands of producers and the well-being of rural America depends on what we do—or do not do—about the farm credit crisis in the next 30 days.●

RESTORE RIGHTS OF STATES AND CITIES TO REGULATE HAZARDOUS MATERIALS TRANSPORTATION

HON. TED WEISS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, Congress, in enacting the Hazardous Materials Transportation Act [HMTA], sought "to protect the Nation adequately against the risks to life and property which are inherent in the transportation of hazardous materials in Congress." Yet, when the Department of Transportation [DOT] issued an HMTA rule in early 1982 regulating transportation of radioactive materials, the result seemed intended to minimize inconvenience to commerce by streamlining transportation routes. Safety became a secondary consideration.

The rule, to be referred to here by its docket designation, HM-164, was expressly designed to preempt State and local regulations which do not conform to Federal laws and regulations. DOT's interpretation of HMTA paid little attention to the delicate balance between Federal, State, and local regulatory responsibilities Congress intended to establish.

In place of stringent State and local rules governing the transport of radioactive, flammable, explosive, and combustible materials into and through urban areas, DOT offered weak guidelines for routing with virtually no safety provisions. In particular, no consideration was given to alternatives to highway transportation. Contrary to the intent of HMTA, no special dispensation was awarded to non-Federal rules providing greater protection to the public without unreasonably burdening commerce.

Mr. Speaker, I am today reintroducing a package of amendments to HMTA which attempts to restore the safety priority. The legislation would also provide State and local governments with additional resources to adequately meet their enforcement and emergency response responsibilities.

The cornerstone of the bill is language shifting the burden of proof in inconsistency and preemption proceedings from the State and local authority to DOT. The language, based in part on a ruling by a U.S. District Court in New York, creates a presumption in favor of local, safety oriented regulations which provide a level of protection to the public equal or greater than that provided by HMTA or regulations developed under the act, and which do not unreasonably burden commerce. The intent is to allow local officials to enhance safety by addressing unique situations within their jurisdictions without permitting the proliferation of unwarranted rules.

The ongoing dispute between DOT and New York City over shipments of radioactive materials from the Department of Energy's Brookhaven Laboratories on Long Island perfectly illustrates the need for this corrective action.

A longstanding city ordinance prohibits—quite reasonably—the transportation of large quantities of radioactive materials through the city. HM-164 directs the movement of radioactive materials over preferred routes which consist mainly of interstate highways and beltways around urban areas. But because New York City lacks such circumferential highways, HM-164 permits nuclear shipments from Long Island to move through downtown Manhattan or any of the other densely populated four boroughs if the route minimizes transit time.

In fact, the route used by Brookhaven until city officials challenged HM-164 in court ran along the Long Island Expressway through Queens and Manhattan, and over the George Washington Bridge. HM-164 does not require the shipper in this instance to consider the alternative mode proposed by city officials, barging the wastes around the city.

In a culmination of litigation extending over several years, the city took its court challenge of HM-164 to the U.S. Supreme Court, which last year declined to consider the case. The city subsequently applied to DOT for a waiver from Federal preemption of its transportation ban—a process which included hiring a consultant to prepare a comparative risk analysis of alternative routes through or around the city—and is presently awaiting a decision.

DOE, meanwhile, announced it intended to renew radioactive shipments using a new route through Queens and the Bronx. I joined a number of New York officials in immediately requesting that DOE postpone any shipments until DOT ruled on the city's preemption waiver. The city offered to assume either the cost of constructing additional storage facilities at Brookhaven or the incremental costs of using a barge or ferry route around the city.

DOE turned a deaf ear and on January 22 began a new round of shipments when it secretly trucked spent nuclear fuel rods through the Nation's most densely populated city en route to Idaho.

New York City is not alone among local governments lacking confidence in DOT's willingness or ability to protect the public. Hundreds of State and local restrictions on transportation of radioactive substances have been proposed since HM-164 went into effect about 3 years ago. A resolution urging the National League of Cities to oppose "any efforts to further expand the preemptive powers of the Federal Government * * * in the area of hazardous materials transportation" was presented by the mayors of New York, Chicago, Washington, DC, Columbus, Pittsburgh, Baltimore, Detroit, New Orleans, and Boston at the league's annual meeting last November.

They have good reason to be concerned. Recent events, such as the Pershing missile explosion killing three U.S. Army soldiers in West Germany, the chemical leak in India and the liquefied natural gas explosion in Mexico City, serve as stark reminders that statistically rare catastrophic accidents tend to occur with some regularity. As the number of hazardous materials shipments nationwide quickly increases, so do the chances of a disaster for which we are not prepared.

A 1980 study by Sandia Laboratories concluded that a worst case scenario involving a plutonium transportation accident in New York City could result in 1,800 latent cancer fatalities, 290 early morbidities, 5 early fatalities, and $9 billion in economic damage.

Other aspects of my legislation would assist emergency response preparation. Section 4 of my bill directs the Secretary of Transportation to establish regional training centers to meet the widespread demand for comprehensive enforcement and emergency response training. This provision was passed by the House in 1981, but the bill died in the Senate.

The measure directs the instructors, in addition to teaching classes at the centers, to conduct outreach training programs and to disseminate information within the communities served. The centers are in no way intended to weaken or eliminate private training enterprises, but simply to fill a clear need for high-quality instruction in areas not served by private programs.

Section 5 directs the Secretary to register hazardous materials shippers, transporters, and container manufacturers. HMTA authorizes the creation of such a program, but DOT has declined to do so to date. Registration would provide authorities at all governmental levels with basic and essential information—not currently available—for developing and improving enforcement and emergency response programs.

Section 6 of the bill instructs the Secretary to study the most effective, equitable, and cost efficient method of imposing a user fee on participants in the registration program. The present fiscal climate has left States and localities with minimal funds for vigilant enforcement of safety regulations and development of emergency response programs. Any fund resulting from this study would help finance those local efforts.

Since coming to office, the Reagan administration has zealously advocated a reduction of the Federal Government's role in favor of increasing State and local jurisdiction. Yet when the issue is hazardous materials transportation, the administration has aggressively sought stronger preemption.

I invite my colleagues to help correct this inconsistency by cosponsoring this bill. Common sense dictates that strong safety initiatives should not be automatically rejected for uniformity's sake. Our State and local officials deserve support in their effort to protect the health and well-being of our citizens.

The text of the bill follows:

H.R. 1146

A bill to amend the Hazardous Materials Transportation Act

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Hazardous Materials Transportation Act Amendments of 1985".

SEC. 2. FINDINGS AND PURPOSE.

(a) FINDINGS.—The congress finds that—

(1) the transportation of hazardous materials can create severe hazards to the public safety;

(2) State and local governments have both enforcement and emergency response responsibilities;

(3) uniformity of Federal, State, and local governmental regulation of hazardous material transportation, as encouraged in the Hazardous Material Transportation Act, should not be achieved through the exclusion of adequate safety precautions;

(4) certain rules contained in parts 171, 172, 173, and 177 of title 49 of the Code of Federal Regulations were issued by the Department of Transportation to preempt many valid and necessary State and local regulations, especially those dealing with routing, curfews, and prenotification of certain hazardous materials shipments;

(5) amending the Hazardous Materials Transportation Act to remove the likelihood of Federal preemption of valid and necessary State and local regulations would decrease the threat to health, safety, and property created by the transportation of hazardous materials;

(6) there is a need to strengthen the available resources for State and local enforcement and emergency response;

(7) the establishment of several regional training centers would increase the number and improve the caliber of properly trained personnel for responding to hazardous materials transportation accidents and enforcing hazardous materials transportation laws and would allow for specialized training of such personnel to reflect the various needs and characteristics of the region;

(8) the prompt registration of all shippers and transporters of hazardous materials and manufacturers of containers used in such transportation would provide authorities at all governmental levels with basic and essential information for developing and improving enforcement and emergency response programs; and

(9) assessing such registrants with a fee for the purpose of generating funds for assistance grants to States and localities would be the most equitable means of financing enforcement and emergency response programs at those governmental levels.

(b) PURPOSE.—The purpose of this Act is to promote the public safety by providing State and local governments with the authority and resources to adequately meet their enforcement and emergency response responsibilities.

SEC. 3. INCONSISTENCY AND NONPREEMPTION DETERMINATIONS.

Section 112 of the Hazardous Materials Transportation Act (49 U.S.C. App. 1811) is amended by striking our subsection (b) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(b) INCONSISTENT STATE PROVISIONS.—(1) A State or political subdivision thereof or any person affected by a requirement of a State or political subdivision thereof pertaining to the transportation of hazardous materials may apply to the Secretary for a ruling as to whether the requirement of the State or political subdivision is inconsistent with any requirement set forth in this title or a regulation issued under this title.

"(2)(A) The Secretary shall issue a finding that the requirement of the State or political subdivision is not inconsistent with the Federal requirement unless the Secretary finds that—

"(i) compliance with both the requirements is impossible, or

"(ii) the requirement of the State or political subdivision would make impossible the accomplishment of the purposes of this title or the regulations issued under this title.

"(B) Any requirement of a State or political subdivision thereof which is found not to be inconsistent with this title or a regulation issued under this title by a final determination of a Federal court made prior to the date of the enactment of the Hazardous Materials Transportation Act Amendments of 1985 shall be deemed to be consistent with the requirements of this title and the regulations issued under this title.

"(3) Any requirement of a State or political subdivision thereof which is found by the Secretary to be inconsistent with any requirement set forth in this title or any regulation issued under this title is not preempted if such requirement—

"(A) affords an equal or greater level of protection to the public than is afforded by the requirements of this title or of regulations issued under this title, or

"(B) such requirement does not unreasonably burden commerce.

"(4)(A) Any State or political subdivision thereof may apply to the Secretary for a determination that a requirement of such State or political subdivision which is found to be inconsistent with this title or regulations issued under this title in accordance with this subsection is not preempted.

"(B) The Secretary shall issue an order of nonpreemption under this subsection unless the Secretary finds that—

"(i) the requirement of the State or political subdivision does not afford a level of protection at least equal to that afforded by the requirements of this title and regulations issued under this title, or

"(ii) the requirement of the State or political subdivision unreasonably burdens commerce.

"(C) A requirement of a State or political subdivision thereof which is determined by the Secretary not to be preempted under this paragraph shall not be preempted to the extent specified in such determination for so long as such State or political subdivision thereof continues to administer and enforce effectively such requirement.".

SEC. 4. REGIONAL TRAINING CENTERS.

The Hazardous Materials Transportation Act (49 U.S.C. App. 1801-1813) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"REGIONAL TRAINING CENTERS

"SEC. 117. (a) PURPOSE OF AGREEMENTS.—The Secretary shall enter into cooperative agreements or contracts under this section (hereinafter in this section referred to as 'agreements') for the establishment of regional training centers for purposes of providing an effective and efficient means for training State and local personnel in order to improve the capability of such personnel (1) to respond to hazardous materials transportation accidents, and (2) to enforce State and local hazardous materials transportation requirements that are not preempted under this title. Such training shall address all modes of transportation, inspection, emergency response, and compliance. Such training shall be provided primarily through programs conducted at the site of the regional training center, but shall also include the dissemination of teaching materials to, and the conduct of training programs in, the local communities to be served by such center.

"(b) APPLICATIONS.—(1) Any State, local or regional government agency, or private nonprofit entity or any combination of such entities may submit an application to the Secretary requesting that the Secretary enter into an agreement under this section with the applicant for the establishment of a regional training center.

"(2) An application to enter into an agreement under this subsection shall be submitted at such time and in such form as the Secretary may require and shall contain—

"(A) a description of the hazardous materials transportation training program that the applicant proposes to provide in the regional training center to be established, including (i) an explanation of how such program will accomplish the purposes set forth in subsection (a) of this section, and (ii) an estimate of the cost of such program;

"(B) a statement that the applicant agrees to provide not less than 60 percent of the estimated cost of providing training in the first year of operation of the regional training center and not less than 75 percent of such cost in the second and third years;

"(C) a statement that the applicant will make available one or more physical facilities that are satisfactory for use as a site for the regional training center; and

"(D) such other information with respect to the applicant or the proposed training program as the Secretary may require.

"(c) ACTION ON APPLICATIONS.—(1) The Secretary shall select for approval those applications submitted under subsection (b) of this section which the Secretary determines in his or her discretion best promote the purposes of this section, taking into account the need for the establishment of regional training centers in different regions of the Nation. In making a selection, the Secretary shall consider whether—

"(A) the program that the applicant proposes to provide in the regional training center will accomplish the purposes set forth in subsection (a) of this section;

"(B) the applicant is capable of paying its share of the costs as described in subsection (b)(2)(B) of this section; and

"(C) the applicant is capable of making available one or more physical facilities that are satisfactory for use as a site for the regional training center.

"(2) The Secretary shall act to approve or deny an application under this section within 60 days after the date such application is submitted.

"(d) DURATION AND TERMINATION.—(1) An agreement entered into by the Secretary and an applicant under this section shall be for a term of three years.

"(2) The Secretary may terminate any agreement entered into under this section upon 30 days' notice if the Secretary finds that the program operated under such agreement is not accomplishing the purposes set forth in subsection (a) of this section.

"(e) PHYSICAL FACILITIES.—Any cost of constructing a facility for use as a site for a regional training center shall be borne by the party to the agreement with the Secretary and shall not be included as a cost of providing training for purposes of subsection (b)(2)(B) of this section.

"(f) PARTICIPANTS.—Training provided by a party to an agreement with the Secretary in a regional training center established under this section may be available to private industry personnel only if such personnel provide reimbursement or make contributions (either monetary or in kind) to such party at least equal to the full cost of such training.

"(g) ASSISTANCE BY THE SECRETARY.—The Secretary, upon the request of a party to an agreement under this section, shall provide such party with training materials and such other assistance as may be appropriate to carry out the purposes of this section.

"(h) COORDINATION.—In developing training materials and conducting training pursuant to this section, a party to an agreement with the Secretary shall take into consideration the procedures and standards for responding to hazardous substance releases set forth in the national contingency plan required under the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation, and Liability Act of 1980, at such time as such plan becomes effective.".

SEC. 5. REGISTRATION.

(a) MANDATORY ESTABLISHMENT OF CRITERIA FOR HANDLING.—The first sentence of subsection (a) of section 106 of the Hazardous Materials Transportation Act (49 U.S.C. App. 1805). is amended—

(1) by striking out "The" and inserting in lieu thereof "Not later than 12 months after the date of the enactment of the Hazardous Materials Transportation Act Amendments of 1985, the "; and

(2) by striking out "is authorized to" and inserting in lieu thereof "shall".

(b) ESTABLISHMENT OF MINIMUM INSURANCE COVERAGE LEVELS.—Such sentence is further amended by inserting before the period at the end thereof the following: "and shall establish minimum levels of insurance coverage sufficient to meet injury or damage claims resulting from transportation of such materials".

(c) MANDATORY REGISTRATION.—The first sentence of subsection (b) of such section 106 is amended by striking out "may" and inserting in lieu thereof "shall".

(d) MANDATORY AMEMDMENTS OF REGISTRATION STATEMENTS.—Subsection (b) of such section 106 is amended by inserting after the third sentence the following new sentence: "Not later than 12 months after the date of the enactment of the Hazardous Materials Transportation Act Amendments of 1985, the Secretary shall issue regulations which require registrants to submit an amended registration statement at any time the registration information included in the statement is no longer accurate.".

(e) AVAILABILITY OF REGISTRATION STATEMENTS TO GOVERNMENTAL ENTITIES.—The fourth sentence of subsection (b) of such section 106 is amended by inserting after "any person" the following: "(including any governmental entity)".

SEC. 6. STUDY OF FUNDING METHODS.

The Hazardous Materials Transportation Act (49 U.S.C. App. 1801-1813) is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"FUNDING METHODS STUDY

"SEC. 118. (a) STUDY.—The Secretary shall study the most effective, equitable, and cost-efficient methods for imposing a fee on all participants in the registration program mandated by section 106 of this Act for the purpose of determining the most effective, equitable, and cost-efficient method of imposing such a fee and assisting States or political subdivisions thereof in developing and conducting enforcement and emergency response programs related to transportation of hazardous materials.

"(b) CONSULTATION WITH STATE AND LOCAL GOVERNMENTS.—In conducting the study, the Secretary shall consult State and local governments which have successfully implemented similar fee programs within their jurisdictions.

"(c) REPORT.—The Secretary shall submit a report on the study findings to Congress within 12 months after the date of the enactment of this section.".

SEC. 7. AUTHORIZATION FOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Section 115 of the Hazardous Materials Transportation Act (49 U.S.C. App. 1812) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "There is authorized to be appropriated to carry out sections 106, 112, 117, and 118 of this title such sums as may be necessary for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1986.".●

WORK OF THE COALITION OF GREATER FLINT AFRICAN RELIEF FUND

HON. DALE E. KILDEE

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. KILDEE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call to the attention of my colleagues in the Congress the tremendous work of the Coalition of Greater Flint African Relief Fund. The coalition will be holding a fundraiser on February 23 in Flint, MI, and is hoping for generous response from citizens to aid the starving millions in East Africa and Ethiopia. An earlier fundraiser on February 10 was a heart-warming success.

The coalition organized in late 1984 out of concern for the starvation crisis in Africa. Approximately 45 individuals representing a broad cross section of Flint's black community joined together at that time to support and raise funds for food relief. Since then, the coalition has been conducting various fundraising drives. As the result of one 6-day effort just before Christmas, nearly $5,500 in individual contributions was forwarded to Interaction for distribution among those American voluntary agencies which are delivering services to East Africa and Ethiopia. Since the holidays, additional moneys have been raised to push the total to more than $10,000. Fundraising efforts will continue through February 28.

The main event will be the "Miss a Meal for Africa" program at the University of Michigan-Flint. The speaker will be Mr. C. Payne Lucas, executive director of Africare, a private nonprofit organization working to improve the quality of life in rural Africa.

Chairperson of the coalition is Dr. Nathel Burtley, deputy superintendent of the Flint Community Schools. Other coalition officers are Inez Brown, assistant chairperson; George Wingfield, secretary-treasurer; Hiawatha Green, coordinator of solicitations, and Floyd Clack, coordinator of finance. Ms. Brown is deputy State director for the office of U.S. Senator DONALD W. RIEGLE, Jr.; Wingfield is a teacher at Holmes Middle School; Green is director of the Flint Human Relations Commission, and Clack is a member of the Michigan House of Representatives from the 80th district.

The coalition has contributed significantly both in emergency food aid to Africa and in helping to build public awareness of the crisis there. Its members and supporters deserve the highest commendations for their service.

All of the coalition's funding is being channeled to Africa through Interaction [American Council for Voluntary International Action]. It is an association of more than 120 private and voluntary American organizations. It has received hundreds of thousands of dollars in private cash donations for relief and development in Africa. The House Select Committee on Hunger gives high recommendations to Interaction as a reputable organization for the coalition to utilize in the fundraising efforts. Interaction includes such well known agencies as Catholic Relief Services, CARE, Save the Children Federation, U.S. Committee for UNICEF, World Vision Relief Organization, and Africare.●

MALT BEVERAGE INTERBRAND COMPETITION ACT

HON. CHARLES E. SCHUMER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Speaker, today, my colleague and friend from Texas, JACK BROOKS, has introduced the Malt Beverage Interbrand Competition Act. This misnamed and misguided piece of legislation has been introduced in the 97th, 98th, and now in the 99th Congress. Despite a total of nine hearings in the last two Congresses neither the House nor Senate Judiciary Committees nor any of their subcommittees reported the bill. There is a good reason for this. The Malt Beverage Interbrand Competition Act is among the most blatant special interest, anti-consumer pieces of legislation that has come across our desks. Last year the Wall Street Journal printed an article I wrote explaining why this bill is totally without merit. I commend this article to your attention.

A BEER BILL TO MUG CONSUMERS

(By Charles E. Schumer)

Brewers and beer wholesalers are now promoting a blatant piece of special-interest legislation aimed at giving beer wholesalers protection from competition. The beer industry is seeking a special exemption from the antitrust laws so that brewers can grant wholesalers exclusive distribution territories without fear of legal challenge. The result, as is usually the case with legislation of this sort, would be higher prices for consumers.

The bill is euphemistically titled the Malt Beverage Interbrand Competition Act. New York State Attorney General Robert Abrams, testifying against the bill, said, "the merits aside, the bill should be rejected because its very name amounts to a fraudulent misrepresentation by implying that it would foster rather than discourage competition." A more accurate title would be the Beer Monopoly Act because exclusive territories are really just monopolies. With these monopolies, every liquor store operator, grocer or tavern owner would be forced to go to the one authorized distributor for a given brand in the territory.

Supporters of the legislation, which is now before the House Judiciary Committee on which I serve, make several arguments in favor of the legislation. First, they argue that exclusive territories are necessary to ensure product freshness. However, because beer has a shelf life of three to four months, beer wholesalers have a hard time explaining why they need exclusive territories when distributors of truly perishable products such as milk, fresh orange juice, meat, bread and produce don't have similar protections. If stale beer is indeed a problem, a better solution is clear labeling of expiration dates similar to what we see on milk and bread.

Second, some beer wholesalers argue that they need protection because "transhippers" (distributors who move across primary areas of responsibility) are stealing their business. But these transhippers are simply competing businesspeople who are trying to win new customers! I always understood this to be what competition is about. Beer wholesalers apparently are uncomfortable about the uncertainty that accompanies a competitive marketplace.

Third, they argue that the bill is necessary to clarify the scope of the 21st Amendment. Under several recent court decisions, federal antitrust laws have been held not pre-empted by the 21st Amendment, which has otherwise been interpreted as granting the states broad authority to regulate the sale of alcoholic beverages. However, even if the Supreme Court sustains this position, the bill does not appear to change the rule established in Continental T.V. Inc. vs. GTE Sylvania Inc. that non-price vertical restraints (which include exclusive territorial arrangements) are neither automatically legal nor illegal. The real reason beer distributors want Congress to enact this bill is to pressure states that have not yet decided the issue to permit exclusive territorial arrangements. They will argue that Congress must want these states to approve such arrangements if it passes a law, however redundant, that declares them not to be per se illegal.

Finally, supporters argue that the existing law isn't adequate to protect against frivolous, and costly, lawsuits. We are a litigious society. But the risk of litigation is one all businesspeople face. The beer industry is no different from any other in this regard and it certainly has not shown why it needs special treatment.

Interestingly, the risk of litigation has not prevented the two giant brewers, Anheuser-Busch and Miller Brewing (subsidiary of Philip Morris), which control over 50% of all beer sales, from instituting territorial monopolies this past year. As a result, according to the New York City Department of Consumer Affairs, prices of those brands of beer have gone up 30% in the first 10 months of 1983, while soft-drink prices have gone up only 4%. This striking disparity is confirmed by research in New Jersey and Indiana showing, not surprisingly, that beer monopolies mean higher prices to consumers.

Even the Justice Department and the Federal Trade Commission, which recently have not looked unkindly at vertical restraints imposed on distributors by manufacturers, oppose the bill. Justice says that the chances of anti-competitive consequences in the beer industry are "uniquely high." The FTC told the Judiciary Committee that it is "unaware of any evidence or pincipled argument that might justify the bill."

This is not the first time the beer industry has sought this kind of protection. Similar legislation failed to move through either the Senate or House Judiciary Committees in the 97th Congress. Typically, however, it is the state legislatures that are asked to endorse these monopolies. When I served in Albany, the beer wholesalers proposed that exclusive territories be mandated by law. (The New York Attorney General has now proposed that they be prohibited.) Back then, however, the brewers opposed that legislation calling it "special interest favoritism, granting wholesalers a perpetual hold on the distribution of products and foreclosing by legislation any competition. . . . [It] would inevitably precipitate a price rise." Miller Brewing said that in 1976 and it was right.

In 1979, the President's Commission for Review of Antitrust Laws and Procedures concluded that exemptions from the national policy of free-market competition should only be made upon compelling evidence of the unworkability of competition or a clearly paramount social purpose. The beer industry has not made this showing. Indeed, it is beer drinkers, not beer brewers or beer wholesalers, who need protection.●

FUTURE FARMERS OF AMERICA

HON. WILLIAM H. NATCHER

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. NATCHER. Mr. Speaker, I join with the half million members of the Future Farmers of America as they celebrate National FFA Week, February 16-23. The theme of this year's observance is "Keep Agriculture Number One—Support FFA and Vocational Agriculture."

Future Farmers of America is a national organization of young men and women ranging in age from 14 through 21, who are interested in all aspects of agricultural industry. Through participation in activities, FFA members learn how to speak in public, conduct and take part in meetings, handle financial matters, solve their own problems, and assume civic responsibility.

Members elect their own officers and plan and carry out activities with a minimum of supervision from a vocational agriculture instructor, who serves as chapter adviser. Each chapter develops an annual program of activities and each member carries out a supervised occupational experience program. Degrees of membership are awarded on the basis of individual achievement. Each member begins as a greenhand and progresses to chapter farmer degree in the local chapter. The State farmer degree and American farmer degree are presented by the State FFA Association and the National FFA organization, respectively.

In my home State of Kentucky, the Future Farmers of America has again had a productive year. There are now 14,290 FFA members and 161 chapters. In 1984, over 1,000 FFA members and teachers attended 1 week of training at the Kentucky Leadership Training Center in Hardinsburg, KY. A computers in agriculture awards program instituted during the 1983-84 school year will be continued this year.

I am proud of the FFA members in the Second Congressional District of Kentucky, which I have the privilege of representing, and I am pleased to announce that the National FFA president, Steve Meredith, resides in my home district. Three FFA members in the Second District became regional star farmers in 1984: Barry Hines of Philpot (also became star State farmer), Richard G. Reynolds of Bowling Green, and David A. Mackey of Elizabethtown. The Spencer County FFA chapter won State and national awards for the chapter safety program, Building Our American Communities and the FFA Farm Operation Identification Program. At the 57th National FFA Convention, held in 1984 in Kansas City, Mr. Jewell Colliver, a teacher of agriculture at Barren County High School, received the FFA honorary American farmer degree and eight FFA members from the Second District received the American farmer degree: Terry L. Burke of Glasgow, Ronald Todd Henning of McDaniels, William M. Lipginski of Taylorsville, Glenn Mattingly of Rineyville, Steve Meredith of Glendale, John R. Richardson of Versailles, Mark Daniel Rock of Hodgenville, and Dennis Glenn Vaughn of Franklin.

I know of no group of young people who are accomplishing more in the field of agriculture than those affiliated with the Future Farmers of America and I would like to take this opportunity to commend the members of the Future Farmers of America for their past achievements and to wish them continued success in the future.●

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

HON. WILLIAM F. CLINGER, JR.

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. CLINGER. Mr. Speaker, on February 7, 1985, I was absent from the floor of the House of Representatives. Had I been present, I would have voted in the following fashion:

Rollcall No. 8: Journal, the House approved the Journal of Wednesday, February 6; "yea"; and Rollcall No. 9: House Resolution 52: Indiana election contest, the House agreed to a motion to refer to the Committee on House Administration the resolution to seat Richard D. McIntyre, "nay."●

JUSTICE FOR FRED PAUL

HON. MIKE LOWRY

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. LOWRY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, today I introduced a private bill which would overturn the inequitable award given to Mr. Frederick Paul of Seattle, WA, for services rendered from 1966 to 1971 to the Inupiat Natives of Alaska's North Slope and other Alaskan Natives. Mr. Paul represented the Alaskan Natives in their attempt to gain Federal recognition of their aboriginal claims to the North Slope of Alaska. The Alaskan Natives turned to Mr. Paul because he was an Alaskan Native and also possessed vast historical knowledge of their aboriginal claims. Mr. Paul's efforts helped lead to the passage of the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act of 1971 [ANCSA] which gave Alaska Natives title to 44 million acres of land in Alaska and also provided a monetary award of nearly $1 billion.

My bill would provide an undetermined amount "in full settlement of Mr. Paul's claim arising from the performance of legal services on behalf of Arctic Slope Eskimos and other Natives of Alaska in connection with the enactment of the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act of 1971." Another bill that I have introduced would refer the payment bill to the U.S. Claims Court for review and a recommendation to Congress on the amount of compensation for Mr. Paul.

I have also introduced a third private bill which would relieve Mr. Paul and his wife, Aileen, of all Federal income tax liability, including interest and penalties, for sums awarded to Mr. Paul for the aforementioned legal services. A similar bill was introduced during the last Congress; the Judiciary Committee's Subcommittee on Administrative Law and Governmental Relations is still awaiting the IRS report on it. While I believe that Mr. Paul should be relieved of this tax liability because his fees were exempt by law, I am now focusing my effort on the congressional reference bills concerning the more basic issue of the fairness of Mr. Paul's award.

For more than 6 years of legal services to the Alaskan Natives, Mr. Paul received a $275,095 award from a $1.9 million fund which was established by section 20 of the ANCSA. This $1.9 million was the total amount provided to compensate all the attorneys who performed legal services directly connected to the adoption of the act. Mr. Paul's award was a small percentage of what he would have received had his original contract with the Alaskan Natives not been voided by section 22(a) of the ANCSA. This contract had been approved after an extensive, 17-month review by the Area Director of the Bureau of Indian Affairs acting on behalf of the Secretary of the Interior.

I do not believe that the $275,095 award given to Mr. Paul was fair compensation for the nearly 7,000 hours of dedicated and pioneering work he put into representing the Alaskan Natives. Moreover, activities such as State lobbying, negotiating with oil company representatives, and other services in which Mr. Paul participated—and which clearly related to the passage of the ANCSA—were arbitrarily excluded from compensation by section 20 of the ANCSA. The contractual violation that Mr. Paul suffered as a result of section 20 of the ANCSA seems particularly amenable to judicial review and assessment. I urge my colleagues to support me in righting this wrong.●

THE RESEARCH ACCOUNTABILITY ACT

HON. ROBERT G. TORRICELLI

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. TORRICELLI. Mr. Speaker, today, I am reintroducing the Research Accountability Act. The purpose of this bill is to correct the longstanding deficiency in the way this country manages its biomedical research enterprise. While we spend billions of dollars annually for research, there is no way that scientists can readily and economically find out what has been done before, so as to avoid performing duplicative research. The Research Accountability Act will serve both the scientific community and the taxpayer, and will result in more productive, efficient and innovative research.

The legislation stipulates that the National Library of Medicine, an arm of the National Institutes of Health, shall make available to all of the Nation's medical libraries the full text of published research results using modern information technology. It further provides for the establishment, within the facilities of the National Library of Medicine, a National Center for Research Accountability, staffed by specialists in the biomedical information sciences, who would conduct a full-text literature search prior to the funding of grant proposals involving the use of live animals. This provision is restricted to live animal research, because it continues to be the research method of choice, in addition to the fact that there is deep public disquiet over the duplication of experiments on live animals.

Mr. Speaker, the problem of duplicative and redundant biomedical research is not new. The National Library of Medicine, an arm of the National Institutes of Health, has existed, under various names, since 1836. Today, on its computerized facilities, the National Library of Medicine disseminates bibliographic information and sometimes a brief abstract, but then the serious researcher must find the full-text documents. This often requires a farflung search reaching to seven regional medical libraries across the Nation. This search is often so frustrating and time consuming that it is sometimes referred to as "the paper chase," and only as a last resort does the library provide the documents to the scientist.

Mr. Speaker, to add to the difficulty, published scientific literature doubles every 10 to 15 years. It has reached such massive proportions that no individual scientist could devote the necessary time to finding what has been done, currently or historically. In fact, the huge volume of biomedical information is so vast that neither grant reviewers nor the funding agencies can readily find out what has been done before, not even in specialized fields.

While the initial cost of this new technology would be significant, the investment would be very cost-effective. Vast sums of money would be saved over all of the ensuing years. It is estimated that with the elimination of wasteful, duplicative experiments, the savings would be more than enough to pay for the required techonology.

It makes no sense for our Government to go on spending billions of dollars annually for biomedical research, while it is virtually impossible for scientists to find out what has already been done. Figures are hard to come by, but the following will provide some indication of present expenditures. The annual appropriation for the National Institutes of Health alone is now over $4 billion annually. According to an internal National Institutes of Health memorandum, 55 percent of this money is spent for animal research—for a total of over $2 billion. According to an article that appeared in the Washington Post on March 19, 1983, a total of $4 billion is spent annually for animal research by all Federal agencies.

The acute nature of the problem can be illustrated by the fact that cancer research alone, which uses large numbers of animals, is published in 1,500 journals worldwide. Also, as reported in Science in 1972 (178:471-9, 25 to 50 percent of all scientific publications are never used. Thus, while billions of dollars are being spent for biomedical research, the results are not reaching the scientific community. It is this situation at which the Reasearch Accountability Act is directed.

The bill would not affect ongoing research. It would become operative only with new grant applications. Furthermore, it is not aimed at experiments in which a researcher or team of researchers wish to confirm the results of experiments performed by another. Rather, the bill is addressed to widespread duplication and redundancy of the kind of experiments which appear in great quantity.

Since the modern technology is now at hand, this legislation, for the first time, gives the Congress and the American people the opportunity to address this enduring problem of efficient, cost-effective, full-text biomedical data storage and retrieval. Solving it will require the expertise of the high-tech biomedical information sciences, supplied by specialists from both inside and outside Government.

This bill will create the most modern, up-to-date, medical library in the world capable of providing our scientists, researchers, teachers, and students with almost instantaneous references and information; and would eliminate the tragic duplication of experiments on live animals.

I encourage my colleagues in the House to support this legislation.●

RONALD O. WARNER HONORED FOR VOLUNTEER WORK IN THE AREA OF HEALTH

HON. DALE E. KILDEE

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. KILDEE. Mr. Speaker, I am honored to call to the attention of the Congress the recognition being extended to Ronald O. Warner of Flint, MI, for his outstanding community service in the area of health. On February 22, Mr. Warner will be presented the Annual Health Advocate of the Year Award by the American Lung Association of Genesee Valley.

Flint's 1980 Citizen of the Year, Mr. Warner is one of the community's most active leaders and has been honored by a number of organizations over the years for his selfless and devoted service to bringing about a better way of life for his community. A Flint resident since 1934, he has been active in numerous State and local projects focusing on urban and social problems.

Mr. Warner's involvement and support of worthwhile organizations includes the following: The Michigan League for Human Services, Michigan Welfare League, Flint Area Chamber of Commerce, Urban League of Flint, Urban Coalition, United Way, Boy Scouts, Rotary, Goodwill Industries, American Red Cross, Greater Flint Area Council of Churches, Community Mobilization Against Poverty, Flint Industrial Club, AutoWorld Capital Campaign Committee, Flint Institute of Music, and Flint Area Conference, Inc., as only a partial list.

In the health field, he has been a member of the Hurley Medical Center board of managers since 1970 and was board president from 1974 to 1976. He was cochairman of the Hurley Development Committee, which raised $6.7 million for renovation and construction. He also has been a member of the boards of the Michigan Hospital Association, Mott Children's Health Center, Greater Flint Area Hospital Assembly, and Genesee-Lapeer-Shiawassee Health Systems Task Force.

Ronald O. Warner is one of Flint's most valuable assets. His record of service to others is outstanding. He retired in 1970 as manager of the Chevrolet Flint Manufacturing Division, but he has never retired as an active citizen of his community.●

BLACK AMERICAN PATRIOTS HONORED IN DAR PUBLICATION

HON. BART GORDON

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, it is my desire to bring to the attention of the 99th Congress the publication of a book which adds greatly to our understanding and appreciation of the contributions black Americans made during the American struggle for independence.

The book, published by the National Society Daughters of the American Revolution, is entitled "Black Courage, 1775-1783: Documentation of Black Participation in the American Revolution." This book documents the courage and valor of black Americans who struggled for freedom during the American Revolution.

The DAR has performed a great service by publishing this book. I intend to distribute copies of the publication to a number of public libraries and other such depositories in my congressional district so that this important story is available to all those who might benefit from it, be they scholars, schoolchildren, genealogists or amateur historians.

To help fully explain the benefit of this publication, I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the attached statement of Sarah M. King, president general of the National Society Daughters of the American Revolution, be made a part of the RECORD of the 99th Congress. Mrs. King made these statements upon the publication of the book. In her remarks, she singles out one black patriot from her hometown, Murfreesboro, TN. Peter Jennings fought in many important battles during the revolution and later settled in Murfreesboro, which is also my hometown. His grave, once unmarked and abandoned, is now a symbol of black participation in the American Revolution and is marked due to the efforts of Mrs. King and the DAR. In a similar but more symbolic effort, the DAR's publication of this book lights forever what was once an unmarked record of service rendered by these brave men.

Following are Mrs. King's remarks:

EXCERPTED STATEMENT OF SARAH M. KING

On the eve of Black History Month, which is also American History Month, it is both appropriate and a privilege for the DAR to formally announce the publication of "Black Courage: Documentation of Black Participation in the American Revolution," by Robert Ewell Greene.

As you may know, the National Society Daughters of the American Revolution is dedicated to the perpetuation of the memory and spirit of those brave and visionary men and women who fought to secure American Independence. Some names are familiar to us all—George Washington, Nathan Hale, the Marquis de Lafayette. But these celebrated patriots were by no means the only great carriers of the torch of Liberty.

Foot-soldiers, militiamen, medics, porters and countless others fought the battles, weathered the storms and, in many instances, gave their lives so that their neighbors and children might live free. These patriots were no less great, no less important, than the celebrated men who led them. They came from all walks of life and they were of varied ethnic and religious backgrounds. But they were joined by a spirit, and, driven by a strength, that built the greatest nation in the world.

Our history books pay tribute to many of these Revolutionary War heroes. Our history books, however, are far from complete. Some groups have not received the recognition they deserve. So it is with the nearly 5,000 Revolutionary soldiers and militiamen who were black. It is time to honor those courageous black Americans.

The National Society Daughters of the American Revolution is committed to doing just that. "Black Courage" was sponsored and published by the National Society. We believe it to be an important contribution to our nation's historical record.

"Black Courage" is the result of Mr. Greene's meticulous research of pension records and other documents in national and state archives. Most of his sources were original manuscripts. From those documents, Mr. Greene compiled more than just the names of black Revolutionary soldiers: he uncovered crucial information about their lives, their social and economic backgrounds, their length of service and their fortunes after the war. In short, Mr. Greene has brought elements of the Massasoit Guards, the "Bucks of America", the Rhode Island Black Regiment, and many others, to life.

In so doing Mr. Greene has accomplished something else that is important to the DAR: he has increased the sum of genealogical data which other Americans can use to trace their families back to the American Revolution and beyond. It is our sincere hope that Mr. Greene, and others like him who have taken the time to expand modern recognition of black patriots, will inspire the living descendants of those patriots to discover their eligibility and join the DAR. Just as our young nation needed their forefathers to join in the fight for liberty, we need them to contribute to our work in the fields of history, education and patriotism.

Now, before I introduce the author of "Black Courage" to you today, I would like to add one personal note. I was pleased to see that one of the patriots listed in "Black Courage" settled in my home town of Murfreesboro, Tennessee. Peter Jennings enlisted in the army in Providence, Rhode Island, in 1776. He served in several companies, including Colonel Edward Olney's 5th Regiment of Artillery for Blacks, and he fought in the battles of Trenton, Princeton, Brandywine, and Germantown, and right to the end at Yorktown.

After the war, Mr. Jennings moved to Murfreesboro, where he was a baker. He was given a pension in 1832, when he was eighty years-old. He died ten years later.

More than ten years ago—in 1974—while searching the old city cemetery for the grave of my own maternal grandfather six generations removed, my DAR chapter and I found that Peter Jennings had been buried there in an unmarked grave. We applied to the General Services Administration for grave-stones, and then marked both graves with stones bearing their names and their titles as Revolutionary War Soldiers. Those headstones were placed side-by-side.

Now, who says genealogy isn't exciting?●

WE SHOULD NOT PLACE AN UNFAIR BURDEN ON OUR SENIOR CITIZENS

HON. HOWARD WOLPE

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. WOLPE. Mr. Speaker, in the past 2 months I have received 4,200 petitions from the National Committee to Preserve Social Security and Medicare expressing their concern that the Social Security and Medicare systems be protected.

The magnitude of the deficits that we have experienced in recent years poses a grave threat to the economic security of the country, and finding ways to reduce the deficit must be given the highest priority in the months ahead. However, in my view, it would be patently unfair to ask millions of senior Americans on low- and fixed-incomes, already faced with rapidly increasing health care costs, to now accept an even greater economic burden.

Mr. Speaker, why is this administration so reluctant to attack the real waste in the Federal budget—the Pentagon cost overruns, the wasteful Synfuels Corporation, the cost-ineffective water projects? Seniors are no less willing than other Americans to accept needed sacrifice, but they are correctly insisting that the sacrifices be equal, that the burden be shared. The Congress must demand no less.●

NO MORE NUCLEAR WASTE SHIPMENTS THROUGH LARGE CITIES

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, today I am joined by my fellow colleagues from New York, Messrs. SCHEUER, MANTON, and WEISS, in introducing a bill to restrict the transportation of radioactive materials through large cities. This measure, which is entitled the Radioactive Materials Transportation Safety Act of 1985, is in direct response to the U.S. Department of Energy's decision to transport nuclear waste by truck from their Brookhaven National Laboratory on Long Island through New York City, Westchester County and other densely populated areas.

DOE's action, while in accordance with one U.S. Department of Transportation regulation, is totally contrary to another. On the other hand, a DOT regulation issued in 1981—HM-164—designates the interstate highway system as a preferred route when shipping large-quantity shipments of radioactive materials. This regulation, then, would appear to give DOE the right to truck the nuclear waste from Brookhaven through the city of New York and Westchester County, since that is where the nearest interstate highway system to Brookhaven runs. However, a second DOT regulation states that whenever possible major urban areas should be avoided when shipping hazardous materials. This regulation would appear to preclude DOE from shipping through New York City and Westchester County, since safer alternative routes avoiding those two major urban areas are known to exist.

My bill seeks to resolve this inconsistency in Federal regulation by requiring shippers of nuclear waste to avoid large cities and instead use alternative routes. This legislation would provide a responsible solution to the Brookhaven dilemma, but it would also establish a clear national policy that would help to promote safety in other parts of the country as well.

Consider, for example, that during the last 10 years there have been an average of about 300 shipments of U.S. nuclear spent fuel each year affecting all regions of the country—large and small cities alike. According to the Environmental Policy Institute, that number is expected to increase to nearly 9,000 shipments per year by the year 2004. Clearly, then, this is a growing problem that must not be allowed to continue.

Why should we be concerned about transporting nuclear waste through large urban areas? Risk assessments vary widely, with anywhere from 5,000 to 10,000 immediate deaths projected, and between $4 billion to $9 billion in costs associated with a nuclear waste shipment accident involving leakage in a large urban area. Further, experts have informed me that to minimize resulting illnesses and fatalities persons within a 2½-mile radius of the leakage would have to be evacuated in a matter of minutes, a virtual impossibility in an urban area like New York City.

Officials at the Departments of Transportation and Energy argue that the chances of a nuclear waste accident involving leakage are highly remote; that every possible safety precaution has been taken. They base their confidence on the fact that during 40 years of nuclear waste shipments there has never been a death or injury resulting from an accident. But, my concerns are also based on fact. For instance, a Ralph Nader study revealed that there were 122 accidents involving nuclear waste shipments in 1979—the most recent year any such study was conducted. Although no injuries or deaths resulted, it seems certain that as the number of nuclear waste shipments increase, so does the risk of accident and leakage. We need only to look at the Bhipal, India tragedy to know that no matter how remote the odds, catastrophes involving hazardous materials can and do occur.

Suffice it to say that when deciding how to ship nuclear waste, we should be working with the worst-case scenario in mind—namely, that there might be an accident involving leakage. The obvious question, then: How can we minimize safety risks in the event of an accident resulting in radiation leakage? The answer: Avoid large cities when transporting the nuclear waste.

That logic is both sound and practicable. Consider, for instance, that a recent study conducted by Arthur D. Little, Inc., a highly respected and knowledgeable firm in the area of hazardous material transportation risks, concluded that there are at least three safer alternatives to the New York City highway route now being used by DOE. The study specifically concluded that any of these three routes would increase safety by from 4 to 9 percent, without any significant cost or mileage increase. The three alternative routes each involve a combined highway-water mode of transport. The average cost per shipment would go from about $12,000 under the current method to only $13,000 under the highway-ferry method. Distance would be increased by a mere 15 to 60 miles—depending on which of the three alternative routes were used—out of the total 2,500-mile trip to Idaho.

The uniqueness of New York City's interstate highway system makes the combined highway-ferry alternative particularly attractive. While DOT's regulations for nuclear waste shipments encourage shippers to use the Interstate Highway System, they also state that an interstate system bypass or beltway around a city is to be used when available. Unfortunately, New York City is one of the only major urban areas in the country without an interstate bypass or beltway. Instead, New York City's interstate highway system cuts directly through some of the city's most densely populated areas, including Co-op City in the Bronx, which is a stone's throw away from the nuclear waste shipments route and his home for more than 40,000 of my constituents. Despite this added safety concern, however, DOE has refused to either delay shipments so other alternatives can be explored—even though they have plenty of extra storage capacity—or to reroute their shipments. I view this inflexibility on the part of DOE to be contrary to the best interests of public safety, and this situation must not be allowed to continue.

DOT issued their regulations governing radioactive material shipments in an effort to promote uniformity. Specifically, they were responding to the fact that some 200 localities nationwide had passed their own laws restricting or prohibiting nuclear waste shipments through their jurisdictions. Their regulations preempted all of those local laws, thus creating uniformity, but at the same time ignoring a number of crucial safety concerns—like what happens when an Interstate Highway System runs straight through our Nation's largest city. My bill effectively and responsibly addresses this problem, without unduly interfering with the overall nuclear waste transportation process. I strongly urge that it receive the prompt and favorable consideration it deserves.

Mr Speaker, at this time I wish to insert the full text of the Radioactive Materials Transportation Safety Act of 1985:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Radioactive Materials Transportation Safety Act of 1985".

SEC. 2. RESTRICTION ON TRANSPORTATION OF RADIOACTIVE MATERIALS.

Section 105 of the Hazardous Materials Transportation Act (49 U.S.C. app. 1804) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(d) RADIOACTIVE MATERIALS.—

"(1) RESTRICTION.—No controlled quantity of radioactive materials may be transported by public road or highway through or into any large city.

"(2) EXCEPTIONS.—The restriction established in paragraph (1) shall not apply to the transportation of radioactive materials—

"(A) to be used for medical diagnosis or treatment in the large city involved; or

"(B) during a national emergency.

"(3) APPLICABILITY.—The provisions of this subsection shall be applicable to any transportation of radioactive materials occurring on or after the date of the enactment of the Radioactive Materials Transportation Safety Act of 1985.

"(4) DEFINITIONS.—For purposes of this subsection—

"(A) the term 'controlled quantity of radioactive materials' means a highway route controlled quantity of radioactive materials under section 173.403(1) of title 49, Code of Federal Regulations, as in effect on January 1, 1985; and

"(B) the term 'large city' means a city having a population of not less than 50,000 persons, as determined by the most recent data available from the Bureau of the Census.

"(5) REGULATIONS.—The Secretary shall revise the regulations issued under subsection (a) to carry out the provisions of this subsection.".●

THE 40TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE BATTLE OF IWO JIMA—"UNCOMMON VALOR WAS A COMMON VIRTUE"

HON. TOM LANTOS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, today—February 19—is the 40th anniversary of the beginning of the battle for Iwo Jima during 1945. In honor of this anniversary, I was pleased to make available space I had reserved in the Cannon Rotunda for an exhibit entitled "The Island War—Marines in the Pacific," which displays art from the Navy, Marine Corps, Army, and Coast Guard collections depicting the heroic struggle in the Pacific Theater of World War II. The works are done largely by participants of Iwo Jima and other battles in the Pacific. Many were done while shots were being fired. They reflect the real faces of war—fatigue, fear, sorrow, and determination. I urge my colleagues to view this exhibition while it is on display during the next 2 weeks.

Although today we are commemorating the battle of Iwo Jima, we are, in a broader sense, honoring all who served in the Pacific during World War II. This battle was one of the many that were fought by our brave men in the Marine Corps, Navy, Army, and Air Force in the Pacific Theater during World War II. They fought in other major Pacific battles—Midway, Coral Sea, Guadalcanal, Layete Gulf, Tarawa, Kawajalein, Guam, Peleliu, Saipan, Tinian, Okinawa and others—and and in the thousands of small skirmishes throughout the Pacific Ocean and in Asia.

Yet in many ways, Iwo Jima has become a symbol of the bravery and courage of all those who fought in the Pacific, first because of the great bravery and courage of those who fought there. Iwo Jima was appropriately called "the Gibralter of the Pacific." The 8 square miles of the island were covered with almost 23,000 defenders who were armed with antiship guns imported from Singapore, as well as machine guns and rifles. The Japanese were prepared to fight to the death.

The battle that began February 19 was one of the bloodiest in Marine Corps history, and some of the most intense hand-to-hand combat of the war took place during the conquest of the island. The Japanese defenders refused to surrender and were annihilated almost to the last man. The island was not declared secure for 5 weeks.

The battle of Iwo Jima took a heavy toll—6,821 marines and sailors were killed and 19,217 more were wounded. For herosim during the seizure of the island, 24 Medals of Honor were awarded. As Adm. Chester Nimitz said of those who fought there: "On Iwo Jima, uncommon valor was a common virtue."

A second reason that Iwo Jima has become a symbol of the American struggle in World War II is that the battle also gave us the most famous photograph of World War II, and one of the finest war photographs of all time. Taken by Associated Press photographer Joe Rosenthal, the photo shows five Marines and a Navy hospital corpsman raising the American flag on the crest of Mount Suribachi on February 23. Three of these brave men died in later action in the war. That photograph is the basis of the Marine Corps War Memorial at the Arlington National Cemetery.

The capture of Iwo Jima was an important contribution to the U.S. victory over Japan in World War II. The island gave U.S. forces a base from which fighters escorted B-29's making bombing runs over Japan and provided an airfield for damaged bombers returning from these runs. Over 24,000 American airmen found refuge on Iwo Jima before the war ended. Thus control of Iwo Jima contributed to shortening the war in the Pacific.

Mr. Speaker, as we mark the 40th anniversary of the battle for Iwo Jima today, we honor those Marines who fought in this battle. But we also honor today all those who contributed to the American victory in the Pacific during World War II. I urge my colleagues here in the House and the American people throughout our Nation to remember on this occasion the unselfish sacrifices made by so many that we might enjoy the blessings of liberty and freedom from tyranny.●

NEWTON N. MINOW'S SPEECH TO THE ASSOCIATION OF AMERICAN LAW SCHOOLS

HON. SIDNEY R. YATES

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, my good friend, the wise and constructive lawyer Newton Minow, recently made a speech to the Association of American Law Schools which raises and discusses most perceptively a number of important issues of interest to every Member of Congress. I have attached it to my remarks and I urge my colleagues to read it:

Your meeting is a most appropriate time and place to announce the completion of a major work of legal scholarship. After thirty-five years, I have finished a comprehensive study of European Comparative Law. Your invitation enables me to share my exhaustive research with our nation's law professors.

After careful study of four legal systems in Germany, France, the Soviet Union and Italy, here are my conclusions:

In Germany, under the law, everything is prohibited except that which is permitted.

In France, under the law, everything is permitted, except that which is prohibited.

In the Soviet Union, under the law, everything is prohibited, including that which is permitted.

And in Italy, under the law, everything is permitted, especially that which is prohibited.

Now, there may be some of you who are not interested in these finer points of European comparative law, and may ask, so what? What about the United States? I suggest that is why there are American law schools and law professors. For it is your task to analyze and debate what is prohibited and what is permitted in the United States. We have a never ending search for the answers, especially because we ask American law professors for even more: we ask that you teach us not only what is prohibited and what is permitted, but also why—and we also ask you to reflect on what should be prohibited and what should be permitted.

It is a high privilege for a practicing lawyer to speak at your annual meeting. The three cornerstones of our profession—the judges, the teachers, and the practitioners—have much to say to each other, and I am honored to bring my perspective to this indispensable dialogue.

As a partner in a large law firm which searches in your schools for talented young men and women to join our practice, my partners and I thank you for giving us splendid lawyers who are well trained and even, in recent years, well mannered.

Yet, while law firms are in your debt for producing practicing lawyers, my thesis today is that our country's citizens are too often being shortchanged by our law schools and the gifted men and women who teach in them.

I take as my text an article which my partner, Ben Heineman, Jr., wrote last year:

"Put simply, the law schools—especially the top 25 that believe they are in the top 10—should be a major source of vision about the kind of society America ought to be, in its third century . . ."

"Yet few outside observers, and few candid insiders, would say that the nation's law schools and law professors are possessed by a breadth of vision or are taking a comprehensive view of the major problems that this society must address in the decades ahead, either in the public or private sector."

While I agree with Ben, I am reassured by the theme of your 1985 Annual Meeting: "The Law Teacher and the Public Interest: Professor Deeds Goes to Washington." One question we will be discussing this afternoon is: Do law teachers have a special obligation to illuminate politics and public life?

To me the answer is clear. Your analytical skills are needed, not only to study also to safeguard principles of law, especially in this confusing time of rapid technological revolution. Your vision is needed if we are to avoid narrow approaches to legal questions—such as what is permitted and what is prohibited in terms of rigid, either/or choices. Last month, Judge Bork reminded us in an important opinion: "The temptation to adhere to sharply-defined categories is understandable. Judges generalize, they articulate concepts, they enunciate such things as four-factor frameworks, three-pronged tests, and two-tiered analyses in an effort, laudable by and large, to bring order to a universe of unruly happenings and to give guidance for the future to themselves and others. But it is certain that life will bring up cases whose facts simply cannot be handled by purely verbal formulas, or at least not handled with any sophistication and feeling for the underlying values at stake. When such a case appears and a court attempts nevertheless to force the old construct upon the new situation, the result is mechanical jurisprudence."

Judge Bork is right. As technology rushes forward in the remaining 15 years of this century, traditional definitions of life itself fail to offer useful answers to new questions. Life support machines extend breathing; do they extend life? As technology rushes forward, do traditional perspectives of the Constitutional war power extend to pushing a button which may blow up the world?

Civilization, said H. G. Wells, is a race between education and catastrophe. I believe it is also a race between law and technological and social change in modern life. Your unique ability to study and apply principles of law to the issues posed by onrushing technological and social change is needed to provide the light of reason.

Here are a few issues of modern life where the law, it seems to me, has thus far been of little help in even asking the right questions, much less in reaching useful answers.

First, the relationship between politics, public office and the public interest. Running for office in our country is a hard, miserable, frustrating and intimidating experience. A candidate must be up and at the voters at 6:00 a.m. shaking hands at the factory gate or the commuter station. A candidate must raise enormous sums of money. A candidate must submit to the most intense scrutiny by the media, and serve up his or her entire family for public examination. A candidate must abandon any notion of privacy, disclose all sorts of personal information, financial data, and expect and accept abuse and constant criticism.

As a result, some people have found it much easier to take a short cut and avoid the political process. All you have to do is simply announce one day that you have been appointed as a representative of the "public interest." If you appoint yourself, you don't have to subject yourself or your family to all the rigors of a campaign. Yet, in the past 10 or 15 years, self-appointed representatives of the public have come to be regarded and treated, especially by the media, as somehow being more legitimate and authentic representatives of the public than the men and women who were elected according to the law.

Why? Traditional legal analysis would tell only a small part of the story—that certain elective offices are created for which persons standing for election must have certain qualifications. But in the real world, forces outside the law—especilaly post-Vietnam, post-Watergate cynicism about public officials—have changed modern life to the point there where self-appointed citizens are often perceived as more representative than our elected officials.

Second, last year I served as Chairman of the Search Committee for the next President of Northwestern University. Our Committee reflected various parts of the institution: trustees, faculty, alumni, and students. We conducted a nationwide search for eight months; simultaneously, our nation searched for nominees for the next President of the United States. Having been a delegate for years to the Democratic National Conventions, it quickly became apparent to me that the way we search for university presidents offered significant lessons compared to the way we nominate our Presidential candidates. When our country began, President George Washington was chosen through the Electoral College which was designed much more like a university search committee than the 1984 primaries and caucuses.

Again, a traditional legal view, based on the literal requirements of the Constitution, would tell us that the Electoral College remains inviolate in the Constitution. But the real world tells us that this part of the Constitution has little to do with modern life.

A third issue concerns changing economic conceptions and the law. In our firm's practice, we counsel different industries and professions trying to adjust to the new world of deregulation. We see pluses and minuses in adapting to deregulation of communications, transportation, banking and medical care. It is currently fashionable for some economists to argue that the all-knowing marketplace is the solution to all problems and, as a result, we see many young lawyers who know the price of everything—and the value of nothing. (Do you remember what one economist said to the other economist? "It may work in practice, but it doesn't work in theory.") But just as many regulators of the seventies were too narrow and rigid, so many deregulators of the eighties are too narrow and rigid. The pendulum is now swinging from everything is prohibited to everything is permitted, from the overregulation of the seventies to what could become the anarchy of the nineties.

What is needed—and has begun at some of your schools—is a new and more subtle form of legal analysis to assess how varying amounts of intervention in markets really work in modern life.

Each of these questions is an example where law, which is the indispensable instrument for orderly change in our governance, has almost became a bystander, an observer, a non-participant. While all of us have been looking for what is permitted and what is prohibited in our law libraries, we failed to look out the window where other things were happening.

When we look in the books to read the Constitution, we learn that the Constitution is subject to amendment only through specific, prescribed procedures. I suggest to you that sometimes the law and the Constitution are amended without any of us realizing it. Sometimes, as in the case of the Electoral College, this happens through the evolution of political practices, and sometimes, this happens when the Constitution is amended by technology. Then it happens silently and instantly.

For example, consider the relevance of political jurisdictions. When the technology of television developed, the television and advertising industries quickly saw that television signals did not correspond with political boundaries. A television signal spreads through the air in a circle with a radius of about sixty miles. Viewers of a signal broadcast from my hometown of Chicago live in the City of Chicago, the Cook County suburbs, the other five county metropolitan area of Chicago, and in other parts of Illinois, Wisconsin, Indiana and Michigan. The same situation exists throughout the United States, and across our national boundaries into Canada and Mexico. When this became apparent, the broadcasting and television industries quickly acted. They drew their own map, ignoring city, county, state and national boundary lines, and divided the country into 211 ADI's—Areas of Dominant Influence. They didn't call for a Constitutional convention or persuade Congress to change any laws. They simply threw away the official governmental maps and boundaries and adapted to the new technology, by defining their business in terms of ADI's, instead of cities, counties, states, and the nation.

In government, however, we haven't acted—or reacted to the new technology.

For example, government failed to act and react while television fundamentally altered the balance between our three branches of government. Only one branch, the Executive, has access to television on its own terms, essentially at the discretion of the President. Congress now knows that television fundamentally altered legislative debates. The other day, Senator Howard Baker observed that Senators do not need to participate much in Senate debates these days because "if no one listens, the Senators don't care because they go outside the Senate floor and someone will listen to them with a television camera."

While Presidents and Senators learned about television, most academics have been slow learners, and closed their eyes to the impact of television.

Suppose I gave you a test with this multiple choice question: Which of the following is the most influential educational institution in America? (a) Harvard (b) Yale (c) the University of California (d) Northwestern University (e) Notre Dame University (f) Your own University (g) None of the above.

The correct answer is (g) None of the above: the correct answer is television.

Watching television is how most Americans spend most of their time—close to eight hours a day in the average home. Most Americans now receive most of their information through broadcasting. As Professor Benjamin Barber observes:

"The community of citizens governing themselves face-to-face has given way to the mass society, and live talk has been replaced by telecommunications. Once a nation of talkers, we have turned into a nation of watchers—once doers, we have become viewers—and the effect on our democracy has been profound."

Yes, the effect on political processes has been more profound than any other technological change since the printing press. And its effect on the democratic process, its effect on law, its effect on government, and its effect on politics all are a set of questions which call for more attention from the best legal minds in America.

Television does enlighten citizens and does advance the democratic process in ways far beyond the capacity of any other medium. Television's coverage of the Watergate hearings and the impeachment hearings gave the American people more than a civics lesson; it also gave them front row seats in the hearing room and a sense of unparalleled participation. The Presidential debates, with all their faults, do bring the candidates into millions of homes and offer citizens a first-hand chance to evaluate the candidates.

But, with all the advances through this powerful medium, there are also setbacks to the democratic process. Theodore White, the best historian-journalist in our time, said it best when he wrote last year that the flood of money that gushes into politics to buy television time is the pollution of democracy.

I propose that you law professors address, analyze, and reflect on this question: What is the best way to harness this great gift of television to improve and advance the electoral process? You have the expertise, analytical skills, and vision to find ways—constitutional ways consistent with First Amendment freedoms—to achieve four goals:

First: To promote rational political discussion in Presidential campaigns.

Second: To reduce the amount of money required to run for political office, especially to buy television time.

Third: To shorten campaigns.

Fourth: To assure basic access to television for all significant candidates for President and Vice President.

Let us examine each goal.

First, to promote rational political discussion in Presidential campaigns. Sophisticated campaign strategists and political consultants now create commercials and spots which dominate the airwaves at a cost of many millions of dollars. In my own State of Illinois in the recent Senate election, our major candidates, Paul Simon and Chuck Percy, found our Illinois situation even worse than usual. A California businessman—unathorized by Simon—spent more than 1.1 million dollars of his own money to "help" Simon by buying radio and television commercials that attacked Percy. Although Simon disavowed the ads, he could not stop them. A law, which I think could be drafted to satisfy Constitutional tests, is needed to stop not only this form of assault on the democratic process, but to stop all political commercials. John O'Toole, Chairman of one of the nation's leading advertising agencies, Foote, Cone and Belding, put the issue in plain English: "The time has come to stop trivializing the electoral process by equating a candidate and a public office with an antiperspirant and an armpit. It is time to stop selling television spots to political candidates."

Second, to reduce the amount of money required to run for political office, especially to buy television time. Once the major Presidential candidates are nominated, they now receive more than $40 million in public funds for the campaign. In 1984, most of that money went to purchase television time, almost all of it to purchase commercials of thirty or sixty seconds. In the primaries, approximately $85 million was raised and spent by the candidates, mostly for commercials.

Presidents of the television age, starting with Presidents Eisenhower and Kennedy, saw the problem coming and urged reform. Now, more than twenty years later, the problem is more than twenty times worse. Why on earth should the American people spend millions out of the public treasury so that the Republican and Democratic candidates can flood the air with thirty second television commercials contributing nothing to political enlightenment? If this money is to be spent, at least let us insist that the candidates appear live to deal with issues. I ask you to search for ways, constitutional ways, to eliminate this pollution of democracy, and use this great medium to inform and enlighten us.

If you are not indignant at the current situation, I remind you of what Kipling did not say: "If you can keep your head while all others about you are losing theirs, maybe you don't understand the seriousness of the situation."

Third, to shorten campaigns. If you've ever been in Great Britain during a political campaign, you saw campaign periods strictly limited to a three-week period during which no candidate can buy television time. Instead, the parties are allocated an amount of political time on the air to use as they wish—with the parties sharing the time and taking their own cases to the voters. No commercials. No payments for time. And Western civilization was not impaired—and has survived.

Fourth, to assure basic access to television for all significant candidates for President and Vice President. As you know, our Federal Communications Act requires that all candidates for the same office be treated equally by broadcasters. This means that if a broadcaster gives or sells time to one candidate, time must be made available on the same terms to his or her opponent. There are certain exceptions for news programs and interviews. The Presidential Debates, with which I was deeply involved in 1976 and 1980, were conducted under regulatory and judicial interpretations of these exceptions—an interesting legal story, but too long to go into here. I believe that not all candidates need to be treated equally; there were 229 candidates for President in 1984; not all of them were serious. How can we distinguish between serious, significant candidates—and the others? How do we do this under the law, under the Constitution, under our sense of fundamental fairness?

While the courts have dealt with some of these issues, the law remains murky.

These four goals are worthy of the serious analysis, research, and thought which legal scholars give to other questions every year. While I do not read widely in the law reviews these days, I do skim the tables of contents, and I find bountiful articles on the finer, esoteric points of law such as: (1) Can a policeman look under a blanket in the automobile trunk when he stops a suspicious driver who may be carrying drugs? (2) Protected "puffery" in commercial speech. (3) The application of the Due Process Clause to an unending stream of actions. (4) Liability of construction lenders to contractors, subcontractors and materialmen. While these issues are worthy of your skills, I suggest that basic issues involving the effect of the electronic media on politics and governance deserve equal time.

Why do I suggest that this issue of television and politics be examined in the law schools? Because law schools are unique institutions in our society, unlike any other part of the academic world. As one privileged to serve as a trustee of several major American universities, I see excellent graduate schools whose function is to train teachers to impart knowledge of English Literature. I see excellent schools where engineers and scientists are trained to create new technological progress. I see business and management experts trained through MBA programs to run complex business and public organizations. I see excellent medical schools train physicians and surgeons to help keep our good health and preserve and prolong life. These are essential, vital and valuable contributions to our society.

But law schools are unique. A law school is the only place where the life of the mind is joined with the practical, real world search for justice, for ethical values, for fairness, for the protection of individual rights and responsibilities, and for the preservation of principles of a free society. As the world of technology becomes more and more complex, your unique competence as professors of law is called upon to reconcile these precious values with the technological revolution and the Information Age.

In only two years we approach the bicentennial of our Constitution to celebrate what the Jeffersons, Franklins, and Madisons gave us in 1787. Where are the 1987 Jeffersons, Franklins and Madisons? I hope some of you are in this room today.

I was lucky in law school to have some wise teachers who passed on enduring lessons to me. Some may say that these lessons have little to do with the law—and others may say they have everything to do with the law. My law professors, some of whom are here today, taught me the value of civility in dealing with contentious matters, the need for respect for opposing views, and the necessity of continuing lifetime learning after law school. Some statements still ring through my memory, such as: "Civilization advances when what had been perceived as a misfortune comes to be perceived as an injustice . . ." and "the challenge is to become one in spirit—if not necessarily in opinion."

More than thirty years ago, I accompanied my boss Adlai E. Stevenson when he addressed the Association of American Law Schools on December 28, 1953. He spoke of the need for justness . . . and the need for a compassionate eye and a strong arm to see that each individual, no matter how weak or unappealing, is dealt with fairly and justly. And he reminded law professors of the university's essential mission: to search for truth and to communicate that truth to succeeding generations.

Today, more than thirty years later, two of my daughters and my son-in-law—all lawyers—are here as part of a succeeding generation. To them—and to you—I leave the words of a great teacher, Professor John Fairbank, about the student-teacher relationship and the debts a student owes a teacher: "For all students who feel indebted to their teachers, the rule is 'Don't feel you should try to pay it back. Instead, pass it on.' "●

NATIONAL SCHOOL LIBRARY MONTH

HON. OLYMPIA J. SNOWE

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing a resolution today which would designate April 1985 as "National School Library Month."

School libraries from the elementary to the university level play a vital role in educating America's students. A school library today, as in years past, often provides children with their first access to books. School libraries staffed by talented, dedicated professional librarians can instill in young people a love of reading which lasts a lifetime. In addition, the modern school library is equipped to provide a full range of media resources, including computers, audiovisual aids, materials for the handicapped, and works of art, to students of all educational levels.

The ability to continue to expand collections and develop new resources to meet the changing needs of teachers and students depends, in part, on the public recognition of the fine services provided by school libraries. By proclaiming April 1985 as "National School Library Month" we can help generate public support and recognition for school libraries. We may also help to spark a renewed interest in reading and learning among our Nation's children.

I invite my colleagues to join me in showing support for school libraries by cosponsoring this resolution.●

MARTIN LUTHER KING HOLIDAY COMMISSION

HON. JIM COURTER

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. COURTER. Mr. Speaker, last month I had the honor of being included in a group of individuals in Atlanta, GA, who were sworn in as commissioners of the Martin Luther King, Jr. Federal Holiday Commission. This Commission is charged with coordinating ceremonies and activities throughout the United States relating to the first observance of the Federal legal holiday in honor of the great civil rights leader. At this time, I would like to share with my colleagues my remarks at the Atlanta ceremony.

The central feature of American political history has been a deep tension between populism and elitism; between those who have and those who need; between economic and political oligarchs and the people. In no other area has this tension been more tragic than in the relations between black man and white man. A nation founded on the eternal truth, that "all men are created equal," was torn apart and nearly collapsed when this truth collided with the Southern, white slave-owner, resulting in a bloody civil war.

The civil rights movement, as we all know, did not end with Lincoln. In fact, he unleashed a flood-tide so powerful that many of those who would keep the black man and woman down have drowned or are barely clinging to the last unsubmerged rocks. And one of the greatest descendants of Lincoln was Martin Luther King, Jr., a man who also had a profound understanding of the implications of the Declaration of Independence. King was an instrument of freedom. He was one of the few men who have been able to prove that history is not always slower than the men who try to make it. He was also, like Lincoln, destroyed just as his revolution reached its apogee. Yet, before he was killed, King had successfully turned his tremendous powers of leadership, organization and persuasion on the pernicious structure of racial segregation. He successfully built a broad consensus in this country that that structure must be brought down.

Many words will be spoken today on the virtues of Martin Luther King, but there is one important aspect of his life that I would like to point out, particularly for many of my conservative friends. King worked within the framework of the Constitution, defending the law of the land as it, in the end, defended him. As Professor Harry Jaffa, an erstwhile speechwriter for Barry Goldwater, pointed out in a fascinating essay on the 15th anniversary of King's death, "Those who arrested King were the lawbreakers. Jim Crow never was law. . . . Hitler and Stalin may have embodied the unjust law in their evil regimes, but Bull Connor never embodied the positive law of the United States, which under the Constitution must be consistent with natural justice."

Where does the civil rights movement go from here? I would like to see President Reagan continue the 20 year old "War on Poverty" with a program that uses private incentives to revitalize our cities and wrest the poor from government dependence. Enterprise Zones are at the heart of this strategy—which also includes home ownership programs and tax relief for the working poor—and I am proud to note that Governor Tom Kean is already advancing this reform at the state level in New Jersey.

This strategy would mobilize the most dynamic and creative source of social and economic change: the private enterprise sector. I support Robert Kennedy's remarks in 1967 that "to ignore the potential of private enterprise is to fight the war on poverty with a single platoon while great armies are left to stand aside."

We can never forget the unemployed in the inner cities who have not fully shared in America's prosperity. This is not a time for gradualism and delay; the President has a mandate to end long years of economic neglect. And I believe the American civil rights revolution will not be complete until we fully assimilate blacks and other minorities into the mainstream of the American economy by putting all Americans back to work. Thank you very much.●

YEAR OF THE TEACHER

HON. WILLIAM D. FORD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to introduce a bill proclaiming 1985 as the "Year of the Teacher."

There are more than 3 million teachers in the United States teaching at every level of education. These teachers are the most critical link in the educational process. It is their job to bring together the learner and the skills, information and knowledge that the learner seeks to attain.

The teaching profession as a whole is performing in a dedicated and exemplary manner. However, teachers frequently do not receive the recognition, rewards and respect that their important role and their outstanding performance merits. Designating 1985 as the "Year of the Teacher," which would be accompanied by appropriate ceremonies and other activities, is one small way to express the Nation's gratitude to its teachers and to elevate them in the public's esteem. A largely symbolic act, such as this resolution, certainly does not replace the need to devote adequate resources to education in general and teachers in particular. Nevertheless, it can be a significant stimulus for improving educational excellence and for recognizing the contributions and needs of our Nation's teachers.

I hope that you will join me in cosponsoring this resolution which recognizes the importance of teachers to our Nation.●

A TRIBUTE TO THE TURKISH BRIGADE

HON. JOSEPH J. DioGUARDI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. DioGUARDI. Mr. Speaker, I rise to draw the attention of this body to the anniversary of a proud service rendered this country on the field of battle. On January 25, 1951, soldiers of Turkey, fighting side by side with Americans under the flag of the United Nations, saved the lives of thousands of Americans. Fighting hand to hand combat in savage cold for many days and nights, the combined forces of Americans and Turks held off an enemy advance that could have entrapped tens of thousands of Americans. In the words of General Walton H. Walker, the commander of the troops whose lives were spared, "You have saved the 8th Army and the 9th Army Corps from encirclement and the U.S. 2d Division from destruction."

No friend is truer than the friend who stands forth in your hour of need and risks all that he has. The Turkish Brigade clearly took such risks to save the lives of Americans. In fact, these forces, along with their American counterparts, were honored with a Distinguished Unit Citation by Congress. This was the first time in history that such an honor was afforded to troops of another nation.

I think that we in Congress should pause to honor those of other nations who gave their lives to defend the American way of life. Clearly, the members of the Turkish Brigade deserve such recognition. I urge each of my colleagues to take the time to reflect on the great service done this nation by those fine soldiers.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.●

VETERANS' PREFERENCE BILL

HON. NICK JOE RAHALL II

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. RAHALL. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation which I believe preserves one important aspect of the Veterans' Preference Act, which was passed during the 78th Congress. Similar legislation was passed by the House of Representatives during the 98th Congress, and I believe it is an important and necessary step in insuring a continuation of the act's original intent—to protect and show commitment to our Nation's veterans.

The bill I am introducing provides that Federal agencies may not separate a veterans' preference eligible from the position of guard, messenger, elevator operator, and custodian, because of a contract award. The bill also gives priority to preference eligible when vacancies occur or new positions are available. Due to a technical interpretation by certain Government agencies which dictates that guards and uniformed officers be given separate classifications, this bill will make it clear that "guards" and "uniformed officers" are synonymous.

Technically, title V, section 3310, provides that competition for the positions of guard, messenger, elevator operator, and custodian, in the civil service, will be restricted to veterans' preference eligibles, as long as preference eligibles are available. However, in recent years, the opportunity for veterans to obtain secure employment in these four restricted positions has been decreasing. A major reason for this decrease is the conversion of many of these positions to contract performance. My bill addresses the route of this decrease is an attempt to shore up the provisions of the Veterans' Preference Act.

We must not forget this Government's longstanding commitment to our Nation's veterans, a commitment which recognizes the tremendous contribution these men and women have made to our country. We cannot turn our backs on veterans who served this country—to ensure the security of our ideals—by ignoring special protections which were instituted to show our commitment and appreciation.

I realize that sheltered workshops for the handicapped have expressed concern about the impact of a blanket prohibition on contracting out these positions, on their ability to contract with the Government for certain services. I am confident that this bill favorably addresses these legitimate concerns, while still upholding the original intent of the Veterans' Preference Act.

I am honored to be joined in introducing this legislation by my distinguished colleagues MERVYN DYMALLY, WILLIAM CLAY, MICKEY LELAND, AUSTIN MURPHY, RICHARD SHELBY, STENY HOYER, DENNY SMITH, MARCY KAPTUR, J. ROY ROWLAND, MICHAEL BILIRAKIS, DAVID BONIOR, SONNY MONTGOMERY, DON SUNDQUIST, HARLEY STAGGERS, JOE KOLTER, MATTHEW MARTINEZ, and RICHARD DURBIN, Members who have consistently demonstrated their commitment to veterans. I am hopeful that all of our colleagues will support this opportunity to say "We have not forgotten."●

INSPIRATION FROM A HEAVYWEIGHT

HON. HAL DAUB

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. DAUB. Mr. Speaker, one of the finest monuments to man's capacity to reach out and care for another less fortunate and make a world of difference lies in my Second District of Nebraska. It's known everywhere—Boys Town. On February 6, it was the scene of a special program called Horatio Alger Day, honoring Horatio Alger's type of hero, the one he wrote about in more than 100 books who against all odds rose from rags to riches, and became a finer, more sensitive human being in the process.

The keynote speaker was the former Olympic gold medalist and later world heavyweight boxing champion, George Foreman, who is now a minister in Houston, TX. George was made one of the Horatio Alger Association of Distinguished Americans inductees in 1984. He started as the youngest son of a lady barber in the "bloody fifth ward" of Houston, and was one of the juvenile delinquents and high school dropouts who went into the Job Corps Program in the 1960's.

His Boys Town appearance offered him an occasion to tell another side of American business, as he wound up in the Parks Urban Job Corps Center near Pleasanton, CA, which was operated by Litton Industries, Inc. Litton's founder, the late Charles B. "Tex" Thornton, believed poverty was not so much lack of money, but lack of employable skills, and he turned away from the traditional direction of a business to test a company's expertise against a rising sociological problem. More than 14,000 youngsters from every State were in that center, about 9,500 of them going into jobs for which they were trained, and George Foreman was only the most famous success story of them all. Thornton sensed something special about George and assigned a former Nebraskan, retired USAF Col. Barney Oldfield to be available to him, to counsel him, to help him as he was a most confused and much troubled youth. Oldfield was with him in Mexico City when he won the gold medal in 1968, in Jamaica with him when he won the championship from Joe Frazier in 1973, and in Zaire in Africa with him when he lost his crown to Muhammad Ali in 1974—but they have stayed together as George has found this new and constructive direction for his life.

One of the last things Thornton did before he died was to nominate his successor as chairman of Litton for the Horatio Alger Award. He, Fred W. O'Green, a onetime high school clarinet player in Mason City, IA, had that honor conferred on him in 1983. When Foreman was named for the Horatio Alger class of 1984, in sentimental memory of the difference Litton industries had made in his life, he asked that O'Green be his presenter, and O'Green gave him his trophy.

And as frosting on the cake, George told one of the Boys Town students in his audience Anthony Cardenas, that he will be going to New York on April 10, to recieve a $5,000 Horatio Alger Scholarship.

That my colleagues may know that there are indeed happy endings the best kind being those continuing with no end in sight—and for those who sometimes wonder whether the legislation we enact here actually reaches out and touches people, I commend for their reading George Foreman's remarks as delivered at Boys Town, NE, February 6, 1985:

REMARKS OF GEORGE FOREMAN AT THE HORATIO ALGER DAY FOR STUDENTS PROGRAM, BOYS TOWN, NE

Father Hupp and my new Boys Town friends: One of the lasting dividends of having been champion of the world is that I get invited to places like Boys Town which gives me a chance to be with people like you. Being world champion entitles you to claim everywhere as your home. One is never a stranger. He's never without friends somewhere. Somebody is always glad to see you. Somebody always wants to talk with you. You hear from people all over this Earth. Some are proud to be seen with you. They tell their friends what we've talked about—the laughs we've had together, or the troubles that we have shared.

People in sports—especially professional sports—are always talked about a lot in terms of money. Money has its importance, but the real riches if you are lucky, are when you emerge from whatever you've done with the respect or other human beings—to have fought the fair fight, to have taken your lumps and survived, to have been admired as a competitor, and to still be admired after competition.

One of the things having the championship teaches you is that sooner or later, you'll have to do something about what comes after that. Nobody can ever keep something like a championship, or be a winning team forever. Somewhere out there, somebody or some group or team is going to take it away from you, and you will be a loser. There are many lessons in losing, the biggest one is that if you are going to stay a loser, that's your decision. It needn't be so. There's always life that is going on, and in that life there's always the possibility that it can be better beyond where you are now. If you learn to put an occasional loss down as just a happening along the road to be put behind you, and go on, you can probably be a big winner and find ways to win forever. Here at Boys Town, you are being prepared for what comes later.

When they asked me if I would come to Boys Town today and represent the Horatio Alger Association of Distinguished Americans, I was putting my coat on while I was still on the phone, and was ready to run for the airport the minute I hung up. They said I had a little more time than that, as it wasn't scheduled until today.

There was a time in my life when Boys Town was a kind of dream. As I had heard about it, if you make it to the gate out there, they'd tell you to come in. Once in, they fed you, cared for you, taught you, guided you, and made sure when you came of age, you would be man and count for something.

In the bloody fifth ward of Houston, Texas, where I grew up, it was like comedian Danny Thomas once described his hometown: Everybody had an equal opportunity—to die in the electric chair. We did all of what kids think are great adventures, hustled pool games, did shoplifting, had fights. I was already an alcoholic when I was ten years old. Nobody forced me to drink that cheap wine. It was my own idea, and I chose to do it myself. I was a big kid, did a lot of street brawling. It was great preparatory training for what I would become as a teenager, a mugger.

Not long ago, I took my son with me back to that old fifth ward. I wanted him to see the houses we lived in—my mother, my brothers, and sisters. I took him there and showed him where I had been on the run and crawled under to hide when the police were looking for me with dogs. Have you any idea what it's like to be lying there alone in the dark, with not too much maneuver room, trapped, and out there in the night you hear police shouting, and dogs snarling and barking, and you are the focus of their attention? I don't recommend it. My little boy got quieter and quieter as I told him about it, and that it had happened right there, and to his father.

You see, he wasn't born until after I had been champion of the world. In his mind, that's where I'd come from. Now he was having to make a big adjustment in his thoughts about his father. He had to include that old bloody fifth ward, being under that house, hiding from cops and dogs. Not so with me, I knew that's where I'd come from.

If you've had a starting point like that, everything would seem bound to get better. I didn't realize it there in the dark—but when there were troubled times later—I could remember being alone there under that old house and not far from those dogs. The important thing is to put as much distance as one is able from a repetition of such experiences. But if you have known such things, never forget them either.

Life teaches you about alternatives. There is never only one way to go, or only one way to do anything. When I was a kid—the friends I had as well as myself—we all thought the bad alternatives were the ways to go. There were so many of them. The bad ones were so easy. Either we weren't looking too much for the good alternatives, or we were turned off them by the fact that there was usually work involved if they were to be realized. Only suckers worked, we thought—and we had some basis for believing that. I used to get hired to unload trucks at a warehouse and they said they'd pay me $1.25 an hour. When I was paid, I got a dollar an hour and they kept the 25 cents. That told me one was a fool to do physical labor. It was easier to steal except—if we thought about it—there were risks involved—things like jail and reform school. As I was making one bad alternative selection after another, they were closing in on me. I was finally given a choice of either going to jail or to the Job Corps. Job Corps was a place where we were taught employable skills. I was to be in two of them—one in Grants Pass, Oregon, and the other in Pleasanton, California, near San Francisco.

I'd been the usual bad boy one day in Oregon, and the center director told me, as punishment, to dig a big deep hole. That ground was hard. I was digging and sweating like a water fountain. When I finally got done with the hole, they told me what it was for, that's where they were going to put the Camp Flagpole. Because I had dug the hole, after the pole was up, they let me raise the flag the first time. It was there that they had told all of us kids that no matter what we'd been called before, Chicanos, chinks, niggers—in that Job Corps Center we were all Americans, and not to forget it. I can't tell you what a deep impression that made on me. I felt so proud that the country into which I'd been born really included me. I don't think I ever felt that before. But there in Oregon they told me that even if I was a bad one—I was an American, too. In my mind, there had always been a place called America, but I was only a problem to it. And then there was an even more terrible thought which I didn't like to have—that I was an outsider because I'd chosen to be one—and a bad one, too. That's not a nice thought to live with, and it made me return to my old rebellious ways. Soon they sent me to another Job Corps Center, the one which was operated by Litton Industries in California.

They were teaching me to be an electronic assembler. Imagine, George Foreman, this human demolition derby, doing something about building rather than destroying. They told me if I followed their instructions about putting a transistor radio together—it would not only function, but it would be mine to keep. To my amazement everything they said would come about, did come about and the radio was mine. Other things they told me were also true. But I was always getting in fights. One day they sent me to the gym and I was told every big guy in the place was going to beat on me. There was nothing much in way of punishment to that, as I was doing that kind of stuff in alleys all the time. But the alternative of doing it in the ring made all the difference in the world. If one does it in the ring, I found, people holler, and cheer, and applaud. One thing led to another, golden gloves, and then to my total surprise a berth on the United States Olympic team in 1968. There in Mexico City, with half a billion people watching by satellite, for the first time in my life I was a winner. They put that Olympic Gold Medal around my neck to prove it, and I slept with it on me that night. I believe I was the proudest American anywhere alive then. What a long, long way that was from being under that old bloody fifth ward house with the police and dogs trying to find me. It says a lot for taking the good alternative, believe me—no matter how unknown the way ahead may be when you do it.

In the minds of most people, it's an easy step from the Olympic Gold Medal to the heavyweight boxing crown. Don't you believe it. There were all those fights after I turned pro in towns where the crowds were small, and I'd have to hock my watch to get to the next town for the next fight. But I thought if I hung in there, my time would come. It did, and I won that long sought championship. When that happen, you are no longer a private person. Everyone thinks he knows you, has a right to part of you, and there are times when you ask yourself whether you really won it all, or lost it all. But that's also when you begin to find out what you're made of, who your friends really are, who wants to help shape you up, and more likely, who wants to shake you down. The alternatives again. They increase in number, the pricetags on the right ones are whoppers, but the pricetags on the wrong ones stagger the imagination. One day when it's all behind you, you get to thinking it was almost like being back under that old house hiding from the police and their dogs. The alternatives had different dimensions, but they were just as fearful—the consequences even more awful.

But whatever I am today, good or bad, it's the sum total of having gone through it all. When God asserted himself in my life, I had been all the way down, all the way up, and I was on the ropes again. He took me over. In boxing—it's almost a tradition that somebody, or several somebodies—have pieces of you, a percentage. But God isn't much interested in limited partnerships, I've found. He wants all there is of you. And for a guy like me, who has known about every bad deal there is—he made me the best one I've ever known. The purse after his struggle to get me was the most generous one there is . . . peace of mind.

Part of that has come through realization that along my tortured trail others saw things in me I never knew were there. One of the recognitions was given me only last May at the Century Plaza Hotel in Los Angeles. The occasion was my selection as one of ten people in this whole country for induction in the Horatio Alger Association of Distinguished Americans. Horatio Alger wrote more than a hundred books about rising from rags to riches, so these awards are given annually based on his theme that people by hard work are capable of winning big. That one of these would fall to George Foreman—that same kid who had hid under that old house from the police and their dogs had to be one of the most humbling, the most unlikely events of all time. But, in this America which includes caring men and women who want to help others—who create places like Boys Town and pat people like George Foreman on the back and urge him on, we have to know the accident of birth has placed us in a truly blessed corner of the world. I'd like to have you know that no matter how bleak it looked out there sometimes, if you make the good try, you'll find more people are paying attention than you think and will applaud you, too.

That's a long, long way from running from dogs and police and hiding under old houses, believe me.

But let me make some statements here about how many human beings there are out there who are probably waiting to help, if you show some signs of being worthy of their help.

Tex Thornton I thank. What a human being he was. His company ran that Job Corps Center in California where I trained. He was there that day I put that transister radio together. It is often said that businessmen are too busy to be concerned about social problems—that social problems are not for business. But Tex Thornton surely didn't think that way. Over four years, besides George Foreman, he helped more than 14,000 youngsters from every State in the Union, and most of them got—and were able to hold jobs—in the skills in which they were trained. And he didn't stop there. He gave a 3,200-acre ranch in Colorado to have it turned into a child caring haven for court awarded victims of child abuse. After he died in 1981, because of what he did for me, I came on the board of directors of that establishment which is called the Triple L Youth Ranch.

That man who gave me my award that night, Fred W. O'Green, he heads the sixty-eighth largest company in America, Litton Industries. He hasn't been able to hear without a hearing aid since he was twenty-six years old. He never let that stop him.

President Ronald Reagan who said nice things about me, used to live up over the store in an apartment which was all his parents could afford when he was a boy. His father had a drinking problem. When World War II bagan, President Reagan's eyesight was so poor, he was barely able to qualify for military service. But he wanted to serve his country, and he did. Once on a movie set, a pistol loaded with blanks, was fired too close to his ear, and his hearing deteriorated. So, our President wears contact lenses and a hearing aid, but it didn't keep him from being President of the United States. From all of them, I have benefitted from their examples. Each one of them in his own time became a Horatio Alger winner and I take pride that we have this in common.

Just a month ago, I had my thirty-sixth birthday. That say's I'm middle-aged. When I was your age, it was an even bet I wouldn't live through some fight to see the next day. I never thought I'd live this long. But from this perspective, when I consider all the incredible things, the people I've been privileged to know, the events I've been part of, how can I ever doubt there's a way over every obstacle there is.

Although I don't know all your personal stories, I believe it's a safe bet that I probably started worse off than any of you. I hope so, for your sakes. Yet with what Boys Town and other high schools offer you, and prepare you for, there's an even richer life expectancy for you than there has been for me. Education is one thing that unlocks almost any door. Cherish the fact that it's available to you and make the most of it. I wish a great full society-serving life for you all, and if the Horatio Alger spirit is with you—you'll make it.●

H.R. 1018, A COMMISSION TO REVIEW FEDERAL RETIREMENT SYSTEMS

HON. BILL ARCHER

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. ARCHER. Mr. Speaker, in this Congress, I have again introduced legislation which would establish a commission to review Federal retirement systems. The bill, introduced on February 7, is H.R. 1018.

The issue of Federal retirement systems is one which I have long felt needs a thorough examination. The purpose of this bipartisan commission shall be to review and examine the Federal civilian and military retirement systems. It will assess the long-term financial requirements of each system in terms of both the projected benefits and anticipated receipts for the systems.

In light of the recent events and circumstances surrounding the debate over Federal pension plans and retirement systems, this bill is timely and merits the prompt attention of the Congress. Some sources estimate that Government retirement plans provide benefits and incur costs three to six times as great as the best private sector plans. At this time of tremendous budget deficits, there is no doubt a need to eliminate waste while continuing to provide a supportive Federal pension system. A bipartisan commission with a congressional directive to review the Federal retirement systems could offer suggestions for pension system reforms which are both fair and equitable. It would provide an opportunity for all affected groups to participate in the process of reaching a public consensus on the scope of the issue of pension reform. It is essential that our Federal pension systems ensure efficiency while providing incentives for attracting and retaining our civil service and military employees. I urge my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring H.R. 1018 to establish a commission to review our Federal retirement systems.●

PRESIDENT ALFONSIN OF ARGENTINA RECEIVES DEMOCRACY AWARD

HON. MICHAEL D. BARNES

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, it was recently my privilege to cosponsor, along with the gentleman from California, [Mr. LAGOMARSINO], the first Western Hemisphere Legislative Leaders Forum. Some 50 legislative leaders from around our hemisphere attended this 2-day conference, which was held in the Foreign Affairs Committee room in the Rayburn Building. The meeting was organized by the Center for Democracy, and owes much of its success to the vision and dynamism of the center's president, Dr. Allen Weinstein. I hope and trust that other such forums will be held in the future.

During the conference, the Center for Democracy presented its Democracy Award to President Raul Alfonsin of Argentina. As the leader of Argentina's transition to democracy during the past year, President Alfonsin is indeed a worthy recipient of this award. As some of my colleagues may know, President Alfonsin will make a state visit to the United States next month, and I know we all look forward to receiving him.

Accepting the Democracy Award on behalf of President Alfonsin was Argentina's very able Ambassador to the United States, His Excellency Lucio Gracia del Solar. Because Ambassador Garcia del Solar's address contains many important insights on the transition to democracy in Latin America—and on the threat to that transition that is posed by what the Ambassador calls "the specters of growing poverty, economic hardship, unsatisfied need and want"—I am including the address at this point for the information of the Members.

DEMOCRACY IN THE HEMISPHERE

It gives me great pleasure to address this audience of distinguished legislators from our hemisphere at a meeting organized by the Center for Democracy which is bestowing the Democracy Award on the President of my country, Raul Alfonsin. This award represents a recognition of the success Argentina is having in recovering the democratic traditions that contributed to the development of the nations of the hemisphere; it is also a recognition of the significance of the regeneration of democratic governments in many Latin American countries.

Democracy is not just a word in our hemisphere, but, as you well know, neither is it a practice that can be taken for granted. Too many nations of the hemisphere are still struggling to return to a democratic way of life or to conserve it. Many of us have learned through bitter experience that democracy is not only necessary for institutional stability, and economic development, it is also the only way of honorably and effectively upholding western values in our societies.

As President Alfonsin has said "Democracy is not simply established by majority rule: What makes a system democratic is the way power is exercised, the manner in which governments submit themselves inexorably to institutional and electoral constraints." I am proud to say that the administration of the radical civic union has governed Argentina for more than a year and in that time our government has restored a sense of decency and fairness to public affairs in a very troubled land, while earning credibility abroad. The award the center is giving our President is a testimony to this fact.

But though it is true that democracy is necessary for justice, freedom and peace, it is also true that recuperating political liberty is not sufficient to achieve and preserve these values. We cannot live by democracy alone.

The move towards democracy in the hemisphere, which is a move towards establishing a viable center in our societies that will cement and preserve our institutions, is threatened by the most serious financial crisis that we have ever faced. This international crisis is beyond our control and in its potential for devastation it has been compared to the depression of the thirties.

I hope that it is only ironic and not tragic that at a time in which the move towards democracy is deepening and widening in the hemisphere, knitting our societies together with bonds based on common values and political practices—in many of the reclaimed democracies we are faced with the specters of growing poverty, economic hardship, unsatisfied need and want.

We understand that the present economic and financial crisis of our countries is not due to the ill will of our creditors. The hard economic realities with which we cope; high interest rates that increase our debt burden and the forces leading to the protectionism that limit our exports, adversely effect economies in the north as well as in the south. But it is also true, and we are quite aware of this truth, that the north is more in a position to solve our common problems than those who have not yet achieved the political stability and economic prosperity that the democratic way of life promises.

Fortunately throughout the hemisphere many people have become aware of the stake we all share in reconstructing and protecting the link between prosperity in the north and growth and democracy in the south. It is becoming more and more obvious that a rich democratic north, financially, economically and politically alien to an improverished south, is a danger to hemispheric values, stability, peace and security.

One of the important roles the Center for Democracy may play in world affairs is to highlight relevant issues and to stimulate the discussion of problems by persons who are in a position to implement their conclusions. This is another reason we value the award you are bestowing our President.

Those of us who are committed to shared values must come together to coordinate our efforts in behalf of practical goals and ideals by getting to know one another and learn about the similarities in our geographically very distant political contexts, whether these contexts are shaped by the concerns of farmers in Iowa or peasants in Peru, steelworkers in Pennsylvania or miners in Oruro, cane cutters in Jamaica or textile workers in Argentina. This kind of cooperation has worked in the European Community and between Europe and the United States. Why should it not work in our hemisphere?

Solutions to international problems cannot be brought about by self-defeating political and economic confrontation, but only by a wider and more knowledgeable cooperation. It is in this field of international cooperation where the Center for Democracy excells as the presence here of legislators from all points of the hemisphere confirms. It is by addressing frankly, in such a forum, the unsolved problems of today, that you will assure that these problems will not set the stage for the future.

Thank you.●

CARDINAL STEPINAC—A MARTYR FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

HON. AUSTIN J. MURPHY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Speaker, February 10, 1985, marked the 25th anniversary of the death of Cardinal Aloysius Stepinac, the Primate of Yugoslavia's 7 million Catholics. The free world will remember this great churchman as an unrelenting opponent of totalitarianism of any form. During the Second World War, Cardinal Stepinac's public condemnations of Nazi and Fascist ideologies showed rare and exemplary courage. Through his words and actions, he cautioned all people against the malevolent forces which had engulfed his beloved Yugoslavia.

In the turbulent postwar period, he was no less energetic in deploring the communism which threatened the hearts and souls of his people. In an attempt to silence this champion of human rights, the Communist regime of Premier Tito accused Cardinal Stepinac of collaboration with the Nazis and sentenced him to prison in 1946.

This travesty of justice became a highly controversial international issue and provoked worldwide outcry. The Vatican took the extraordinary step of ordering the excommunication of all those connected with Stepinac's trial. Although he was released from prison in 1951, he was forced to live a life of police-enforced isolation in his native village of Krasic until his death on the 10th of February 1960.

On this occasion, I would ask my colleagues to remember Cardinal Stepinac as a brave religious leader whose commitment to human dignity reached far beyond his native Croatia and touched all mankind.●

TOBACCO IMPORT RELIEF ACT

HON. HAROLD ROGERS

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the Tobacco Import Relief Act of 1985.

This bill would limit annual imports of burley tobacco to 45 million pounds, flue-cured tobacco to 31 million pounds, and filler tobacco to 25 million pounds. This represents about a 50-percent reduction of imports for each of these different types of tobacco.

This bill incorporates the provisions which were included in the section 22 petition for relief from tobacco imports, which was filed by the American Farm Bureau Federation, and the 12 tobacco producing State Farm Bureaus. It has become necessary to file this bill since the ITC has now decided not to recommend administrative relief from tobacco imports under section 22.

The facts clearly point out the need for such relief from imports. Imports have skyrocketed, increasing by 400 percent from 1975 to 1983. Imports' share of the tobacco market is also increasing dramatically, rising from 4 percent in 1975 to 26 percent in 1983. And the U.S. Department of Agriculture has projected that if the current trends continue, tobacco imports' share of the market will exceed 40 percent by 1990.

The net result of all these tobacco imports has been that domestic loan stocks are increasing, from 180 million pounds in 1975 to 798 million pounds in 1984.

The impact of these developments on the hundreds of small tobacco producing farms across the United States has been devastating. We've been forced to reduce price support levels. And we've been forced to accept a 36-percent reduction in marketing quotas just since 1980.

These reductions alone have resulted in an estimated $733 million loss in growers' income. And when increases in no net cost fees, compensating for the swollen stocks are added on, our small family farms have suffered an approximately $1 billion loss in income. This is a terribly cruel blow, especially when considered in light of the generally severe financial conditions in our farming communities.

Mr. Speaker, today we are in the deplorable situation where we are restricting our domestic growers production in order to stabilize market conditions—but at the same time, we are giving our foreign competitors a free hand, to sell as much as they wish to in our borders. And these imports, flooding unrestricted into our markets, are wreaking havoc with our tobacco growers' incomes.

The Tobacco Import Relief Act of 1985 will help to correct these problems. By placing strict limits on imported tobacco, and reducing these imports by 50 percent, it will give us breathing room to solve our import problem. It will allow us to reduce our loan pools and give our growers a chance to get back on their feet. This relief is essential to the survival of our small tobacco producers. I urge my colleagues to support this bill.●

USE CIGARETTE EXCISE TAX REVENUES TO SAVE MEDICARE

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, on January 3, I introduced H.R. 236, a bill to keep the cigarette excise tax at 16 cents, adjust it annually for changes in the cost-of-living index, and earmark the additional revenues from this tax to the Medicare trust funds.

This proposal is a user fee: Those who smoke cost the Nation's health care systems a great deal more than those who don't. The cigarette users should therefore be willing to pay more for their practice and those revenues should be used to help pay for the health care system.

The Economic Report of the President, issued this February 5, contains a section (page 137-8) discussing the enormous costs of smoking to the health system. The data is another strong argument for my bill, and I include it in the RECORD at this point:

THE EFFECTS OF LIFESTYLE ON HEALTH

If the effectiveness of additional medical care in producing better health is questionable, the opposite can be said about the importance of lifestyle factors such as smoking, consumption of alcohol, and diet. Studies of middle-aged men have identified three risk factors—smoking, cholesterol, and blood pressure—as the major determinants of the risk of death from any cause. These factors are all influenced by a person's lifestyle.

A number of investigators have estimated that 30 percent, or more, of coronary heart disease deaths can be attributed to cigarette smoking. Smoking is the major single cause of cancer deaths in the United States, and it is a contributing factor to deaths from stroke and emphysema. In fact, the U.S. Surgeon General calls it "the chief, single avoidable cause of death in our society, and the most important public health problem of our time." The total annual U.S. mortality from smoking is estimated to exceed the number of Americans killed in battle during World War II.

According to one estimate, the total direct medical care cost of smoking was $12.8 billion in 1972 (using 1983 prices). The discounted value of lost earnings attributable to sickness or death related to smoking was $31.1 billion. The total cost for smoking-induced illness represented 10.9 percent of all medical care costs in 1972. Focusing on the smoking-induced direct costs of cancer, there was a marked increase from 1972 to 1980—from $1.67 billion to $3.15 billion (in 1983 prices). . . .

These negative externalities can be affected by taxing the products that cause them. . . . The Federal excise tax per package of cigarettes was raised from 8 to 16 cents by the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act of 1982. This provision is due to expire later this year when the Federal cigarette tax will revert to its old level. Several studies have shown that consumption of alcoholic beverages and cigarettes falls if the prices of these products are increased by an excise tax.●

THE 75TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE BOY SCOUTS OF AMERICA

HON. GUS YATRON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. YATRON. Mr. Speaker, this year, our Nation celebrates an important anniversary—the 75th anniversary of the Boy Scouts of America. In celebration of this important event, the Hawk Mountain Council of the Boy Scouts of America, located in Pennsylvania, will hold a Diamond Jubilee Scout Show at the Kutztown fairgrounds.

Clearly, the Boy Scouts of America are deserving of our highest tribute for their outstanding contributions to our Nation. Since the beginning of this organization in 1910 they have given millions of young men an opportunity to come together, to learn, to develop, and to excel. The actual date of organization of the Boy Scouts of America is February 8, 1910. Additional recognition of the diamond jubilee year will be at the camporees and Scout shows in the months ahead and the different councils throughout the country.

The Hawk Mountain Council celebration will be held on May 10 and 11. This council is 15 years old. It was established when the former Daniel Boone Council in Berks County, which can be traced back to 1911, merged with Appalachian trails in the Schuylkill County Council. Hawk Mountain Council encompasses all of Berks County, all of Schuylkill County and a portion of Carbon County. There are nearly 10,000 youth in Cub Scout Packs, Boy Scout troops and Explorer posts in the Hawk Mountain Council. Hawk Mountain Council has strong business, community, and family support and is counted as one of the most successful councils in the Boy Scouting family.

The Hawk Mountain Council and the leaders and Scouts who have come together under its unity, exemplify the type of community spirit so important to the American way of life. The council has enhanced the lives of so many of our youth and it is especially fitting that we pay tribute to the council and to the Boy Scouts of America today. I know that my colleagues will join me in wishing the council a most successful Scout show and continued success in all their future endeavors.●

"CAN-DO" REAGAN GOVERNMENT

HON. ROBERT H. MICHEL

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, as we move forward into the second Reagan administration, it is useful to reflect on the work of those first 4 years. What were some of the successes in meeting the goals of the 1980 election challenge?

In a perceptive article entitled "'Can-Do' Government" published in the current issue of Policy Review (Winter, 1985), William Kristol draws our attention to the effectiveness of three appointees who have translated the challenge into a meaningful reordering of Government agency priorities.

The subtitle of the article: "Three Reagan Appointees Who Made a Difference" focuses on the work of Thomas Pauken, Director of ACTION, James Miller, Chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, and William Bennett, Chairman of the National Endowment for the Humanities and the new Secretary of Education.

At this time, I would like to insert into the RECORD, "'Can-Do' Reagan Government" by William Kristol as published in the current issue of Policy Review.

CAN-DO GOVERNMENT

THREE REAGAN APPOINTEES WHO MADE A DIFFERENCE

(By William Kristol)

William J. Bennett, James C. Miller III, and Thomas W. Pauken have defied the conventional wisdom about institutional paralysis in Washington. Neither Tip O'Neill nor career bureaucrats nor the Washington Post stopped these three Reagan appointees from translating their president's mandate into fundamental policy changes at the agencies they lead.

When Mr. Bennett took over the National Endowment for the Humanities (NEH) at the end of 1981, the agency was a roaring success by Washington standards: its budget had grown even faster than the norm during the 1970s. Unfortunately, there was no evidence that the humanities were better off as a result of these unfocused dollops of Federal spending. If anything, the NEH was aiding and abetting the shallowest and trendiest sorts of projects, those least likely to be of enduring value.

Three years later, the institution has been transformed. Its budget has been cut in real terms by 15 percent. The Division of Special Programs, which gave grants to such noted bastions of the humanities as labor unions and the National Organization for Women, has been eliminated. There is a new focus on restoring the vitality of core humanities disciplines: new guidelines for education grants promote basic courses in the humanities, and a successful new program provides summer seminars for secondary school teachers on great books or themes in the humanities.

Mr. Bennett has also played a role beyond the direct effect of NEH programs in reframing the public debate on education and the humanities toward a concern with excellence and with fundamentals. For example, his recent public request for lists of 10 works in the humanities that every high school student should read, and his argument that the knowledge of such works is more important than acquaintance with the latest trends, has strengthened the hand of "back-to-basic"-minded parents, teachers, and school board members throughout the nation.

If the NEH was drifting before Mr. Bennett took over, the Federal Trade Commission was self-destructing. Under the leadership of Naderite Michael Pertschuk, the FTC had become notorious as the "National Nanny" for its campaign against "unfair" advertising on children's TV programs; by 1981, when James C. Miller III replaced Mr. Pertschuk as Chairman, Congress had reserved for itself a legislative veto on all new FTC regulations, and had cut back on the agency's authority in various ways. In this respect, one might say that some of the Reagan Administration's work had already been done for it. But Mr. Miller was not content to preside over a relatively harmless FTC.

He has moved aggressively to transform the FTC into an agency that promotes the free market by moving against government-created restrictions on competition, such as municipal taxi-licensing, and by speaking out for deregulation and free trade within the Federal government. More important, he has made the FTC an example of rulemaking based on serious economic analysis.

No longer does a subjective judgment that certain business practices are "unfair or deceptive" justify government intervention and rulemaking; now the FTC requires solid evidence that consumers are actually harmed, and that the proposed remedy would improve the situation.

Not only has this resulted in fewer but better cases being brought by the Commission, and in more emphasis on voluntary compliance than on rulemaking, it also has elevated the level of public understanding about the workings of the market, and the effects of government intervention on markets.

OPENING NEW VISTAS

Another dramatic turnaround was engineered by Thomas W. Pauken at ACTION, the Federal volunteer agency. Mr. Pauken succeeded anti-war activist Sam Brown as director of ACTION; the director of VISTA, ACTION's most prominent component, had been Marge Tabankin, whose claim to fame was a comradely visit to Hanoi in 1972. Under these two, as one might expect, a good chunk of Federal volunteer funds were going to various New Left community organizing and advocacy organizations. Mr. Pauken has failed in his efforts to persuade Congress to abolish VISTA; but he has succeeded in reorienting a considerably smaller VISTA, and ACTION as a whole, away from left-wing politics.

Today ACTION focuses on voluntarism and self-help. A drug prevention program helps to enlist corporate leaders and money in supporting local parents' drug awareness efforts. In the Vietnam Veterans Leadership Program, veterans who have successfully reestablished themselves in civilian life volunteer to help other veterans with problems stemming from their war experience.

Mr. Pauken has not had the impact on the public debate in his field that Messrs. Bennett and Miller have had in theirs; but that is not due to any shortage of efforts on his part to articulate a theme of "voluntarism" as an alternative to liberal, dependency-creating social welfare policies. Rather, his lonely voice has been drowned out by others within the Administration determined to prove that the Reagan Administration is even more "generous" than its predecessors.

GOVERNING STRATEGICALLY

To the degree they have governed successfully, Messrs. Bennett, Miller, and Pauken all emphasize, it is because they have tried to govern strategically. This means first of all having certain fundamental objectives; as Mr. Pauken puts it, "You've got to have a strategy, and that means an agenda." This may seem too obvious to be worth saying; but few Reagan appointees have had a vision of what their agency should be doing, or have thought seriously about how to get there. Far more common is the simple desire to cut back on certain activities or the limited ambition to "manage" one's agency or department well.

All three of our political appointees distinguish their approach from either of these more common alternatives. Governing strategically is different from "good management," for example, because setting as one's goal "good management" means making no serious change in the direction of the agency. Furthermore, the attempt to "manage" non-controversially usually fails even on its own terms. According to John Agresto, Mr. Bennett's deputy, "it's those who try to make the least waves who get into the most trouble." They end up reacting to developments shaped by others, and fighting on others' terrain, at someone else's chosen time and place. And they end up being judged by criteria set by others.

The political appointee who tries to govern strategically, by contrast, not only has a substantive agenda; he articulates it clearly and publicly. Mr. Bennett offers this "first law" for political appointees: "Before someone else tells the world what you're doing, what you're about, get the bull by the horns and tell everyone—loudly and clearly and repeatedly—what it is you intend to do, and why you're doing it.

You need, first and foremost, to articulate a vision of what the agency should be." This is because in politics, unlike football, there is no referee who makes sure you have a turn on offense. "If you don't act as if you had the ball, if you don't put yourself on the offensive, setting the terms of debate around your agency, then you're on the defensive, and that's no place to be."

One implication of this perspective is that the political executive ought not to be afraid of publicity—or controversy. Mr. Bennett does not mind being called "the outspoken chairman" of the NEH; Mr. Miller does not hesitate to say, "I don't make any bones about it—there's been a change of emphasis and philosophy at the Federal Trade Commission"; and Mr. Pauken does not worry when it is said that he "has made his share of enemies" while transforming ACTION.

All three regard publicity, and controversy, more as a tool than as a threat—but only because they have attended to framing the terms of debate in which the controversy will be reported. This, in turn, requires that the appointee have what Mr. Miller calls an "intellectual framework" that governs his actions within his agency but that also provides a basis for explaining and defending them. As Mr. Miller puts it, "Loyalty and good instincts are not enough. Without an intellectual framework either you get captured and don't get much done—or you get in a lot of trouble."

It is this framework that seems to distinguish Mr. Miller from, say, Anne Burford, President Reagan's first administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency. As one sympathetic Administration official explains, "She knew she was supposed to change things, to be more pro-business, but she didn't have ideas of her own. So she would ask the bureauracy for options and then choose the most pro-business one that was given her. She wasn't able to redefine the agenda; and in the end the bureaucracy and the media destroyed her." In reaction to Mrs. Burford's fate, many appointees who would have to be judged loyal Reaganites ran for cover: better to go native than to be eaten by them.

Messrs. Bennett, Miller, and Pauken avoided both these fates. All three wanted to cut back on certain activities of their agencies, but all found, in Mr. Pauken's words, that "you can't beat something with nothing." Having "something" does not necessarily mean having initiatives of one's own to propose, though that may help; it does mean articulating clearly and publicly a new understanding of the mission, a new governing philosophy of one's agency. Only by doing this does the political executive give himself a fighting chance not to be judged by the standard of whether he is liked by the relevant interest group network in Washington, or by the standard of whether what he does corresponds to the conventional (liberal) wisdom.

TAMING THE PRESS

Is the press sufficiently open-minded to permit a successful reframing of the debate? Mr. Miller comments ruefully that reports prove the dictum that "A little knowledge is a dangerous thing." But he agrees with Mr. Bennett that, at least in the case of the print media, the conservative political executive will on the whole be treated fairly if he can make a coherent and credible case. And he increases his chances of being treated well if he remembers that the press wants news—which means interesting stories. Mr. Bennett saw that asking for lists of books that every high school student should have read would be an interesting story; and the coverage of that story did as much to further his agenda of fostering a kind of back-to-basics movement in the humanities as any of the NEH's grants or any of his formal speeches.

Of course, the only thing the press likes more than an interesting story is a scandal. This means, Mr. Pauken says, that conservatives sometimes have to resist the temptation to have their offices redecorated. It also means that they have to ensure that there is no disjunction between what is said internally and what is said externally. Since everything in Washington will eventually come out, and since the press loves to think of itself as "exposing" the nasty truth beneath the high-toned rhetoric, honesty does turn out to be, to a surprising degree, the best policy.

Messrs. Bennett, Miller, and Pauken are all known for their candor, and they all recommend a policy of clearly proclaiming one's purpose, and then making operations conform to the statement of purpose. As Mr. Bennett notes, Reagan appointees do have the advantage that the public tends to agree with their purposes; therefore they can usually survive attacks on their statements of purpose, and on actions taken in accord with such statements. They do get in trouble when they are timid about publicly proclaiming their intentions, and then the press can expose a disjunction between stated policy and actual policy.

MOTIVATING CIVIL SERVANTS

One great advantage of redefining the terms of public debate is the effect this has within the agency. Mr. Bennett says that the best way to get NEH employees to work implementing a new idea is to announce to the press in advance that this is what the Endowment is doing. Professionalism and pride that their agency is doing something newsworthy may lead civil servants to cooperate, even if they disagree with much of the political appointee's program.

By instituting new programs in line with a mission that has been reasonably articulated, and by giving career employees opportunities to help make these programs successes, Mr. Bennett has found it possible to marshal cooperation and even support for the civil service.

Mr. Bennett also, to be sure, took advantage of the fact that though career civil servants are very hard to fire, they are easy to transfer at the same grade level; he used this mechanism to break up old loyalties and vested interests. But on the whole Mr. Bennett has found the civil service so "governable" that he has brought in only five or six political appointees to join a professional staff of about 250.

More than Mr. Bennett, Mr. Miller brought aboard his own team of top appointees at the beginning, people who shared the same general point of view and who were committed to his program. But he, too, says he was pleasantly surprised by how unresistant the career employees were: "I thought 80 percent of the career staff would be ideologically opposed; in fact the number was more like 20 percent."

And though he has been tough in dealing with civil servants when necessary, Mr. Miller says he is struck by how useful it is to spend time, at brown bag lunches and seminars, working to convince the career staff that his policies are intellectually correct—that they really will help consumers more over the long run. Miller also notes that he stood on principle against efforts of many, including Republicans, in Congress to strip the FTC of the authority to enforce the antitrust and consumer protection laws against the learned professions and city governments. His opposition, he says, was very important in winning a hearing for himself, and building support within the Commission.

Mr. Pauken inherited a group of career employees who were more ideological, and less professional, than either of the others. He therefore had to bring more political appointees into key line positions, using "Schedule B"—a civil service shortcut for hiring people with special skills—to bring in loyalists, and had to do more in the way of transferring and even firing civil servants in order to establish control over the agency. As if this were not enough, Mr. Pauken also had to fight hard with the White House to resist ACTION's being used as a "dumping ground" for loyal Reaganites, regardless of background or qualifications. Yet in the end, by sticking to his guns Mr. Pauken was able to hire a remarkable crew of associates, many of whom had little or no government experience and little in the way of political connections, almost all of whom have since moved onward and upward in the Reagan Administration.

By spending his first few months establishing internal control, rather than setting out on speaking tours as suggested by the career staff, he was also able to find out which career employees were willing to work with him, and which could not. Once most of the career civil servants saw, Pauken says, that he was not simply there to trash the agency, most came around, and "a good working relationship" now exists.

Indeed, as one of Mr. Pauken's former deputies points out, it may well be that activists like Messrs. Bennett, Miller, and Pauken get more cooperation from the civil service than would a "good manager." Civil servants are paid to manage, and they resent the claim by businessmen that they are going to come in and, for the first time, impose sound management practices. As long as the political appointee gives civil servants a chance to participate in implementing his program, most of them will be reasonably hospitable to the efforts of the political appointee to change the agenda of the agency. After all, even civil servants will admit, that is what we have political appointees for.

CANDOR, CLEVERNESS, AND CONGRESS

Getting control of the agency requires what Mr. Bennett calls the "will to administer"—the willingness to pay attention to detail, to personnel, to all of the boring chores that translate broad policies into real programs. But even a combination of the broad vision and the will to administer would be insufficient if Congress made the successful governance of an executive agency impossible. Mr. Pauken's effort to kill VISTA, Mr. Bennett's attempt to cut the budget further and to shift more funds from media programs to educational ones, and Mr. Miller's proposal to change the FTC's enabling legislation have all been thwarted by Congress. But all have nonetheless been successful in generally reshaping their agencies in accord with their new agendas. How?

Here again all three emphasize the importance of being able and willing to make a case and defend it, both in general terms and in its concrete implications. Most Congressmen are not spoiling for a fight with an articulate and confident defender of a particular vision of an agency. Of course that vision must fall within the legislative mandate, but most legislative mandates are sufficiently broad that executive officials have room to maneuver. Thus when Mr. Miller decided that Congress could not be persuaded to narrow the FTC's authority to police "deceptive" trade practices, the Commission was able to issue a policy protocol on deception administratively. And though Congress has saved VISTA, Mr. Pauken has succeeded in changing its character.

These three men also consistently sing the praises of candor and straightforwardness. Mr. Bennett stresses in particular the inadvisability of putting oneself in the situation of making deals with particular Congressmen, citing Senator Jacob Javits admonition that "if you dance with one, you have to dance with everybody," and your freedom of action is lost. Thus when one Congressman asked Mr. Bennett to ensure that a particular applicant receive a grant, Mr. Bennett responded that he would be happy to oblige—and would publicly announce that this applicant's proposal had not been judged worthy, but that he was nonetheless receiving support because of the intervention of Congressman X. Mr. Miller tells a similar story of more gently rebuffing an attempt to sway his vote on a case; and both say they have not been bothered again.

Of course, candor does not preclude a degree of cleverness in dealing with Congress. When Mr. Bennett refused to submit affirmative action goals to the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, he came under fire from Representative Cardiss Collins, chair of the House subcommittee that monitors "equal opportunity" practices in the Federal government.

Representative Collins demanded a list of the race and sex of all NEH panelists. Mr. Bennett responded that the NEH did not keep records of this; but wary of the trap of seeming to be "obstructionist," he sent all panelists a letter explaining Representative Collins's demand, and inviting them—as a matter of choice—to identify their race and sex. Mr. Bennett thus brought home his point about the indignity of quotas, and rallied political support behind him, while complying with the Congresswoman's request. But the key here, as in other areas, was the willingness to go public in defense of one's principles.

In the course of berating, Mr. Bennett for his stand on quotas, Representative Collins threatened to cut the NEH's budget. But in this respect, as Mr. Bennett points out, most conservative political appointees have a peculiar advantage in dealing with Congress: they often want lower budgets than Congress has given them. The reason most political appointees are captured by congressional committees is that they are first captured by their own agencies; those who view their job as moving their agency toward certain policy goals, rather than as increasing their agency's budget, can resist congressional pressure much more easily.

But resisting all of the pressures for accommodation is not easy. These men happen to have strong beliefs and forceful character; without these they would not have set out to transform their agencies in the first place. But though each of them is too loyal to complain about it, one learns from talking to others that in its first term at least, the Reagan Administration did little to support or reward the attempt by some of its appointees to take seriously the job of carrying through the President's program. The chances of more such appointees being willing to resist all the pressures in the second term would seem to depend on a White House commitment both to recruiting such individuals and to supporting them.

"An agency can be run effectively with a conservative philosophy," says Thomas Pauken. This claim must be vindicated before the American people will be willing to give that philosophy a hearing for more fundamental changes.●

HOW CAN WE HELP BUILD A PEACEFUL WORLD

HON. SAM GIBBONS

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Speaker, as you and many of my colleagues know, last June I was privileged to participate in the ceremonies commemorating the 40th anniversary of D-day in Normandy. My participation in those meaningful events—both the original and the commemoration—provided an opportunity for me to recall how my service in World War II caused me to seek a life of public service; and particularly the opportunity to work for peace.

Some fine young people in my congressional district were also provided with an opportunity to think about the need for everyone to contribute to this effort when they entered an essay contest sponsored in Hillsborough County by the Sun City Peacemakers on the topic: "How Can We Help Build A Peaceful World?" It is my privilege to share with you today the two winners' thoughts. I know you will find them stimulating.

The winner at the high school level was Tommy Chen, a student of Mrs. Sylvia Sarrett at Chamberlain High School, in Tampa. Tommy is 14 and entitled his essay which follows:

PEACE: A WORLD CONCERN

Ever since the development of nuclear weapons, man has lived in fear of a war that could completely destroy his race. It is now imperative that mankind develop a system to insure that his fears are never transformed into reality. Unfortunately, such a task will not be an easy one and will require the co-operation of all nations. Nations must educate their people, improve relationships among themselves, and reduce their nuclear arsenals in order to bring world peace. These three steps are sequential, each establishing the basis for the next.

The first, education, is the vital factor that forms the foundation for this peace effort. It not only has the responsibility of helping to attain this goal but also of preserving it once the goal has been achieved. The young, who represent the future of the human race, must be taught not to be prejudiced against the governments of other nations because they are different. They must also learn that the government of a nation and its people may be two very different entities and that one does not necessarily reflect the other. Too often, American children are given the impression that all Soviet people are evil warmongers. Undoubtedly, Soviet children are given the same impression about Americans. Although both sides are obviously misinformed, this distrust is often carried into adulthood. Sadly, this distrust is not only found between these superpowers but is also prevalent in other rival countries. As long as this distrust remains, a permanent and world-wide peace cannot be achieved.

Finally, the young must be well-informed of all the consequences of a nuclear war. They must know the long and short-term effects of radiation sickness, radioactive fallout, and "Nuclear Winter" as well as the widespread destruction caused by a nuclear war. Only with this knowledge will the youth of this planet be able to make the decisions that will have profound effects on the future of the human race.

The second factor, the improvement of political relations among nations, will be the product of good education. First, politicians must stop using propaganda and rhetoric to cause their people to hate or fear the people of another nation. Second, when nations are in conflict, they should send more ambassadors to each other rather than withdrawing those that were already there. By sending more ambassadors, each nation shows its willingness to negotiate. With this attitude, it is more likely that a peaceful compromise can be reached. Finally, if the two nations are unable to settle their dispute between themselves, they should call upon an international peace organization such as the UN, OAS, or OAU to serve as mediators in their negotiations.

Since the heart of the problem, however, lies in the nuclear arms race, the most important result of good education and the improvement of political relations is the gradual elimination of the number of nuclear weapons. The arms race between the United States and the Soviet Union has increased the number of missiles on both sides and has strained foreign relations between these two superpowers. Since the negotiations on arms reduction between these two nations have made very little progress, these two countries should call upon the United Nations to mediate in their dispute and break the present stalemate. The reduction of nuclear arms must be carried out in mutual trust rather than each side accusing the other of cheating. It is of monumental importance that these two superpowers work together in the peace effort. This reduction, however, must not be limited only to the United States and Soviet Union but must also be carried out by any nation possessing these weapons.

Through these three methods—education, political reform, and arms reduction—man can strive for peace and harmony on his planet. The cost of this project will doubtlessly be phenomenal, but even so, it is a small price to pay for the preservation of humanity. It took millions of years for man to become the master of his planet. It can only be hoped that the technology that made man so powerful will not also prove to be his destruction.

At the junior high level, Tammie Rattray, a 12-year-old student in Mrs. O'Sullivan's class at Tampa's Young Junior High, won first prize with this entry:

I believe better relations between the United States of America and the Soviet Union would be a giant step in achieving world peace. Being the two strongest countries on the earth, together they could put an end to violence throughout the rest of the world. The question is, how can we settle our differences with the Soviet Union?

To achieve better harmony between the Soviet Union and the United States the two countries need to have more negotiations between top officials of the countries. A one to one basis is needed to talk about such controversial issues as weapons in space, territorial rights, and the amount of military power a country should have. The more negotiations we have, the better chance the two countries have to settle their differences and work together to help spread world peace.

I also feel that the Soviet Union, United States, and other countries with nuclear weapons should talk about putting into effect at least a partial or limited disarmament. Disarmament is needed now because any nation that has large stockpiles of nuclear weapons must spend a large portion of its resources on maintaining and increasing them. It is well known that countries in an arms race must keep many of their scientists and engineers working on military projects. In 1973, it was reported that the Soviet Union was recruiting geophysicists, meteorologists, and other scientists to work on space stations. Was this for peaceful or militaristic purposes?

There is a history of the United States and Russia making and breaking peace agreements. In 1961, Russia resumed testing atomic weapons, breaking a test ban that had lasted nearly three years. Shortly after that, the United States resumed its testing. In 1962, the Cuban Crisis brought the United States and the Soviet Union to the brink of war. It was this crisis that convinced both countries of the need for controls on nuclear weapons. As a result, in 1963, the Atomic Test Ban Treaty was signed by the United States and Russia. This treaty was a step in the right direction, but why did the two countries have to come so close to war to realize this?

As the number of nations that possess nuclear weapons increases, so does the chance that a nuclear war may begin. There will never be any assurance of peace as long as large stocks of nuclear weapons exist in the world.

There are a number of other ways Russia and the U.S. could work together to eradicate violence in the world. Russia and the United States should make a bolder effort to work together on exploring the vast regions of outer space. Space, if used correctly, could be of great benefit to mankind. Weathermen can receive warnings of storms with pictures taken by weather satellites. Physicists can perform experiments to unravel the laws of nature for the betterment of all people of all nations. Navigators can map the positions of ships using signals broadcast from navigational satellites. Telephone calls and television pictures can be sent around the world by communication satellites. All of these are examples of the nonviolent uses of outer space.

The Space Age officially began October 4, 1957, when the United States and Russia began the space race after the launching of Sputnik I. During the early years of the space age, success in space became a measure of a country's leadership and national defense. President John F. Kennedy focused the national attention on the space race, and set as a national goal that the United States would reach the moon before the end of the 50's decade. In 1958, the first U.S. satellite was launched. Three years later, on April 12, 1961, a Russian became the first man to fly in space. It is interesting to note that five days later, on April 17, the Bay of Pigs invasion occurred. In a similar vein, as Alan Sheppard became the first American in space on May 5, 1961, that same year the Berlin Wall cut off East Berlin from West Berlin. It seems that as the space race intensified, so did the tension between the Soviet Union and the United States. Instead of taking a competitive attitude toward the exploration of outer space, I believe a more cooperative approach should be taken.

In 1963, the General Assembly of the United Nations declared that other space should be used for the benefit of all people. Twelve years later, in 1975, the United States and Russian had their first joint space mission—the Apollo-Soyuz Test Project. On July 17, a three man U.S. Apollo space craft docked with a Soyuz with two Russian cosmonauts. Then for two days they conducted experiments together. This is an example of what we can accomplish when we work together.

According to the Russians, they seek space pilots on the basis of their "spiritual and ethical qualities, ideological views, and social attitudes." If they could dwell on such areas with the United States and work together, like we did in 1975, we could open new horizons in the peaceful and non-violent exploration of outer space.

The U.S. and Russia could also co-operate in the development and exploration of the resources of the sea. In 1967, the United Nations agreed that a large area of the sea bed should be beyond the control of individual nations and should be used for the benefit of all people. And then in 1971, a treaty was developed which barred the testing of nuclear weapons from the sea bed beyond a twelve nautical mile coastal range. The United States and Russia could well take a leadership role in similar co-operative measures for the exploration of the resources of the sea and the peaceful use of the knowledge gained.

Another way to promote peace is through the Olympic Games. They are an excellent way to encourage world peace and friendship. The Soviet Union and the United States could do a great deal to keep politics out of the Olympics and set an example of friendship and peace for the other participating nations.

I feel the United Nations is an excellent way to bring nations together. The United Nations works for world peace and the betterment of humanity, its two goals being peace and human dignity. Many times disagreements (including those between Russia and the U.S.) among United Nations members interfere with their peacemaking ability. Once we have an organization such as the United Nations, it takes the leadership and dedication of the major world powers to achieve the organization's goals. In many instances the United States and Soviet Union prefer to use their own forces to settle conflicts. This makes me doubt their dedication and allegiance to the ideals of the U.N.

The United States and Russia need to work co-operatively in the area of human rights. Many people in underdeveloped nations have a very low standard of living and in some cases are not treated well. If Russia and the United States could get together and use their resources co-operatively they could help people in these underdeveloped nations. In 1961, President Kennedy sent thousands of Americans in the U.S. Peace Corps abroad to help people in underdeveloped nations raise their standards of living. Maybe the two countries could get together and organize a similar program on an even larger scale. If the United States and the Soviet Union could do this, other nations might follow their example.

If Russia and the United States could become allies, I believe the whole world would benefit. There are many things Russia and the United States could do together that couldn't be done alone. Hopefully, they can settle some of their differences in the near future and help other countries, thereby benefiting all the people of the world.

Mr. Speaker, these young people are to be commended for the thought they have given to a subject of grave importance. As Tommy says, "man can strive for peace and harmony on his planet" through education, political reform, and nuclear arms reduction. And so man must.●

LITHUANIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

HON. JOSEPH D. EARLY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. EARLY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to join my colleague FRANK ANNUNZIO in commemorating the 734th anniversary of the Lithuanian Republic and the 67th anniversary of their declaration of freedom and independence from Russian domination and oppression.

This is both a joyous and disturbing commemorative day. Joyful because we may honor February 16, 1918, as the day of the establishment of a free and sovereign Lithuanian Republic; but disheartening because this independence was so short lived. In June 1940, Soviet troops invaded Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia, quickly ending over two decades of freedom relished by the Baltic States. This relentless and hostile annexation was in direct violation of a peace treaty signed July 19, 1920, by both Lithuania and the Soviet Union. The treaty stated that the Soviet Union "voluntarily and forever renounces all sovereign rights possesssed by Russia over the Lithuanian people and their territory."

During the first days of the 1940 invasion, over 30,000 Lithuanians were deported to labor camps in Siberia. It is estimated that between 1945 and 1951, during Stalin's brutal and violent reign of terror, 340,000 Lithuanians were arrested and deported by the Soviet Army. Ironically, the persecution and atrocities committed by the Soviets against these people and the Lithuanian Republic has only strengthened their unbending spirit and courage. The 22 years of independence rightly enjoyed by Lithuania will remain imbedded in the wills and hearts of these freedom-loving people forever.

Today, the Soviet Union continues their oppressive "Russification" of the Lithuanian and Baltic States in the attempt to disperse and break these peoples' fierce sense of nationalism and their cultural and religious identity. Soviet efforts, however, to deport Lithuanians throughout the Soviet Union and to encourage and order ethnic Russians to settle in Lithuania to promote the Russian language and culture there, seems only to increase the Lithuanians passionate quest for self-determination and freedom. The Soviet attempts to subvert the Catholic Church, perhaps the most important institution for spiritual and cultural expression in Lithuania, has only succeeded in strengthening the faith and religious beliefs of the people as they pray for the end of Soviet domination and continue to spread the Word of God and message of freedom throughout the land. Although the persecution and deportation of clergymen and clergywomen and the destruction of monasteries and convents in common practice by the Soviets, faith, worship, and prayers of hope by the Lithuanian people continue to prevail.

The United States will never recognize the illegal occupation of Lithuania and the Baltic States. I am proud to join my colleagues and over 1 million people of Lithuanian descent residing in the United States in honoring the 67th anniversary of the Declaration of Lithuanian Independence and in celebrating the spirit and courage of the Lithuanian people.●

CASH FLOW INCOME TAX

HON. CECIL (CEC) HEFTEL

OF HAWAII

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mr. HEFTEL of Hawaii. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill to replace our present income tax with a progressive cash-flow income tax. I am introducing this proposal as an alternative to those tax reform proposals already presented to Congress because I feel that my proposal provides the best incentive for savings and investment. Only through sustained incentives for savings and investment can we attain the capital formation vitally needed for long-term economic growth and enhanced employment.

The present income tax structure is so weak and diminished by exclusions, deductions, exemptions, credits, and other tax privileges that it is no longer capable of distributing the tax burden in an equitable manner.

At the same time, long-term U.S. economic growth has been poor at best. Our savings and investment rates are lower than those of our faster growing allies in Canada, Japan, France, and West Germany. Today, income is taxed when it is first earned and, again, when the savings generate additional income. The U.S. income Tax Code discourages saving and subsidizes consumption.

The taxation of cash flow provides the best incentive for savings and investment. Under the cash-flow income tax system, all income is taxed once—either at the time of consumption or at the time of death in estate tax form. Cash-flow tax can be deferred as long as one's lifetime, providing the stimulus for capital formation. The formation of capital will result in positive, long-term economic growth and enhanced employment.

Therefore, I am proposing a cash-flow tax which will assess people according to their personal expenditures, not according to their income. People would be taxed not by how much they put into the national product, but by how much they take out.

In this bill, annual cash flow is derived by calculating the value of his or her total receipts in the year using the W-2 and 1099 forms as presently used. From that value is subtracted the amount of net savings and investment made by the taxpayer during the year. The difference between what was received and what was saved over the year is cash flow—the tax base.

It is necessary that the taxable base of the cash-flow tax be broader than that of any income base since consumption by definition is smaller than income. Thus, to raise adequate revenue levels, the tax base or tax rate on a comprehensive cash-flow base would have to be higher than that on a comprehensive income base.

In addition to the inclusion of all forms of income in the taxable base—net capital gains, all dividends and (most) interest, retirement income, and all gifts and bequests—unemployment compensation would also be considered part of the taxable base.

The remainder of the taxable base would be made up of net borrowing amounts for that year. However, borrowing to buy a principal residence is excluded from the tax base. Conversely, debt repayment is subtracted from the base, or the adjusted gross cash flow. This bill also provides for a lifetime exclusion of $20,000 in borrowing for every individual.

A limited number of deductions, or a standard deduction, would be subtracted from AGCF and graduated tax rates would be applied to the taxable cash flow.

Deductions allowed to be subtracted for individuals include: First, mortgage interest payments on principal residence and interest on indebtedness for purchase of investment assets and that incurred in the conduct of trade or business (whether personal or partnership); second, medical expenses in excess of 5 percent of adjusted gross cash flow; third, charitable contributions up to 5 percent of an individual's adjusted gross cash flow; fourth, State and local income taxes; and fifth, uninsured property losses in excess of $500.

We would also provide credits of $200 for each personal exemption, which is equivalent to a $2,000 exemption. However, the credit provides the same value at the 30-percent consumption rate level as it does at the 10-percent level.

The bill repeals most of the current credits and deductions provided for businesses and individuals. Depreciation for property placed in service by a corporation during the taxable year would be expensed or subtracted to arrive at adjusted net income. Indexing would not be necessary since the current value of money is the basis for the tax. Therefore, inflation has no effect on the rates. As an offset to the expensing of depreciation, which is most attractive for capital formation, current deductions for capital gains, investment tax credits, and foreign tax credits would all be repealed. Similarly, fringe benefits, such as contributions by employers to health and life insurance plans, would be included in the individual's taxable base. The amount of medical insurance added to the taxable base would likewise be accrued toward the 5 percent of adjusted gross cash flow level necessary for the medical deduction. Deductions for real and personal property taxes would also be repealed.

We provide for three progressive rates: 10 percent, for married individuals filing jointly up to $15,000 in consumed income and unmarried individuals up to $12,000; 23 percent for married individuals filing jointly and unmarried individuals up to the Social Security wage base; and 30 percent for those above the Social Security wage base. A family of four with less than $12,000 in consumed income will pay no taxes. The indexing of the Social Security wage base provides for automatic indexing of the 30-percent rate. However, language to index other individual rates could be incorporated. Meanwhile, corporations would pay one rate, 30 percent, on retained earnings.

We provide for zero bracket amount deductions of $4,000 for individuals, $6,000 for heads of household, and $8,000 for joint returns. A tax credit of $200 is included for each dependent claimed.

A cash-flow tax system would simplify our Tax Code by repealing the loopholes listed in today's massive number of deductions and credits. Expensing of depreciation, and incentives for savings and investment will provide the mechanism for the increased capital formation needed for revitalization of American business.

A cash-flow tax system is workable, simple, and effective in developing the capital necessary for long-term economic growth. I hope that my colleagues will seriously consider the merits of this proposal.●

LITHUANIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

HON. RAYMOND J. McGRATH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. McGRATH. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to join in the commemoration of the 67th anniversary of the restoration of Lithuanian Independence.

The declaration of Lithuanian independence came at the tail end of World War I upon the withdrawal of its two occupants, Germany and Russia. Lithuania remained independent for parts of two decades, however in 1940, 300,000 Soviet soldiers invaded Lithuania. As in most nations the Soviet Union has illegally annexed, human rights were denied, dissension to official Soviet policy was punished, mass deportations were carried out, religious expression was outlawed and all land was nationalized. In the later stage of World War II, Lithuanians suffered at the hands of the imperialist and bloody Nazi regime. After the war, Lithuania again came under Soviet control.

Yet despite a tragic history of foreign domination and oppression, the spirit of Lithuanians around the world remains strong in the pursuit of the restoration of a truly free homeland. Their struggle has been valiant. Occasions such as today's special order which lend tangible support to the ongoing struggle for Lithuanian independence are important in the realization of that goal.●

REPORT ON NORTHERN IRLAND

HON. NORMAN F. LENT

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mr. LENT. Mr. Speaker, my good friend Peter King, comptroller of the county of Nassau, NY, has returned from a recent visit to Northern Ireland. At his request, I would like to share a report of his visit with my colleagues. Mr. King's report follows.

LOYALIST ALIENATION IN NORTHERN IRELAND: AN OPPORTUNITY FOR A DIPLOMATIC BREAKTHROUGH

(By Peter T. King)

During the period of January 26-January 31, 1985, I was in Belfast, Northern Ireland at the invitation of Families For Legal Rights which is an organization comprised of relatives of loyalist defendants who have been charged on the uncorroborated testimony of "supergrass" informers.

The purposes of this visit were (a) to observe the current loyalist supergrass trial where 29 alleged members of the outlawed loyalist para-military Ulster Volunteer Force (UVF) are being tried on the uncorroborated testimony of supergrass James Crockard and (b) to meet with leaders and representatives of the loyalist community.

These supergrass trials, where large numbers of defendants are tried together for unrelated crimes, without a jury, and are convicted on the uncorroborated testimony of a supergrass informer are show trials reminiscent of Stalin's Russia. The judiciary of Northern Ireland has surrendered its independence and has become a mere adjunct of British military policy. The use of supergrasses is merely the latest abuse by England of Northern Ireland's criminal justice system. Previous abuses, some of which continue to date, include internment without trial, tortured confessions, the use of lethal plastic bullets against civilians, and indiscriminate searches of homes and arrests of civilians by security forces.

I accepted the invitation of Families For Legal Rights because it has always been my position it is just as wrong when loyalists have their rights violated as it is when nationalists' rights are violated. Human rights are universal and cannot be allowed to be restricted by political or sectarian boundaries. I also believed it was significant that a hard-core loyalist group, which was fully cognizant that I was a Catholic and supported the nationalist cause, would invite me to assist it. This signaled to me a considerable change in loyalist thinking.

The Crockard trial is as violative of due process and civil and human rights as were the McGrady and Grimley trials. In virtually every particular this loyalist trial equaled the nationalist trials in its perversion of justice. Even if any or all of the 29 defendants are acquitted, justice will not have been done because the lives of the defendants and their families will have been devastated because of a criminal prosecution and trial which were fatally defective ab initio. In fact, the supergrass trials are a sophisticated version of internment because whether or not the defendants—bowing to international pressure, the judges have been acquitting defendants on evidence which would have been more than sufficient for conviction just one year ago—large numbers of them are imprisoned from the time of their arrest until trial. This time "on remand" often exceeds two years.

What has made the supergrass system unique is the extent to which it has been imposed upon the loyalist community. Internment, tortured confessions and plastic bullets were directed primarily against the nationalist community and this caused England considerable public relations problems. England attempted to avoid this problem with the supergrass system by charging loyalists as well as nationalists, thereby giving the appearance of even-handedness.

This has outraged the loyalist community for several very basic reasons. First, in their frenzied pursuit to erect the facade of impartiality, the British have charged loyalists on evidence which, in some instances, is even less credible than the evidence against nationalists. Second, the "terrorist" offenses for which the loyalists are now being charged are the very type actions which, in the past, the British security forces condoned and even encouraged them to commit against the nationalists. Third, while the British have moved against the loyalists in the past, it has never been on this scale or to this extent. Indeed, the loyalists have historically viewed themselves as the ultimate defenders of British rule in the six counties. For loyalists to witness the British system of justice being so horribly perverted with themselves included among its victims is psychologically shattering to growing numbers of loyalists.

The extent to which many working class loyalists feel alienated from England was made clear to me in my meetings with Families for Legal Rights and with loyalist politician George Seawright and with Andy Tyrie who is the commander of the loyalist paramilitary Ulster Defense Association (UDA).

At this juncture, I believe that my terminology should be defined. In the context of Northern Ireland, "loyalist" is interchanged with "Protestant" and "nationalist" is interchanged with "Catholic". It has been, however, and continues to be my firm belief that the tragedy of Northern Ireland is in no sense a "religious" conflict. The loyalists historically were Scotch or English settlers who happened to be Protestant and the nationalists were native Irish who happened to be Catholic. It has also been my belief that the loyalist and nationalist communities have far more in common with one another than they do with England. The British, however, have succeeded in dividing the communities and pitting one against the other by according the loyalist majority a status superior to the nationalists. Among the working class, however, where, ironically, the animosity is most bitter, the loyalist superiority is often marginal. As Andy Tyrie stated to me: "The Catholics have always claimed they have been second class citizens in Northern Ireland. That is not true. The loyalists were the second class citizens; the Catholics were third class citizens."

I do not for a moment minimize the extent of the breach between the communities. Nonetheless, I believe that there now exists a unique diplomatic opportunity which should be seized before the moment passes. The ideal role for the United States to play is as an honest broker. Every effort should be made by the United States to encourage meaningful dialogue between the two communities on issues of mutual relevance and importance. Supergrasses and strip-searches are two such issues. Additionally, the United States must not only permit but indeed encourage loyalist and nationalist representatives to set forth and articulate their positions to the American people. In short, the United States must descard its visa denial policy and allow all Northern Ireland representatives into our country including nationalists such as Gerry Adams, Danny Morrison and Owen Carron and loyalists such as Andy Tyrie, George Seawright and Ian Paisley.

The time has also long since come to acknowledge that a war situation exists in Northern Ireland and that peace will never come until all parties to the conflict including para-militaries such as the Ulster Defense Association, the Ulster Volunteer Force and the Irish Republican Army are permitted to take part in whatever negotiations are ultimately held.

Ideally, the United States would set this process in motion by furthering the dialogue between loyalists and nationalists. Even, however, if the dialogue does not bring about a long-term political solution, it could nevertheless result in the alleviation of human rights violations by the British against both communities and that in itself would be a very meaningful achievement.

The people of Northern Ireland have suffered too long and too hard for the United States to ignore the potentially historic diplomatic opportunity which presently exists. The time for action is now. The judge is history.●

PROPOSE RESTRICTIONS ON EXPORT OF NORTH SLOPE OIL

HON. HOWARD WOLPE

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mr. WOLPE. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join with my colleague from Connecticut, Mr. MCKINNEY, to once again introduce legislation extending vital restrictions on the export of Alaskan oil. These restrictions, contained in section 7(d) of the Export Administration Act, guarantee that no export or swap arrangements involving Alaskan oil will be permitted unless it can be clearly demonstrated that such exports would directly benefit the American consumer and would serve our national security interests.

These restrictions were overwhelmingly endorsed by both Houses of Congress with the passage of the Export Administration Act in 1979. This support was reaffirmed in the last session of Congress when 237 House Members cosponsored legislation identical to the legislation we are introducing today. Although I was successful in attaching a slightly modified version of our legislation to the bill reauthorizing the Export Administration Act last term, the effort to forge a compromise with the Senate on other, more controversial, provisions of the reauthorizing bill failed in the final days of the session. Therefore, we present our legislation again in anticipation of efforts to renew the Export Administration Act in this Congress. Let our resolve on this issue be equally firm in 1985: it simply makes no sense from either an economic or a national security perspective to allow unrestricted exports of our finite reserve of Alaskan oil. I urge my colleagues to join us in the fight to protect American consumers, and to promote a wise and responsible export policy that will serve both our energy and national security interests.●

INTERNATIONAL TELECOMMUNICATIONS COMPETITION ACT OF 1985

HON. EDWARD J. MARKEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mr. MARKEY. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the International Telecommunications Competition Act of 1985, a bill to promote full and effective competition in international communications. I offer this bill in order to open up the process which determines our international telecommunications policy, and also to assure that American industries can compete on an equal footing with their foreign counterparts.

Congress created the Communications Satellite Corporation, Comsat, two decades ago to meet national and world needs at the birth of the space age. Twenty years later the information age is now mature and we find our Nation's high tech industries struggling to cope with an outdated structure while facing stiff competition from abroad.

Today we stand on the brink of change in the international telecommunications arena. From this vista, I think a new look at Comsat and its structure is entirely appropriate. Less than 2 months ago, President Reagan sent to the Federal Communications Commission the recommendation of a special Federal task force that Comsat should not retain its monopoly status, that international competition would serve our national interest. As a result of the President's recommendation, the Federal Communications Commission has begun to examine Comsat's monopoly position in light of the President's recommendation and ask a question I have asked for many months: Why should Comsat be immune from competition?

In the context of this debate, I think the timing is fortuitous for an examination of Comsat's structure. I find it consistent with the other discussion now focused on Comsat and I believe it gives us a special opportunity to reshape our international telecommunications system in order to meet the exigencies of the 1980's.

This bill addresses four major problems currently plaguing our international telecommunications system.

First, Comsat is engaged in both monopoly and competitive activities. This corporate structure creates the potential for cross-subsidization that unfairly increases costs to telecommunications users and to the American public at large. In addition, these cross-subsidies place the industry at an unfair disadvantage in competition with Comsat's subsidiaries.

Second, Comsat—a private entity—serves as the official U.S. representative before the international satellite organizations, Intelsat and Inmarsat. As our representative at these organizations, Comsat sits beside offical government representatives from over 100 other nations. A competitor in the rapidly growing telecommunications industry, Comsat has substantial conflicts which impinge on its unbiased implementation of U.S. policy. I believe this situation hampers our Nation's ability to compete fully and fairly in the telecommunications field.

The third problem involves an inherent conflict of interest which Comsat faces. At the Intelsat table, Comsat stands out as the only delegate not directly controlled by its Government. Our Nation suffers from this arrangement because many other Intelsat delegates turn over the documents they receive at the meetings to their fellow countrymen who manufacture communications equipment. As a result, Comsat is the only company in the United States that has the timely access to these important documents, while many foreign manufacturers enjoy significant lead time advantages in the development of equipment for international communications services. Consequently, American companies find themselves left at the starting gate and American workers find themselves losing the race to foreign competition.

Fourth, there is presently no method to assure that Comsat complies with the instructions of our Government when it represents the United States at Intelsat or Inmarsat. Indeed, we allow this company, with its own agenda that may or may not be the same as the public interest, to be our official spokesman with no effective supervision. This problem cannot be dismissed as simple paranoia. In fact, a representative from the State Department testified last summer that there was evidence that Comsat failed to follow the clear directive from our Government. If we intend to have our national interest served unwaveringly at critical international meetings, then this situation must be rectified.

The Federal Communications Commission and the Departments of State and Commerce have attempted to offest these problems with burdensome regulatory oversight. The International Telecommunications Competition Act, however, offers solutions to these problems that address the underlying conflicts inherent in the present legislative scheme.

Mr. Speaker, the bill I introduce today requires timely public disclosure of the documents Comsat receives in connection with its Intelsat/Inmarsat activities. This should put American firms back in a fair competitive position with respect to foreign manufacturers. It requires the divestiture of Comsat's competitive ventures. In short, it presents a legislative framework that returns the corporation to the original activities that Congress envisioned for it. These changes also would eliminate the possibility of unfair and anticompetitive cross-subsidization of monopoly and competitive endeavors.

In addition, this bill authorizes the President to appoint a representative to Comsat's delegations to Intelsat and Inmarsat in an effort to monitor the corporations' compliance with our Government's instructions and to avoid the situation I described before. This provision should help insure that our national interests is articulated forcefully at Intelsat and that the policies which are pursued in our name really represent the best interests of our country, and not just the interests of one company.

Finally, it creates a mechanism for public input into the process by which governmental instructions are formulated and implemented. This feature would give the public a voice in the formulation of our international telecommunications policy and insure the fair input of American firms into our communications policy.

I invite my colleagues to join me in join me in supporting this bill and addressing these critical communications issue facing our Nation.●

A TRIBUTE TO COL. WILLIAM HARRIS

HON. PARREN J. MITCHELL

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday, February 19, 1985, city, State, and Federal officials and hundreds of his friends attended the funeral services of Col. William Harris. He was my friend. During the days of the civil rights struggle we were often together, working cooperatively to prevent violent confrontations between protesters and law enforcement agents. At the height of the Vietnam protest we worked together, successfully stopping violent confrontations.

For more than 12 years Colonel Harris volunteered his services to my advisory board which makes recommendations to the military academies. He was as devoted and zealous in that capacity as he was in every endeavor he undertook.

The following editorial from the Baltimore Afro-American newspaper tells of his life far more effectively than I could ever do.

[From the Baltimore Afro-American, Feb. 16, 1985]

WILLIAM "BOX" HARRIS

When young blacks hear about pioneers such as William "Box" Harris who died this week they don't fully appreciate the magnitude of their contributions. "Box" Harris was not only a pioneer in law enforcement and national guard matters he was also a mediator and peacemaker in an era characterized by anger and confrontation.

Harris served in both World War II and the Korean War and spoke out against the sickness of racism in the military. In between the two wars he managed to graduate from Morgan State.

He became Maryland's first black parole officer in 1952 and four years later he became the first black U.S. Deputy Marshal. During the bitter racial turmoil that struck Cambridge in 1964 Harris served with the National Guard as a captain.

He resigned from his marshal's job to remain in Cambridge as an economic development program officer helping the residents to bring about economic opportunity for blacks and heal the racial tensions that rocked the community.

Harris was appointed head of the city police department's community relations division by Gen. George Gelston, acting head of the department of 1966 and he is credited with helping keep Baltimore cool during the long hot summers that plagued the nation during the 60s. In 1971 he was promoted to lieutenant-colonel and made head of the traffic division.

Harris was also the first black law enforcement official to apply for membership in the Maryland Law Enforcement Officers Inc. His membership was accepted.

In 1971 he retired from the National Guard after 20 years service.

Governor Mandel appointed Harris special executive assistant for community affairs in 1973 and he served in the post until 1979 when he retired.

Harris was a man who fought injustice yet he was able to bring disputing factions together because of the respect he earned and because of his uncompromising stand against discrimination. He was a first and he was a giant among his contemporaries. He will be missed.

To say he will be missed is almost an understatement. He was indispensable in his time, and therefore leaves a large void in the life of our communities.

HEALTH MAINTENANCE ORGANIZATIONS: THE NEXT 10 YEARS

HON. BERNARD J. DWYER

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mr. DWYER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, it is an honor for me to share with my colleagues a statement by Mr. Thomas P. Hartnett, president of Healthways, a health maintenance organization [HMO] based in New Jersey's Sixth Congressional District. This statement provides an informative look at the growing HMO alternative to providing cost-effective, quality health care services to our constituents.

The statement follows:

HEALTH MAINTENANCE ORGANIZATIONS [HMO's]—THE NEXT 10 YEARS

(By Thomas P. Hartnett)

Nearly ten (10) years have elapsed since the first Health Maintenance Organization (HMO) received federal qualification, representing the beginning of a federal initiative to introduce prepaid, competitive programs as an alternative form of health care financing and delivery to the American people. According to the Office of Health Maintenance Organizations, there are now more than three hundred and twenty-five (325) HMO's serving in excess of 14 million enrollees. More than fifty (50%) percent of these programs became operational through his federal effort.

The federal government, which supplied funding through grants and loans, awarded its last grant for development or expansion in September 1981, and has phased out the loan program. The successful development and funding effort has been replaced by the Office of HMO's pursuing strategies to encourage private sector involvement.

The first ten (10) years of the HMO "industry" saw the health care field dealing with governmental regulation regarding cost, planning, and health care delivery. This environment is now being modified by marketplace forces which directly involve the payors and providers of health-care services in decisions regarding facility and service needs of their respective constituents.

Other major philosophical changes are resulting in significant developments which will impact over the next decade on the financing and delivery of health care services. HMO's will remain on the cutting edge of these developments. HMOs are in an excellent position to create efficient delivery of quality health care services because of their unique provider/payor characteristics of operation.

Change is coming fast. Last year $1,365.00 was spent for health care service for every person in the U.S. Federal, state and local governments paid forty-two (42%) percent of this amount, and they are looking for methods to control further spending. Employers have seen their health care expenditures rise seven hundred (700%) percent since 1970, whereas the G.N.P. in comparison has risen by two hundred and eleven (211%) percent. Employers are now very actively looking at ways to limit their cost increases for health care benefits for their employees without reducing those benefits. In addition, a longer-living populus now requires greater amounts of health services, and significant life-expanding technological innovations (E.g., artificial organs, limbs, etc.), while welcome, involve additional costs.

Over the next 10 years, many medical and surgical procedures will be performed in surgicenter-type facilities, and more services will be available to be provided in the home. The trend will also be toward basing health care costs on the rationality of services being provided.

In summary, the HMOs of today are in the premier position to blend their operating characteristics with the massive change that is taking place. Those that can and do adapt will be in the forefront over the next decade in providing for quality and cost-effective health care services.●

CONGRESS CAN SAVE MONEY ON UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION ADMINISTRATIVE COSTS

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I introduced H.R. 1143, "The Unemployment Insurance Administrative Cost Improvement Act of 1985," which is designed to make the unemployment compensation [UI] system more cost-efficient.

All too frequently, the Congress has overlooked the opportunity to save millions of dollars by improving the administration of the UI Program. At the Federal level, the Department of Labor's Employment and Training Administration administers the UI Program and is essentially responsible for assuring that the States operate effective and efficient systems. In actuality, the UI Program is executed at the local level by 53 UI jurisdictions in accordance with their own State laws and policies and with their own employees. As a result, there are significant differences in productivity rates among States and offices within States. According to the Government Accounting Office [GAO], much of the difference is attributable to variations in operating practices. For example, in 1982, productivity among all States ranged from a weighted average of 19 to 40 hours per case. This wide separation has persisted for at least the past 5 years. This means that some States are using up to twice as many staff hours on average as other States to do essentially the same thing. The range within a State is even greater. In 1982, in one State, the range was from 7 to 29 hours per case, and in another State, the range was 6 to 59 hours per case, a 939 percent variance.

These variations in efficiency within and among States could be significantly cut if two major improvements were made in the administration of the UI State programs.

Possibly the most important cost-efficient step necessary is to modernize the outdated computer system now in place. The UI system has in the past—and will in the future—relied heavily on its use of automated technology to carry out its unemployment insurance and employment service responsibilities. In spite of this fact, there have been no major investments in data processing systems since the mid 1970's. The result of this lack of funding is that the UI system is now being supported primarily with obsolete data processing equipment and aging patched together computer programs. This legislation would make available assistance to the States to establish and implement modern computer programs, equipment and operations in the local offices of the State agencies.

The greater matching of staff to workload is the second major step needed to improve the cost effectiveness of the UI Program. In UI offices, the workload can fluctuate by day by week and by season and may vary as much as 200 percent or more within 1 year. Often to adjust for these changes, part-time employees are utilized. This legislation seeks to increase the use of permanent part-time employees in order to account for these fluctuations and to provide a labor force that is experienced enough to produce high quality work efficiently.

The GAO has estimated that computer improvements and the better matching of staff to workload could save about $140 million annually in salary costs.

The use of a one-step notice of termination is a third cost improvement measure contained in this bill. The processing of claims can be facilitated by having employers provide their employees or the UI office a notice citing the reason of termination. Such a notice saves time by eliminating the need for the local UI office to prepare and mail a form to the employer asking for confirmation of the reason for termination. It also eliminates the need for the employer to look up the information and complete the form. Additionally, it allows faster service and reduces the potential for erroneous payments.

Provision has also been made to allow the States to retain 50 percent of their contingency funding. This will allow the local offices to quickly hire temporary or intermittent staff during times of rapidly increasing workloads and to acquire the space and equipment to serve the unemployed.

Last, the bill removes the State UI trust funds from the Federal unified budget. State UI trust funds were included in the Federal unified budget by Executive order in 1968. This action has focused Federal attention on UI benefits as a means of reducing the Federal budget. This creates a false sense of cost savings because the State funds cannot be used for anything but the UI Program.

A short factsheet follows which explains the provisions of the bill in more detail:

SECTION II—ADMINISTRATIVE IMPROVEMENTS

The State agency is to establish within 2 years of enactment:

1. Computer programs to determine individual eligibility and benefits at the local UI offices.

2. Written notices from employers to employees stating the reasons for termination of employment to assist in the determination of eligibility for UI benefits.

3. Greater utilization of part-time personnel on a permanent basis in the administration of the UI program.

4. Utilize other administrative practices—including payment of benefits on a biweekly basis—and recommendations of the Secretary of Labor.

To facilitate implementation of the above, the Secretary of Labor is to:

1. Fund modern computer programs and equipment.

2. Provide technical assistance for employer termination notices.

3. Establish a model of productivity practices and procedures for the administration of the UI program.

SECTION III—BUDGETARY TREATMENT OF STATE UI FUNDS

1. Effective with fiscal year 1990, UI trust funds are to be removed from the unified budget.

SECTION IV—RECOVERY OF ADMINISTRATIVE CONTINGENCY FUNDING

1. States are to retain 50 percent of their contingency funding to be utilized for part-time personnel or nonpersonal service costs.

2. No recovery of contingency funds is made until the fourth quarter of the fiscal year.

SECTION V—DEMONSTRATION PROJECT FOR DISLOCATED WORKERS

1. Establishes a three State demonstration to develop programs to provide immediate and long-term training and relocation assistance to dislocated workers.

SECTION VI—COMPUTER PROGRAMS FOR EMPLOYMENT SERVICES

1. The Secretary of Labor is to make grants to States for modern and efficient computers and systems to improve and expand job bank and job matching capabilities, other UI employment services and data processes in UI.

2. One hundred million dollars is authorized over 5 years.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to join me in finding ways to improve the cost efficiency of the UI system and making it more responsive to the needs of the unemployed.●

LEGISLATION TO RESTORE AUTO BUMPER PROTECTION

HON. ANTHONY C. BEILENSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mr. BEILENSON. Mr. Speaker, today I am reintroducing legislation I originally introduced last summer to restore automobile bumper protection standards to the 5-mile-per-hour requirement which was in force when the Reagan administration took office.

As part of the President's plan to ease the so-called regulatory burden on the automobile industry, the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration rolled back the 5-mile-per-hour standard, which had been in effect since the mid-1970's, to a much weaker 2.5-mile-per-hour standard.

The bumper standard is the speed at which a car should sustain no damage when it crashes directly into a flat barrier. Actually, the benefits are greater: bumpers meeting the 5-mile-per-hour standard also sustain less damage in angular crashes and crashes into poles.

The Reagan administration's argument for relaxing the standard to 2.5 miles per hour was that weaker bumpers would be cheaper to install and replace, and their lighter weight would improve fuel economy, saving consumers money on the purchase price and operating cost of their cars. The administration also promised to provide bumper data to consumers, so that car buyers could make informed choices about the amount they wished to spend for extra bumper protection.

I am sorry to report that none of these economic benefits has materialized. Not only is the Government ignoring the consumers' need for adequate, accessible crash safety and damage information—by making bumper and crash test information difficult for new car purchasers to find—but the car makers themselves are not reducing the prices on cars that they have equipped with the weaker bumpers. And in at least some cases the weaker bumpers are actually heavier than the stronger ones, so they do not provide an advantage in fuel economy either.

Further, by some estimates consumers have spent hundreds of millions of dollars in extra repair costs because of the extra damage incurred in slow speed accidents: in 5-mile-per-hour crash tests done by the Insurance Institute for Highway Safety, cars with the weaker bumpers sustained up to $2,000 in needless damage. And, to add insult to injury, in some models the stronger bumper actually costs less to replace than a weaker bumper on another model from the same manufacturer.

Mr. Speaker, the administration made a serious, costly mistake when it rolled back the bumper standard. It has cost consumers many millions of dollars, with no offsetting benefit at all. Some manufacturers have continued to supply the stronger bumpers voluntarily, but consumers have no easy way of knowing whether cars have the stronger or weaker bumpers.

It is time for Congress to reverse this foolish and costly error by establishing in law the same standard that existed by regulation prior to 1982. We can save consumers millions of dollars by a proven regulation that worked well in actual practice only a few years ago. This administration has shown that it will allow rhetoric about the burden of Government regulation and the advantages of free market economics to blind itself to the reality of the economic and human costs of automobile accidents. It is up to Congress to restore rationality to automobile bumper protection standards.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring this simple, straightforward bill.●

LITHUANIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

HON. WILLIAM J. HUGHES

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, I am very proud to join with my many colleagues who have spoken this week to commemorate the 67th anniversary of Lithuanian Independence Day.

Lithuania formally broke free from extended Russian domination and brief German occupation on February 16, 1918. On that date, a 20-member elected council proclaimed an independent Lithuania, bounded by ethnographic frontiers and governed by democratic principles. The Nascent government had to endure a Soviet invasion in 1919, but Lithuanians rose to the challenge and expelled their oppressers in 1920, forcing the Soviet Union to legally recognize "without any reserve the sovereignty and independence of the state of Lithuania * * * and forever (renounce) all sovereign rights possessed by Russia over the Lithuanian people and territory."

In 1940, however, after 22 years of freedom, the promise of Lithuanian autonomy was broken by the Soviets. During World War II, the Republic of Lithuania was invaded by Soviet forces, occupied, and incorporated into Soviet boundaries. Russian oppression caused an abrupt halt to the strides which the tiny republic had made both economically and culturally in this short period of time.

It is a tribute to justice and courage that the people of Lithuania still refuse to relinquish their national spirit. Despite attempts at russification, the Lithuanians continue to use their own language, and have retained their unique cultural heritage. In support of the continuing Lithuanian struggle for autonomy, the U.S. Government refuses to acknowledge the permanent incorporation of the Republic of Lithuania into the U.S.S.R. While the Russians continue to control Lithuanian territory, the people of this courageous nation steadfastly adhere to their national identity.

On this occasion, we salute the determination of the people of Lithuania, and join in solidarity with them in their continuing opposition to tyranny, and their enduring quest for true human rights. The strength of the Lithuanian dissidents truly serves as a beacon to oppressed people throughout the world.●

THE VISIT OF MRS. THATCHER

HON. JOSEPH P. ADDABBO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Speaker, I, like so many others who serve in this House, would be less than honest if I did not note how deeply disturbed our people are about the policies of the Thatcher government. The entire policy of the British Government toward the resolution of the conflict in Ireland leaves much to be desired. Since the decision to send troops into Ireland, very little has been accomplished toward a resolution of the problem and, many would say, that the difficulties have increased because of the presence of English troops.

Many of us join members of the American Irish Congress today in protesting against Mrs. Thatcher, particularly in regard to those injured in Belfast last August 12. Because the State Department tends to deny visa privileges to those who seek to bring the Irish point of view to our country, our people have been getting a distorted appraisal of what the Thatcher government seeks to do in Ireland. I would urge Mrs. Thatcher to tell the American Congress that she will withdraw British troops from that troubled land and exert her leadership toward beginning negotiations that will peacefully end the fighting in that troubled land. Those of us who seek a just and peaceful end to the killing in Northern Ireland implore the British Government to take a leadership role.●

SUPPORT AID TO AFRICA

HON. NORMAN F. LENT

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mr. LENT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to join my colleagues in supporting relief efforts in drought-ridden Africa. The faces are all too familiar. Specters of hunger and malnutrition stare out at us from the television and newspaper almost every day, constant reminders of the tragic situation which exists in Africa today. Children dying in the arms of their mothers, young and old alike lying in the sun-baked dust of sub-Saharan Africa too weak to move as they wait for death.

The figures are staggering, almost 10 million people throughout the 23 countries in Africa face the risk of starvation as a result of the drought and famine conditions. The United States has sent millions of dollars in emergency aid to the drought-stricken African Continent and yet thousands are still dying each day. As with any difficult battle, this fight against hunger may only be won through perseverence and sustained aid. It is easy to lose hope when these tragically haunting images of death and widespread starvation reappear each night on the news despite our continued emergency assistance to Africa. However, we cannot lose faith that our effort will bring about an eventual end to the adversities in that area of the world and eliminate the suffering of so many people. I am convinced that through public expression of our deep concern and our strong advocacy of effective relief efforts we may achieve these goals.●

WOMEN IN BUSINESS

HON. CLAUDINE SCHNEIDER

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mrs. SCHNEIDER. Mr. Speaker, an article was recently brought to my attention which I would like to share with my colleagues, discussing the programs and problems faced by nontraditional women-owned businesses. This was one subject addressed by a series of meetings held last year around the country by the members of President Reagan's Advisory Committee on Women-Owned Business.

This article appeared in Newsday, and was authored by a member of the advisory council, Robert R. McMillan, vice president for public affairs, Avon Products, Inc.

[From Newsday Jan. 14, 1985]

RUNNING A BUSINESS? "NO JOB FOR A WOMAN" IS STILL THE PREJUDICE

(By Robert R. McMillan)

If you were a manufacturer, would you buy sophisticated nuclear sub parts from a business owned and managed by a woman? Would you want a new factory or warehouse constructed by a contractor owned and managed by a woman?

I have found over the last year that the answers to these questions and the answers to the same questions for every "nontraditional" woman-owned business comes very slowly. In fact, there is often a hesitancy to say "yes" and in some cases, distrust of the capabilities of women-owned businesses. Many businessmen are still not ready to do business with businesses owned and managed by women.

As a member of President Ronald Reagan's Advisory Committee on Woman-Owned Businesses, I recently concluded a series of meetings throughout the country with bankers, women business owners, educators, community leaders and representatives of corporate America.

In spite of the distrust by some in the private sector towards these businesses, they continue to grow at an unprecedented rate. In fact, women-owned businesses between 1977 and 1982 grew from 1.9 million to over 2.6 million. Women-owned businesses today account for sales of almost $50 billion a year and that figure, too, is growing. These figures could be even greater if women were dealt with fairly in the marketplace.

There is no doubt in my mind that women business owners in the "nontraditional" areas of business have a much harder time than men in getting past the purchasing agents of companies and the loan officers of our nation's banks.

One member of our committee sells sophisticated parts to a nuclear submarine builder. When she first started to manage the business—and to some extent even today—there was great skepticism about her capacity to deliver. As she tried to bid for work, purchasing agents would ask—subtly—"how can a woman manage a company machine-tooling submarine parts?" "Quite well" is the answer.

During our meetings across the country, I heard from a radio talk-show host whose wife was interested in opening a restaurant. She needed a business loan; bankers would not even return her call. Then the talk-show host, well-known in the community, called the bank and the president of the bank immediately got on the phone to assist him.

These examples are symbolic of the challenges faced by women-owned businesses today. Women, while still interested in owning gift shops, boutiques and providing decorating services, are also coming on strong in the "nontraditional" business areas. They are now in the mainstream. But that mainstream has some very tough crosscurrents and rapids that must be overcome by women entrepreneurs. They cannot do it alone.

Many large companies and banks have policies against discrimination, but sometimes they do not filter down to purchasing and loan officers. On the other hand, we have found that many companies not only have strong policies on purchasing from businesses owned by minorities and women, they have strong outreach programs to secure bids from women and minority-owned businesses.

Women-owned businesses are providing more and more jobs each year. It is only fair, therefore, that the private sector take a deep responsibility to make sure that budding women entrepreneurs are given every opportunity to secure bank loans and bid for business without any "tilt" against them.●

BUDGET FREEZE PROPOSAL

HON. CECIL (CEC) HEFTEL

OF HAWAII

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mr. HEFTEL of Hawaii. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a concurrent resolution calling for a freeze on Federal spending in fiscal year 1986 at fiscal year 1985 levels. Furthermore, this legislation would limit spending increases in fiscal year 1987 and fiscal year 1988 to the lesser amount of 5 percent of the rate of the consumer price index.

Although President Reagan endorses a constitutional amendment to balance the budget, this same President has recently submitted a budget containing a $180 billion deficit. Our national debt has doubled in 4 years. President Reagan's budgets have matched the amount of debt which took our Nation over 200 years to first accumulate. It does not, however, solve the deficit problem by blaming any particular President or political party.

It is more important to be constructive and take the first immediate step. While we debate how to balance the budget; whether it be achieved through reducing or eliminating Government programs, or from increasing taxes or a combination of both, we must first freeze Federal spending to halt spiralling budget expenditures. We must halt these increasing expenditures before the ability to reduce the deficit or balance the budget is nothing but a dream.

We need to freeze Federal spending before entitlements and interest on the national debt reach such a magnitude that we will never be able to control or reduce those expenditures.

I realize that a 1-year budget freeze is not the total solution. Even if all the President's budget savings recommendations are adopted by this Congress, the deficit will surpass $140 billion in fiscal year 1986. We must limit the growth of Federal spending in the outyears as well.

We must first and immediately adopt a budget freeze. Then we can consider the variety of alternatives necessary for achieving fiscal responsibility, whether it be passage of a line-item veto or something as drastic as a constitutional amendment to balance the budget. Our deficit problem is in such dire straits that we should not rule out anything at this time.

Mr. Speaker, I ask that Congress put partisan interests aside since our deficits are harmful to all of our constituents and all interest groups. Middle-income people should be capable of owning a home without being crowded out of the borrowing market by high interest rates. Private capital formation provides far greater job opportunities than does borrowing by the Federal Government.

Mr. Speaker, I ask that Congress get on with the extremely difficult task of reducing our growing Federal deficits and attain permanent fiscal responsibility. Let us begin with a 1-year budget freeze in fiscal year 1986 and limitation on budget growth in fiscal year 1987 and fiscal year 1988.●

THE CONCEPT OF SANCTUARY

HON. ROBERT GARCIA

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I want to bring an editorial from the January 31 edition of Catholic New York to the attention of my colleagues. The editorial was sent to me by the South Bronx Committee in Solidarity with Central America, a very concerned and committed organization based in the South Bronx.

The sanctuary movement, as the editorial explains, has an honorable history within the Catholic church, but it is by no means limited to that or any other church. The concept of sanctuary—that is providing a place of refuge and protection—should not be at all a foreign idea to Americans. Our Nation is, in essence, a sanctuary, a refuge for the world's "tired, hungry, and poor."

What is going on now with regards to the refugees coming from Central America is merely an extension of this principle. I believe the editorial eloquently states the case for those who support the sanctuary movement. I submit it for my colleagues perusal.

[From the Catholic New York, Jan. 31, 1985]

SANCTUARY AT WORK

The concept of sanctuary is a long and honorable one in the history of the Church; for centuries those who sought the Church's protection in time of peril have found refuge there.

The theory finds itself up against a stern test at the hands of the administration these days. People affiliated with the sanctuary movement have been indicted both in Texas and Arizona in recent weeks on charges of aiding illegal Salvadoran refugees, and even though one Church worker won an acquittal last week, the issue is far from resolved.

Members of the new sanctuary movement, who claim to be acting out of religious convictions, say the aliens they assist are political refugees from countries such as El Salvador and Guatemala, and that they face persecution or death if they are deported. However, the U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service classifies almost all Salvadorans and Guatemalans here without proper documentation as economic refugees, which makes them ineligible for political asylum.

The government would do well to listen to the arguments of bishops in the affected areas, who have given the sanctuary movement a strong voice. Echoing earlier support from Bishop John J. Fitzpatrick of Brownsville, Texas, three other bishops from the Southwest—Bishops Thomas J. O'Brien of Phoenix, Manuel D. Moreno of Tucson, and Jerome J. Hastrich of Gallup, N.M.—last week called on President Reagan to allow Central American refugees to remain in this country while fighting continues in their homelands. They emphasized especially that doubts in the matter should be resolved in favor of the refugees themselves.

Those in the sanctuary movement are acting in the firm conviction that the refugees are victims of political instability and forces beyond their control. In offering sanctuary, the bishops said, their actions are "consistent with our national history and with biblical values." They added this thought in a message to the president:

"If there is room for legal doubt and debate on this issue, it should be clear that their choice represents a moral position publicly affirmed, a choice which does not harm or threaten other persons, a choice made with the willingness to accept the consequences within our country's legal system if necessary."

The words are well chosen. They deserve a fair and full hearing.●

NEW FEDERAL DEBT OF $936 FOR EVERY MAN, WOMAN, AND CHILD IN THE CURRENT FISCAL YEAR

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, in the President's budget requests submitted on February 4, is the admission—which has almost totally escaped attention—that the deficit for the current fiscal year will be $222.2 billion.

There are now 237.4 million Americans.

The numbers are therefore easy to remember. For every man, woman, child, and baby, the President's budget policies will add almost $1,000 in new Federal debt during the 12 months between October 1, 1984, and September 30, 1985.

This is not an opportunity society. It is an opportunistic society, which refuses to pay its bills or cut the things it wants—and leaves the bill paying to its children.●

TAX REFORM: A PENNSYLVANIA APPROACH

HON. WILLIAM J. COYNE

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mr. COYNE. Mr. Speaker, along with Federal tax reform, the Nation could also benefit from a new look at local taxation.

Theoretically, the separation of powers suggests that the Federal Government has no say in local taxes. In reality, however, they are interrelated. Much local taxation is needed to comply with Federal requirements or to match Federal funding. Much Federal taxation, on the other hand, is a response to essential national needs for which local funds are inadequate.

Congress and the administration thus have a real interest in taking a close look at how some new local tax reforms are generating more revenues, contributing to healthier local economies, spurring new housing construction and rehab and generating higher employment.

These are among the results of what we in Pennsylvania call the "two-rate property tax." We simply impose two different property tax rates—a higher rate on land values and a reduced rate on buildings.

When I served on the Pittsburgh City Council, we were able through this kind of reform to offer tax relief to most homeowners and progressive businesses at the same time we increased city revenues. I doubt it was a coincidence that Pittsburgh then enjoyed dramatic downtown renewal and that homebuilding remained healthy during the past recession when construction nationwide came to a near standstill. Similar good results also occurred in Harrisburg, Scranton, McKeesport, and New Castle after they adopted the two-tax rate.

Two more western Pennsylvania cities, Washington and Duquesene, began using the two-rate tax in 1985. Legislators in California, Missouri, and elsewhere are asking about adopting this system.

Members of Congress, I believe, will do communities in their districts a service by bringing this innovation to their attention. A documentary that gives an overview of the two-rate tax and its accomplishments is available from the Center for Public Dialogue in Kensington, MD. Several recent articles on the topics are of interest as well. At this point, I would like to include in the record some articles on the topic:

DUAL TAXATION SYSTEM UNEARTHS REVENUE

(By Michael J. McManus)

The public's attention is naturally drawn to the presidential race this fall. But there's an important issue that ought to surface in the election of governors and state legislators of every old industrial state, as it has in Missouri.

How would you like a state law that would:

Cut the taxes of the average homeowners, or rents of most apartments?

Provide an incentive for rehabilitation, by cutting taxes on improvements?

Increase the property taxes of land speculators, giving them an incentive to build on their land (creating jobs in your community) or sell it to someone who will?

Spur needed new development in old communities with stagnant tax bases?

There are no more important state-local issues, in my opinion. But I'll wager that your state representative and his challenger never heard of what Pennsylvania calls "Incentive Taxation," or what Missouri Rep. Walter Muller calls "Site Value Taxation."

But take a look at "a quiet tax revolution" that is gaining so much momentum in Pennsylvania that it was praised by Fortune magazine Aug. 8, 1983, as one of the few forms of taxation "that promote development." And it is the subject of a film called "A Tale of Five Cities—Tax Revolt Pennsylvania Style" that ought to be shown at any meeting where those running for state office have to face the voters.

But to understand the solution, you must first understand the problem. Here's how Dr. Steven Cord, an economics professor at Indiana University of Pennsylvania, and editor of a publication called Incentive Taxation, explains the issue in the film:

"An owner who just sits on prime city land and keeps it idle is rewarded with low property taxes, and yet he can make big, speculative, unearned profits by selling it at some future time. What about the man who builds on his central-city site? He puts up office buildings and housing, and he is penalized by high taxes year after year, not just once."

The solution is simple.

Five cities in Pennsylvania of varying size—Pittsburgh, New Castle, Scranton, Harrisburg, McKeesport—have increased property taxes on land, and cut building taxes.

And Washington, Pa., will implement such a law Jan. 1.

If you look at your property tax bill, you will see that there are really two taxes—one on land, and the other on buildings. If you don't live in the above cities, your rate of taxation is the same on both forms of real estate. For example, if Washington had not passed its law, its residents would have paid 2.58 percent on both land and improvements.

But in January, Washington will tax land more than three times higher than its buildings: 6.056 percent on land vs. a 1.68 percent tax per dollar of building value.

Some 81 percent of homeowners will have a lower property tax than they would have had if there had not been a shift to a dual tax rate. Taxes will increase on owners of large quantities of underused land, such as parking lots in the downtown—often owned by speculators. That will give them an incentive to build on the land, or sell to someone who will.

This is not theory, but proven fact in the five cities whose laws are older.

Scranton, a city of 87,378, doubled its land tax rate in 1980 and made any commercial or industrial construction property tax exempt for a decade while new residential construction was made completely tax exempt the first year, 90 percent exempt the second year, then 80 percent and so forth over a decade. These new construction exemptions provide extra incentives to build over the simple duel tax rate.

"The builder is no longer penalized in the city of Scranton," said Mayor James McNulty. The result: new construction rose from $8.6 million to $10.6 million in Scranton while it plunged in neighboring Wilkes-Barre—a city of similar people and economics—by 44 percent, from $14.5 million to $8.1 million.

Pittsburgh is a more dramatic case study. The value of building permits from 1976–8 averaged $82 million a year. In 1979, Pittsburgh made its land tax four times higher than its buildings. And that represented a tax increase, not just a tax shift. Building permits in 1979 jumped to $108 million, nevertheless.

In 1980, the tax on land rose again to five times that of buildings. And a property tax deferment was granted for three years on commercial or industrial buildings and five years on new residential construction. The results were incredible.

New construction soared to $297 million in 1980 and skyrocketed to a record-breaking $563 million in 1981. The figure slipped back to $201 million in 1982 and $212 million in 1983. But that is still 2½ times the average of 1976–8.

Why can't it be seen in other states? Only Pennsylvania permits any locality to have a dual tax rate. Illinois will permit it in counties with a population of 200,000 only. Peoria has scheduled hearings on the issue for Oct. 1 and 2, thanks to leadership of John Kelly, a stockbroker.

Missouri's House of Representatives passed enabling legislation proposed by Rep. Walter Muller by a 5–1 vote last spring, but there wasn't time for the Senate to act. Minnesota Rep. John Burger backs the concept in his state.

"Site Value Taxation is eminently fair," said Muller. "The more favorable your location is, the higher your tax. The person who improves his property won't have to pay a higher tax. Speculators will pay more while the average person's taxes are cut."

TWO-RATE TAX OF FIVE CITIES PUT ON FILM

[By Linda R. Woodhouse]

How five Pennsylvania cities are using a two-rate property tax system as a "potent new tool" to spur economic growth and financial stability is the subject of a recently released film.

The film, "A Tale of Five Cities: Tax Revolt Pennsylvania Style," tells how Scranton, Harrisburg, McKeesport, Pittsburgh and New Castle impose higher tax rates on land and lower tax rates on buildings and improvements as an incentive for landowners to make improvements to their property. The film was produced by the Center for Public Dialogue of Kensington, Md.

The concept has many names (graded tax, differential tax, two-rate tax) but one purpose—to spur economic development by discouraging land speculation, promoting new construction which will create jobs, and encouraging proper upkeep of buildings, especially in aging neighborhoods.

All five cities have gradually increased tax rates on land while holding constant or reducing rates on homes and other buildings, and have reaped these benefits: 1) dramatic upturns in privately financed downtown construction; 2) increased housing starts in the midst of a national housing slump; 3) new jobs in construction and related fields; and 4) increased tax revenue that has enabled these cities to maintain services and programs at a time when other cities are cutting back because of loss of federal funds and effects of the recession.

Pittsburgh and Scranton were the first to adopt the concept in 1914 when they began to tax land at twice the rate of buildings.

From 1978–1982 Pittsburgh gradually increased the land tax to six times the rate for buildings, with dramatic results. Fortune magazine reported in August 1983 that, after a land tax increase from 4.95 percent to 9.85 percent of assessed valuation in 1979, "new construction, measured by the dollar value of building permits issued, rose 14 percent as compared with the 1977–78 average."

With another increase in Pittsburgh's land tax rate to 12.55 percent in 1980 (2.475 percent was the rate for buildings), construction in that year" leaped 212 percent above the 1977–78 average, reflecting groundbreaking for a new crop of office skyscrapers that is giving the city its so-called second renaissance," Fortune reported.

In 1980, when Pittsburgh adopted a three-year tax exemption on all new buildings, construction again rose and peaked in 1981 at nearly six times the 1977–78 rate, Fortune reported.

In Scranton the tax rates since 1980 have been 9.6 percent on land and 2.55 percent on buildings.

[From the John Herling's Labor Letter, Sept. 22, 1984]

"Quiet" property tax revolt: The effects on housing, jobs, downtown renewal and local revenues have been documented in "A Tale of Five Cities" in Pennsylvania. Sponsors of this movie are the U.S. Conference of Mayors, the League for Urban Land Conservation, the National Forest Products Association, The Metropolitan Washington Planning and Housing Association, the National Association of Home Builders, and the Center for Public Dialogue.

Without ballyhoo, Pittsburgh, Scranton, Harrisburg, McKeesport and New Castle have gradually increased tax rates on land while holding constant or reducing their tax rates on homes and other buildings.

Unlike Proposition 13 in California and other highly publicized tax limitation devices, a two-tier tax enabled these five cities to increase revenues substantially. Economists, business people and others in the film tell of:

Dramatic upturns in privately financed downtown construction.

Increased housing starts in the midst of a national housing slump.

New jobs in construction and related fields.

Further, mayors and council members say this property tax changes enables cities to maintain adequate services at a time when federal supports are being cut—and in a way that eases tax burdens for most homeowners.

Scranton' tax rate on land is now four times the rate on buildings. Mayor James B. McNulty credits this differential with inducing a 22 percent rise in the value of local building permits. Chamber of Commerce President Austin J. Burke says the two-rate tax reduces the cost of new construction and gives a signal to industry that Scranton wants development.

From 1978 to 1982, Pittsburgh gradually increased the land tax from double to six times the rate on buildings. Annual construction rose 14 percent the first year, 211 percent the next, and 600 percent the next. Rep. William J. Coyne, a former councilman who led Pittsburgh's move toward higher land taxes, explains that the higher tax cost of holding vacant and underused land in the core of the city has generated exciting new downtown construction.

Pittsburgh, Scranton and McKeesport alone saw building construction increase by three-quarters of a billion dollars in 1980, 1981 and 1982 after their tax reform, accounting for at least 5,800 new full-time construction jobs for those years.

A shortcoming of Pennsylvania's system is pinpointed by Mayor Dale Yoho of New Castle. Only cities may now use the two-rate tax. Urban counties and school districts still await enabling legislation to give them the same option.

Harrisburg Mayor Stephen R. Reed urges cities across the nation to employ the two-rate tax as an economic stimulus. Efforts are reportedly underway in a number of states to follow Pennsylvania's lead in modernizing the property tax.

Walter Rybeck, director of the Center for Public Dialogue and producer of the film, led a discussion of the documentary on Capitol Hill. Among those present were Congressman Coyne, Michael Sumichrast, chief economist, National Association of Homebuilders, and Father William S. Byron, S.J., president, Catholic University, former head of Scranton University.

STRENGTHENING THE PEACE

HON. WM. S. BROOMFIELD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, we and the Soviet Government have once again commenced an important effort to reduce and, hopefully, eliminate our nuclear arsenals.

On January 11, the Voice of America broadcast to the world an educational editorial explaining the nature of these talks in Geneva and our hopes for their success. The issues are as difficult as they are important. We cannot hope for overnight success. However, as President Reagan said, "We must work together, wherever possible, to strengthen the peace."

Mr. Speaker, I commend the following Voice of America editorial to my colleagues for their consideration.

STRENGTHENING THE PEACE

This week in Geneva, American and Soviet officials sat down to talk about arms control. Led by George Shultz, United States Secretary of State, and Andrei Gromyko, Soviet Foreign Minister, the two delegations agreed to negotiations to reduce nuclear weapons and strengthen strategic stability. Although both sides still have many differences, they agreed in a joint communique on an ultimate objective: total elimination of the nuclear weapons that threaten the world. President Reagan heralded the meeting as "the beginning of a new dialogue between the United States and the Soviet Union."

According to the Agreement, the major arms control questions will be discussed simultaneously by delegates divided into three groups. This welcome step should streamline the negotiating process. Previous talks on strategic and medium-range nuclear weapons were broken off by the USSR in late 1983.

One group will take up the question of long-range nuclear weapons that can reach targets on another continent, a hemisphere away. A second group will discuss reducing intermediate-range weapons—the Soviet SS20's and SS4's in Europe and Asia, and the U.S. missiles deployed in response, in member countries of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. In both groups, the delegates will concentrate on reducing all nuclear weapons, with the final goal of putting them away for good. If a treaty is adopted, it must include some provision for verifying compliance. As the President pointed out in his press conference Wednesday night, "Zero nuclear weapons is easier to verify, far easier than if you're simply reducing the numbers."

The third group in the forthcoming talks will discuss space and defense weaponry, an issue that was not on the agenda of earlier arms control talks. At present, the Soviet Union has an operating anti-satellite weapon as well as an anti-ballistic missile, or ABM, system. The United States dismantled its own ABM system some time ago, and its anti-satellite device is only in a testing stage. Recently, our Government began a research program, known as the Strategic Defense Initiative, to find out if it is possible to build a defensive system that could destroy nuclear weapons before they can strike the United States or our allies.

The chief accomplishment of the Geneva meeting is the promise of serious dialogue to come. We are encouraged by the resumption of arms talks with the USSR and are prepared to be flexible as well as persevering. We ask the same of the Soviet Union, and hope its leaders will help make the negotiations a success. Our two nations cannot be expected to overcome basic differences of belief, and the United States will continue to speak out for democracy and freedom. But, in the words of President Reagan, "We must work together, wherever possible, to strengthen the peace."●

HATE CRIME STATISTICS ACT

HON. BARBARA B. KENNELLY

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mrs. KENNELLY. Mr. Speaker, the Hate Crime Statistics Act which I am introducing today will improve the collection of statistics on crimes motivated by racial, religious, or ethnic hatred. It requires the Attorney General to include in the FBI's Uniform Crime Reports information concerning the incidence of crimes where it appears that the crimes were committed to express racial, religious, or ethnic prejudice. The idea of developing a nationwide system of reporting to produce an accurate measurement of this type of crime was first advanced by the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights in July 1983, and it is my hope that this bill will turn that recommendation into a reality.

A series of arsons of synagogues in my congressional district last year drew my attention to this problem. Each year hundreds of acts of violence and intimidation are committed against specific groups in every region of the country because of their race, religion, or ethnic background. Every time such acts occur, they threaten the basic precepts of a peaceful and pluralistic society. Cross burnings, swastikas sprayed across the walls of a temple or school, desecrations, arson, or intimidation of people because of their skin color, religion, or ethnic heritage, are threats to us all.

Unfortunately, it is impossible to measure the extent of the problem. We do not know the amount, location, or type of crime that is motivated by racial, religious, or ethnic hatred. We do not know if it is on the rise or on the ebb. There is simply a shortage of hard data on this problem. The Anti-Defamation League does collect valuable information on anti-Semitic incidents in selected areas throughout the country, but their efforts, while important, are not comprehensive. And although annual crime statistics are collected and published by the Federal Bureau of Investigation in the Uniform Crime Reports, the slaying of a spouse in a domestic quarrel and the murder of a black person because of his color are both recorded as homicide.

There is a clear and demonstrable need for reliable statistical information on the subject of crime motivated by racial, religious, or ethnic hatred. Communities presently cannot respond to the problem because there is not enough information on criminal violence motivated by bigotry. This lack of data makes it very difficult for law enforcement officials to measure trends in such crimes, to develop enforcement strategies, and to allocate personnel in areas of greatest need. The lack of data impairs the ability of policymakers to assess the extent of the problem and develop adequate measures of prevention. Such data is also needed to highlight and determine national, local, and regional trends in this type of crime, and to evaluate the effectiveness of particular efforts to combat it. Such statistics would ensure that Federal, State, and local governments are aware of the dimension of this threat, and would help reinforce the fact that the problem does exist, and must be addressed.

Finally, the systematic gathering of information about such crimes would symbolize society's commitment to eradicating bigotry, racism, and its violent byproducts by demonstrating its willingness to commit time and resources to this problem.●

BROKEN PROMISES

HON. MARY ROSE OAKAR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, the following article is the painful story of a truly unsung hero. I hope we can, in some way, rectify this terrible neglect.

[From the Cleveland (OH) Plain Dealer, Feb. 17, 1985]

BROKEN PROMISES—MAN WHO SAVED REAGAN DENIED WHITE HOUSE GLORY

(By Mairy Jayn Woge)

He was named Italian-American Man of the Year in one city, feted at a giant union dinner and admitted to the Senior Citizens Hall of Fame. He was hailed as a hero and became the pride of Garfield Heights. A street was named in his honor.

But Alfred A. Antenucci, credited with saving President Reagan's life nearly three years ago by tackling would-be assassin John W. Hinckley Jr., died last May without receiving the recognition his family believes he deserved.

Reagan administration officials made many promises to Antenucci—a lunch with the president at the White House, financial help with his medical bills—but few of those promises were kept. The lunch never materialized, and Antenucci's widow, JoAnn, paid $28,000 in medical bills out of her savings after her husband died.

Now Antenucci's two children, Dominic A. Antenucci and Maria Bennett, are pressing for some official notice by the administration of their father's heroic act.

Antenucci would probably have had mixed feelings about their effort. For the most part, he wanted to forget the event that made him famous.

He was never the same, physically or emotionally, afterward, his family said. He had nightmares about the shootings, and dreaded reliving the episode for others, said Bennett.

"I don't feel like a hero. I just did what any average guy would have done," Antenucci often said.

Even though Bennett knew her father would have disapproved, she began writing letters to the White House, Congress and labor unions last June, asking that Antenucci's role in saving the president's life not be forgotten.

"He was the only real fatality from Hinckley but he never was mentioned with the other victims," Bennett said. "I heard they got bonuses or medals. They were honored at a luncheon with the president.

"The FBI agent who was in the ambulance when my father was taken to the hospital in Georgetown told him, 'You are going to get a medal. Anyone involved in something like this gets a medal,'" Bennett said. "Think about it, Michael Jackson got a medal."

Antenucci got plenty of headlines for what he did on March 30, 1981. But no medals.

As a business agent for Carpenters Local 1750, Antenucci was attending a building trades conference in Washington, DC. He elbowed himself into the second row of spectators waiting to see Reagan leave the labor conference following a speech.

Antenucci would recount, "I saw this kid in front of me had his hands in his overcoat pockets. I should've wondered why anyone would wear an overcoat when the temperature was 80 degrees.

"I didn't think anything of it until the kid took a gun out of a pocket and fired two shots. I punched the kid in the back of the head twice. He started falling. He fired two more shots while he was going down. I jumped on top of him."

Antenucci was holding onto Hinckley and wrestling for the gun. Secret Service agents pounced on them. Al Antenucci, a veteran of union picket lines, would not let go. One agent, apparently believing Antenucci was the assassin, socked him in the jaw.

When Antenucci was pulled off Hinckley, he saw James S. Brady, the presidential press secretary. Brady had been shot in the head, and Antenucci later said the sight of Brady's blood greatly upset him.

News reporters declared Al Antenucci's quick action had saved President Reagan's life. Three hours later, Antenucci was rushed to Georgetown University Hospital with heart palpitations.

"He did not have heart trouble before March 30, 1981," said Dominic Antenucci, a golf professional at Walden Golf & Tennis Club in Aurora.

The day after the assassination attempt, the visits from White House officials and the promises began.

Dominic Antenucci had flown to Washington and was in his father's hospital room when Secretary of Labor Raymond J. Donovan and presidential aide Robert F. Bonitati arrived. He said he heard Bonitati advise his father, "The government will take care of everything, compensation for hospital bills, your family's trips to Washington while your are in the hospital."

"That did not happen," said Dominic.

Union hospitalization, Medicare and the Antenucci family paid $110,000 in hospital bills incurred after the Hinckley incident and again last year.

And the family footed the travel costs to Washington, including Antenucci's trip home when he was discharged from the hospital, April 8, 1981.

Donovan told Antenucci that he would be having lunch at the White House with Reagan, Dominic recalled. Another broken promise. Antenucci did have lunch at the White House—with Bonitati in 1982.

Clevelander Paul A. Russo, then a special assistant to Reagan, told newsmen that while Antenucci was hospitalized, he had talked on the telephone with Antenucci.

"I gave him the president's respect and gratitude and told him he would be hearing from the president," said Russo.

Russo, now a consultant, did not return Plain Dealer telephone calls.

The Department of Labor said Donovan is not available. He is on a leave of absence because of his indictment for filing false business returns.

According to Antenucci's family, the only time Antenucci was recognized publicly by Reagan was a year later when the president was at the podium during another building trades conference in Washington.

When Reagan was told Antenucci was in the audience, the president asked the hero to stand up.

"My dad was so short, 5 foot 2, he had to climb on a chair to salute the president," Bennett said.

In her Garfield Heights home that overlooks Antenucci Dr., Bennett recently explained, "My father did not expect anything. He told us what he did at the shooting was what any American would do. But when the Reagan people made promises, he trusted and believed them.

"The only thing he looked forward to was the luncheon and our family having a picture taken with the president," said Bennett, a federal employee.

According to Dominic Antenucci, "Even Gov. (James) Rhodes said father was to be honored by the White House. He was to go to Washington in the state plane. But no invitation came."

Al Antenucci would make excuses for the president, his children recalled.

"He said Mr. Reagan was very busy," said Bennett.

She said when Reagan telephoned Antenucci, once, six weeks after the shooting, a New York newspaper pulled the strings to make it happen.

Labor Secretary Donovan visited Antenucci twice in Garfield Heights in the summer of 1981. Each time, he said he was handling the White House luncheon engagement, Bennett and Dominic said.

Then came the final snub, according to Bennett.

When the Antenucci family accompanied her father to the building trades convention in Washington in 1982, Donovan and Russo did not return their telephone calls.

Meanwhile, Al Antenucci was showered with honors—named Italian-American Man of the Year in Chicago, feted at a union dinner in Cleveland attended by 750 people, and admitted to the Ohio Senior Citizens Hall of Fame. He retired at 70. Then there was Antenucci Dr., a short street between Interstate 480 and Turney Rd. in Garfield Heights.

"I think that because of all that attention, people thought the White House had fulfilled its promises. There was a great omission. I sometimes wonder if the president knew what was going on," said Bennett.

Plain Dealer telephone calls to the White House last week indicated there was no familiarity with the situation among the current staff.

"That man saved the president's life," said Rep. Mary Rose Oakar, D-20, of Cleveland. "He didn't expect anything from it. I think it was terrible the way he was treated by the White House. There was a ceremony for the other guys." She was referring to ceremonies honoring Secret Service agents and district policemen.

The White House even bungled the way it responded to Antenucci's death, and the brief illness that preceded it.

Last April 30, Antenucci helped install a dishwasher he had bought for Bennett as a surprise. At 11 p.m., he walked the three blocks back to his home.

About 7 the next morning, he was admitted to Marymount Hospital, breathless from the irregular heart beat that had begun in Washington.

On May 1, the Antenuccis heard from the White House—indirectly.

Someone from Columbus telephoned to report that the president was in Alaska, but planned to stop at Marymount to visit Antenucci on his way back to Washington.

"That didn't happen either. The president went straight to the White House. My father got a get-well telegram from Ron and Nancy Reagan," said Bennett—but the greetings came after Antenucci's death on May 9.

On May 14, a large envelope from the White House was delivered to Marymount Hospital. In it was a note signed by President Reagan, dated May 10, wishing Antenucci "good health and a speedy recovery," Bennett said.

No Reagan representatives were at her father's burial even though Garfield Heights police had been informed some were coming. Flags were hoisted along the street to greet them, she said.

"There were no flowers or a card or a call. I was hurt," she said.

Two thousand others mourned at the funeral.

The president extended his condolences to JoAnn Antenucci, the widow, in a telegram May 15, Bennett said.

Bennett's efforts to win recognition for her father likewise have been met with bureaucratic red tape instead of results. "I do not want my father's name to be lost in the shuffle of history . . . I sincerely hope you can do something about this," the daughter wrote in a letter to the president dated June 14.

That letter also brought up the matter of the unpaid hospital bills, "because they were part of the broken promise and because they were the result of the assassination attempt," Bennett said.

Antenucci received expensive care from specialists at Georgetown and the bills grew when he became ill last year and was treated at Marymount.

Despite warnings from Oakar, Antenucci had believed the White House would deliver on promises to pay the bills. "They'll do it," he would say. But, when Antenucci's widow had to pay the $28,000 balance on his medical bills, it was the last straw for Bennett.

"If promises can't be met, there is no reason to make them," Bennett said.

After writing to Washington, Bennett said, "It took me eight weeks to find out who had the letters that I sent to the president about my father."

One reply in August from Peter Rusthoven, associate counsel to the president, said that Rusthoven was handling her letters and the president's reply. Also in that reply Rusthoven said the government had no funds to pay the hospital bills.

In a follow-up letter, Bennett had to emphasize that the purpose of her letter to the president was not money, but recognition.

In a letter on last Nov. 5, Rusthoven continued to deal with hospital costs. He instructed Bennett to apply, ironically, to the James S. Brady Presidential Foundation.

The Brady foundation, funded by contributions, was created by Congress to pay medical expenses of civilians or public workers who are wounded during assassination attempts on high government officials, candidates for office and their families. It was the result of the Hinckley attack on March 30, 1981.

"The purpose of my letter to President Reagan was not money," Bennett wrote in one letter. "The reason was that the recognition of my dad was handled so poorly . . . It was my hope that the president would somehow acknowledge my father's brave, unselfish and heroic act."●

PROPOSED RESTRICTIONS ON EXPORT OF NORTH SLOPE OIL

HON. STEWART B. McKINNEY

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mr. McKINNEY. Mr. Speaker, today my distinguished colleague from Michigan, Mr. WOLPE, and I have introduced legislation to make permanent the restrictions on the export of North Slope Alaskan oil. In the 98th Congress, 237 Members cosponsored similar legislation. This legislation will again give Members of Congress the opportunity to strongly support our Nation's efforts to become energy independent.

In 1973, before the Arab oil embargo, when a gallon of gasoline cost 40 cents and a barrel of oil $2, Congress saw Alaskan oil as a valuable domestic resource which should remain at home. In 1977, after a painful lesson from the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries on the consequences of energy dependence, Congress further strengthened restrictions on the export of Alaskan oil. In 1979, with the fall of the Shah of Iran, Congress adopted amendments to the Export Administration Act, reaffirming and strengthening the restrictions on the export of Alaskan crude. And in the last Congress, conferees overwhelmingly supported the provision of the Export Administration Act which restricts the export of Alaskan oil.

Some argue that exporting Alaskan oil to Japan would improve America's international trade balance. Actually, this only would improve Japan's trade position with the United States. Pressure on Japan to reduce significant barriers to U.S. manufactured and agricultural exports would be lessened and instead of exporting goods using American labor, the United States would be exporting a scarce domestic resource. Our lopsided trade position with Japan demands substantive trade concessions from the Japanese, not short-term cosmetic measure which only will mask underlying trade inequities. Moreover, the overall U.S. trade deficit will not be reduced because exports will force us to import an equal amount of oil from abroad. Indeed, exports are likely to increase our trade deficit as we pay more per barrel for replacement oil than we get for Alaskan crude abroad.

Exporting Alaskan oil would be a tremendous blow to our Nation's efforts to become energy independent. Currently, all of the approximate 1.7 million barrels per day of Alaskan oil now being produced travels through the Trans-Atlantic pipeline for exclusive use in the United States. This constitutes nearly 20 percent of total U.S. oil output. If this supply were sold abroad, it would have to be replaced by imports from foreign sources. Proponents of exporting Alaskan crude have claimed that lost Alaskan oil could be made up with imports from South America or Mexico. This is unlikely, however, as gulf coast refineries are geared for high-quality, low-sulfur Alaskan crude which only could be replaced by Mideast imports. The Iran-Iraq war, instability in Lebanon, and the turbulent history of the region all point out the risk of renewed dependence on Mideast oil.

There also is little evidence suggesting that the American consumer will benefit from the export of Alaskan oil. Due to the higher cost of foreign imports versus the price of Alaskan oil, exporting Alaskan oil will mean that consumers will pay $1 to $2 billion more each year for petroleum products. Moreover, since most of the benefits of increased Alaskan oil prices will be reaped by the Federal Government and the State of Alaska in the form of tax revenues, the export proposal is a cleverly disguised tax increase.

Exporting North Slope crude will in no way serve the interest of the American public or our national security. Therefore, I urge you to support this legislation in an effort to keep this vital domestic resource at home where it belongs.●

IS OVERPOPULATION TO BLAME FOR FAMINE IN ETHIOPIA?

HON. JOHN EDWARD PORTER

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of my colleagues to an editorial by Werner Fornos, president of the Population Institute, which appeared recently in the Chicago Tribune regarding the famine in Ethiopia. In it Mr. Fornos asserts that many of us have missed the main cause of the problems in Ethiopia: "too many people living in an area with too few resources to sustain them." It is a very important article and I urge my colleagues to review it.

The article follows:

[From the Chicago Tribune, Jan. 28, 1985]

FACING AN AWESOME CHALLENGE

(By Werner Fornos)

A great deal of compassion and support has been expressed by the American people as they have watched the Ethiopian tragedy unfold on their television screens. That is understandable and even expected.

What is more difficult to understand are those misleading reports attributing the cause of the tragedy solely to famine caused by drought. This is a shortsighted viewpoint, to say the least.

Of course, drought has played a role, as have other factors like migration, civil wars and politics. But none of these is the main reason. The underlying cause for what has occurred in Ethiopia and its neighboring countries is overpopulation: too many people living in an area with too few resources to sustain them.

The Ethiopian tragedy would have occurred with or without the drought. It was inevitable. Demographers have been predicting it for a least four years, just as they are predicting similar tragedies in other parts of Africa. In another part of the world, Bangladesh may be the next "Ethiopia."

Third World countries are adding too many people without the economies or the food production to take care of them. Eighty-five million people are being added to the world population each year, with 90 percent of this growth in the already struggling poorest part of the world. Between now and the turn of the century, the world will grow from 4.8 billion to 6.1 billion people—the equivalent of the population of the City of Chicago every 13 days.

Africa is the continent facing the most crucial problems because its population is the fastest-growing. Its population today is 531 million, but by the year 2000 it will have risen to 855 million. It doesn't take a mathematical genius to see that if Africa has serious problems today, they are going to escalate dramatically in the next few years.

At a World Bank symposium this month in Washington, it was stated that with current death rates and the age structure in developing countries, an average of four children per couple assures a population growth rate of at least 2 percent a year. Growth at a rate of 2 percent annually means that in 100 years a population grows to eight times its original size. At 3 percent a year it grows 20 times.

By the turn of the century, 30 of Africa's 51 countries will be unable to feed themselves, according to the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization.

The recently completed World Fertility Survey conducted in 60 nations found that 400 million women did not want their last child; nor did they want any more children. These women lacked the education and the means to determine the size of their families and the spacing between births. An immediate doubling of U.S. aid for international family planning assistance to $580 million a year would mean 100 million of these women could receive contraceptive help. As a result, world population growth could be stabilized at 8 billion in the next century, instead of the projected 12 billion to 14 billion.

Compare this amount to the more than $1 billion expended by the U.S. in 1984 for food and famine relief to only 18 African countries. Population assistance is much less costly than famine relief. Famine relief is projected to cost up to $1.7 billion by the year 2000 when population will have risen from 215 million to 339 million in these countries. Additional family planning services would have a dramatic impact in reducing these dollar outlays.

It also would require more virgorous leadership by the United States than is currently apparent. It is in the nation's economic, political and security interests to help solve the Third World's population problems.

It is important to emphasize, too, that each individual country must be responsible for providing its own solutions to reduce fertility rates. This will require political commitment, motivation and free access to readily available family planning services. When this has been tried—Indonesia, Mexico,

Japan, China, Singapore and South Korea—the results have been highly encouraging.

Family planning methods are closely tied to education. Studies have shown that women who have completed primary school have fewer children than women with no education. But there are 800 million people in the world who cannot read or write, and two-thirds of them are women. The illiteracy rate in Africa is 73 percent.

Population affects the quality of life within a country, from birth to death. To bring population under control, it must be emphasized that family planning will improve life standards for the individual family. This means family planning must be accompanied by economic development, better educational opportunities more jobs and a more secure outlook for the future.

It is an awesome challenge. But it must be undertaken if we do not want starvation and suffering to be the methods used to control the world's ever-increasing population growth.●

DISINVESTMENT IS ANTI-BLACK

HON. HENRY J. HYDE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mr. HYDE. Mr. Speaker, several days ago I called the attention of my colleagues to the remarks of two legitimate black leaders in the Republic of South Africa. One of them was the chief of the Zulu Nation. In the Wall Street Journal of February 20, 1985, Chief Buthelezi has written with eloquent passion of the negative aspects of the present tidal wave of recrimination that could shortly surface against South Africa. He has argued that blacks will gain and have gained power because they are exercising new and stronger economic power. Disinvestment and other punishment meted out against South Africa can only negatively affect all population groups in that country. I recommend Chief Buthelezi's article to my colleagues:

DISINVESTMENT IS ANTI-BLACK

(By Mangosuthu G. Buthelezi)

In the struggle for liberation any black leader worthy of the title recognizes that the responsibility for bringing about radical change in South Africa rests on black shoulders. It is a South Africa struggle, and blacks have to lead in that struggle until we pass the point where the drive for improvements becomes nonracial. We have to shape events in our own chosen direction, and we have to fashion our society after the models that we ourselves emulate.

It must not, however, be forgotten that in life and death situations decency is so often under siege. Bloody revolutions fought against terrible oppression do not automatically bring about great improvements. Decency in South Africa is under siege at the moment in the sense that decency and democratic nonviolent opposition to apartheid are under threat by white recalcitrance, which is polarizing society and driving blacks to despair and anger. Decency is also under siege in the sense that time-honored civilized values and Western democratic principles are being viewed as impotent by an ever-increasing number of blacks. The struggle for liberation in South Africa still could take ugly turns; the prospects of widespread devastation of property and a sharp escalation of violence leading to a race war remain an ever-present possibility.

NEED ALL-PARTY ATTEMPT

It is against these background thoughts that I ask Americans to consider attitudes toward investment in South Africa, and attitudes toward President Reagan's constructive engagement policy. As a black leader I cannot be jubilant yet about the Reagan administration's South African policy. We don't know yet what deeds will be added to words, but we are aware that sufficient political time has not passed for anybody to make judgments on Mr. Reagan's approach to South Africa. As a black leader I must welcome his attempt to formulate a South African policy for the first time in the U.S.'s history, even if it has not yet been demonstrated that the U.S. government and the American people have the will and the ability to take South African issues out of U.S. party politics. Black South Africans still don't know whether petty politicking between Democrats and Republicans will turn apartheid into an American political football for party gain.

I make the point that for the U.S. the South African situation is distant and unimportant. The remoteness of South African issues from the daily vested interests of U.S. citizens does not demand that any U.S. government make more than vague moral pronouncements on what should and should not be happening in my country. The South African issue, however, does challenge Americans' moral fiber and the U.S.—as the world's leading democracy—should make an all-party attempt to side with the oppressed in South Africa.

This thought, however, does not belie the fact that medium- and long-term economic developments in South and Southern Africa have implications for U.S. interests. South Africa after liberation will be a great gateway to the African hinterland where the process of industrialization must inevitably be talked of in terms of many millions of dollars. At this juncture, however, the immediate challenge to the U.S. is a moral challenge.

If we are to avoid a destructive conflagration of forces in South Africa, the process of change in the country must be speeded up. I fail to see how those who agree with this statement can possibly talk of our effective economic isolation. Isolation will bring stagnation to the economy and perhaps even destroy its growth base. Yet it is in the circumstances of a rapidly expanding economy, where the interdependence of black and white is vastly increased, that the propensity of the country to change is enhanced. Black vertical mobility is a concomitant of economic growth. Anybody who knows anything about a society such as ours will know that the ceilings that apartheid imposes on this vertical mobility, produce the rubbing points that mobilize opposition to apartheid where it is most vulnerable.

Apartheid has lined white pockets and succored white privilege. When white privilege and standards of living are threatened through the prosperity of blacks and there is a rising claim to recognition, then the prospects of negotiated advances are the greatest. While protected by a wide range of apartheid measures, big business in South Africa has for decades sided with the oppressor and exploited black South Africans unmercifully.

That era has passed. No big business today can secure future plans without challenging apartheid. It was the large corporations that broke the apartheid barriers that led to real advancements for black workers. Ford Motor Co.'s bold indenturing of black apprentices against the law hastened the day when job reservation had to be abandoned. Progressive managements talking, dealing and negotiating with workers hastened the day of black trade-union recognition.

It is big business that keeps institutions such as the Institute of Race Relations alive, and it is very often big business that provides the financial muscle to challenge the government in the courts on civil-rights issues, on labor issues and on contradictions and ambiguities in law; and it is international capital that can back educational and development programs. For large American companies to opt out of the South African situation is to opt out of the prospects of being catalysts in the process of change.

Increased economic investment in South Africa by U.S. companies associated with a U.S. constructive engagement policy with real meaning is a moral option that the U.S. now has. In the circumstances that now appertain, withdrawal of investments in South Africa by Americans is a strategy against black interests and not a punitive stick with which to beat apartheid.

LIFE AND DEATH DIFFERENCE

There is a great deal of genuine interest in South Africa among many Americans, but I really am fearful that the upsurge of the current debate on the disinvestment issue and on Mr. Reagan's constructive engagement policy is in part fired by Americans for Americans on American issues. Apartheid should be more than some kind of looking glass in which Americans see themselves. Apartheid is real; it is out there and millions of black South Africans suffer indescribably under it. Americans should profess a humanitarian approach to the question of what the U.S. should do about apartheid. To stand on American indignant principles by withdrawing diplomatically and economically from South Africa is a luxury that the vastness of American wealth could afford. But indulgence in that luxury for the sake of purity of conscience, whatever genuine motives produce that conscience, would do no more than demonstrate the moral ineptitude of a great nation in the face of challenges from a remote area of the globe.

Black South Africans have to confine their options to realities, and we have to seek to bring about radical change in such a way that we do not destroy the foundations of the future. More than 50% of all black South Africans are 15 years old or younger. A huge population bulge is approaching the marketplace. To greatly exacerbate unemployment and underemployment, and to greatly increase the already horrendous backlog in housing, education, health and welfare services, would be unforgivable. Millions of black South Africans already live in dire squalor in squatter areas and in shantytowns. Jobs make the difference between hunger and starvation and between life and death. For Americans to hurt the growth rate of the South African economy through boycotts, sanctions and disinvestment would demonstrate a callous disregard for ordinary people, suffering terribly under circumstances that they did not create, and would be a gross violation of any respect Americans may have for the principle that people should be free to exercise their rights to oppose oppression in the way they choose. Black South Africans do not ask Americans to disinvest. The strident voices calling for confrontation and violence are the voices most dominant in calls for disinvestment.●

NASSAU COUNTY COMPTROLLER PETER KING REPORTS ON NORTHERN IRELAND VISIT

HON. RAYMOND J. McGRATH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mr. McGRATH. Mr. Speaker, Nassau County, NY Comptroller Peter T. King recently returned from a visit to Northern Ireland and shared his observations and impressions with me. I am pleased to submit for my colleagues review his report, "Loyalist Alienation in Northern Ireland: An Opportunity for a Diplomatic Breakthrough." I commend this report as a thoughtful and cogent assessment from a man who is a Catholic, and a nationalist supporter, yet who visited Northern Ireland at the invitation of Families for Legal Rights which is an organization comprised of relatives of loyalist defendants charged in supergrass trials. Mr. Speaker, I am sure you will agree that this makes for very interesting and thought-provoking reading.

The report follows:

LOYALIST ALIENATION IN NORTHERN IRELAND: AN OPPORTUNITY FOR A DIPLOMATIC BREAKTHROUGH

(By Peter T. King)

During the period of January 26-January 31, 1985, I was in Belfast, Northern Ireland at the invitation of Families For Legal Rights which is an organization comprised of relatives of loyalist defendants who have been charged on the uncorroborated testimony of "supergrass" informers.

The purposes of this visit were (a) to observe the current loyalist supergrass trial where 29 alleged members of the outlawed loyalist para-military Ulster Volunteer Force (UVF) are being tried on the uncorroborated testimony of supergrass James Crockard and (b) to meet with leaders and representatives of the loyalist community.

I accepted the invitation of Families For Legal Rights because it has always been my position it is just as wrong when loyalists have their rights violated as it is when nationalists' rights are violated. Human rights are universal and cannot be allowed to be restricted by political or sectarian boundaries. I also believe it was significant that a hard-core loyalist group, which was fully cognizant that I was a Catholic and supported the nationalist cause, would invite me to assist it. This signalled to me a considerable change in loyalist thinking.

The Crockard trial is as violative of due process and civil and human rights as were the McGrady and Grimley trials. In virtually every particular this loyalist trial equalled the nationalist trials in its perversion of justice. The prevalent thinking in Northern Ireland today is that the use of supergrasses has just about run its course with only two significant cases remaining—Kirkpatrick (nationalist) and Gibson (loyalist). This, however, should provide little solace because recent history has demonstrated that England replaces one draconian system with another—e.g., internment was succeeded by Diplock Courts which were characterized first by tortured confessions and then by supergrasses.

What has made the supergrass system unique is the extent to which it has been imposed upon the loyalist community. Internment, tortured confessions and plastic bullets were directed primarily against the nationalist community and this caused England considerable public relations problems. England attempted to avoid this problem with the supergrass system by charging loyalists as well nationalists, thereby giving the appearance of even-handedness.

This has outraged the loyalist community for several very basic reasons. First, in their frenzied pursuit to erect the facade of impartiality, the British have charged loyalists on evidence which, in some instances, is even less credible than the evidence against nationalists. Second, the "terrorist" offenses for which the loyalists are now being charged are the very type actions which, in the past, the British security forces condoned and even encouraged them to commit against the nationalists.

Third, while the British have moved against the loyalists in the past, it has never been on this scale or to this extent. Indeed, the loyalists have historically viewed themselves as the ultimate defenders of British rule in the six counties. For loyalists to witness the British system of justice being so horribly perverted with themselves included among its victims is psychologically shattering to growing numbers of loyalists.

The extent to which many working class loyalists feel alienated from England was made clear to me in my meeting with Families For Legal Rights and with loyalist politician George Seawright. The meeting was held in the Loyalist Club on the Shankill Road which is the embodiment of the most bitter hatred between loyalists and nationalists. Yet, as a Catholic and professed nationalist supporter, I was graciously and politely received. Quite frankly, I could not imagine such a meeting taking place several years ago. These most dedicated loyalists were willing to ignore my Catholic religion and republican sympathies in an attempt to reach agreement on matters such as supergrasses which are of concern to both loyalists and nationalists.

I do not for a moment minimize the extent of the breach between the communities. Nonetheless, I believe that there now exists a unique diplomatic opportunity which should be seized before the moment passes. The ideal role for the United States to play is as an honest broker. Every effort should be make by the United States to encourage meaningful dialogue between the two communities on issues of mutual relevance and importance. Supergrasses and strip-searches are two such issues. Additionally, the United States must not only permit but indeed encourage loyalist and nationalist representatives to set forth and articulate their positions to the American people. In short, the United States must discard its visa denial policy and allow all Northern Ireland representatives into our country including nationalists such as Gerry Adams, Danny Morrison and Owen Carron and loyalists such as Andy Tyrie, George Seawright and Ian Paisley.

The time has also long since come to acknowledge that a war situation exists in Northern Ireland and that peace will never come until all parties to the conflict including para-militaries such as the Ulster Defense Association, the Ulster Volunteer Force and the Irish Republican Army are permitted to take part in whatever negotiations are ultimately held.

My own views on Northern Ireland are unchanged. I believe that Northern Ireland is a failed political entity and that the only viable, long-term solution is a united 32 county Ireland wherein the legitimate rights of loyalists and nationalists would be guaranteed. The precise framework and time table for a united Ireland would be arrived at after honest and meaningful diplomatic initiatives by London and Dublin and negotiations among all parties including para-militaries.

Ideally, the United States would set this process in motion by furthering the dialogue between loyalists and nationalists. Even, however, if the dialogue does not bring about a long-term political solution, it could nevertheless result in the alleviation of human rights violations by the British against both communities and that in itself would be a very meaningful achievement.

Finally, London and Dublin can be expected to resist any effort to achieve nationalist-loyalist dialogue because that will limit their influence. The English and Irish governments have, however, failed miserably over the past 65 years in Northern Ireland. Both have cynically manipulated and abandoned the communities whose interests they supposedly represented. In short, the bankrupt policies of London and Dublin cannot be allowed to once again frustrate the hope of progress.

The people of Northern Ireland have suffered too long and too hard for the United States to ignore the potentially historic diplomatic opportunity which presently exists. The time for action is now. The judge is history.●

JAMES DuBOSE RETIREMENT

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, last month, my very dear friend, James DuBose, retired from the Newark Police Department after 29 years of service. It is a privilege for me to take this time today to pay tribute to Detective DuBose.

I have known Jim for many years, and have a deep admiration for his outstanding service to our community. He began his career as a police officer in 1956 and rose through the ranks of the department, serving as a detective in the vice squad and the intelligence squad and earning numerous citations and awards. In 1974, he became special assistant to the police director, a position which Jim held until his recent retirement. Here he put his many talents to use, serving Police Director Hubert Williams and the people of Newark as well.

In addition to his service in the department, Jim DuBose has played an important role in numerous civic and community affairs. As one of the founders of the Bronze Shields, an association of black police officers, Jim has assisted many charitable services in the community. He is also active in the 369th Veterans Association, and has for some time been working as a historian for this organization. It was while he was preparing an oral history of this brave and honorable unit that Jim came across a man from Newark named William O. Layton, who had fought with the 369th during World War I. Mr. Layton told Jim that he had been awarded the highest medal of honor by the French Government—the Croix de Guerre. Unfortunately, however, the medal was lost when he returned to the States. For over 60 years, Mr. Layton tried to have the medal replaced, but was unsuccessful until Jim DuBose got involved. He asked for my assistance, and last April, at a ceremony at Newark's city hall, Jim DuBose and I presented Mr. Layton with a Croix de Guerre.

This story says something about Jim DuBose that I have known for a long time—that he is a caring and dedicated individual with unlimited love for the people of our community. Although his retirement is a loss to the police department, I am confident that Jim will continue to be a very important player in the life of our community. I salute him on his retirement, and wish him all the best in the future.●

HON. BENJAMIN A. GILMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to thank the gentleman from Illinois, the Honorable FRANK ANNUNZIO, for his leadership in sponsoring the commemoration of Lithuanian Independence Day. The 734th anniversary of the formation of the Lithuanian State is not only a time to reflect on a proud moment in Lithuanian history, but also a time to rededicate all our efforts toward securing Lithuanian independence again.

For more than a century, the Lithuanian people suffered under foreign domination, trying vainly to win their independence. But on February 16, 1918, Lithuania was able to do just that. This independence was soon followed by German occupation during World War I, but thereafter and for the next 20 years, until 1938, the Lithuanian people were free. That small nation then came under Soviet domination during the course of World War II, and in 1940, Lithuania was declared a constituent republic of the U.S.S.R. Thereafter, during World War II, Germany occupied this land once more, for another 4 years, until the end of the war. Since that date, Lithuania has remained under the thumb of the Soviet Union.

Mr. Speaker, millions of Lithuanians exist today within the captive borders of the Soviet Union. They cannot celebrate the day as we do. We, as members of the free world, must continue to exercise our right of free speech to ensure that their dream of independence never dies. The importance of this day cannot be underestimated as it is a tribute to the Lithuanian spirit and heritage.●

OLD TURKEYS, SACRED COWS AND PORK

HON. BOB EDGAR

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, while I frequently have differences with David Stockman, we seem to agree a bit more regularly on matters of Federal water policy. Today I would like to bring my colleagues' attention to one such area of agreement, as summarized in an editorial from the New York Times last week. The piece points out the redundancy of having two major Federal agencies to build our water projects—the Bureau of Reclamation in 17 Western States and the Army Corps of Engineers throughout the country. Mr. Stockman believes that one agency would be enough.

For some time I have advocated the development of a rational, planned Federal water policy. Not one which stopped building necessary water projects or eliminated the Federal role in them, but a strategy which builds projects based on need, demonstrated local support, and with respect for the environment. I think that the Times editorial makes the simple point that having dual agencies for this purpose is an unaffordable extravagance in a time of $200 billion deficits. Moreover, the duplication of services works against the goal of a rational national water policy.

I think that David Stockman's idea has merit and deserves attention. I commend the following editorial to my colleagues:

OLD TURKEYS, SACRED COWS AND PORK

Representative Morris Udall of Arizona says the idea of merging the two big agencies that build Federal water projects—the Bureau of Reclamation and the Army Corps of Engineers—is just "an old turkey that comes back every few years." He's partly right. It had been around at least since Calvin Coolidge. But the idea is an old turkey, it has become one bacause the bureau is a sacred cow.

Budget director David Stockman dares to suggest that a single bureaucracy would suffice, and save money besides. Not surprisingly, he's run into a stone wall. Neither the Interior Department, where the bureau is located, nor the Pentagon sees any point to his proposal. President Reagan, however, is interested.

What's the problem? Mr. Udall and his colleagues from the West. No matter how many Presidents think one agency would be better than two, the Western contingent in Congress thinks otherwise. The bureau is their pork barrel. They want it kept separate.

The corps dates from the early years of the Republic, when its main business was building forts. The bureau came along in 1902, to reclaim arid regions in 17 Western states. Nowadays, the agencies' operations have grown more alike. The bureau, still confined to the West, emphasizes hydropower and irrigation. It has 8,200 employees and a $1.1 billion budget. The corps works all over, mainly on flood control and navigation. it has 37,000 employees and a $3.6 billion budget.

President Reagan's new 1986 budget proposes cutting $900 million from the corps and $100 million from the bureau. Merger wouldn't save nearly that much; Mr. Stockman estimates $50 million a year. And it certainly wouldn't shut down the Washington pork barrel. Both agencies know how to accommodate Congress.

But the potential public benefits are clear. The savings aren't peanuts. And over the long haul, one less agency generating new ideas for subsidized water projects would save much more. The major work the bureau was created to do is done.

The President won't take a stand until the new Interior Secretary, Donald Hodel, has reviewed his predecessor's findings. A credo to guide both men is available in Mr. Reagan's second Inaugural address: "If not us, who? And if not now, when?" ●

FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF THE WILLIAM M. GOUSE, JR., VFW POST 3211

HON. NORMAN F. LENT

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mr. LENT. Mr. Speaker, February 1985 marks the golden anniversary of the William M. Gouse, Jr., Veterans of Foreign War (VFW) Post 3211 of Hicksville, Nassau County, NY. This landmark is an important occasion for the post, its members, and the local community. More importantly, the event symbolizes the lasting commitment to serving our Nation's veterans which has been the VFW's proud tradition throughout its history.

At the time the charter was approved on February 4, 1935, and instituted on February 11, 1935, 20 comrades comprised Post 3211 at the first muster. Originally the Manetto Plains Post, Post 3211 was renamed after William M. Gouse, Jr., who died October 16, 1938, at the age of 39. The original comrades had agreed, "Whichever of our comrades dies first, so shall the post be named after our deceased comrade."

VFW Post 3211 supports local veterans' centers and various programs to assist veterans and their families. In fact, the post earned a national recognition award for the formation of a veterans' employment agency.

The post is a place to share in the comradeship of fellow veterans. Many of the members visit the Northport Veterans' Hospital every month. In December, the hospital patients are brought to the post for a Christmas celebration and dinner. These visits help boost morale and spirit among the veterans.

The William M. Gouse, Jr., Post is dedicated to serving the local community as well. Members are active in many charitable organizations and community projects, such as the Hicksville Community Council.

The post also offers scholarships through the Voice of Democracy Program and the coloring book contests to students of the Hicksville school system. Post 3211 earned a national recognition award for sponsoring the first coloring book contest for area elementary students. They sponsor programs such as the International Games for the Disabled and donate food and clothing to needy families in the area. The post also sponsors Boy Scout Troop 3211.

The members of Post 3211 deserve our gratitude for their continued work on behalf of our Nation's veterans, their families, and the local community.

The VFW, as an organization and through its members, has been instrumental in reinforcing the principles of loyalty, strength, and patriotism in America. Our veterans are entrusted with passing on our country's noble ideals to present and future generations of Americans. The post's efforts in pursuit of these esteemed goals are worthy of the highest commendation.

I congratulate the William M. Gouse, Jr., Post 3211 and its members on their 50th anniversary. And I know my colleagues join me in wishing them 50 more years of continued success. Thank you.●

SETTING THE RECORD STRAIGHT

HON. WM. S. BROOMFIELD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, early last month, the Voice of America broadcast an editorial that puts the degree of aid we have been providing the people of Ethiopia and the reaction of Ethiopia's Marxist government into important perspective.

The editorial points out that while we have sent an unprecedented amount of aid to that country, the Ethiopian regime has made a point of concealing the true extent of our aid while exaggerating the importance of help from countries like the Soviet Union.

It also points out that while the attitude of the Ethiopian regime may be disconcerting to us, our overriding concern is for the welfare of the Ethiopian people. We have thus urged that their government consider our Food for Progress Program to promote agricultural development through private effort—an approach that as the President said "holds the promise to help prevent tragedies like Ethiopia from reoccurring in future years."

Mr. Speaker, with these thoughts in mind, I commend the following Voice of America editorial to my colleagues:

SETTING THE RECORD STRAIGHT

Since the first television pictures of the starving people of Ethiopia reached the West last October, people and governments around the world have sent an unprecedented amount of relief aid to that country. The United States has been especially forthcoming. In all, our government contributed two hundred and thirty thousand tons of grain to Ethiopia in the last three months of 1984.

The American aid to Ethiopia is a matter of record. Yet, for some reason, it's not a matter that Ethiopia's Marzist rulers like to acknowledge. In fact, Ethiopia's government has made a point of concealing the extent of U.S. aid. In December, the government-controlled Ethiopian Herald announced that Finland had donated two thousand blankets—but ignored the American contribution of five thousand blankets on the same day. In November, the same newspaper waited nineteen days before reporting a U.S. pledge of fifty thousand tons of grain, the single largest donation of any government. In its lists of foreign aid, the Ethiopian government has included direct U.S. government assistance, but excluded government aid distributed by private groups, thus understating total U.S. aid by some seventy five percent.

While the Ethiopian regime has downplayed U.S. aid, it has exaggerated the importance of the help it has received from its Chief foreign patron, the Soviet Union, which has contributed some ten thousand tons of food. Instead, Ethiopian leader Mengistu Haile Mariam talked at great length about the Soviet trucks and aircraft being used to distribute food. He doesn't say where the food is from.

It doesn't really matter who the Ethiopians think is feeding them—as long as they are fed. What the Ethiopian government does—or doesn't—say about its aid donors is not nearly as important as an Ethiopian commitment to provide for its people in the future. Unfortunately, such a commitment is nowhere to be seen. In the past decade, the Ethiopian government has collectivized agriculture according to the Soviet model, and with the same result: sharply declining farm productivity. Since 1982, Colonel Mengistu has ignored warnings that his farm policy could contribute to famine; now, the Ethiopian regime plans to extend collectivization so that, by 1990, more than half of its people will work on collective farms.

We are glad to be able to help the Ethiopian people in their present suffering. Last week, President Reagan pledged that the United States will provide one half of the emergency food aid needed for Africa in 1985. Yet we think that, in the long run, greater food-sufficiency is the answer to food shortage. Our government's Food for Progress program is meant to promote agricultural development through private effort. That approach, as the President said, "holds the promise to help prevent tragedies like Ethiopia from reoccurring in future years."●

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGES

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Washington Report for Wednesday, February 20, 1985, into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGES

President Reagan used his State of the Union Address to celebrate individual freedom and extol old-fashioned values. His flawless delivery and warm introduction of two "citizen heroes" contributed to the political theatre. He called for "a second revolution of hope and opportunity" as he developed his theme of unlimited horizons for all Americans. I was impressed by his praise of the nation's progress and of its stunning prospects. The President called for few new changes in government. In his view things are going well, with prosperity at home and stability abroad. Undoubtedly, most Americans agree with him.

The President's plea for a simpler tax code was the centerpiece of the speech. Having stressed the issue vigorously, he is now obligated to follow through. He pushed for lower tax rates for individuals, but expressed concern that a corporate tax hike like that in the Treasury's tax proposal will reduce incentives for new plant and equipment spending. He also questioned the elimination of preferential treatment for capital gains. The President faces a challenge in attempting to lower individual tax rates and keep current corporate tax levels without lowering revenues. Nonetheless, he gave impetus to tax reform without committing himself to a specific plan. I suspect he will propose a list of several provisions rather than comprehensive legislation when he finally endorses a plan.

The President reacted out to minority groups, advocating enterprise zones and subminimum wages for teenagers. Emphasizing the themes of social justice, he endorsed job training partnerships, tuition tax credits, and a program to help low-income public housing residents buy their own homes. He urged constitutional amendments to permit school prayer and ban abortions, and encouraged greater use of the death penalty.

The President's speech dwelt less on foreign policy than most State of the Union addresses. He requested further increases in both foreign aid and military spending. He again supported the MX missile and the Strategic Defense Initiative, which he called "the most hopeful possibility of the nuclear age." He asked for new negotiations to expand trade and strengthen the global economy. He was less combative toward the Soviet Union than in the past speeches. He saved his harshest language for the Sandinista leaders of Nicaragua.

The President's separate Economic Report also praised the outlook for the United States economy. Unlike the State of the Union Address, the report warned of the risks of massive federal budget deficits. One interesting section of the report criticized the Treasury tax plan, which the President has praised at other times. The report attributes much of the economic recovery to the accelerated depreciation and investment tax provisions of 1981 tax law, which the Treasury plan would dismantle. The report blames the trade deficit largely on a strong dollar. It attacks protectionism and favors comprehensive trade liberalization and a new round of multi-lateral trade negotiations. The President stressed further deregulation of the banking system, trucking, railroads, natural gas prices and the licensing of nuclear power plants.

The President credits the Federal Reserve for the recent drop in inflation and interest rates. The report embraces monetarism, an economic doctrine holding that money supplies should expand at a constant rate each year. The report says that fiscal policy (the taxing and spending process of government) has little direct impact on economic growth except in time of war. This is a striking departure from previous reports which stated the traditional view that fiscal policy more directly affects growth, especially in a slack economy. Both views agree, however, that money supply is a major factor in the economy's growth rate. The President seems to be positioning himself to blame the Federal Reserve if economic growth declines.

The President counts heavily on economic growth to control the budget deficit. My concern is that this approach does not warn of the risks ahead. I do not believe we can maintain strong growth with present economic policies. The message of the State of the Union Address and the Economic Report is that while we may be running large budget deficits, we can expect a healthy, rapidly expanding economy nonetheless. In my view, that message is mistaken.

For example, the overall federal debt is growing at a faster rate than the economy. The President often states his view that the federal government's role must shrink, and the private sector's role must grow. But instead of shrinking, the government's share of the economy has expanded significantly since 1980. Government outlays jumped to 24.8% of GNP from 22.9% four years ago. The overall debt could amost triple in this decade, rising from $914 billion in 1980 to $2.5 trillion by the end of the decade.

The deficit feeds on itself. Interest payments in the budget have quintupled in the past ten years, and they will continue to soar. Every time there is an additional $200 billion annual deficit there is another $20 billion each year in interest payments for that part of the deficit. The deficit is bleeding us and it can't be cured, as the President's budget suggests, by cutting spending in one-third of the budget (social programs) and increasing spending in the other two-thirds (defense, entitlements and interest payments). Reducing the deficit will have to be based on a wider range of spending cuts. And if a better budget cannot be found, it may have to include consideration of higher taxes, too.

My feeling is that our present recovery is due largely to the monetary policy of the Federal Reserve. Yet, we are on shaky foundations because of huge deficits and the influx of foreign capital. If foreign investment begins to dry up, the dollar will decline in value, interest rates could increase, inflation could rise, and a recession could occur. My sense is that the President is not giving enough attention to the chances of trouble ahead in the economy.●

GOOD NEWS FOR TAXPAYERS ON MILITARY PROCUREMENT

HON. TONY P. HALL

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mr. HALL of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, we have often heard horror stories of the Pentagon buying a claw hammer for $900 or a flat washer for $300. Rarely do we hear about military officials reducing the cost of procurement.

However, Defense Department officials are taking steps to cut costs, and these efforts should be recognized. For example, at Wright-Patterson Air Force Base adjacent to my district, officials running the F-15 Fighter-Plane Program have introduced a new procurement system which could save taxpayers millions of dollars.

For the benefit of my colleagues, I would like to introduce into the RECORD the text of an article from the Dayton Daily News on the new system. Here is some good news on military procurement.

The article follows:

[From the Dayton (OH) Daily News]

INNOVATIVE: WRIGHT-PAT BUYING DIRECT TO SAVE MONEY

(By Mary Beth Lane)

Officials running the F-15 fighter-plane program at Wright-Patterson Air Force Base have introduced an equipment-procurement system they predict will save millions of dollars.

Instead of buying items such as ladders and jack pads from McDonnell Douglas Corp., the company that builds the plane, the officials are buying the equipment directly from small businesses. They expect to save $1 million to $10 million when the contracts are signed next month.

"I just wanted to make sure we were doing business right in the F-15 (office) and avoid horror stories. I'd rather find a horror story than have you (the press) find it, to be frank," Col. Michael Butchko, director of the F-15 office, said in an interview.

"We're taxpayers, too. Everyone seems to forget that."

Butchko, a pilot who was assigned to the F-15 office six months ago, said he came up with the procurement idea when he learned his office faced the purchase of 350 support items for which McDonnell Douglas would charge $30 million.

"(I thought) maybe we could get it done quicker, cheaper and with the same quality as the prime contractor," he said.

Butchko plucked six employees from his staff of 200 and assigned them to a "tiger team" to work full time on the order. Creating a tiger team, an expression used by the military and defense contractors, means assigning a panel of experts to work on one matter exclusively.

Frederick MacLeod, who heads the team, said he and his colleagues studied the order and found 135 items out of 350 could be purchased quicker, cheaper and at equal quality from "small and disadvantaged" businesses instead of McDonnell Douglas. The federal government defines these as firms that are "socially or economically disadvantaged," including those owned by women, minorities, handicapped people or immigrants.

The items being purchased are simple devices used to support the F-15, including ladders, wrenches, ammunition trailers, tow bars and dollies.

Although this procurement system means less profit for McDonnell Douglas, the contractor has given its enthusiastic support, Butchko said. He said contractors generally would prefer not to handle support-equipment orders because it is not a high-profit area for them.

After contracts are signed with small businesses to provide the simple items, the same team will study whether any of 500 more sophisticated items used in the F-15 can be bought the same way, Butchko said.●

ETHIOPIAN LENINISM AND FREEDOM

HON. HENRY J. HYDE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mr. HYDE. Mr. Speaker, as most of us know the current drought conditions in Africa have been exacerbated by socialist economic policies and a repression of freedom in those nations adopting a Sovietized Marxist-Leninist totalitarian political system. Ethiopia has become a bottomless funnel for foreign disaster assistance. Selectively hoarding food for its army, city dwellers and apparatchiks, this despicable regime continues to play the role of hapless victim of the elements.

In the February 20, 1985 edition of the Wall Street Journal writer Wayne Svoboda has aptly described the state of affairs in the most active Soviet satellite in the Horn of Africa. I recommend to my colleagues a careful reading of this report prior to writing a blank check to the Ethiopian regime and its Cuban and East European enforcers.

CALAMITY IN MENGISTU'S COUNTRYSIDE

(By Wayne Svoboda)

ADDIS ABABA, ETHIOPIA—In a recent speech here at Congress Hall, not far from Lenin's high-rise statue, Comrade Mengistu Haile Mariam, Ethiopia's self-appointed ruler, discussed fine points of revolutionary communist ideology as his countrymen suffered from the twin ravages of drought and his government's nonsensical economic policies.

What Ethiopia needed was a specific sort of cadre, proclaimed Comrade Mengistu, secretary-general of the central committee of the communist Ethiopian Workers' Party [EWP]. The ideal member of such a cadre, he said, should be "not one who is satisfied merely to exist, but one who will sacrifice himself for the program we have formulated and guarantee the freedom of the worker."

Comrade Mengistu need not have bothered. Tens, probably hundreds, of thousands of Ethiopians had already offered the ultimate sacrifice in 1984: their lives. Weak from malnourishment brought on by three years of drought and aggravated by their unelected government's unenlightened policies, most died unseen in the hills. Others expired before the cameras of journalists allowed into the country during the last few months of the year.

Had these Ethiopians been better fed in their villages, they would not have contracted the dysentery, measles and other diseases that killed them; or, having contracted them, they would have recovered. Instead, weak, they died. As many more may die this year, despite massive Western aid and not-so-massive help from such Ethiopian allies as the Soviet Union and East Germany. Ordinary Ethiopians' only hope is that Comrade Mengistu will change his policies and provide incentives for peasant farmers to grow food. In normal times, most Ethiopians grow just enough for themselves; there is no incentive to grow more, because the government pays prices that are artificially low for the main grains. Only in the central highlands is there a small surplus; this goes to feed city dwellers.

Such a change in agricultural policy is unlikely. Comrade Mengistu's most recent bad idea is to shift individual peasants from subsistence to state-run farms, in which the government owns the land and laborers work for a wage, or to producer cooperatives, in which land is individually owned but equipment is shared. He thinks these are the fairest ways, and wants half the peasants to work on such collectives by 1994. At the moment, only 5% do. To speed up the transition, he has made it difficult for peasant farmers to obtain seed, fertilizer and credit to work their own plots. State farms and cooperatives get more than their share.

Comrade Mengistu generally pays little attention to the needs of the countryside, where more than 80% of Ethiopia's 36 million people live, preferring to concentrate on keeping his townfolk happy. In Addis Ababa on Sundays, crowds fill a fancy sports stadium to watch soccer; afterward, spectators heading home on broad paved streets can stop off for bakery goods, cups of cappuccino, glasses of fresh orange juice, or dinner by candlelight while a piano tinkles softly in the background. Contrast this with the rural areas, where children in dusty fields kick at a filthy ball made of cloth. There are almost no shops, paved roads, piped water, dams, irrigation programs or trees (wood is burned for fuel everywhere; as trees disappear, so does topsoil—and the desert spreads). Almost nothing, almost everywhere.

Comrade Mengistu's predecessor, Emperor Haile Selassie, was not much better, especially in the years just prior to his overthrow in 1974 by Comrade Mengistu and other officers (most of whom were killed before Mr. Mengistu became head of the government in 1977). Selassie was disposed because he refused to admit that 200,000 Ethiopians were dying as a result of famine in Tigre and Wallo provinces in 1973, much less seek help for them. The emperor thought that undue attention to such events was demeaning.

Mr. Mengistu has shown the same tendency. Western reporters who requested visas to visit Ethiopia throughout the winter, spring and summer of 1984 were consistently turned down. The thought that the reporters might have contrasted the plight of the starving with the government's celebration of its 10th-anniversary was apparently too much to bear. Mr. Mengistu moans about the West's alleged manipulation of humanitarian aid to serve political ends. But he knows why nearly all reporters were not allowed in until September, and why, even now, they are forbidden to travel outside the capital without government-approved permits and guides. Swift's metier was satire; Mr. Mengistu's, hypocrisy.

That Karl Marx might today cringe at those who act in his name seems not to interest Mr. Mengistu. Some other African heads of state mouth Marxist slogans but can tolerate some capitalism—Robert Mugabe, prime minister of Zimbabwe, is the best example. Mr. Mengistu speaks benignly ("it is imperative to give priority to, and focus on, the development of the agricultural sector") or banally ("you are being deployed to register another historical victory in the complex process of our class struggle"). But his actions are decidedly malignant.

He is fighting four wars—against Eritrean and Tigrean rebels in the north, Somali nationalists in the Ogaden, and Oromo nationalists in the south. Refugees walking out of Eritrea and Tigre toward the Sudan in search of food have been attacked by the Ethiopian air force. Hungry Ethiopians who opt for camps, called feeding centers, set up by the state often find themselves aboard Soviet transport planes flying south. There they are "resettled" in secure areas sometimes far different from those they left. The strife-ridden north is becoming less and less able to support the rebels.

Mr. Mengistu's ideological altar is supported by three planks—tired Marxist-Leninist cant from which even communist stalwarts such as China now are distancing themselves, food-price subsidies to urban Ethiopians and to the army to avoid coup attempts, and agricultural collectivization. Many attempts have been made to smash this ideological foundation. All have failed. An Oxford economist, Keith Griffin, was asked by the Ethiopian government to offer a plan for agricultural reform. He did. Mr. Mengistu ordered that it be kept secret and not used. The World Bank, in three reports over the past four years, has drawn attention to shortsighted, ultimately counterproductive agricultural policies followed by African nations including Ethiopia. Comrade Mengistu yawns.

His defenders say he deserves less blame than he gets: that leaders such as President Gaafar Nimeiri of Sudan also suffer from civil war, drought and famine, but escape condemnation because they are friends of the West. Yes and no. For drought, both men are blameless. For nurturing, not solving, an inherited civil war, each is guilty; Comrade Mengistu more than President Nimeiri. But Sudan has not tried to cripple private farming, and its food shortage is thus less severe. Much of it is also caused by the presence of hordes of refugees from neighboring countries—including, yes, Ethiopia.●

MOTHER SETON SCHOOL, EMMITTSBURG, MD

HON. BEVERLY B. BYRON

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mrs. BYRON. Mr. Speaker, 175 years ago today, in the mountains of western Maryland, America's first saint of the Roman Catholic Church began one of the endeavors on the road to her eventual nomination to sainthood. On February 22, 1810, the original parochial school founded by Elizabeth Seton, was opened as a mission school to settlers living in what was then the far western frontier of the American wilderness.

From that small beginning Americans of all beliefs can learn a lesson in industry and faith. Our Nation has grown to boundaries unimagined in 1810, when that frontier school was formed. The subjects of history and science and mathematics have likewise expanded beyond the bounds first taught in the simple mission school. And the small school itself branched in growth to a university. And the individual efforts of Elizabeth Ann Seton progressed to the point that she was ultimately named the first American saint of her church.

On this day we can all be reminded that from small beginnings grow the ultimate greatness of spirit, accomplishment, and personality. And that is the heritage that this teacher gives to us all, no matter what our religion.●

IRS COMMISSIONER MAKES GREAT CASE FOR MASSIVE TAX REFORM

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, every time he gives an interview, the President backs further away from the Treasury Department's outstanding work on tax reform. The concrete work of the Treasury's experts is rapidly turning to jello in the President's mouth.

Still, the people who really know taxes—such as IRS Commissioner Egger—continue to make the good fight as to why, without tax reform, our tax system could collapse. I would like to include at this point in the RECORD an excellent article by Commissioner Egger from the Washington Post of February 10, 1985:

WITHOUT REAL REFORM, OUR TAX SYSTEM COULD COLLAPSE

(By Roscoe L. Egger, Jr.)

In his State of the Union address President Reagan made a persuasive case for tax reform to achieve "fairness, simplification and growth." In addition, there is a factor that is of particular concern in my business of tax collecting: if we fail to make our tax code simpler and fairer in the near future, we could jeopardize a great American tradition—voluntary compliance with the tax laws.

Fundamental tax reform is now not a luxury. It is a stark necessity if we are to preserve that tradition of voluntary compliance. The latest figures we have are for 1981, when Americans failed to pay $90 billion in taxes they owed to the government. The size of this "tax gap" has probably grown in the last four years, and it is part of our deficit problem.

Not all tax avoidance can be described as cheating, because—unfortunately—a lot of it is legal. In the last few years there has been a staggering growth in the ways taxpayers have attempted to avoid taxes by investing in so-called shelters. Tax shelters are "exhibit A" when it comes to demonstrating the unfairness of our current tax system. They are also evidence of the lengths to which some taxpayers will go to avoid paying taxes—a sign, perhaps, of how close we are getting to a society in which dodging taxes becomes not only fashionable, but acceptable.

Some recent data on tax returns of selected partnerships is instructive, since partnerships are a common vehicle used for tax shelters. Between 1963 and 1982 the number of taxpayers who claimed partnership losses on their individual returns increased from 412,000 to about 2.1 million. At the same time there has been a significant erosion in the base of the federal income tax—that is, the amount of taxable, reported income—particularly among taxpayers in the higher income groups.

In 1983, partnership losses that were claimed by individual taxpayers sheltered as much as $35 billion dollars of income that would otherwise have been taxed. A sampling of 88 Form 1040 returns gives an illustration of how this works in individual cases.

These taxpayers held interests in certain tax shelters that are not being challenged by the Internal Revenue Service as abusive. The average income of this group was $193,000, and their total income before losses was $17 million. But their taxable income was just $1.9 million, because they deducted losses of $6.4 million from partnerships, and other losses totaling $8.7 million.

Of these 88 returns, 19 with average gross income before losses of more than $240,000 reported total income tax payments of less than $500. Thirty-seven with average gross income before loss of more than $170,000 reported total tax payments of $6,000 or less.

To compare, a typical family of four with income of $45,000 and no tax shelter losses would pay $6,272 in taxes. The current tax system in this country supports this kind of gross unfairness. It reinforces the notion that there are special privileges—but only for the few that somehow find ways to take advantage of the system.

Last year, the IRS commissioned a detailed study of public attitudes to the tax laws. The firm of Yankelovich, Skelly and White interviewed more than 2,000 people, and confirmed that most taxpayers consider the system unfair.

At least 75 percent of taxpayers believe their taxes are too high for what they get, and about two out of three believe they have to pay more than their fair share. A whopping 80 percent of the taxpayers in this country believe the present system benefits the rich and is unfair to the ordinary working man or woman.

Can we afford any longer a system whose very unfairness and complexity literally invites tax cheating? Can we support a system where special interests get a varity of tax breaks but the great majority of the people are squeezed just a bit harder each year to make up the difference?

The answer is obvious. Our survey of 2,000 taxpayers produced strong evidence of increasing public cynicism about taxes. Half the population thinks that 25 percent or more of all Americans cheat on taxes; a quarter of the population thinks more than half of us cheat. A majority said tax cheating is increasing. Nineteen percent of those we surveyed admitted cheating on their own taxes. What is the reason for this cheating? The answer given most often in our survey was that the existing system is unfair.

In our sample 38 percent of those questioned agreed with this statement: "Since a lot of rich people pay no taxes at all, if someone like me underpays a little, it's no big deal."

The reaction to the Treasury Department's new and admirable tax simplification package was a case study in what's wrong with our current system. One after another, the special interests have come forward to attack the Treasury plan.

Why? Because regardless of a general lowering of the rate structure to the benefit of the many, the few that have benefited in the past want their special tax breaks to continue. Never mind that they would receive the overall benefits of the reforms. The few also want to continue to receive their preferential treatments. But the very existence of all those special privileges is exactly why we need to reform the system—not later, but now.

For a quarter century we have been using the tax code to provide incentives for social and economic objectives deemed desirable by Congress. As a result we have a system piled high with patchwork complexities resulting from one so-called reform after another. For example, last year's "reform" effort amounted to more than 1,000 pages of legislative language and was designed to "fix" some of the difficulties of the system.

One of the greatest potential benefits of the Treasury Department's new proposals has gotten too little attention: the prospect of abolishing tax returns for most American taxpayers.

This isn't a pipe dream. About 90 percent of the wage earners in Japan don't have to file tax forms. In Britain, too, most wage earners are usually spared the need to file any forms. We could also develop a return-free program if we had a simplified tax code.

Beginning with the 1987 tax year, we could help 14 million people earning less than $50,000 a year pay their taxes without filing any forms. These taxpayers now file our shortest and simplest tax form, the 1040EZ. By 1990, we believe the program could reach as many as two-thirds of all individual taxpayers. We could determine their tax liabilities by processing information given to the IRS by employers, financial institutions, etc.

Think of the benefits this would bring: By 1990, taxpayers could be spared 97 million hours in return preparation and untold amounts in preparer fees. (Today we are the only country in the world where more than 40 percent of the people pay someone else to do their tax returns.) We would save reams of paper, eliminate much record-keeping, and add millions of smiles to Americans faces.

What's the alternative? Continued reliance on a patchwork tax code built around tax breaks for special purposes and special interests. But we simply cannot rely on tax breaks to drive our economy, to prop up our businesses or to be the deciding factor for personal investment decisions. If tax breaks are going to make the critical difference between whether one industry makes it or does not make it in the marketplace, then something is very wrong with the tax system and undoubtedly with that industry.

Whatever happened to the free-enterprise system? Since when does it require tax subsidies to make each industry function properly? Or must everyone get some sort of tax break? In that case we have chaos. Perhaps we should reserve tax breaks only for those with the more successful lobbyists. That sounds like the present system.

Today we are preoccupied with adjusting personal and corporate lives to fit the tax code. How much tax you pay is not governed any longer by how much money you earn. It reminds me somewhat of a family where one child is clearly the favorite. The child learns early on to expect special treatment, to know that whatever mistakes he or she makes, his or her interests will be protected. Healthy family relationships become impossible, and the reaction over time from less-favored children is deep and abiding resentment.

We have that resentment today. We also have strong public support for fundamental tax reform, as reflected in several recent opinion polls.

Perhaps it seems unusual that the commissioner of Internal Revenue is becoming an advocate for the American taxpayer. Think about that for a moment. We in the business of tax administration see the returns of the rich and the poor, the partnerships, the corporations, the families and the single people. We have seen it all. In the final analysis I am not sure there is any group of people more sensitive to the need for basic change that tax administrators.

Despite protests to the contrary, time is not on our side. The tax system cannot hold on indefinitely while we fumble around with so-called tax reform or, worse yet, continue meaningless debate over details of a system that cries out for reform. Let's work together now for ourselves as well as for future generations of taxpayers.●

HON. SAMUEL S. STRATTON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, February 16, 1985, marked the 67th anniversary of Lithuanian Independence Day. I take this opportunity once again this year to pay tribute to the Lithuanian people everywhere who embrace the ideals of liberty and continue to long for the day when they can again freely and openly exercise their much-cherished cultural and religious freedom as an independent nation. A brief review of the events surrounding the inglorious Soviet conquest of Lithuania underlines how little has changed in the territorial ambitions of the Soviet system, and reminds us how every state bordering the Soviet Union remains in constant jeopardy of invasion and subjugation.

When the Lithuanian people at the close of World War I established their own government and proclaimed their independence, the Bolsheviks invaded the newly created state. They fought the invaders fiercely and bravely until the Lithuanian nation finally emerged triumphant. On July 19, 1920, the Soviet Government signed a treaty of peace which declared that it "voluntarily and forever renounces all sovereign rights possessed by Russia over the Lithuanian people and their territory." During the subsequent 20 years the Lithuanian people were able to savor the peace and freedom they had so valiantly fought for.

But then came the Hitler-Stalin Pact and the partition of Poland between Nazi Germany and the Soviet Union. The Kremlin immediately demanded permission to place 20,000 troops in Lithuania for the duration of the war. These troops, it was emphasized, would be removed at the end of the war. On October 10, 1939, only 2 weeks after the original demand was served on Lithuania, the Soviet Union concentrated its armed forces on the Lithuanian frontier and compelled this brave nation to sign the pact of mutual assistance which the Kremlin placed before it. But at the point of signing, they discovered that the clause stipulating that Soviet bases would be removed after the war had been effaced from the pact on the personal instruction of Stalin.

On July 14, 1940, 8 months later, the Soviet Government demanded that the Lithuanian Minister of Interior and the Director of Security be brought to trial, that a government friendly to the Soviet Union be installed, and that that Red Army be granted free entry into Lithuania. Without even leaving enough time for a reply, the next day on June 15, the Red Army occupied Lithuania and the Government was forced to flee abroad. Then as today, the Soviet regime had carefully laid out its plans and proceeded to move rapidly. They had a quisling regime in the wings ready to be installed and a list of Lithuanian patriots whom they would ruthlessly eliminate.

This scene is sadly familiar to us because the Soviet invasion and occupation of Afghanistan parallels the Soviet invasion of the Baltic States in 1940.

Yet it is extremely heartening to see that the national consciousness of the Lithuanian people is not fading after all of these years as the Soviet ideologues had hoped, but is even more resolute today, especially in the face of ongoing Soviet aggression and imperialism. This spirit is also carried on to the brave people of Afghanistan.

Therefore, we rise today to call once again for individual freedom and self-determination in Lithuania, and to reaffirm our pledge that we in Congress will continue to do so until Lithuania and other captive nations are once again free.●

CHINESE NEW YEAR

HON. BILL GREEN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, as a Member of Congress privileged to represent Chinatown in New York City, I would like to announce that February 20 marks the beginning of the Chinese New Year. The Chinese year 4683 is the year of the ox. The ox is a totem of success, confidence, patience, and generosity. The Chinese New Year is regarded as a time of kindness and good will to all. It is celebrated on the first day of the month of the lunar calendar. The celebration lasts several days, beginning with family observances and ending with gala festivities. The week for the Chinese is also a week of closing the business of the old year, clearing debts, and cleaning house.

I have worked with the Chinese community. I have found my Chinese constituents to be both industrious and independent. The Chinese culture has enriched the lives of all New Yorkers. At this time we honor them and wish them a happy new year.●

EPSTEIN BARR VIRUS: A CONCERN OF US ALL

HON. JOHN EDWARD PORTER

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the House Appropriations Subcommittee on Labor, Health and Human Services and Education, I would like to bring to my colleagues attention two articles, the first from USA Today and the second from the Chicago Tribune, regarding the illness resulting from the Epstein Barr Virus. This is a debilitating illness which may affect many. According to the articles, most of us have been exposed to the virus at some time in our lives. For reasons we do not understand, the body's immune system usually supresses the disease. However, in some cases, the body cannot fight the disease and the result is years of chronic flue symptoms such a fatigue, low grade fever and swollen glands. The articles are informative and I bring them to my colleagues attention for their review.

The articles follow:

[From the Chicago Tribune, Jan. 7, 1985]

HAD THE FLU FOR AGES? VIRUS MAY BE CULPRIT

NEW YORK.—A newly recognized flu-like illness marked by fatigue, fever and swollen glands that can persist for years has been linked to a virus in the herpes family.

The disease is especially troubling because it cannot be detected by routine medical tests, despite its obvious symptoms, according to two reports to be published Monday.

"Most of the individuals we studied had been through many medical evaluations and had come to believe that there was nothing physically wrong with them, that it was all in their heads," said Dr. Stephen Straus, principal author of one of the reports.

"Considering the extent of the patient complaints and disability, the results of routine laboratory tests were strikingly normal," Straus and his colleagues wrote in one of the two reports to appear in the January issue of the Annals of Internal Medicine.

The illness was so severe that "about half the individuals couldn't work or go to school," said Straus, a researcher at the National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases in Bethesda, Md., part of the National Institutes of Health.

Unfortunately, nothing can be done now to alleviate the ailment except to reassure the patients, many of whom have had considerable difficulties with their employers and families as a result of the illness, said Dr. James Jones of the National Jewish Hospital in Denver, principal author of the other report appearing Monday.

The ailment is not caused by the viruses that produce genital herpes or fever blisters, but apparently by another member of the herpes virus family called Epstein-Barr virus.

Epstein-Barr virus is known primarily as the cause of infectious mononucleosis, a disease most common in adolescents and young adults, Straus said.

About 90 percent of Americans have been exposed to the virus by age 30, making it one of the most widespread infectious agents known, Jones said.

The researchers said they do not know how many people are subject to these unusual flare-ups and that they cannot be certain the Epstein-Barr virus is the cause.

"The real problem in publicizing a study of this type is that chronic fatigue is very common," Straus said. "There are many diseases associated with chronic fatigue and a number of psychiatric conditions.

"If an individual has had chronic fatigue with low-grade fevers, mild swollen glands and a sore throat, then he might consider this diagnosis," Straus said.

It is only within the last few years that researchers have begun to suspect that the Epstein-Barr virus might be responsible for illnesses other than infectious mononucleosis.

Jones said he saw his first case about five years ago when a mother brought into his office her 3-year-old child who had been sick with recurrent infections since he was 3 months old.

(Chicago Radio Station, WBBM-AM "Newsradio 78", also carried this story on its news broadcasts during the day on January 7, 1985.)

[From the USA Today, Jan. 7, 1985]

FLULIKE ILLNESS CAN LAST FOR YEARS

(By Sally Ann Stewart)

Medical experts have recently identified an incurable illness that can cause flulike symptoms for years.

The disease—characterized by fever, sore muscles, chronic fatigue and depression—can persist or recur indefinitely, two new studies show.

The reports, published in today's Annals of Internal Medicine, say the illness cannot be diagnosed using routine medical tests.

Although there are no estimates yet as to how many people suffer from the flare-ups, "this is not a trivial matter," says Dr. Stephen Straus, a researcher at the National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases in Bethesda, MD, and author of one of the reports.

An estimated 90 percent of Americans age 30 and older have been exposed to—and may carry—the virus that causes the illness. But in most people, the body's immune system suppresses the disease, Straus says.

But once the virus becomes active, the patient suffers the illness periodically, sometimes for years at a stretch.

"These people have suffered for years, yet there wasn't a diagnosis established for them," he says. "It led a lot of people to think that this was just in their minds."

The illness is caused by the same family of viruses that cause herpes and mononucleosis; it's called chronic active Epstein-Barr virus or chronic mononucleosis.

The most important diagnostic clue is the persistence in the blood of abnormally high levels of antibodies to virus proteins, which can be discovered only through extensive blood tests, Straus says.

The Epstein-Barr virus was identified in the late 1960s as the cause of infectious mononucleosis, a disease marked by fatigue and most common in adolescents and young adults. It's in the same family of viruses that cause chicken pox and oral and gential herpes.

Straus studied 23 young adults who suffered flu symptoms such as chronic fatigue, low-grade fever and swollen glands for at least four years.

In a related study, Dr. James F. Jones of National Jewish Hospital in Denver, studied 44 adults with chornic active Epstein-Barr virus. Key findings:

About 60 percent suffered depression.

About 60 percent experienced difficulty with thinking or completing school and work responsibilities.

"It's like having the aftermath of the flu all the time," Jones says.●

PEACE IN NORTHERN IRELAND

HON. ROBERT A. ROE

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mr. ROE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to join my colleagues in officially welcoming Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher of Great Britain to our Chamber.

She is indeed a most distinguished world leader and it is a high honor to have her address us here today. Great Britain is, of course, our closest ally in the world today. Historically and traditionally, we share a common heritage, which is underlined by a strong belief in democracy and the right of people the world over to live in freedom and peace.

It is because of that shared belief in the equality of man that I rise today to ask Prime Minister Thatcher do everything in her power to secure a breakthrough in the stalemated efforts to secure a peaceful solution to the violence that has plagued Northern Ireland these many years.

Mr. Speaker, the war that continues to rage in Northern Ireland is the longest standing conflict in the history of modern man. Literally thousands of innocent men, women, and children have lost their lives in this bloody battle that appears to have no end.

Prime Minister Thatcher told us here today of her own wish for a peaceful solution to the situation in Northern Ireland. But if she is true to her words, a most necessary first step must be the removal of all British troops from Irish soil. The British military presence there, is in my opinion, a key inhibiting force to the peace process.

As my colleagues here well know, I have gone on record many times detailing the horrible record of the Royal Ulster Constabulary, the major military force in Northern Ireland, in its treatment of the Irish people. The actions of those soldiers, including the inhumane and indiscriminate use of deadly rubber bullets, represents one of the worst violation of human rights in the world today. The people of Northern Ireland literally flee in fear of their lives at the sight of those soldiers and yet there are those who would try to convince us those British troops are based there on a mission of peace.

It is urgently important that the feelings of hatred and division that have developed over the years in Northern Ireland not be allowed to stand in the way of the drive for peace that we all hope will soon begin in earnest. In the past 15 years, more than 2,000 Irish lives have been lost in the violence that has made Northern Ireland one of the bloodiest battlefields in the world.

If Prime Minister Thatcher takes one message back to Great Britain, let it be that the American people want the British troops out of Northern Ireland now. The British must realize the turmoil in Ireland is an Irish problem that can only be solved by the Irish people.●

HON. BOB EDGAR

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, today we commemorate the 734th anniversary of the birth of the Lithuanian state. As you know, the Lithuanian people are now engaged in a continuing struggle for independence. I commend the gentleman from Illinois for reserving this time today to honor their fight; as a member of the Ad Hoc Congressional Committee on the Baltic States and the Ukraine, I am pleased to join him in this special order.

Today we recognize the valor and indomitable spirit of the Lithuanian people. February 16 marked the 67th anniversary of the founding of the Republic of Lithuania in 1918. As we all know, however, after a brief taste of freedom Lithuania was annexed by the Soviet Union in June 1940. Although Lithuania is no longer free, Lithuanians everywhere still proudly celebrate the date of their independence.

Here in the United States the Lithuanian-American community has made a tremendous contribution to our diverse culture. On this day we join these Americans in honoring the dauntless spirit that is so much a part of their heritage. That spirit helped create a Lithuanian state, and it is a spirit that sustains Lithuanians around the world until their country is able to rejoin the community of free nations.

The courage of the Lithuanian people in the face of tremendous adversity stands as an example to us all. Mr. Speaker, as we stand to promote freedom and human rights around the world, let us be encouraged by the spirit and endurance of the Lithuanian people.●

LITHUANIAN AND ESTONIAN INDEPENDENCE

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, this week we commemorate the 67th anniversary of the Lithuanian and the Estonian proclamations of independence. Once again, our attention is focused on the struggle for freedom against oppression, and the courage of those people who live under Soviet domination.

The Lithuanians declared their independence on February 16, the Estonians on February 24 in 1918. These dates are symbols of hope for Lithuanians and Estonians everywhere, as we reflect upon a time that brought great possibilities for the future for the people of these two lands. Their dreams of independence have never died, and live on in the hope that one day, true freedom will come to the Baltic States.

As a nation committed to freedom, we cannot forget those who live in the hope of true independence. We pray that one day freedom and human rights will be restored to Lithuania and Estonia.

I commend my colleagues who every year arrange for us to speak out against the oppression that exists in the Baltic nations. We all look to the day when we will truly be able to celebrate the anniversaries of Lithuanian and Estonian independence in a joyous, rather than a melancholy tribute to the cherished ideals of freedom and justice everywhere.●

A TRIBUTE TO SENATOR JOE TYDINGS

HON. ROY DYSON

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mr. DYSON. Mr. Speaker, last December the University of Maryland celebrated 10 years of progress. As a public official with a strong and enduring interest in the university's development, I was invited to attend that celebration. Pressing engagements prevented me from being present. However, I am pleased to note that the event was a singular success.

The university has in fact flourished over the past decade. It has emerged as a leading research institution in the natural sciences, economics, and artificial intelligence. This progress is ample justification for last month's banquet, but it is not the only reason for the celebration. For the university's growth did not "just happen." People have brought this development. They have dedicated careers to the university, contributed funds, and imparted a vision of excellence that has guided the university's growth. In this collective effort, no one's vision has been more clear nor a truer guide than that of Senator Joe Tydings, the current chairman of the university's board of regents and a member of the board for the past decade.

The 10th anniversary of Joe's appointment to the board of regents afforded a suitable opportunity for the university—indeed, the State—to express its gratitude and appreciation. Joe, of course, would not accept such a tribute to himself. He requested that the evening celebrate the larger cause that he has championed. And so it did. Last month's tribute was to "Maryland in Motion," signifying the university's unflagging momentum, its push to the forefront of the Nation's educational and research institutions.

But Joe is not one to let a room full of prominent public figures gather without impressing on each one of them how important is their support of the university. That night was a perfect opportunity to continue his campaign on behalf of the university's newest center, the "School for Government and Public Affairs." More than $100,000 was donated for scholarships to the school. These will become known as the Joe Tydings scholarships, and a more fitting tribute would be hard to devise. Joe's accomplishments as regent will benefit students and the State for years to come, as will the Joe Tydings Scholarship Fund.

A good number of supporters and admieres spoke on Joe's behalf that night, and I would like to submit for the RECORD a transcript of the speech delivered by Mr. Roger Mudd of NBC News. It is a witty and revealing testimonial on the role Senator Joe Tydings has played in the growth of the university. I am pleased to submit it for my colleagues' review, and to have this opportunity to congratulate Joe on his many acomplishments as regent.

Welcome to this University of Maryland cocktail party and 9th annual Joe Tydings for Senate Launching Pad dinner.

When the Board of Regents invited me some months ago to speak, little did I know I would get to stand on the very spot in this hotel ballroom occupied only 2 weeks ago by Henry Kissinger. I have never stood on a rug once stood on by Henry Kissinger but already it is having an effect on me.

Because the Joseph Tydings Scholarship Fund at the University of Maryland is just as worthy as the Louis Goldstein Chair of Public Policy at Washington College, I, too, will waive my regular speaking fee of 25,000 dollars.

But unlike the man who made testament to Controller Louis Goldstein 2 weeks ago, I have met the Guest of Honor before. In fact, it was in 1964—20 years ago—when I first got to know Joe Tydings. I was working for CBS at the time and I used to anchor a broadcast called: "Meet Your New Senators."

I requested Joe Tydings as my interview because I had heard so much about him, what a reformer he was, what an exciting new breed of politician he was for Maryland. . . . I mean, exciting in the sense that here was a Maryland Senator who had actually gone to the University of Maryland.

Even though I have lived in Virginia for more than a decade now, both NBC and before that CBS have been aware of my roots in Maryland and my affinity for Maryland and both have seen fit to reward me with assignments to some of Maryland's great stories over the years:

In 1958, I was there when John Marshall Butler and Glenn Beall, Senior, stood on the steps of the Senate to announce they were introducing a constitutional amendment making the Black-Eyed Susan the national flower.

In 1961, during the height of the Cuban Missile Crisis, I was with Tommy D'Alesandro, Junior, when he was sworn in as a member of the Federal Renegotiation Board.

In 1964, I covered Speaker Marvin Mandel at the ribbon-cutting ceremony at the Elicott City By-Pass.

In '66, I was assigned as the main correspondent at the gubernatorial victory party for Carlton Sickles.

I actually flew back to Washington after that assignment. Have you ever flown from Friendship to Washington on Allegheny? A man runs alongside the plane on I-95 . . . holding up a picture of a cloud.

Just 2 weeks ago, I was rushed over to Annapolis to tell the nation about the unique and innovative way that District Judge in Frederick County had found to unclog the crowded court docket.

And just the other day, I was at your great Governor's press conference when he announced he could procrastinate no longer about his future political plans and therefore was appointing a task force to study whether he should reveal his intentions after the General Assembly adjourns next April or wait until it reconvenes in January '86.

So its a great record of assignments and I am grateful to the networks for having me present at Maryland's milestones.

Tonight I stand before you as one of the sons of Maryland who should have gone to the University but did NOT.

The reasons for not going are familar ones, but, I am happy to report, are becoming less and less valid.

My father—I should say OUR father because my older, wiser and more powerful brother John is here this evening—OUR father graduated from Maryland Agricultural College in 1912. Somewhere in the attic are his yearbooks the Reveilles from 1910 and 11 and 12.

Dad was from LaPlata and I can remember pouring over those yearbooks as a child looking at the football pages and the pictures of the Charles County Front Four: Kemp, Duckett, Posey and Mudd.

Dad once told us—and he didn't tell many stories about himself—but he once told us that he was injured for the big game against West Virginia, that his leg was strapped up so he couldn't bend it. Curly Byrd was the coach and West Virginia was punching through the right side of the Maryland line—which was Dad's side. So Curley put Dad in the game . . . He probably said, 'Suck it up, Mudd'. . . and because Dad couldn't move forward neither could West Virginia move him back. So the right side of the line began to hold and MAC beat their great rivals.

That was about as extravagant as Dad ever got in his story telling about College Park. But I suspect he always had a quiet pride about Maryland.

During the 30's he always managed to get us in the car once or twice a month on the pretext of getting ice cream cones at the college diary shop but somehow we wound up taking a very slow drive through the campus as he looked and studied and took note of a new building here or landscaping there. And our father was one of the few Redskins season ticket holders ever to give up his seats at Griffith Stadium so he could follow Maryland's great teams of the 50's.

But when the time came for me to go to college, I went elsewhere. And as we approached the time for our children to go to college, we moved into Virginia. But I suspect that if we were starting over, all that would be different.

The slogan for tonight's dinner is "Maryland in Motion" and indeed the motion and spirit and enthusiasm are unmistakable . . . not only in the state but also across the nation.

To read—as I have in the most cursory way about Maryland's uneven, indifferent and at times bizarre support for higher education over the years is to realize why so many of Maryland's sons and daughters used to go elsewhere to college; why Baltimore itself sometimes pretended there was No College Park; and why the big, bad Baltimore Sun declared the year that the University's enrollment was approaching 5,000 that "college education in America has been overdone."

But those days are done and gone, and I think the Sun knows it, I know Maryland knows it and I believe the nation is coming to know. Clemson sure as hell knows it.

What the University of Maryland has done in this past decade is to give her state and her people what they have deserved and needed but have NOT had—a great public institution that is—at once—a scholarly, research center and a university that contributes to the health, subsistence and comfort of all the state's people.

Let Princeton or Amherst or Hopkins or my alma mater, Washington&Lee, specialize in the uplift of individuals.

Maryland's mission—indeed, Maryland's obligation as a public land-grant school—is to fuse its future with the future of the state it serves.

In Maryland, there is NO "preppy" state university, on the one hand, and NO "cow college" or ag school, on the other . . . as in Virginia or Indiana or Alabama or Colorado or North Dakota.

In Maryland, there is one system where all disciplines co-mingle . . . where the arts and history and philosophy and the law can come to know engineering and husbandry and journalism.

Maryland—in this Decade of Progress—has also developed that special land-grant relationship with the businesses and industries of the state . . . sitting astride, as it does, the nation's highest concentration of highly trained technical, professional and managerial workers in the country—the Baltimore-Washington Corridor.

The Corridor—with more than 400 government, university and corporate labs and think-tanks—now ranks with the Silicon Valley south of San Francisco the Research Triangle in North Carolina, Route One in New Jersey between New Brunswick and Trenton, and Route 28 around Boston.

And soon, if not now, the University of Maryland will be listed along side North Carolina, Texas, California and New York where the fusion of state government and state university has attracted new industry and jobs and economic growth in partnerships that are the pride of their states and the envy of the nation.

Not long ago, the Washington Post—the big, even badder Washington Post, suggested that little University's remarkable progress of the past decade would have been possible without the exertions of Blair Lee and Joe Tydings.

In fact, the Post even hinted that Joe's service as University Regent might have outweighed his performance as a United States Senator.

When I told Joe at lunch the other day that I had been hearing that same thing around the Senate for at least 3 or 4 years, he looked at me for quite a while before he laughed.

Joe doesn't know this but I first laid eyes on him during a football weekend at Washington & Lee in 1949. Some of the Baltimore boys in the fraternity had invited him down and I just assumed he went to Princeton or Hopkins or Virginia.

After all, he was from one of Maryland's fine families and he was the son of a United States Senator. So I just assumed. But, of course, I was wrong. I was wrong that Joe Tydings would ever misplace his loyalties to his home state.

Joe Tydings chose to go to College Park and he chose to go to Maryland Law School and he chose to practice law in Maryland.

And after 6 years in the Senate, after holding tenaciously to beliefs and principles, after refusing to compromise his views on gun control or on the Vietnam War, Maryland turned its back on Joe. But Joe did not and would not turn his back on Maryland.

He stayed in Maryland and stayed in her service as a Regent of his University and he touched the lives of Maryland's young men and women in unique and lasting ways.

Most of us are ambivalent about our lives and purposes. But Joe is not. Joe is steadfast. Joe has never embarrassed his state or his heritage or his alma mater with cheap and devious ventures.

In fact, he has elevated the calling of public service and the definition of volunteer with a seriousness of purpose and a clarity of mission that are beyond Maryland's ability to repay.

It's not that others haven't had similar opportunities to influence and shape and contribute; but it is rare when someone has never failed, never fallen short.

Joe Tydings has never failed. That's why its so easy for us to be here in this ballroom and at this microphone to honor him.

I am now about finished. But if there is anything Joe Tydings hopes you take from this room tonight it is a piece of the pride he feels in his University. There is no greater driving force than pride.

The historian of your University, Dr. George Calcott, believes there are two ingredients requisite for a great university: Morale and Will.

"Morale means an institution's belief in itself," writes Dr. Calcott, "its self-image, its pride. . . It is what parents in Texas and Oklahoma feel when they refuse to consider sending their children to colleges outside the state. . . . The institution that believes it is better than it is, is half-way to being there."

For you to know that you have attended a university that has been educating young people for 175 years, through five generations, through seven wars, six financial panics, four recessions and one Great Depression, to know that each of you is a beneficiary, however remote, of those first lectures in anatomy when John Beale Davidge opened the medical college on November 2, 1807, to know that you are all linked together with about 207,000 other living graduates surely that burden of history will bring you back to your alma mater again and again to guarantee that the University maintains its rightful place among the nation's finest.

And no one has set a finer example for you of what pride and loyalty can do than Joe Tydings.●

NORTHERN IRELAND SITUATION

HON. ROBERT J. MRAZEK

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mr. MRAZEK. Mr. Speaker, earlier today, Mrs. Margaret Thatcher addressed a joint session of Congress. Many of her statements were met by almost unanimous approval by those of us assembled here. Yet, she also raised several issues that merit our concern.

While justifiably condemning those in the United States who provide financial support for violence in Northern Ireland, Mrs. Thatcher failed to condemn the violence perpetrated by those opposed to independence for Northern Ireland.

Mrs. Thatcher fails to realize that there are many in this body, and millions throughout this Nation who share a grave concern about the current situation in Northern Ireland. Further, we are deeply distressed by her policy of standing behind military force, rubber bullets, and informers.

It is now long past time for the Thatcher government as well as the Reagan administration to embrace a peace process that truly holds out the hope for a Camp David type accord. President Carter was able to use Camp David to bring together the warring factions in the Middle East. I believe President Reagan owes the people of this Nation and of Northern Ireland, no less.●

THE DESIGNATION OF THE CLEVELAND CLINIC FOUNDATION AS A NATIONAL AND REGIONAL REFERRAL CENTER

HON. LOUIS STOKES

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to call to the attention of my colleagues that the Cleveland Clinic Foundation, one of our Nation's outstanding health care resources, has been approved by the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, Health Care Financing Administration as meeting the requirements established for national and regional referral centers. This standing was created with the enactment of Public Law 98-21, the Social Security Act amendments, which established the Medicare prospective payment system for hospitals.

The purpose of this designation for national and regional referral centers is to ensure that our Nation maintains its position at the leading edge of technological innovation in the advancement of clinical medicine. More importantly, this status recognizes the special needs of facilities furnishing extraordinary medical and surgical care to the sickest and most resource intensive patients from diverse geographical origins. Both purposes are vital to our Nation as we move into an era of significant health care cost containment.

The Cleveland Clinic Foundation which is located in the 21st Congressional District of Ohio, has a distinguished 64-year history of providing the highest quality care to patients throughout its region, our Nation and around the world. The foundation has a singular history in the development and application of new technology and procedures for improving patient care.

Major advances in medical science have been accomplished at the Cleveland Clinic Foundation. These include: Pioneering work in kidney transplantation, kidney revascularization and the artificial kidney; the implementation of new techniques in chemotherapy and the use of mixed beam therapy for cancer patients and; the design and refinement of artifical organs including assist devices for the heart, liver and pancreas and the totally artifical heart. However, these are just a few examples of the amazing medical and technological advances achieved by the foundation.

Mr. Speaker, as you can see from this description, the Cleveland Clinic Foundation truly represents a national resource. The care that the foundation provides serves not only Medicare but all patients, and the advances achieved here generally improve the quality of health care throughout the country. I take this time to commend the Health Care Financing Administration for the development of criteria which define this exemplary status and the Cleveland Clinic Foundation for the affirmation of its role as one of the leading health care institutions in the world.●

EDWARD H. MAHALAK HONORED

HON. WILLIAM D. FORD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, many years of distinguished and unparalled public service on the part of former Michigan State Representative Edward H. Mahalak are being commemorated by his family, friends, and associates at a testimonial dinner on February 23. Representative Mahalak has been a most effective and diligent representative of his constituents in the Michigan Legislature. While coming from an area with a rich diversity of interests and pursuits, Ed Mahalak had a special talent and ability to coalesce these points of view into a sound and systematic legislative program which served both his constituents and the people of Michigan with distinction.

He also is a worthy personality because of his other civic pursuits which are highlighted by his participation in a Michigan Civil War Regiment where he has participated in a number of reenactments and commemorations of Michigan's important role in the Civil War. I know all of us join in congratulating Ed on his peerless service to the public good and wish him success and happiness in the years ahead.●

REAGAN'S 1986 BUDGET

HON. WILLIAM O. LIPINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mr. LIPINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak against many of the components of President Reagan's 1986 budget which I find unacceptable or at the very least incongruent.

One of the major weaknesses of the Reagan plan as I see it is that it fails miserably to cut Government spending. The budget cuts domestic spending by $30 billion while at the same time it increases military spending by $30 billion.

The money that currently goes to the cities for such things as mass transit and development block grants will now be funneled to an already massive defense budget. When the new budget was unveiled, it proved to be nothing more than a continuation of the same policies that the President has been advocating since he took office 4 years ago. It pursues a rapid military buildup, provides for no new revenue increases and continues to seek deficit reductions solely through cuts in the same domestic spending programs that have been targeted for cuts throughout the Reagan administration.

The proposed elimination of general revenue sharing, urban development action grants, and sharp cutbacks in community development block grants, and rural and urban water and sewer grants, threatens the economic existence of our major smokestack cities and their surrounding communities. Cities have taken deep cuts in many of their community improvement programs while other programs in the budget have grown substantially. City administrations will now be forced to bear a disproportionate part of the burden of deficit reduction, along with a tax reform proposal which will significantly reduce their capacity to meet these new burdens.

Nevertheless, the unwillingness of the present administration to place a freeze on defense spending has meant that cuts in city and State programs will have to be more drastic in order to meet the $50 billion deficit reduction target despite the fact that these local programs make up a relatively small portion of the Federal budget.

During the first term of the Reagan administration, many of our major cities had to tighten their fiscal belts by raising taxes and user fees, cutting services and laying off employees, thus, they were able to balance their budgets during a time of severe recession and sharp Federal cutbacks. The budgetary responsibilities local administrations undertook during those first 4 years were based upon the promise that the growing needs of the homeless, unemployed, hungry, untrained, and uneducated would be addressed this year. Apparently, proposals now emanating from the administration seem to suggest that since State and local officials can manage their respective budgets so well, they can continue to do so but without Federal assistance.

Unfortunately, this assault on our major cities and their taxpayers will continue with other major domestic spending cuts being proposed under President Reagan's budget plan in many areas important to them.

MASS TRANSIT

The administration proposes to cut Federal assistance for mass transit by two-thirds to $1.6 billion in 1986. Under the President's budget, discretionary capital grants and operating assistance would be eliminated and the minimum local match on Federal mass transit aid would be increased from 20 percent to 30 percent. Invariably, this will jeopardize many community road improvement projects due to the financial constraints less solvent, municipalities will be placed under in trying to meet their funding requirements by an additional 10 percent.

SMALL BUSINESS ADMINISTRATION

In this area, the administration proposes to terminate the SBA's loan programs and transfer other programs to the Commerce Department. The heart and soul of many of our cities' neighborhoods is made up largely or in part by local businessmen. Their economic prowess and ability to keep a particular community thriving has been contingent upon federally funded incentive programs. The President's plan to eliminate these loan programs will ultimately stifle community growth and development and place many local merchants on the rolls of unemployment.

HOUSING PROGRAMS

The administration is proposing a 2-year moratorium on direct loan obligations on housing for the elderly and handicapped. The entire program will be cut by 97 percent this fiscal year.

SPECIAL SUPPLEMENTAL FOOD PROGRAMS

Proposed cutbacks in this program, which provides nutritious food supplements to low-income young children and pregnant women, could result in assistance to 100,000 fewer people next year.

ELEMENTARY, SECONDARY AND VOCATIONAL EDUCATION

In the area of education, the Reagan budget calls for holding appropriations at this year's level for handicapped, vocational, and adult education programs while limiting guaranteed student loans. In addition, the President calls for eliminating two programs for needy students—the supplemental education opportunity grant, and State student incentive grant programs—and putting an end to new Federal contributions to the Direct Student Loan Program. Unfortunately, these changes will put higher education out of reach for many poor and middle class families.

LOW-INCOME WEATHRIZATION

The administration proposes to eliminate programs to help low-income families weatherize their homes, and to help schools and hospitals weatherize their facilities.

MEDICARE

The President proposes to reduce Medicare spending by a total of $18.7 billion over the next 3 years. Major cuts in this area will include a 1-year freeze on payment rates to hospitals and a 1-year extension of the present freeze on payments to physicians. In addition, the Reagan administration is proposing to raise the premiums that retirees pay for coverage under that portion of Medicare which pays doctor bills. Unfortunately, this course of action will further burden the financial plight of the elderly across this country.

MEDICAID

The administration is seeking to limit the amount of Federal payments allocated to State governments to operate Medicaid programs. These limits are expected to reduce payments approximately $6.5 billion below the amounts needed to continue current services over the next 3 years.

VETERANS' HEALTH CARE

The budget plan proposes to establish a means test for free Veterans' Administration hospital and medical care. Under current law, veterans over 65 are entitled to free medical care if hospital space is available. The proposed change would require those veterans over 65 who have no service-connected disabilities to prove a financial need in order to qualify for free VA hospital and medical care. The President's proposals are designed to ensure that approximately 11 million World War II veterans, who will be turning 65 in the next few years, will not be eligible for care in the VA hospital system.

These domestic cuts can be best put in perspective if we look at the overall distribution of Federal spending under Reagan's budget plan. The budget totals $973.7 billion and out of that figure, 30 percent or approximately $324 billion goes to military programs, while domestic programs, essential to our cities' existence, receive token consideration. For example, only 7 percent of the budget goes to Medicare, 5 percent for assisting the poor, 4 percent to health programs, 3 percent to transportation, 3 percent for veterans' benefits and services, 1½ percent for training and social services and 1 percent for community development.

The scenario of blatant economic inequities under the Reagan budget plan can also be highlighted on a State level where, for example, the Federal Government returns to Illinois 75 cents for every dollar State taxpayers pay into the U.S. Treasury, the remaining 25 cents is channeled to other States. At the other end of the scale, California gets back $1.08 for every dollar it puts in, and Hawaii gets $1.39, while the highest ratio can be found in the city of Washington, DC, which receives $4.80 for every dollar it provides in taxes.

An attempt must be made to target more tax moneys to States like Illinois. Senator ALAN DIXON'S 90 percent bill tried to address this issue. His legislation proposed that Federal funds for programs and procurement going to a particular State must equal at last 90 percent of what that State provides in tax dollars. If the Government falls short of this figure in 1 year, it would compensate the State by increasing its funds for programs and procurement the following year.

Although this bill never saw the light of day, it espoused a new principle: That a State is entitled to a specific percentage of the tax money it provides to the Treasury.

In short, all of the drastic domestic spending cuts in the new Reagan budget really do nothing to help meet the President's goal of bringing down Federal spending. Rather, these cuts, which go solely to pay for military budget increases, ultimately, endanger the economic survival of many major cities across America.●

CARIBBEAN/CENTRAL AMERICAN HIGHER EDUCATION FELLOWSHIP PROGRAM

HON. MERVYN M. DYMALLY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mr. DYMALLY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to acquaint my colleagues with a matter of vital significance to the development of education in the Western Hemisphere. For the past several years, the university system throughout Central America has fallen prey to the unsettling political conditions. In some Central American countries, professors and students have been killed, while classrooms have been ransacked and campus buildings destroyed. In other Central American nations, the university survives without violence, but slowly strangles from the lack of an adequate budget. In all cases, the situation is dramatic, whereby many predict the total collapse of the Central American university system within a few years. The Caribbean, on the other hand, struggles with the problems of modern university development; a more luxurious difficulty perhaps than Central America, but a critical one that requires delicate solutions at this early stage.

In response to this situation, I am proposing the creation of a Higher Education Fellowship for Caribbean and Central American academics, permitting these individuals to study university management and faculty development courses at several U.S. universities. Following this program, the fellowship participants would share their educational experiences with their colleagues at a special institute at the University of the West Indies. Once this is accomplished, they will return to their respective nations and implement the programs and policies that they have learned.

Some may say that this is a small step in the face of large problems. I believe that it is a first essential step to reform and development, symbolizing the cooperative spirit of United States-Caribbean relations, and placing the responsibility of doing something about the higher education situation in the Caribbean and Central America on the fellowship participants themselves. Given the significance of higher education in modern society, this fellowship should be regarded as valid as any strategic or economic initiative for this important part of the world.●

HON. MARTY RUSSO

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 19, 1985

● Mr. RUSSO. Mr. Speaker, on February 16, 1985, about 1 million people of Lithuanian descent residing in the United States commemorated the 67th anniversary of the Declaration of Lithuanian Independence. This day marked a remembrance of the courage and determination of the Lithuanian people in establishing peace and freedom in their nation. I am proud to join my colleagues in commemorating this day and hope that Lithuania will again be able to enjoy the rights they lost through the illegal incorporation of their country into the Soviet Union.

The peace and freedom Lithuania had gained after years of struggle for independence had been replaced by conflict and repression with the takeover of the country by the Soviet Union. During World War II, the Soviet Union invaded Lithuania and annexed the nation as one of its republics. This illegal acquisition has been a grave injustice to the people of Lithuania. It is our responsibility as members of a free society to support any nation whose people continuously strive to gain the right to govern themselves and retain their heritage and sovereignty.

The cultural, religious, economic, and political contributions Lithuania had made during their short-lived independence were manyfold. However, the eventual takeover and recent efforts by the Soviet Union to disrupt any roots of nationalism have delayed the advancements this country can make. Although Lithuania's progress has been curtailed, it's spirit has not been dampened. It is our hope that this spirit will continue to grow and comfort them in their struggle to regain freedom.

It is an honor to be associated with remarks commemorating the brave Lithuanian people and I welcome the opportunity to express my hope and confidence in the efforts of the people of Lithuania. These courageous people have seen enough repression and control, and experienced enough hardship and injustice to know that they deserve the right of freedom. Let us join together today to proclaim our support for the people of Lithuania who strive to attain the greatness of a free society.●

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTIONS IN MARYLAND

HON. BEVERLY B. BYRON

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mrs. BYRON. Mr. Speaker, John Willis' effort in researching and writing his book, "Presidential Elections in Maryland" is to be commended. It is sure to be a valuable tool and resource from both a historical viewpoint and a practical point of view.

For those wishing to research the election process in the State of Maryland, the Willis book is an interesting resource. And for those organizing a political campaign this book provides useful data on the widely varied forces within the State.●

A BILL TO EXPAND THE PETRIFIED FOREST NATIONAL PARK

HON. MORRIS K. UDALL

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, today I have introduced legislation to expand the Petrified Forest National Park in Arizona. Although the expansion of the park is small in size—only about 40 acres—it is a highly significant archeological addition to the park. Furthermore, the addition involves property recently purchased by the Archeological Conservancy which most generously proposes to donate it to the park.

While known to the public primarily for its fascinating natural features, Petrified Forest National Park is an archeological gold mine. There are more than 300 recorded archeological sites within its boundaries dating from early archaic times to the 19th century. The property to be included in the park is known as site 236 and is the most significant nearby archeological site not now in the park.

Site 236 consists of a major Anasazi village dating from about the year 900 to 1100 A.D. There is a large circular depression adjacent to the village which is believed to be either a dance circle or a great kiva, either of which would be unique to the area and of great scientific importance. Broken pottery and other artifacts are in abundant supply. One of the most exciting aspects of this site is that its archeological aspects have not been extensively developed or explored. The knowledge it will yield undoubtedly will add greatly to our understanding of the cultural history of the region and to visitor interpretation of the park.

The site has just been purchased for $10,000 by the Archeological Conservancy which is a national organization based in Santa Fe, NM, and dedicated to the acquisition and preservation of the Nation's most important archeological sites. The property is currently part of a subdivision and was acquired from the original purchasers. Public acquisition of the land will involve no termination of other uses, such as grazing, at this time. Donation to the Park Service, however, will help protect the site from looters and other vandals who, unfortunately, are rather active in the area.

I know of no opposition to acceptance of this donation. I also would like to express my admiration of the work of the Archeological Conservancy and my personal gratitude for their most generous gift to the public.●

AFL-CIO EXECUTIVE COUNCIL SPEAKS OUT AGAINST APARTHEID

HON. WALTER E. FAUNTROY

OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mr. FAUNTROY. Mr. Speaker, as we in the Congress seek to develop a consensus around a legislative initiative aimed at dealing with the system of apartheid in South Africa, a recent statement by the executive council of the AFL-CIO may be of interest.

The statement was crafted and presented during the executive council's meeting in Bal Harbour, FL, February 19, 1985.

The statement follows:

STATEMENT BY THE AFL-CIO EXECUTIVE COUNCIL ON SOUTH AFRICA

Apartheid is a moral affront to civilized humanity. But despite the condemnations of an outraged world opinion, the South African government continues to resist the demands of its black citizens for an end to institutionalized racism and for full and equal participation in the political life of the nation.

The AFL-CIO is committed to cooperation with those forces in South Africa that seek an end to apartheid through peaceful, democratic means. The alternative is a violent revolutionary upheaval that would bring immeasurable suffering to all elements of South African society.

We appreciate the contributions of the many individuals who, because of their outspoken opposition to apartheid, have been driven into exile or prison. But it is to those inside South Africa, fighting on the front lines, that we look for leadership in the eradication of apartheid, which cannot be sustained if peace and stability are to be achieved in Southern Africa.

We have been especially encouraged by the emergence in recent years of the black trade union movement in South Africa. Freedom of association is the foundation of democratic institution-building and offers the most promising hope for peaceful social change.

The AFL-CIO will, therefore, continue to respond to requests for assistance through its Program of Action in Support of Black Trade Unions in South Africa and through the ongoing programs of the African-American Labor Center.

Our assistance will be guided by the same principle that has governed our aid to the workers of Poland, El Salvador and every other country where our help has been requested—namely, that we will respond to the expressed needs and wishes of our brothers and sisters who are under the gun.

The AFL-CIO calls upon the other free labor movements of the world—and especially those in the industrialized nations that trade with South Africa—to urge their governments to press South Africa for an end to the Preventive Detention laws that are used to harass, intimidate and imprison labor leaders and others without trial. These laws, in effect, nullify much of whatever benefit accrued from previous legislation recognizing the trade union rights of black workers.

The AFL-CIO will continue to contribute to the multilateral program of assistance to black trade unions directed by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions and to participate in the union-to-union programs of the International Trade Secretariats.

In addition, we call upon the International Labor Organization to investigate the appalling conditions of black labor in South Africa including the forced removal of black workers in Bantustans. Toward this end, the ILO should consider setting up a commission of inquiry comparable to the commissions it established in the cases of Poland, Chile and other countries.

The ILO should also consider creating documentation and research machinery to monitor the conduct of all corporations operating in South Africa, with regard to their recognition of black trade union rights, the training and upgrading of black workers, and their observance of universal labor standards.

Companies that fail in their social responsibilities should be targeted for disinvestment, boycotts, adverse publicity campaigns and other appropriate measures. In considering whether and when to apply such measures, the AFL-CIO will be guided by the wishes of the black trade union movement of South Africa.

The Reagan Administration's policy of "constructive engagement" has not produced significant results. Indeed, Pretoria apparently views its good relations with the Administration as a license to delay indefinitely the dismantling of the odious apartheid system. But apartheid cannot be maintained indefinitely. The real issue is whether it will be abolished peacefully or violently. The longer South Africa resists peaceful change, the more it invites the bloody alternative.●

JUDGE ROBERT FALASCO RETIRES

HON. TONY COELHO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mr. COELHO. Mr. Speaker, recently, Judge Robert Falasco retired from the Merced County, CA, Superior Court after a long career of dedicated service to his community.

Judge Falasco received his law degree from the University of Santa Clara in 1951, and served as Merced County deputy district attorney after 2 years in private practice. In 1959 he was appointed a justice court judge, and held that position until Merced County converted to the municipal court system in 1977. He served as a municipal court judge until being appointed to the superior court in 1982. Aside from his judicial responsibilities, Judge Falasco has also served on the Los Banos Elementary School District Board of Trustees and the Merced County Fair Board.

On behalf of the people of Merced County, I would like to commend Robert Falasco for the outstanding job he has done on the Merced County Superior Court, and for his fine record of service to our community. His knowledge, compassion, and fairness certainly will be difficult to replace.●

ESTONIA'S INDEPENDENCE

HON. ELDON RUDD

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, Sunday, February 24, marks the 67th anniversary of the proclamation of Estonian independence.

Situated on the eastern shore of the Baltic Sea, Estonia's strategic location invited a succession of foreign invasions throughout that country's long history. However, the years of invasions and foreign domination could not crush the strong national spirit and pride of the Estonian people. Estonians fought a successful war of independence against the invading Bolshevik Russians at the end of World War I, and subsequently enjoyed a period of cultural progress, agricultural and economic development.

But Estonians were only able to hold onto their hard-won independence for a short time before Russian troops, entered their country in 1940, set up a new government and illegally annexed the country as one of the republics of the Soviet Union.

They have since suffered grave abuses of their human rights at the hands of Soviet oppressors. By mid-1941, some 60,000 Estonians, more than 5 percent of the population, were either tortured or killed, or sent to concentration camps where they later perished. They have suffered russification of their country in an attempt to deny them their very identity as a nation.

Despite the long years of hardship and oppression Estonians have never given up hope that one day they will again be free. We join them today in marking the anniversary of Estonian independence and focusing attention on the reprehensible occupation of this proud nation by the Soviet Union. The United States has never, nor will it ever recognize Soviet claim to Estonia. Nor will we ever allow the plight of our brothers and sisters in Estonia to be forgotten.●

A TRIBUTE TO FRITZ ODER

HON. NORMAN Y. MINETA

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mr. MINETA. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a moment to honor a gentleman, Dr. Fritz Oder, who for the past 30 years has been a major participant in America's space programs. We honor him today on the occasion of his retirement from Lockheed Missiles and Space Co. and convey to him our appreciation and best wishes.

In the early 1950's, Fritz served as Technical Director of the Air Force's Geophysical Research Laboratories. Using instrumented V-2 and Aerobee rocket probes, Fritz greatly enhanced our understanding of the environment we would ultimately find in space. He used both theoretical underpinnings and subsequent scientific verification to reveal atmospheric conditions in space, thereby paving the way for the design of future space craft and their payloads.

Later as an Air Force colonel and program director of the first major Air Force space program, Fritz led a cooperative Government and industry team responsible for the design, development, and flight operations of the 117L Advanced Reconnaissance System Program. Our national security capability owes much of its current sophistication to the work originally performed by Fritz and his team.

When next he moved on to become assistant director of research and engineering at Kodak's Apparatus and Optical Division, he conceived and directed the design, the development, and the tests as well as the actual flight of the Lunar Orbiter photographic equipment. The data generated by this work was essential in the selection of lunar landing sites. Without the collection and analysis of such information, there would have been no Apollo missions and certainly none of the thrill and excitement generated by the first landing on the moon by American astronauts.

Since 1966, Fritz has been a member of Lockheed's senior management team. He has been responsible for the successful development of a family of extremely complex and sophisticated space systems incorporating absolute state of the art technology. As a result, this nation maintains a leadership role in remote sensing capability from space.

Throughout his career, Fritz has displayed exceptional technical insight in dealing with unusually complex engineering problems. He has ventured into areas lacking any precedent or workable body of knowledge and used his imagination, his innovative thinking and his expertise to produce for us a whole new range of possibilities in the field of astronautics. Without Fritz's contribution's, I doubt this Nation would enjoy such preeminence in space exploration.

And, through it all, Fritz has remained one of the kindest and most thoughtful of men. His many charitable contributions and his participation in professional and civic organizations has indeed rounded out a most distinguished career. Certainly, he is a model of the many dimensions a career in engineering can offer someone of his prodigious energy.

Mr. Speaker, I trust that you and all of our colleagues in the House of Representatives will join me in wishing Fritz Oder all the best and salute him for his many accomplishments which have served this Nation so well. Thank you.●

HUNGER IS NOT A STATISTIC

HON. BYRON L. DORGAN

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mr. DORGAN. Mr. Speaker, when reckoning the continental famine in Africa, we often hear very sobering statistics. Over 100,000 people died from hunger and related causes in Mozambique in only 1 year. In Ethiopia, 7.7 million are directly affected by drought and, of these, 2.5 million presently face starvation.

But behind each of these numbers is a human being—many of them women and children. One recent article about an Ethiopian woman named Hawa Ali shows in grim detail how famine has devastated her life and those of her family.

I would like to insert this article to underscore why we need to redouble our emergency food and disaster relief efforts in Ethiopia and across Africa. We have the power to stop widespread famine—if only we immediately pass supplemental legislation to speed food, medicine, and relief to millions of desperate Africans.

The February 14, 1985 article from the Washington Post follows:

[From the Washington Post, Feb. 14, 1985]

ETHIOPIAN MOTHER RECOUNTS TRAGEDY FAMINE INFLICTED ON HER FAMILY

WE HAD EVERYTHING BEFORE RAINS STOPPED

(By Michelle Faul)

BATI, Ethiopia.—Hawa Ali smiled wistfully as she remembered the last good year—before her world collapsed in Ethiopia's devastating famine.

There were memories of a Moslem holiday when she spent two weeks preparing delicacies, of family and friends feasting on roasted goat, of the silk-embroidered white dress given her by a loving husband, of new clothes, too, for the children.

That was five years ago, just before the rains stopped, bringing drought, famine and death to Ethiopia as much of the rest of Africa. There has been no celebration since and, in the past year, only calamity and sorrow.

Hawa's husband left her last August. Four of her six children have died. The mother-in-law she had grown fond of walked out of their wood-and-mud hut one day without explanation and never returned.

The family's trials were part of what peasants at Hawa's lowland village of Kebbele, in the Galla district of Ethiopia's Welo Province, called ye elketz emen—the era of death.

"My husband didn't leave me because he didn't love me," she said proudly, speaking in Amharic through an interpreter. There was a glint of challenge in her gentle brown eyes.

"He said he couldn't just sit and watch me withering, the children crying from hunger, when he could do nothing. He went to find a job. Maybe he is in Assab, maybe he went to Djibouti. Maybe he is dead."

Assab is Ethiopia's biggest port, on the Red Sea. Djibouti is a neighboring country.

Hawa, in her late twenties, and her husband, Hussein Yusuf, had a "happy, fulfilled" life until the rains stopped.

Hawa was considered the belle of Kebbele—a tall, lithe girl with a cloud of silky, black shoulder-length hair. According to Moslem custom, her parents arranged a marriage soon after her 15th birthday to Hussein. He was a man as handsome as she was beautiful and a prosperous and sought-after bachelor in the district of peasant farmers.

"It was a good marriage," said Hawa. "My husband was not like other men in the village who went out drinking and had other women and came home to beat the wives. He worked hard in the fields and he was always very gentle and kind to me."

Hawa would milk their 36 cows, great wealth by Ethiopian peasant standards. Hussein would till the land with their six oxen. Together they would weed the fields of barley, sorghum and the staple grain, tef. Their oldest son, Muhammed, would tend the 55 goats and 30 sheep as they grazed.

At home their daughter Aminat would care for the younger children, and help her mother clean the hut, grind grain and prepare meals.

"We had milk, butter, everything," said Hawa. "Every 10 or 15 days my husband would slaughter a goat, so there was always meat."

Then the drought came. The last three years were the worst.

"Now it's all gone," said Hawa. "First we ate all the grain, even the seeds stored underground for planting in the new season. Then we sold and slaughtered all the animals. The last pair of oxen went for only 80 birr (about $40). Before, we could sell a fattened bull for 700 birr (about $350).

When there was no money left to buy food Hawa sold her clothes and then her dowry: amber beads and antique silver bracelets and anklets called "albo."

When the money ran out one day last September, Hussein's mother ran away, a month after Hawa's husband disappeared.

"She didn't even say she was going. She just went. But I know she did not want to be a burden for the food which wasn't even enough for the children," Hawa explained.

"The drought made the rich and poor equal," she said. "But it was the rich peasants who were more affected. They were the first to die, the first to abandon the village. They didn't have the strength for hardship of the poor."

Hawa rubbed a straw of grass in her fingers and covered half her face with a black net veil as she described her struggle to get food for the children.

"I went out every day to cut grass or cut wood to sell in town. Then I would buy a small tin of grain for the children. That's all there was—some grain.

"I walked for miles, collecting and chopping firewood and grass, then carrying it on my back to sell. When I came home it was hard to even wake the children to eat. They said they just slept all day, they were so weak."

But Hawa was pregnant. As she got larger, carrying heavy loads became more and more difficult.

"At last I knew I could do no more," said Hawa, whose child is due in about three weeks. "I heard there was food in Bati, so I came here."

Bati is the site of one of the more than 200 relief centers set up to cope with the famine, currently affecting an estimated 9 million of Ethiopia's 42 million people.

The town is usually a day's walk from Hawa's village. But it took her, along with her three sons and three daughters, three full days to get here because they were so weakened by hunger. She waited too long. Despite intensive, nutrious feeding at Bati's tented camp, Muhammed died after 15 days. He was about 12 years old. He was followed over the next three weeks by the baby of the family, a daughter called Lubaba, about 3, the second-youngest girl, Kaditcha, about 5, and then Aminat, about 11.

Hawa could not continue with the interview. A tear dropped to her cheek. The interpreter also fell silent and walked out of the tent to wipe his eyes.

"That's why I shaved my head," Hawa finally went on. She pulled her veil away from her head to reveal short sprouts of black hair. "It was for the sorrow of my children. . . ." My husband loved my long hair.

Hawa pulled onto her lap her remaining two children, Abdu and Ahmet, who appeared to be about 10 and 6. The boys, she complained, will not go out and play with stones and tin cans, toys for other youngsters at Bati.

They watched their mother listlessly as she stroked Ahmet's skinny legs. He scratched open some sores on his head but stubbornly clung to the dirty blanket his mother had wrapped around her hips as a skirt.

What now?

"Now I sit around the tent all day," she said. "Four of the other women here are from my district. We talk of the good days and a lot about these bad days and what they have done to our families."

About 40 men, women and children live in the tent, but Hawa said they make more room for her "because of my big stomach."

Asked what she did all day, Hawa waved her hands indignantly.

"What do you expect me to do? There is nothing to do. If I was at home, pregnant like this, in our custom my husband would care for me, buy me pretty things. He wouldn't allow me to work. I would have to rest for 40 days because of the baby.

"Now the little ones fetch the water for cooking. They bring the firewood. I cook—I have no daughters left, no Aminat to help me.

"Once the food rations for the day have been distributed, there is nothing to do but talk sometimes and hit at the flies. That is the worst thing—nothing to do."

Hawa straightened her back, indicating the interview was over.

"But now I have to be strong for the little one—this child that is kicking in my belly is a sign of happiness for me because I will know motherhood again.

"Perhaps the rains will come and we will go back to the village. Maybe my husband will find me again and see his new child," she added. "It's all with Allah."●

THE FOLGER THEATER

HON. THOMAS J. DOWNEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mr. DOWNEY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I recently received the following letter from the students and professor of a class in Shakespearan literature at Millersville University in Pennsylvania in response to my efforts to assist the Folger Theater in resolving its current financial crisis. The letter eloquently expresses the invaluable mission of the theater as "an unparalled resource" serving thousands of persons from all parts of the country who visit our Nation's capital each year.

MILLERSVILLE UNIVERSITY,
February 13, 1985.

Congressman THOMAS J. DOWNEY,
House of Representatives,
Washington, DC.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN DOWNEY: What follows is not a schoolchild-write-to-your-Congressman exercise, quaint and not to be taken seriously, It is, instead, a strongly expressed opinion of voting taxpayers enrolled in a university course on Shakespeare.

Millersville is one of the Pennsylvania's state-owned universities. It lies two hours away from Washington by car. Institutions in Washington, such as the Folger Theater, are resources important to instruction for this university. The Folger Theater's 1984-5 season has material concern for English 343: Shakespeare.

The Folger Theater is also of material concern for these students and to me as well. We were all dismayed at the prospect of its closing and somewhat heartened by your suggestion that the Folger Library not receive federal funds if the theater were not to continue.[1] My English 343 students strongly subscribe to the idea that this very special resource, a gem for the nation's capital, be kept open to serve and to educate the public in the spirit of Shakespeare, who was not a research scholar or even a University Wit like Marlowe, but an actor, playwright, and householder in his own theater company. His plays were the thing for masses of Londoners as well as for the court and their guests. They were not mines of material available exclusively for seminars at Oxford and Cambridge.

We realize that $350,000 is very little against trillions for defense. We also realize that in the jockeying for funds, everyone who makes requests does so from his/her own set of values, vested interests, and priorities. We are obviously no exception. Further, that $350,000 comes from our money, and we have not only the right, but the duty to say how we think it should be spent. But we believe that keeping the Folger Theater operating is of utmost importance to our ongoing national and regional cultural health, both for now and for the future.

Although we recognize the value of scholarship and have benefited from it, we have benefited from the work of scholars from many eras and from a number of nationalities, not only those who have worked for or briefly at the Folger.

Further, we recognize the fact that the Folger productions have certainly made use of Shakespearean scholarship, not exclusively that conducted at the Folger Library, as valuable as its resources are. Through these productions, the public has benefited from the work of the specialists. The fact that the Folger has such a unique facility in its well-established, very effective theater program over the years makes it a valuable resource. Yet, these productions have not existed for specialists only; they have been, in the spirit of Shakespeare, for the public. However, while scholarship does not supplant the purpose of performing drama.

Therefore, we strongly support your position that:

1. The Folger Theater should continue since it is an unparalleled resource for the nation, for the capital, and for the 60,000 people from all over the country whom it serves each year.

2. The Folger Library should receive no federal funds if it should allow the Folger Theater to close since the taxpayers at large would not benefit widely from the expenditures that the Library now deems necessary to sustain research specialists.

We would urge further: That the Folger Theater should be regarded as part of the valuable work of the Folger Library with a special mission to the country—to supply drama live—for the public in the spirit of the man to whom the Folger Library owes its existence and part of its name: William Shakespeare.

Thank you for your attention. We should appreciate your acknowledging the receipt of this letter.

Sincerely,

DR. M.P.A. SHEAFFER
(And 18 others).●

END THE STRIFE IN NORTHERN IRELAND

HON. NORMAN F. LENT

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mr. LENT. Mr. Speaker, I join my colleagues in Congress in expressing my grave concern over events in Northern Ireland. As a member of the Ad Hoc Committee on Irish Affairs since its inception 6 years ago and as one who has spoken out consistenly against human rights violations around the world, I am well acquainted with the injustice and violent political strife which have become epidemic in that country.

I had hoped that this day would mark the beginning of a change in the history of British injustice and oppressive occupation of Northern Ireland. Such is not the case. I am deeply disappointed over Prime Minister Thatcher's studied avoidance of the "real" problems plaguing Northern Ireland. This evasion of issues only perpetuates the violence and blood-letting that have horrified those of us who hold human and civil rights as the very definition of human existence and dignity.

I look forward to the day when my colleagues and I will not have to stand up any longer to protest the oppression and violence in Northern Ireland. I look forward to the day when the British Government heeds the call for justice and commits itself to restoring human rights in that troubled land. Until that time, however, I will continue to dedicate my efforts toward securing peace and ensuring a unified Ireland.●

BAD NEWS FOR THE AMERICAN AUTO INDUSTRY

HON. WILLIAM D. FORD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, the reports in the newspaper today that a Cabinet-level committee unanimously recommended that the President let Japan decide whether to continue the so-called voluntary restraints on Japanese auto sales to the United States for a fifth year, are very bad news.

My constituents in the 15th District of Michigan have made it clear to me that they do not feel this is the right time to lift the quotas and allow more Japanese cars to enter the United States. Job losses in the auto industry are estimated anywhere from an immediate 200,000 to an ultimate 800,000 depending on how you count.

About 1 out of every 7 American jobs depends on auto production, so a big drop in U.S. auto production can have a horrendous impact on the whole Nation. At the current time, we are running a $19 billion trade deficit in autos with Japan and reports indicate that Japan has an unused auto capacity for making more than 2 million additional cars a year. The United States is the only open market left in the world, so in the words of UAW President Owen Bieber, "the United States would become the dumping ground for that excess capacity."

I have been receiving mail from across the State of Michigan on this most important matter. One of the letters I received was also sent to President Reagan. It explains the trade problem in realistic terms and is worthy reading:

HIGHLAND
CHRYSLER-PLYMOUTH-IMPORTS,
Grand Rapids, MI, October 29, 1984.

To: The President, Vice President, Cabinet Members, and Members of Congress.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: When you were visiting Detroit, Michigan, you advocated free trade but FAIR trade. Our late president, Dwight D. Eisenhower, said 25 years ago that our trade policies with Japan needed to be revised and updated.

In the authomobile industry, we ask you to immediately equalize our trade policy. What is good for Japan in trade-barriers is good for the United States.

Our company does sell Japanese imports, but justice is more important than the franchise.

Please review this example of injustice:

Import automobiles from Japan to United States	Amount	U.S. Export Automobiles to Japan	Amount
Vehicle cost	$10,000	Vehicle cost	$10,000
Undervaluation of the yen	−(1,200	23 percent added for Japan commodity tax.	+2,300
23 percent reduction for Japan commodity tax.	−(2,300	Shipping cost	+600
Shipping cost	+175	Tariffs	+300
Tariffs	+300	Landing fees, unloading costs, regulation, predelivery service.	+4,000
		Modifications	+1,000
Final U.S. price	6,975	Final Japan price	18,200

Be fair to American Industry and equalize trade agreements.

Also to remind you of other factors:

1. 13.7% of labor and salaries on U.S. cars support our Social Security system—up to the first $37,800.00.

2. Property tax and manufacturing taxes of U.S. industry support education, government, etc.

3. The Import deficit with Japan runs between four and five billion dollars per month, or approximately 50 billion dollars a year. This is counter-productive to our national deficit.

Please do not wait. Implement what you believe in—Fair Trade. We have delayed 25 years too long.

Yours truly,

JAY VAN HOUTEN,
President.

H.R. 1050—"the Made in America Act" is now more important than ever. Passage of this legislation which was introduced by my good friend, Congressman DINGELL and cosponsored by many of us, will help prevent or remedy the serious injury which excessive automobile imports continue to pose for the U.S. economy especially with the cessation of the Voluntary Restraint Agreement with Japan covering passenger vehicles.

Mr. Speaker, as the Chrysler Corp. noted in a recent letter to me:

If the Japanese are allowed to add to their two million car imports in an unfettered matter, a sizeable portion of the U.S. car industry will be lost to the U.S. Congress should note that the damage will immediately extend to the steel, textile, electronics, rubber, plastic and other supplier segments as well. American automobiles are the biggest users and consumers of these products.●

ANATOMY OF A LEAK: UNFORESEEN CONSEQUENCES

HON. HENRY J. HYDE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mr. HYDE. Mr. Speaker, one of the most important responsibilities of the Director of Central Intelligence [DCI] is to protect the sources and methods employed in intelligence gathering. Instructive is the National Security Act of 1947 which established the Central Intelligence Agency and stipulates "that the Director of Central Intelligence shall be responsible for protecting intelligence sources and methods from unauthorized disclosure."

All too often, the importance of this DCI responsibility is dismissed. Indeed, some view it as a tailor-made excuse for the DCI to not be as candid with Congress as many feel he should be. Such a perspective has led to the conclusion that Congress must aggressively insist that the various executive branch intelligence agencies be more forthcoming.

To practice meaningful oversight of the intelligence community, Congress does need to know what is going on in the necessarily clandestine world of intelligence. However, with that need to know goes the overriding responsibility to keep much of that information secret. As Members of Congress, we are often unable to anticipate fully the implications of disclosing sensitive information, but there are those who naively continue to think we can. Illustrative of what I am talking about is discussed in a recent article by Reed Irvine that I am inserting in the RECORD as recommended reading. It appeared in a recent edition of the Washington Times and focuses on the ramifications of a leak that may have sparked the current spy scandal furor in India.

Mr. Irvine's article follows:

WAS THIS INTELLIGENCE SOURCE SILENCED BY MEDIA EXPOSURE?

A small story on Page 19 of The Washington Post of Jan. 23, reported that the French government had recalled one of its diplomats from India after he was implicated in a spy scandal in that country. Two private French citizens who also were reportedly involved already had fled the country.

The Indian government had arrested several high officials in the prime minister's office on charges of providing information to an unidentified foreign power. The home minister told Parliament that it had not yet been determined what foreign intelligence agency was involved.

The story went on to say that the Indian government had been alerted to the espionage operation by stories that had appeared in The Washington Post and The New York Times last Sept 15. The stories concerned a CIA briefing of the Senate Intelligence Committee. They discussed a top-secret recommendation to the prime minister of India by some of her advisers suggesting a preemptive strike against a nuclear reactor in Pakistan. The Indian government deduced that there must have been a leak from the prime minister's office. Surveillance of aides working in the office was begun, with the result that several aides were accused of divulging information to unauthorized foreigners.

The first report of the CIA briefing of the Senate Intelligence Committee appeared on ABC's "World News Tonight" on Sept. 13. Anchorman Peter Jennings read this statement: "There is concern on Capitol Hill tonight about a possible confrontation between India and Pakistan. ABC's John Scali has learned that some senators became alarmed after they learned of a possible Indian attack on a Pakistani nuclear facility. U.S. intelligence authorities insist that no special warning was given to the senators that any attack on the facility was imminent, that this was just one of several trouble spots worth watching closely. There has long been concern in India that Pakistan might be constructing a nuclear device. Pakistan has said it was not."

Two days later, on Sept. 15, Philip Daubman had a long story in The New York Times reporting that Prime Minister Indira Gandhi had received recommendations from some of her senior advisers that India carry out an air strike against the nuclear reactor at Kahuta, Pakistan. The purpose would be to prevent the development of nuclear weapons by the Pakistanis. Mr. Taubman said that both Sens. Barry Goldwater and Daniel Patrick Moynihan had expressed concern about the possibility of an Indian air strike against the Kahuta installation. Mr. Taubman said: "The CIA told the Senate committee, according to two members, that it had learned from a sensitive intelligence source that Mrs. Gandhi received recommendations this year from some senior aides that India attack the Kahuta plant to make sure that the enrichment process was not used for the development of weapons."

The Washington Post story by Don Oberdorfer reported that government officials in Washington had discounted as "alarmist" the ABC News report that Prime Minister Gandhi had been urged by her advisers to attack the Pakistani nuclear installation. Mr. Oberdorfer said some officials noted that the report appeared to come from a CIA briefing of the Senate Intelligence Committee.

It would appear that the CIA had acquired its information from a foreign intelligence agency that had developed valuable assets within the Indian government, a government with close ties to the Soviet Union. The CIA shared that information with senators, and some of them promptly blabbed to the media. The intelligence operation was destroyed, and we can assume that the foreign source will be less willing to share its secrets with the CIA in the future.

Apparently neither the senators nor the journalists worried about what would happen to the sensitive source if the information were made public. The people who run The New York Times said The Washington Post claim that they are qualified to decide what should be kept secret.

Question: Did they blow this operation on purpose or did they goof? ●

NEW ZEALAND AND THE ANZUS ALLIANCE

HON. GUY V. MOLINARI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mr. MOLINARI. Mr. Speaker, I lend my strong support to the actions taken by the administration, including the cancellation of six scheduled military exercises and meetings, against New Zealand in response to its decision to ban port visits of U.S. nuclear-powered/armed ships.

The actions of the Government of New Zealand are totally irresponsible and show a thoughtless disregard for the principle of mutual responsibility of allied nations. Should New Zealand come under attack, the United States would be ready to come to its defense. New Zealand seems to want all the benefits of the alliance while not bearing its fair share of responsibility. The United States carries a tremendous burden protecting freedom around the world and we certainly do not need those who ask for such protection banning U.S. ships in their ports. We cannot let this action set a precedent of accepted behavior around the world.

I hope that the administration will continue to take strong reprisals against New Zealand to send clear and regular signals to that Government on how serious we view its actions. In the absence of some movement by the New Zealand Government to turn the decision around, I believe we should be seriously considering the imposition of trade sanctions. I expect to see growing dissatisfaction here on Capitol Hill with the New Zealanders and know that when we consider any item dealing with New Zealand, they will be three steps behind from the start.

This year's budget contains initial funding for the homeporting of a seven-ship U.S. Navy Surface Action Group in my congressional district of Staten Island, NY. While some have asked about the presence of nuclear weapons on these ships, they have been given the same answer as the New Zealanders: that because of national security imperatives, the United States can neither confirm nor deny the presence of nuclear arms on ships.

The great majority of my constituents, well over 90 percent, support the Navy coming to our community. We recognize our responsibility as a community to the Nation's defense. It is time New Zealand recognizes its responsibilities. Its recent actions are something we do not expect from our allies.●

EXPERTS NOT STARRY EYED ON STAR WARS

HON. BYRON L. DORGAN

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, scratch the administration's strategic defense initiative and you find a dangerous, wastefull, and ridiculous scheme.

That is not the view of an isolated campus radical but of three prominent defense advisers to Republican Presidents.

Lt. Gen. Brent Scowcroft, President Reagan's MX Commission Chairman and President Ford's national security adviser, said the so-called Star Wars proposal makes arms control immensely more complicated. The reason is because the Soviets would not logically reduce their offensive forces in the face of new defensive weapons. Scowcroft also argued that Star Wars would make verification more troublesome.

Dr. James Schlesinger, a former Defense Secretary and arms control adviser to President Reagan, dumped cold water on the notion that Star Wars could provide an airtight defense against Soviet missiles. He also warned that deploying defensive missiles could absorb at least $1 trillion—funds badly needed for conventional weapons.

Ford administration disarmament chief, Gerard Smith, has also warned that deploying a ballistic missile defense could prompt a new dangerous arms race.

Even if the administration found the perfect antiballistic missile defense, it would not protect the United States against the nuclear threat from penetrating manned bombers or low-flying cruise and depressed trajectory missiles. For my money, I would rather invest the $25 billion Star Wars downpayment in conventional forces and in modernizing our deterrent with air-launched cruise missiles.

To help focus the Star Wars debate, I have included for the RECORD articles which pinpoint the objections of defense experts who have served President Reagan and President Ford.

Articles from Science, November 9, 1984, and Los Angeles Times, February 7, 1985, follow:

GENERAL SCOWCROFT CRITICAL OF STAR WARS PROGRAM

(By Robert Scheer)

In a sharp break with the Administration's approach to arms control, Lt. Gen. Brent Scowcroft, the man President Reagan chose to chair his MX Commission, has attacked the "Star Wars" proposal, which the White House has made a centerpiece of its defense budget.

According to Scowcroft, who served as national security adviser to President Gerald R. Ford, the proposal, which is officially known as the Strategic Defense Initiative, will seriously complicate the coming round of arms control negotiations with the Soviet Union.

"There are immense arms control implications because it has been difficult enough to negotiate simply strategic offensive weapons agreements. When you throw defense in, it obviously makes it immensely more complicated," Scowcroft said in a telephone interview.

Scowcroft, the retired Air Force general who last year chaired the commission that Reagan named to evaluate U.S. strategic capabilities, was expanding on remarks scheduled to appear in Perspectives magazine, a publication of the Institute For National Strategy, the Los Angeles-based think-tank founded by former California Gov. Edmund G. Brown Jr.

Scowcroft was responding to the magazine's publication of a previous interview with presidential science adviser George Keyworth, who argued that the development of a strategic defense system is a necessary prelude to a reduction in the number of nuclear weapons.

"Effective arms control does not require defense." Scowcroft argued. "I do not agree with Keyworth there." In the magazine interview, Scowcroft added, "As a practical matter, it would be very difficult to induce the Soviets to reduce their offensive forces if they faced the prospect of a strategic defense for which they might need those offensive forces to penetrate."

Citing the U.S. reaction to earlier Soviet efforts at a defensive system. Scowcroft said in the telephone interview that he disagrees with Keyworth's assertion that defense would facilitate nuclear arms reduction.

"That is unlikely to be true," he explained, because "the most reasonable reaction is quite the opposite. And that, in a sense, is what happened in the late '60s and early '70s when the Soviets moved toward building an ABM system. We increased our offensive forces and went to MIRVs (missiles with multiple independently targeted warheads) in order to maintain the ability to penetrate a defense. I'm not saying the other reaction couldn't take place, but I think it's not—and has not historically—been the normal reaction."

According to Scowcroft, who has served as a U.S. representative to previous arms control negotiations, "It is difficult enough, given the kind of asymmetries between the U.S. strategic forces and the Soviets' strategic forces, to figure out what balancing reductions might be among bombers, submarine missiles and ICBMs. When you add the implications of the possible deployment of a defensive system and how one has to deal with that and how one balances that off against the various offensive systems, it just gets very, very complicated.

Noting that it would take a decade or more for a "Star Wars" system to be developed, Scowcroft suggested that the Soviets would delay any move toward the deep cuts in nuclear arsenals called for by the President until they could assess the effects of the new systems. He added that such systems also would seriously compound problems of verification in any future arms control agreement.

SCHLESINGER ATTACKS STAR WARS PLAN

Despite an aggressive White House marketing campaign, President Reagan's plan to defend the public nuclear missiles—popularly known as his "Star Wars" plan—continues to attract criticism from nuclear weapons experts. This, at least, was one message of a recent conference on space and national security in Bedford, Massachusetts.

A number of speakers at the conference, which was cosponsored by the Air Force and by the MITRE Corporation, a major Air Force contractor, ripped into the program and assailed the President for misleading the public in his initial April 1983 announcement about it. "The heart of Reagan's speech was the promise that someday American cities might indeed be safe from nuclear attack," said James Schlesinger, a former Secretary of Defense and arms control adviser to President Reagan. It is entirely unrealistic, he said. "There is no serious likelihood of removing the nuclear threat from our cities in our lifetime or in the lifetime of our children."

Schlesinger, who received classified briefings on the program as an adviser to the recently dissolved President's Commission on Strategic Forces, said that he doubted whether an effective space-based missile defense could actually be constructed, whether it would be affordable, and whether it would add to global stability. "Any [space] defense is going to suffer some erosion," he said, "and an effective opponent will develop defense suppression techniques and punch a hole in whatever . . . is deployed. . . . Even if we were able to develop a hypothetical leakproof [missile] defense we must bear in mind that there are means of delivering nuclear weapons other than nuclear missiles. I point this out because the United States Air Force has long argued that air defense systems are penetrable." Schlesinger added that the cost of a defensive missile shield would be at least $1 trillion, and that its development would adsorb funds drastically needed by conventional weapons programs.

He noted, however, that continued missile defense research is important, as did virtually all of those attending the meeting. He said that a number of recent Pentagon studies have indicated that a mixture of defensive and offensive weapons can indeed enhance global stability. But "all of these studies rest upon an assumption" that the number of offensive weapons will be constrained at the same time a missile shield is deployed, and it is unlikely that the Soviet Union will agree to such constraints so long as the United States is endeavoring to build the shield—a consummate Catch-22. Finally, Schlesinger said that talk of abandoning nuclear deterrance based on offensive weapons because of its alleged immorality is "reckless," "immature," and "pernicious." "We are going to rest on [this policy] for the balance of our days," he said.

Somewhat less strident criticisms were also voiced by Abram Chayes, a Harvard law professor: Albert Carnesale, academic dean at the John F. Kennedy School of government: and Richard Garwin, a physicist at IBM. Retired Lieutenant General James Stansberry, a former commander of the Air Force Systems Command, gently criticized the program for its failure to have a concrete goal. "I've seen a lot of people spend a lot of money over time, when people didn't know quite what they were up to," he said. He added that the tough questions about the program "haven't been debated enough."

At the meeting, both Lieutenant General James Abrahamson, the director of the missile defense program, and Gerald Yonas, its chief scientific adviser, consciously downplayed any hopes of using it to defend cities. Abrahamson acknowledged that "there is no perfect weapons system, there is no panacea," and Yonas said that the program's only purpose is to "search for technology to see if we can find an alternative to the present system. . . . our program is the President's program."●

A TRIBUTE TO DR. MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR.

HON. TIMOTHY E. WIRTH

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mr. WIRTH. Mr. Speaker, 56 years ago a man was born who moved a nation with four profoundly simple words: "I have a dream." Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., truly represents the best of American leadership, and I would like to pay tribute to him today, as I would have on January 15, had the House been in session.

Mr. Speaker, few men have advanced the cause of justice and affected such deeply rooted change as Dr. King. Endowed with inordinate courage, prescience, and commitment, Dr. King liberated the oppressed and pulled them from the abyss of despair, disaffection, and frustration.

But Martin Luther King was much more than the champion of the downtrodden. Like Jefferson, Lincoln, and other American leaders before him, he was a stalwart of democracy, tirelessly pursuing those basic principles which vouchsafe human dignity and progress.

Mr. Speaker, Dr. King was painfully aware of the sharp incongruity between the American rhetoric of "the inalienable rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," and the ugly reality of racial bigotry and subjugation. With unbounded faith, he dreamed of a unified society, free from that incongruity. He envisioned an American democracy so true to its creed that the whole would be greater than the sum of its parts.

In an era of chaos and explosive racial hostility, Dr. King lived the alternative of peace, unity, and brotherhood. From Montgomery County to the jails of Birmingham, his redemptive spirit turned violence, bitterness, and alienation into nonviolent, constructive social change. In his actions and in his words, he stretched the limits of human achievement.

Dr. King's life was an unrelenting pursuit of a dream that was intensely American. And if his vision represents the American destiny, and I believe it does, Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., will be remembered as the catalyst in the realization of our ideals.

Mr. Speaker, let us carry on the vision of Dr. King, and let us address the issues we face with the same foresight, courage, and integrity which characterized that great man.●

SUBCOMMITTEE ON OVERSIGHT AND INVESTIGATIONS: U.S. ECOLOGISTS AND EVOLUTIONARY BIOLOGISTS LOOK AT THE ENVIRONMENTAL RISKS ASSOCIATED WITH BIOTECHNOLOGY

HON. JOHN D. DINGELL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 20, 1985

● Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, I wish to submit the enclosed article from the December 1984 issue of the Bulletin of the Ecological Society of America for inclusion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. This article discusses the ecological consequences of the deliberate release of genetically engineered microorganisms into the environment. Most important, it outlines a minimum program for the responsible assessment of possible adverse environmental and evolutionary consequences. The article is signed by some of the foremost ecologists and evolutionary biologists in the United States, including James H. Brown (University of Arizona), Robert K. Colwell (University of California at Berkeley), Richard E. Lenski (University of Massachusetts), Bruce R. Levin (University of Chicago), Monte Lloyd (University of Chicago), Philip J. Regal (University of Minnesota), and Daniel Simberloff (Florida State University).

The Subcommittee on Oversight and Investigations of the Energy and Commerce Committee recently held a hearing which looked at these issues, and this is an area of continuing interest to us. I bring this article to the attention of my colleagues because it represents the type of discussion and thought which is needed from this academic discipline and from others concerned with biotechnology. Such approaches should continue to be of great value as we attempt to regulate appropriately this exciting new technology.

[From the Bulletin of the Ecological Society of America, December 1984]

REPORT ON WORKSHOP ON POSSIBLE ECOLOGICAL AND EVOLUTIONARY IMPACTS OF BIOENGINEERED ORGANISMS RELEASED INTO THE ENVIRONMENT

On 28-31 August 1984, seven ecologists and evolutionary biologists from academic institutions participated in an important workshop on the possible risks associated with release of biologically engineered organisms into the environment. The workshop was sponsored by the United States Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) and the Council for Research Planning. Other participants included academic geneticists, scientists from the biotechnology industry, and representatives of Federal regulatory and granting agencies (EPA, OTA, FDA, USDA, USDHHS, NIH, and NSF). The following position paper, adopted unanimously by the ecologists and evolutionary biologists attending the workshop, expresses their concern about possible ecological and evolutionary hazards associated with deliberate or accidental release of genetically engineered organisms and recommends initial steps be taken to assess and minimize these risks.

Of particular interest to ESA members is the fact that the EPA is currently developing procedures for assessing risk and regulating release of genetically engineered organisms. The EPA proposal, which is expected to be completed soon, should appear in the Federal Register and be mailed to many ecologists. Concerned members should watch for this document and make whatever responses they feel appropriate.

The text of the position paper is as follows:

Recent advances in biotechnology offer the potential for producing new varieties of organisms that can have enormous benefits for health, agriculture, and environmental management. On the other hand, there are serious concerns about the possible effects of deliberate or accidental release of genetically engineered organisms into the environment. Such release poses potential adverse consequences for natural and human-modified (e.g., agricultural and urban) ecosystems for the following reasons:

(1) Genetic engineering techniques raise the possibility of creating new varieties of microbes, plants, and animals that may be qualitatively or quantitatively different from the vast majority of variants that are found in nature or that can be produced by conventional biotechnology (e.g., artificial selection).

(2) The results of introductions of exotic species and historical changes in the roles of native species show that natural communities are not saturated, and there are many ways in which new genotypes can become incorporated into the trophic web. The continual evolution of species in communities has not led to perfection or saturation.

(3) Products of biotechnology pose problems different from those of nonliving substances that are released into the environment because genetic material has the capacity to replicate and organisms can increase in numbers and spread into new areas.

(4) It is possible that traits of genetically engineered organisms that have been developed to produce beneficial effects may be transmitted infectiously by plasmids, viruses, or other means to other organisms in which they may have adverse effects.

(5) Since the goal of many applied genetic engineering programs is to produce organisms of novel structure and function, these organisms can be expected to play different ecological roles than their progenitors and relatives. Commercial and academic research programs presently are attempting to develop new varieties that use new substrates for growth and development, modify microenvironments, extend the limits of tolerance of physical conditions, and confer resistance to predators and pathogens.

(6) Engineered organisms can have potentially deleterious environmental impacts by affecting the outcomes of direct interactions among species (including the natural and managed regulations of pests by predators and pathogens), by altering the indirect relationships among species, by influencing the geochemical processes that support all ecosystems, and by changing the rate and direction of the evolutionary responses of species to each other and to their physical and chemical environments.

Because of these considerations, the introduction of novel genotypes produced by genetic engineering requires careful investigation of possible adverse consequences. Both unintended genetic and unanticipated ecological effects are of concern. Quantitative experimental procedures will be needed to evaluate specific concerns in each case. The possible unintended consequences of most concern will depend on the particular kind of organism in question, and the specific characteristics of its intended release. Although the natural environment is so complex that it will not be possible to predict all the adverse effects of this (or any other) technology, ecologists and evolutionary biologists possess sufficient expertise to design and to execute these assessment procedures. Although these will not assure zero risk, they should substantially reduce the likelihood of unanticipated impacts that would be costly or impossible to mitigate.

In order to deal responsibly with the wide spectrum of possible ecological and evolutionary consequences of anticipated biologically engineered organisms, the following constitute a minimum program. Steps to implement these activities should be initiated immediately and pursued vigorously.

While it is our conviction that risk assessment must be on a case by case basis, the following potential adverse effects should always be considered:

1. Genetic:

i. Rate and nature of horizontal (infectious) genetic transmission.

ii. Stability of the engineered genetic change(s) (role of movable genetic elements).

2. Evolutionary:

i. Likelihood and nature of host range shifts.

ii. Likelihood of unregulated propagation.

iii. Likelihood of changes in virulence (parasites and pathogens).

3. Ecological:

i. Effects on competitors.

ii. Effects on prey/hosts/symbionts.

iii. Effects on predators/parasites/ pathogens.

iv. Role of introduced organism as vector of pathogens.

v. Effects on ecosystem processes (biogeochemical effects).

vi. Effects on habitat.

In addition to the need for a prior assessment of the risks associated with the release of genetically engineered organisms, there should also be an effort to so modify these organisms that the potential hazards are minimized. This can be accomplished in one of two ways. (a) When possible to "disarm" the novel organisms ecologically, so that they will not be likely to spread beyond the range where they are intended to be effective. (b) By the incorporation of characters that will facilitate recall (leases), e.g., sensitivity to broad classes of antibiotics and phage for bacteria.

The program of release should be followed by a continuous process of monitoring for changes in the released organisms and the community.

Although risk assessment can be instituted now with present personnel in ecology and molecular biology using available knowledge in these disciplines, there is a need for further basic research and for a larger body of experts in certain areas.

(1) Although there is a sound foundation for assessing the potential adverse consequences of release, there is need for an increased level of basic research into the nature of interactions among coexisting species and the rules by which groups of species are knit together into functioning communities.

(2) Ecologists and evolutionary biologists with expertise on the taxon proposed for release and on the types of target communities must be involved in the study. They also can advise genetic engineers on the design on new genotypes in ways that can fdacilitate the study, and can help to reduce the probability of adverse effects. Thus, there is a general need for increased graduate training in evolution and ecology.

(3) There is a particular need for enhanced training programs in certain ecological and evolutionary areas, such as microbial and soil ecology, to increase the corps of specialists who can participate in these studies.

(4) More basic research is needed on the transfer of genetic information between species by infective and other nonreproductive means in higher organisms.

(5) More research is also needed on the role of movable genetic elements in evolution and adaption, and the possible induction of genomic reorganization and evolutionary volatility.—James H. SENATE COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Title IV of Senate Resolution 4, agreed to by the Senate on February 4, 1977, calls for establishment of a system for a computerized schedule of all meetings and hearings of Senate committees, subcommittees, joint committees, and committees of conference. This title requires all such committees to notify the Office of the Senate Daily Digest—designated by the Rules Committee—of the time, place, and purpose of the meetings, when scheduled, and any cancellations or changes in the meetings as they occur.

As an additional procedure along with the computerization of this information, the Office of the Senate Daily Digest will prepare this information for printing in the Extensions of Remarks section of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on Monday and Wednesday of each week.

Any changes in committee scheduling will be indicated by placement of an asterisk to the left of the name of the unit conducting such meetings.

Meetings scheduled for Thursday, February 21, 1985, may be found in the Daily Digest of today's RECORD.

MEETINGS SCHEDULED

FEBRUARY 22

10:00 a.m.

Budget

To continue hearings in preparation for reporting the first concurrent resolution on the fiscal year 1986 budget.

SD-608

Foreign Relations

To resume hearings, in closed session, to discuss U.S. foreign policy, focusing on U.S./Soviet relations.

S-116, Capitol

Joint Economic

To resume hearings in preparation of its forthcoming annual report.

2172 Rayburn Building

2:00 p.m.

Budget

To continue hearings in preparation for reporting the first concurrent resolution on the fiscal year 1986 budget.

SD-608

FEBRUARY 25

10:00 a.m.

Environment and Public Works

To hold hearings on S. 51, to extend and amend the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation and Liability Act (Superfund) (P.L. 96-510).

SD-406

Small Business

To resume hearings on S. 408, authorizing funds for fiscal years 1986, 1987, and 1988 for the Small Business Administration.

SR-428A

Joint Economic

To hold hearings to review current U.S. agriculture conditions.

SD-G50

11:00 a.m.

Foreign Relations

To resume hearings to discuss American foreign policy, focusing on U.S./Soviet relations and arms control.

SD-419

2:00 p.m.

Armed Services

Closed briefing on strategic doctrine.

SR-222

Foreign Relations

To continue hearings to discuss American foreign policy, focusing on U.S./Soviet relations and arms control.

SD-419

FEBRUARY 26

9:00 a.m.

Appropriations

Interior and Related Agencies Subcommittee

To hold hearings on proposed budget estimates for fiscal year 1986 for the Department of the Interior and related agencies.

SD-124

Appropriations

Labor, Health and Human Services, Education, and Related Agencies Subcommittee

To hold hearings on proposed budget estimates for fiscal year 1986 for the Office of the Secretary of Labor, and the Employment and Training Administration, Department of Labor.

SD-116

Armed Services
To hold hearings on arms control.
SD-G50

Commerce, Science, and Transportation
Science, Technology, and Space Subcommittee
To hold hearings on proposed legislation authorizing funds for fiscal year 1986 for the National Aeronautics and Space Administration.
SR-253

9:30 a.m.
Judiciary
Constitution Subcommittee
To hold hearings to review constitutional issues relating to the proposed Genocide Convention.
SD-226

Veterans' Affairs
To hold joint hearings with the House Committee on Veterans' Affairs to review the legislative priorities of the Disabled American Veterans.
345 Cannon Building

10:00 a.m.
Appropriations
Transportation and Related Agencies Subcommittee
To hold hearings on proposed budget estimates for fiscal year 1986 for the Research and Special Programs Administration and the Office of the Inspector General, Department of Transportation.
SD-138

Environment and Public Works
Business meeting, to markup S. 51, to extend and amend the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation and Liability Act (Superfund) (P.L. 96-510).
SD-406

Foreign Relations
To continue hearings to discuss American foreign policy, focusing on U.S./Soviet relations and arms control.
SD-419

Select on Intelligence
Closed briefing on intelligence matters.
SH-219

2:00 p.m.
Appropriations
Energy and Water Development Subcommittee
To resume hearings on proposed budget estimates for fiscal year 1986 for energy and water development programs, focusing on the Department of the Interior.
SD-192

Armed Services
To hold closed hearings on the maritime threat to U.S. national interests.
SR-222

FEBRUARY 27

9:00 a.m.
Appropriations
Labor, Health and Human Services, Education, and Related Agencies Subcommittee
To hold hearings on proposed budget estimates for fiscal year 1986 for the Labor-Management Services Administration, Employment Standards Administration, and Bureau of Labor Statistics, all of the Department of Labor, and the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation.
SD-116

Armed Services
To hold hearings on the status of the unified commands.
SR-222

Veterans' Affairs
To hold joint hearings with the House Committee on Veterans' Affairs to review the legislative priorities of the Paralyzed Veterans of America, Blinded Veterans of America, Purple Heart, and Vietnam Veterans of America.
334 Cannon Building

9:30 a.m.
Commerce, Science, and Transportation
To hold hearings on the proposed sale by the Department of Transportation of Conrail.
SR-253

Energy and Natural Resources
To hold oversight hearings to review those programs which fall within the jurisdiction of the committee as contained in the President's proposed budget for fiscal year 1986, focusing on the Department of the Interior.
SD-366

Labor and Human Resources
To hold oversight hearings to review labor violence activities, focusing on alleged violence committed by unions against management.
SD-430

10:00 a.m.
Environment and Public Works
To hold hearings on those programs which fall within the jurisdiction of the committee as contained in the President's budget requests for fiscal year 1986, focusing on requests for the Nuclear Regulatory Commission.
SD-406

Foreign Relations
To hold hearings on international economic issues.
SD-419

Select on Indian Affairs
To hold hearings on those programs which fall within the jurisdiction of the committee as contained in the President's budget requests for fiscal year 1986.
SD-538

Select on Intelligence
To resume closed hearings on proposed legislation authorizing funds for fiscal year 1986 for the intelligence community.
